"The frightful number of these unfortunates," remarks in another place the same writer, "will dwindle away as the light of knowledge makes clear the laws which govern our existence. But in the meantime," he urges, "let none of them be lost, let none of them be uncared for,—but whenever the signal is given of a man in distress—no matter how deformed, how vicious, how loathsome even, he may be,—let it be regarded as a call to help a brother."

Under an act of the Massachusetts Legislature, April 11th, 1846, Dr. Howe was appointed chairman of a Committee "to inquire into the condition of the Idiots of the Commonwealth, to ascertain their number and whether anything can be done in their behalf." A report was returned in March, 1847; in the meantime the commissioners had been actively employed, both in personal visits and inspection, and also in extensive correspondence, not only in their own State and country, but in Europe. The result of a second year's labor in this cause was reported to the Legislature in February 1848. The first part of the report contains remarks upon the various definitions of the terms Idiots—Idiocy—upon their numbers, condition and capacities in Massachusetts, followed by many valuable suggestions as to treatment (gentle or harsh) physical care, &c., from which we would gladly quote did the limits of this article permit. Kind and gentle management has been uniformly found in their case as in that of the insane, most beneficial; and illustrative of this we would cite here an affecting instance mentioned in the Supplement to the Report, of an idiot youth of violent and irritable disposition whose parents had endeavored to overcome this temper by corporal punishment but without success. We will give the account in the narrator's own words.

* Report to the Massachusetts Legislature upon Idiocy. The causes and prevention of Idiocy. Coolidge & Wiley, 12 Water St. Boston.

"The father spared not the rod, but healed not the child who, on the contrary, grew worse and worse. The lessons in punishment were not lost upon him. Whatever object offended him he would beat and punish just as he had been punished. If it were a tool of any kind he would smash and break it in pieces; if it were a dumb beast he would beat and abuse it.

"It happened one day that a zealous member of the Peace Society was a visitor at the house and witnessed a scene of contest in which the father barely came off victor. The visitor urged the father to follow a different course with his unfortunate son, to abandon all blows, all direct use of force and try mild measures. By his advice Johnny was made to understand that if he should commit a certain offence he would be mildly and kindly remonstrated with, have nothing but bread and water for supper and be obliged to lie upon the floor with only a little straw under him. Very soon he began to practice this mode of punishment upon the cattle. If the cow offended him, instead of flying into a passion and beating her, he addressed her gravely, telling her the nature of her offences, and assuring her of the consequences. He would then lead her out, lay some straw upon the ground, bring a little water and a crust of bread, and tell her that was all she could have for supper. One day being in the field he hurt his foot with the rake, and instead of getting angry as he was wont to do and breaking the instrument to pieces, he took it up mildly but firmly, carried it home, got some straw and laid the offending tool upon it; then he brought some bread and water, and demurely told the offender that it had been very naughty—that he did not want to hurt it—but it should have no other supper and no bed to lie on.

"By such means he has been much improved, not only in behavior but in temper. He is growing less violent and more manageable every day."

Truly—"he that feareth is not made perfect in love."

The first attempt in Europe for the education of Idiots is thus noticed by Dr. Howe—"It is a singular and interesting fact that the first regular attempt upon record to educate an idiot was made with a view to prove the truth of the theory of the sensualist school of philosophy which was so much in favor, in France, during the Revolution. A wild boy who had been found in the forest, was brought to Paris and became famous as the Savage of Aveyron. Great was the delight of the wise men when they found that this man could not speak any human tongue, and was devoid of understanding and knowledge. The celebrated Itard undertook to teach him, and it was expected that he would prove that all our ideas are derived immediately from the senses and that our mental faculties are only sensations transformed. According to the theory, by causing certain sensations, certain ideas would be generated, and from these a given character produced. No one was better fitted than Itard for giving the experiment a fair trial, and he labored as far as man can whose feet are upon moving sand. But it was all in vain, and would have been nearly in vain under any system, for it became evident that the supposed savage was only an idiot. Itard, however, was not merely a philosopher, but a man of humanity, he became interested in the subject and followed up his attempts to instruct this poor creature with great zeal and ability for several years, and his labor was not lost. He saw what might be done for idiots and his thoughts and hints have been since acted upon by a disciple worthy of such a master—Mr. Edward Séguin."

Dr. Howe also mentions the praiseworthy efforts of Dr. Belhomme, of Paris, Mons. Ferrus, Mr. Falret, and Dr. Voisin. Their principal exertions have been made since the year 1824. "It is however," says Dr. Howe, "due to Edward Séguin to say that to him, more than to any other person, seems to be owing the great and rapid improvement which has been made in the art of teaching and training idiots. He has labored with that enthusiasm and zeal in a beloved object which almost always ensures success. He has put forth a degree of courage, energy and perseverance, which, if exerted in the art of destroying men and cities would have covered his breast with those crosses and decorations and tawdry baubles, so highly prized by vulgar minds. But how utterly worthless would be such tokens of excellence in a bloody and barbarous art compared with the high reward of an approving conscience which must ever follow labors of love in the field of beneficence. We do not know that Seguin has a title; but surely one of field-marshal or peer of France, which might have been given at the whim of a man, could never equal in true honor that of friend and benefactor of the most afflicted of the human race; a title which he has gained by long years of patient toil, and which shall be held in honor when that of destroyer shall cease to be prized by any but barbarians."

Extracts are also made from letters describing the schools for Idiots—from those of Dr. Conolly and Mr. Sumner, already quoted by the correspondent of the Messenger, and which we therefore omit here, proceeding at once with Dr. Howe's appeal—

"No systematic efforts," says he, "have yet been made in this country to teach a class of these sorely bereaved creatures, but individual efforts have not been wanting in Massachusetts. The success here obtained for the first time in the education of persons who by the English law are considered to be necessarily idiots as 'wanting all those senses which furnish the human mind with ideas,' has encouraged attempts to educate idiots.* The results thus far are most satisfactory. In view of all these circumstances, we earnestly recommend that measures be at once taken to rescue this most unfortunate class from the dreadful degradation in which they now grovel.

"It is true that the plea of ignorance can be made in excuse for the neglect and ill-treatment which they have hitherto received; but this plea can avail us no longer. Other countries have shown us that idiots may be trained to habits of industry, cleanliness and self-respect; that the highest of them may be measurably restored to self-control, and that the very lowest of them may be raised from the slough of animal pollution in which they wallow; and can the men of other countries do more than we? Shall we who can transmute granite and ice into gold and silver, and think it pleasant work, shall we shrink from the higher task of transforming brutish men back into human shape? Other countries are beginning to rescue their idiots from further deterioration and even to elevate them, and shall our Commonwealth continue to bury the humble talent of lowly children committed to her motherly care, and let it rot in the earth, or shall she do all that can be done to render it back with usury to Him who lent it? There should be no doubt about the answer to these questions. The humanity and justice of our rulers will prompt them to take immediate measures for the formation of a school, or schools, for the instruction and training of idiots."

Acting upon these suggestions of their Commissioners, the Legislature of Massachusetts appropriated the sum of $2,500, annually, for three years, to try the experiment of education upon ten idiots. Mr. James B. Richards, who was appointed teacher, visited the schools in Europe, to derive such information as might aid him in his task, and in October, 1848, began his labors with four pupils, whose number has since increased to eleven—all of them boys. The establishment is under the supervision of Dr. Howe, and under the same roof with the Perkins Institute for the Blind,—a large and commodious building, occupying an airy and delightful position upon that part of South Boston known as Mt. Washington.

The benefits of the Institution are not limited to the ten for whom the present fund provides,—private pupils being also received.

The school is yet in its infancy—only seven months having elapsed since its commencement. No report of its progress therefore has been offered to the public, but we are happy to lay before our readers such information as a recent visit thither afforded us.

The unfortunate children who a few months since were unable to control their limbs, had no idea of size, form, or number, we found seated at desks, of the usual kind, and when called upon to do so by their teacher, stood up before the black-board, on which was printed in chalk part of the alphabet, designated the letters, and combined them into words of three letters. After this they proceeded to exercises which would enable them to control and direct their muscles at the example of the teacher; such as folding their arms across the chest, placing them at the side, and extending them—the lessons not having been yet applied to the use of the left arm or of the feet. In the room were also placed ladders which they were taught to climb; (a straw mattress being placed on the floor to prevent injury in case of any falling.) Pupils who, when first received into the school, manifested much timidity, and indeed almost entire inability to mount one step, are now climbing up and down with facility, and seem to enjoy their newly acquired knowledge. One child who, on his arrival, knew the names of but four objects, and was not able to bring any of them when called for, went for several articles when sent, brought the teacher's hat when told, placed it on his head, and gave other indications of improvement. It should be remembered that these pupils were for the most part apparently from six to ten years of age, selected from pauper families, and suffering when brought to the school from every disadvantage and neglect.

* Two blind idiots are under training at the Institution for the Blind in Boston.

One child only is incapable of using his lower limbs; but Mr. Richards hopes to find him much improved in that respect in the course of a couple of months more; his other faculties had made sufficient progress to excite the wonder and gratitude of his father, who burst into tears, on marking his improvement when he visited him a few weeks since.

The school, as we have before stated, is but an experiment, and a recent one; but its results are such as to encourage renewed and continued exertion. Shall not little ones like these whom a few months has seen so far reclaimed from their miserably abject state, as to be at least "fed and clothed," be at length found sitting at the feet of Jesus and in their right mind? Yes, truly; in the heavenly home they shall; but let us hope with striving for such a state of things even here!

We have collected the above statements, not in boast of what has been done, but to show what may and ought to be done. And, we ask in conclusion, what will our other States do in behalf of these, their desolate, and helpless children? Let those whose voices may be heard in our public councils protest in the name of humanity, against a neglect which leaves, sunk in degradation, any portion of our population!

As surely as the good seed is sown in faith, so surely shall the sunshine of God's grace, and the dew of his blessing descend upon it, till it bring forth an harvest.

We know that the work is not one of weeks, or months, but of years—years too, of long, unremitting, patient toil, but—shall it not be undertaken? We doubt not that true-hearted ones will rise up in our midst ready to devote themselves, with an heroic patience, to the prosecution of this truly noble enterprise—whose reward shall be great, for they shall be called the children of the Highest!

M. F. D.

Boston, Mass.

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

GEO. P. PUTNAM has published during the past month, several charming works which deserve honorable mention. "The Crayon Miscellany," forming volume IX. of the new edition of Irving's Complete Works, will be welcomed heartily by those who have enriched their shelves with the previous volumes of the series. Our readers will be pleased to know that a similar republication of Cooper's Works has been begun; the first volume, "The Spy," being now before us. This remarkable romance, which at once established the author's reputation at the time of its first appearance, presents in its new and beautiful garb a refreshing contrast to the more recent productions of Mr. Cooper. It is indeed seemly that such a book should be preserved in a handsome Library edition. "Last Leaves of American History" is the title of an excellent little narrative by Mrs. Willard, comprising histories of the late war with Mexico and of the California Territory. Mrs. Willard's reputation as a vigorous and elegant writer is fully sustained in her manner of treating these subjects, although the sketch of the war is much too rapid, and, while results are given with sufficient accuracy, instances of individual gallantry are almost wholly passed over. "The California and Oregon Trail," by Francis Parkman, Jr., contains some agreeable sketches of life on the prairie and in the Rocky Mountains. Such scenes as he describes are being daily witnessed by the multitudes now on their way to California, and we can only wish that some of these emigrants may make as good books of their travels as Mr. Parkman has done. "The Genius of Italy," by the Rev. Robert Turnbull, we have perused with interest and pleasure. The author's style is flowing and rhythmical, and throws an air of freshness around the Vatican and the Apennines, the treasures of art and the glories of landscape, that have been so frequently described by tourists since Beckford lingered amongst them. Perhaps the most striking work of the month, is Mr. Curzon's "Monasteries of the Levant," wherein we find an account of an Eastern pilgrimage of a somewhat novel character. Oriental objects, natural and artificial, have been as extensively written about by travellers as Italian sunsets, but we do not recollect to have seen any narrative of the interior life of those old monastic establishments of the East, so full of acceptable information as the one before us. As to the style of these works, it is sufficient to say that their typography is in all respects similar to Mr. Putnam's usual publications. They are for sale by A. Morris and Nash & Woodhouse.

RAPHAEL: or Pages of the Book of Life at Twenty. By Alphonse De Lamartine. Author of the "History of the Girondists," &c. New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers. 82 Cliff Street.

It may seem rather late in the day to give our readers a notice of this book. But we have an ample apology in the facts of the case. It was put into the hands of the proper critic, who after reading it fell into a comatose state, from which he was rescued only by the utmost skill on the part of judicious physicians. He recovered sufficiently to mutter some such phrase as "puerile rhapsody" or "blasphemy"—we could not rightly understand which. As the medical attendants forbade any conversation on the subject, we were under the necessity of looking into the book ourselves, and find the story to be somewhat as follows—

Raphael, (who is the author as far as we could judge,) goes to the baths for his health. He is four-and-twenty and excessively handsome. Of course he is brimful of romances. All handsome people are. He there sees a young woman bent on the same pursuit of health as himself, as handsome as he is, and to the full as poetic. She is a mystery to everybody—and either for that reason, or for some other equally good, Mr. Raphaël delivers himself up soul and body as her captive. But his altar is erected to an unknown goddess. At the proper time, however, just when his passion has reached a frantic pitch, the Destinies who preside over novels and their heroes and heroines, step in and declare who it is that he so ignorantly worships. She is fond of boating—gets upset. He rescues her. They pass the night in some fisherman's dilapidated hut—and he then discovers that she is the wife of an elderly physician, who gives her the largest kind of liberty—and that she is an Atheist. This latter discovery shocks him beyond measure, for he is a Christian. The narrative is then subsequently composed chiefly of his efforts to convert her to the true faith—in which he finally succeeds—and the conversion and its announcement form perhaps one of the most amusing scenes in the book. They then die in due season, and the book closes abruptly, with a hint, however, that, (as the razor-strop man says,) "there are a few more of the same sort left." The idea of a Christian man, as portrayed in the character of Raphaël, is certainly not intended as genuine, but is probably meant as an exquisite satire upon the pretenders to "pure religion and undefiled," for this Christian hero wastes his time, pinches his whole family, pawns his mother's last jewels, sponges on his friends, and all for the purpose of gratifying his fancy for the too charming wife and Atheist; a character which may be regarded as doubtful in morals, to say nothing of Christianity.

The book, however, appears to be the work of a man, who feeling that he has made show enough in the world to entitle him to a notice in Biographical Dictionaries, resolves to be understood—and accordingly writes an account of himself before he appeared on the scene of action—not an account of himself as he really then was, but of what he now wishes the world to think him to have then been. It accordingly results in as vainglorious a piece of folly as we have ever seen—and it is difficult to reconcile in one's mind the author of this book with the heroic talker of the Revolution of 1848. He says that Thucydides had the formation of his mind. If this be so, we can only say, that in the present instance, that very respectable individual appears as literary grandfather to a very melancholy abortion.

The book can be had at all the cheap bookstores.

RURAL LETTERS and other Records of THOUGHTS AT LEISURE, Written in the Intervals of More Hurried Literary Labor. By N. Parker Willis. New York: Baker & Scribner, No. 145 Nassau Street and 36 Park Row. 1849.

What we say about Willis we wish to be read,
So we publish it under our critical head,
And the better to rivet attention from you,
We make it, kind reader, a rhyming review.

The volume in muslin before us contains
Not the very best produce of Willis's brains,
But at least as agreeable reading in prose
As ever was written in couleur de rose,
There are many good hits in the "Letters from under
A Bridge," which excited the Gothamite's wonder,
How a dashing young cit could so easily pen
The delightfulest jottings from greenwood and glen,

And marked out their author as something between a
New York Horace Walpole and Madame Savigné.
Yet his charming descriptions of life in the woods,—
Where nothing of city disturbance intrudes,—
Have much of a light, metropolitan air
That smacks of the region of Grosvenor Square.
If he mentions his pumpkins, his pigs, or his hay,
He mixes up with them the Rue de la Paix,
The oriole, pouring its song on the breeze,
Is a feathered Rubini engaged for the trees,
And the calm Susquehannah's bright waves as they move,
Do but serve to remind him of Blessington's glove.*
Of such elegant trifles we do not complain,
For like bubbles that rise to the top of champagne,
They give effervescence and life to his style,
And cause it to sparkle more brightly the while.
Altogether, the volume's a capital thing,
A dish of belles-lettres too good for a king,
It is spirited, droll, in a word it is Willisy,
Just the book to be read in the summer sub ilice!

Now for Willis's books we had always a liking,
There's something about them so wondrously striking,
Though conceits often mar the effect of his thought
And he deals in queer phrases much more than he ought,
And his slanderers say that he printed, the sinner,
What was said by the belle that sat next him at dinner, (En passant we never gave heed to a charge,
Which the Pencilings cannot establish at large.)
This it was that made Willis the talk of the town,
When in London they ventured to scribble him down;
There was Lockhart, that terrible Quarterly man,
Who at once to abuse and berate him began,
And declared that his publisher never could sell any Sheets of the second edition of Melanie,
(That's the way we pronounce it, although we agree
That the author himself calls the word Mel-a-nie.)
Yet in spite of †Pete Morris and all his abettors,
He turned out a new Esterbazy of letters,
For he scatters his brilliants wherever he wanders,
Whether down through the Broadway of prose he meanders,
Or trips with a livelier measure along
The shining Fifth Avenue trottoir of song!
There are times, too, when Willis asserts his control
O'er the purest emotions that ruffle the soul,—
When to bosoms that murmur, his verses reply
With those sweet consolations that moisten the eye,
And those graces beyond the perfection of art,
Which gush from a warm and benevolent heart!

But to leave this digression and get to our book,
There's one affectation we can't overlook,
'Tis the name of the author itself which we see
"N. Parker" instead of the simple "N. P."
At this we let fly all our critica epacula,
'Twere better the letters meant N-othing P-articular.
Now this middle cognomen, this Parker intrusion,
Disabuses our mind of a happy illusion,
For we always imagined, our author should know it,
N. P. was the Latin for being born‡ poet!

But enough; lest our lines anapestic get worse,
We here put a stop to our critical verse,
Which, though often its feet sadly stumble and go ill,
Is as good as the "Fable for Critics" by Lowell.

* Page 62.

† Peter's Letters to his Kinsfolk.

‡ Nascitur Poeta.

RURAL SPORTS. A Tale—in 4 parts. By J. B. Jones. Philadelphia: Charles Marshall. 1849.

We owe to the author or publisher our thanks for this poem, and we feel bound to take some notice of its merits.

The work is strikingly original. Its object is to show the superiority of tranquil rural life over the carking cares and exhausting tumults of political ambition. And no one can fail to be struck with the extraordinary novelty of such an attempt. Nor is the pleasant surprise less, when we come to the details of the narrative, which present the hitherto unsung enjoyments of the chase, the fishing-rod, the fields, the flocks, the poultry yard, and the thousand other sources of 'rural felicity,' which nobody ever heard of before. The hero, moreover, Charles Longfield, is a very remarkable man. He is "a mortal stern, whose will had shaped his fate," but who grew dissatisfied with his own work, and retired into the country "to reign" over his wife, children, and other property, "in uncontested sway enthroned on his own soil," utterly defying writs of right, ejectments, and notices to quit. One bad effect, however, has been produced by the wild course of life, so mysteriously hinted at—he is much addicted to rambling about all day with his dog and gun, and indulges an insatiable thirst for blood—the blood of hares, partridges, and woodcocks. His wife, unfortunately, is something of a Grahamite in theory, and has conscientious scruples about eating meat: though the calls of appetite invariably prove too strong for her principles, and as the poet in hand most gracefully sings,

"E'en her voracious pearls right fondly cling
To breast of partridge, or a pheasant's wing."

But another cause of disquiet is soon added to her antivivorous misgivings. Charles at the "Haunted Hill" (another unprecedented feature in the tale) falls in with a "Black Lady's" foot-prints, finds an inscription on a beech tree (more marvels!) addressed to him, and picks up a handkerchief, which had brought his sagacious Ponto to a dead point! Our hero is a very faithful spouse when his wife is at his elbow, but is, nevertheless, mightily disturbed by these phenomena, when alone in the woods. Nor can he altogether shake off the effect when he gets home. After the children are put to bed—when Delia and himself are comfortably seated in great cushioned chairs—with a cricket apiece on the hearth—and two kittens (for symmetry) playing on the carpet—his moody looks are remarked by his wife, and the cause inquired. Here we must admit that something like plagiarism does appear: for Delia proceeds, in a style worthy of Mrs. Caudle herself, to "worm it out of Johnny," and to "do the tragics" naturally consequent upon such a discovery. He produces the handkerchief—she snatches it up with a pair of tongs—holds it over the fire, till it turns black, and somehow displays most appalling pictures of cypress wreaths, snakes, and skull-bones—and then consigns it to the flames, which do most unexpectedly consume it. "Charles gazed in wonder:" but recalling what he had read in Turner's Chemistry, or "Knowledge for the people," about sympathetic inks, he very logically concludes the thing to be a contrivance of some rustic Dalilah, intent upon seducing him from his marital allegiance.

The result is, however, that he goes no more a hunting and is bound by a solemn pledge never to visit the "Haunted Hill," except under escort of his help-mate. The armistice with the beasts and birds feræ naturæ, is extended to the domestic animals—

"And duck and gobbler, squab and waddling goose,
Were all forbidden to be slain for use;
Next sav'ry beef and hacon took their turn;
Why should such creatures bleed for us, and burn?"

This state of things, however, could not last always. The spirit, indeed, was willing but the flesh was weak. For —Delia hungered, and in secret sighed

For turkey roasted, or fat rabbit fried: * *
At length one day she saw a barrow pluck
The head away from a short-winded duck:
'Speed Charles,' she cried, 'there's something we may eat;
Bring it away for dinner, I entreat!'"

The ice once broken, things went on swimmingly—the "married lovers," in concert, ate the duck; but we grieve to say that Charles "gulped down" the lion's share, and of the residue the children got little or nothing. It was resolved to renew hostilities; and the very next day our sportsman murdered in cold blood, and on the ground, a whole flock of partridges at a single shot, to the unspeakable disgust of the high-souled and generous Ponto. Even the fishes are not secure: and he is assisted by the partner of his bosom, and the interesting pledges of their affection, in netting minnows, and hooking bass, pike and spotted trout, without the slightest remorse or compunction. It must be admitted that the character of our heroine presents one trait, never before illustrated in works of fiction. Generally speaking, heroines never eat; but, if we may employ a most appropriate phrase of modern invention, our Delia "don't do any thing else!"

We own that we were extremely apprehensive all this time for the wedded bliss of this amiable pair; and we dreaded to learn the issue of the adventure with the Black Lady. But our fears were groundless. After some days of killing and feasting, Delia trots out her husband according to promise to the Haunted Hill; dismisses him and the dog to hunt one way, while she goes another, and charges him if he shall take the game in question, to hold fast, and on no account to lift her veil, until she herself shall be present. Ponto soon brings the lady to bay—Charles rushes forward and finds her arrayed, not in black, but white: he forgets his pledge to his wife, and begs for one peep before her arrival: the request is granted, the veil withdrawn, and Delia stands before him—the arch contriver of all the disablerie!

A cynical friend of ours suggests as a motto for the end of the tale, which we have now reached, but we vehemently protest against the supposed resemblance, and doubt not that Lord Byron himself, were he alive, would disclaim it. Our author may unquestionably say, with Touchstone, "a poor thing, sir—but mine own."

"The phantom of her frolic grace, Fitz-Fulke!"

The versification of this poem is very orthodox in the main, especially the rhymes: we have "kiss and bliss,"—"eye and try,"—"go and low,"—"birds and words,"—"sport and report," and the like, with only occasional exceptions. But in the syntax and prosody the poetic license is indulged with more freedom. For example "fire" is twice (at least) made a disyllable, as if fi-er.

—"Strange forms of fi-er o'er the ascent played"—

—"The lamp is out, the fi-er feebler glows"—

There is also a liberal use of ellipsis, which sometimes leaves the reader in doubt about antecedents and relatives, nominative cases and verbs, as thus—man and dog are approaching birds—

"With steady nerve our Charles advances slow:
His dog sagacious, softly crouches low;
Whirring they fly—the acme of the sport;
His fi-er—they fall—a bird at each report!"

Now, if this be read according to Lindley Murray, the story merits a place in Ovid's Metamorphoses. For, at the very instant when we expect to flush the covey of partridges, Charles and Ponto fly whirring instead of the birds, Charles lets off both barrels, commits murder and suicide successively, and drops down with his dog, "a bird at each report." Nor is this all—for in the next line they are up again—

"He marks the rest pitch on the fallow plain, While dashing Ponto gathers up the slain!"

himself included. This is not a bad use of the western idiom, which describes a person about to make unusual exertions, as "gathering himself"—"humping himself," &c. Immediately after, we are told—

"The gun re-charged, deposited the birds,
Bestowed upon the pointer cheering words,
Charles leaps the hedge and through the stubble goes
To where the frightened fugitives repose.
Healthful and strong, by keen excitement flushed,
Each care that rose beneath his heel was crushed;
Pursued his lawful sport with rare delight
Repressing pity with the sense of right."

The gun, it would seem, did not escape the magic influences of the time and place. Being re-charged, and apparently overcharged, it quietly deposited the birds, and addressed some cheering words to poor Ponto: a very considerate thing of the gun, inasmuch as it had just before turned Ponto into a dead partridge. Meanwhile Charles leaps over the hedge into the stubble, and crushes beneath his heel "each care that rose," (like evil weeds as they were,) no matter "how healthful and strong, by keen excitement flushed." Happy man! to have "healthful cares," and be able to crush even them with his heel—in a stubble field! He was happy also in pursuing his "lawful sport," without dread of a suit for trespass, or an indictment for killing game out of season. And lastly, he was happy in the possession of that Roman firmness, which enabled him to repress his pity with the sense of right; and to extract even a "rare delight" from the reluctant discharge of the painful duty, which obliged him to shoot partridges and molly-cotton-tails!

Long may Charles Longfield, Esq. "reign" over his elastic domains, where "Orchard and garden, field and gentle mead, Cluster around, or far their acres spread."

Long may he repose beneath the shade of his venerable, though somewhat oblivious, trees—

"The ancient oaks, tall, towering to the skies,
Last landmarks of forgotten histories."

May he often gaze abroad, with his well-fed wife at his side, from that "fancy" porch and balcony, of curious texture,

"With trellised vines fantastically wove."

And when the romantic pair have any more adventures, may they be commemorated by the muse of Jones, and a copy of the volume containing them be transmitted to the Messenger.

ASTORIA: or Anecdotes of an Enterprise beyond the Rocky Mountains. By Washington Irving. New York: George P. Putnam. 1849.

It is enough to say that this is another volume of the handsome reprint of Irving's works, in the course of publication by Mr. Putnam, and that it is equal to those which have preceded it.

LES CONFIDENCES. Par M. A. de Lamartine. New York—D. Appleton et compagnie. Philadelphia—Geo. S. Appleton.

CONFIDENTIAL DISCLOSURES, or Memoirs of my Youth, by Alphonse de Lamartine. Translated by Eugene Plunkett. New York, D. Appleton & Co. 1849.

The Publishers have thought proper to head this book, or at least the translation of it, with an extra line of capitals styling it "Lamartine's remarkable book." Whether this be a trick of the trade on the part of those enterprising bibliopoles—the Appletons—or a bit of self-glorification on the part of Mr. Plunkett, we know not. It served in part, however, to seduce us into a glance at Mr. Lamartine's exposures of himself, though we had mentally forsworn every thing from his pen after a taste of the pages of Raphaël.

As we have headed our notice with the title-pages of both the original and translation—the picture and its "counterfeit presentment"—we must of course say something of the mode in which the translation is executed. Mr. Plunkett has done well on the whole, though it is manifest that he has endeavored to translate with spirit rather than with fidelity. This we regard as by no means a venial fault in a translator, especially where the author rendered is peculiarly idiomatic and antithetical as Lamartine. He affects to write in a species of prose-poetry, of which no foreign reader, not understanding the language, can have an idea unless the translation is strictly literal.

We are aware that the relative advantages of free and literal translation constitute a debateable point, a resata quaestio, in the world of letters. Much, as in all like cases, has been said upon both sides. But we confess that we are covetous of an acquaintance with the author—not such as he would be when trimmed and fashioned to suit our tastes, fancies and peculiarities, whether national or educational, but such as he is,—such as he would appear to us were we to "transport ourselves over to him, and adopt his situation, his mode of speaking, his idiosyncracies."* Style is as much a part and parcel of a literary man, or his works, as the ideas themselves which he expresses. Without it we can have no idea of the individual. As well give us the countenance of a person without his expression, give us his mere features, as to give us the book of a man without his style—his ideas without the peculiar mode in which he utters them. This can only be done by a rigorous, amounting almost to a reckless, adherence to strict literal translation. In this respect Mr. Plunkett has failed, though we think he has produced a book quite as readable as the original.

We confess that we are like to prove but sorry critics of this "remarkable work." The day has gone by with us when feverish sentimentality and transcendental longings held mighty power over our soul. At sixteen "Les Confidences" might have enraptured us, for at sixteen we were deeply read in Carlyle and learned in Goethe—knew something of Jean Paul and could chatter as fluently of the sufferings of our bit of humanity as a New England Miss or member of "The Boston Mutual Adulation Club." But at the period of this present writing, we have years enough over our head and have seen sufficient of this naughty world of ours to cause us to lay aside some of the frivolity and nonsense of our boyhood, and to forget some of our childish "hoverings towards the far-away, loving stars of bliss-giving grace."† The sad result is that in these later days, we are somewhat disposed to scan closely the morals of a book, and to ask in a true cu bono spirit, whether or no man is likely to profit by the publication of this, that or the other "remarkable work,"—to consider whose soul may be enlightened—whose heart gladdened by its perusal—to feel that we stand as watchmen on the walls of the literary Zion, commissioned to tell "what of the night" as well as when "the day cometh." But to the book.

* Goethe—Austin's Characteristics, vol. 1, p. 23—34.

† Faust.

The book itself is written for the avowed purpose, (if we may trust the opening paragraph of Note I, Book I,) of disclosing to the world the author's "past life,"—of opening up "those living and hidden streams of existence, his feelings and thoughts"—and thus presenting himself to his age and posterity as he would wish to be viewed. Now we quarrel with no man for "putting his best foot foremost." We try to do it ourselves sometimes. Certainly we think others have a right to exercise this privilege, at least, so long as the world continues its present free use of detraction and censure. But we do blame Mr. Lamartine—and blame him very decidedly—for taking three years, (see Preface,) to paint his own portrait, and then representing himself in a fashion so discreditable alike to the Poet and the Man.

Such an assertion may perhaps strike some of our readers who have perused the book, or may hereafter read it, as strange. Nevertheless we affirm its correctness, and base it on Mr. Lamartine's own showing. True, this book as well as its companion Raphaël, contains much in which he endeavors to exhibit himself as the affectionate son, the high-minded man, the true-hearted Christian. But the Pharisee who went up to the Temple to pray at the same time with the Publican, gravely informed the All-seeing Deity whom he addressed, that he was without spot or blemish; and yet in spite of the numerous claims to merit which he urged, an All-wise Power exercised a just discrimination between the self-righteous man and the humiliated sinner who stood afar off and lifted not up his eyes. So too a discerning eye will readily discover that the almost perfect character which our author so freely ascribes to himself is more the result of his imagination, as guided by his subsequent experience, than supported by the facts (so-called) which he presents. We would not be considered as unjustly harsh, but we frankly confess that we have risen from the perusal of this work, disgusted, perhaps irritated, with the author and the portrait of himself which he has limned.

Mr. Lamartine has asserted in his Raphaël, when speaking of Rousseau, that the first love of a man always marks his character in subsequent life—and that therein may the history of that early attachment be read.* We will assume this to be true—and then refer our readers, by way of sustaining our somewhat strongly expressed opinion, to the story of Graziella, that forms so large a portion of these Confidences, over which Mr. Lamartine pondered for three years before he submitted them to the gaze of a critical public.

The story is briefly this. Lamartine, aged eighteen, and friend, aged twenty,—which friend, by the way, is honored with a passing notice as curt as need be,—fall in with a fisherman, very pious, in his simple way, honest and upright, and resolve to take a roving excursion with him in the Bay of Naples and its vicinity. Their excursion lasts two months, and is suddenly brought to a termination by a storm which, about midnight, swamps the boat just off the shore of Procida, where the Fisherman resides. To his humble hut they are taken, and here our hero† and his readers are introduced to Graziella, the fisherman's granddaughter. Her night-dress, which she has not had time to arrange, discloses a tall and slender form,

"With vernal bosom springing into view."

Large oval eyes, blue-black,—round cheeks, rich lips and

* Note XLII.

† Note XII of the Episode.

beautiful teeth, together with tresses gloriously luxuriant and dark as the raven's wing, complete the picture,—which, by the way, is seen from a distance on a stormy night. In this hut Lamartine spends months, and his whole occupation seems to have been, by every way and means, to win the affections of this half child, half girl,—whose heart and soul would appear to have been far more lovely than her person. We can not dwell here upon the details—suffices it to say that he succeeded, and that but too effectually. The time came for her to be betrothed to a young man ardently attached to her, one whose fortune and character were such as to render him a most desirable partner for life. Urged on the one hand by filial love, duty and gratitude, to accept a lover who would make her happy and respectable, and render the declining years of her aged and toil-worn grandparents easy and comfortable,—her heart on the other hand loudly telling her that her affections were elsewhere bestowed, that the vows of the altar could give only a lifeless form whose spirit was linked to another's,—revolting with her nobility of principle from a falsehood, yet yearning to comply as became a dutiful daughter,—the soul of the poor child was rent in pieces by the conflict. Her reason deserted her. She rushed from a home where she was adored; long search was made,—and at last the author of this calamity discovers her in an old, deserted stone house, far away from those who loved her so fondly: and thus he found her—

La petite lampe rallumée devant la madone par Graziella l'éclairait d'une faible lueur. Je courus au fond de la seconde chambre où j'avais entendu sa voix et sa chute, et où je la croyais évanouie. Elle ne l'était pas. Seulement sa faiblesse avait trahi son effort; elle était retombée sur le tas de bruyère sèche qui lui servait de lit, et joignait les mains en me regardant. Ses yeux animés par la fièvre, ouverts par l'étonnement et allanguis par l'amour, brillaient fixes comme deux étoiles dont les lueurs tombent du ciel, et qui semblent vous regarder au fond de l'eau.

Sa tête, qu'elle cherchait à relever, retombait de faiblesse sur les feuilles, renversée en arrière et comme brisée par un coup de hache. Elle était pâle comme l'agonie, excepté sur les pommettes des joues teintes de quelques vives roses. Sa belle peau était marbrée de taches de larmes et de la poussière qui s'y était attachée. Son vêtement noir se confondait avec la couleur brune des feuilles répandues à terre et sur lesquelles elle était couchée. Ses pieds nus, blancs comme le marbre, dépassaient de toute leur longueur le tas de fougère et reposaient sur la pierre. Des frissons couraient sur tous ses membres et faisaient claquer ses dents comme des castagnettes dans une main d'enfant. Le mouchoir rouge qui enveloppait ordinairement les longues tresses noires de ses beaux cheveux était détaché et étendu comme un demivoile sur son front jusqu'au bord de ses yeux. On voyait qu'elle s'en était servie pour ensevelir son visage et ses larmes dans l'ombre, comme dans l'immobilité anticipée d'un lincoln, et qu'elle ne l'avait relevé qu'en attendant ma voix et en se plaçant sur son séant pour venir m'ouvrir.

They take her back to her home. The little dreams of a happy and reputable life for their grand-daughter, which had so gladdened the hearts of the aged fisherman and his wife, were broken. But they cheerfully surrendered their hopes and plans, formed for her good alone, so that they might keep her angel light within their dwelling.

Mr. Lamartine soon afterwards resorts to an artifice by which to escape. He gets back to Paris—plunges into the gayety of that dissipated metropolis—and six months or so after his escape, he receives one night, on his return from a ball, a mysterious package. He opens it. It is a letter from Graziella.*

"Le docteur dit que je mourrai avant trois jours. Je vous te dire adieu avant de perdre mes forces. Oh! si tu étais là, je vivrais! Mais c'est la volonté de Dieu. Je te parlerai bientôt et toujours du haut du ciel. Aime mon âme! Elle sera avec toi toute ta vie. Je te laisse mes cheveux, coupés une nuit pour toi. Consacre-les à Dieu dans une chapelle de ton pays pour que quelque chose de moi soit auprès de toi!"

With this letter was all her beautiful hair, which Mr. Lamartine apparently displays even now, with the same grim satisfaction that an ancient Mohawk contemplates some scalp highly prized as a trophy of youthful cruelty and bloodshed.

Our readers will naturally ask what excuse Mr. Lamartine tenders for his conduct—for the hours of madness—the lingering suffering—the despair,—the death of this young girl. We will furnish it in his own words: †

"Je n'étais que vanité. La vanité est le plus sot et le plus cruel des vices, car elle fait rougir du bonheur..."

Epoch was Mr. Lamartine at eighteen,—nothing but vanity. Such he is now at sixty,—nothing but vanity. Are we harsh in saying that we have risen from the perusal of these "Confidential Disclosures" with disgust?

* Livre Dixième xxvii.

† Livre Dixième xxvii.

NINEVEH AND ITS REMAINS: With an Account of a Visit to the Chaldean Christians of Kurdistan, and the Yezidia, or Devil-Worshippers: and an Inquiry into the Manners and Arts of the Ancient Assyrians. By Austen Henry Layard, Esq., D. C. L., in 2 vols. Geo. P. Putnam, New York. 1849.

The letter of our New York Correspondent, contained in our last number, pronounces this to be the great publication of the season: and we can say that it well deserves his commendation. The execution of his work by the publisher is every way worthy of the subject: and that subject is nothing less than the resurrection of a mighty city which was destroyed 2,500 years ago, and of which the very site has been until recently, a matter of uncertain conjecture. We are familiar with the traditional glories of Babylon and Nineveh, and with their utter ruin and desolation, from our earliest years. The prophecies of sacred writ, and the pages of profane history, attest their magnificence and their annihilation. The vestiges of their former splendor had been so completely obliterated, that the descriptions of ancient writers seem to resemble the fabulous creations of Oriental fancy. But it has been granted to us, in this century, to discover some traces of their long-buried greatness—to disinter some of the stupendous monuments of Assyrian art and labor—and to interpret records which still exist upon many of them, fresh and uninjured as if chiseled but yesterday. Mr. Layard's book, with its numerous and beautiful illustrations, will prove to be a rich contribution to our knowledge of the past; notwithstanding the vast and valuable accession which that knowledge has received, and is still daily receiving.

For sale by A. Morris.

THE GOOD AND THE BAD IN THE ROMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH: Is that Church to be Reformed or Destroyed? A Letter from Rome. By Rev. Henry M. Field. New York: G. P. Putnam. 1849.

This little pamphlet of some 34 pages is an admirable production. The author, if we mistake not, is a clergyman of the Presbyterian Church; but his views of Christianity are by no means confined within the limits of his own persuasion. His short, but searching, examination of the Catholic faith and practice, as they now exist, is singularly impartial; while he points out and condemns what is pernicious, he seems to rejoice in acknowledging all that is praiseworthy, and in holding it up to Protestants for imitation. More than this, he combats vigorously the enmity and prejudice, too generally entertained and manifested in this country, against the Roman Catholic religion; and enquires, with much force, why it is less an intolerant persecution, than the display of the same spirit by Catholics in other countries towards Protestant missionaries. He laughs to scorn the apprehension that a true religion can have any thing to fear from competition, among such institutions as our own; and urges upon the members of the Protestant churches, male and female, that they should meet the Catholics with their own weapons, and win proselytes by the same means: by self-denial and sacrifice—by works of charity and love—by succoring the poor and the rich—and by manifesting the goodness of their faith in the excellence of its fruits.

We think its perusal will do nobody any harm.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION. By J. D. Morell, A. M., author of the "History of Modern Philosophy," &c. New York: D. Appleton & Co. Philadelphia: G. S. Appleton. 1849.

A work of this sort is not to be judged of without careful reading and reflection. A hasty glance at it, however, has impressed us very favorably, as to its merits. We quote some paragraphs, which seem to us fraught with sound sense and liberal feeling; qualities, which do not always exercise their proper influence, in theological discussions—

"Whilst, however, the mass of uneducated minds absorb the theological system, in which they are educated, as a whole, those, who are more reflective, soon detect in that system an element of mere human reasoning. This consciousness is, for the most part, awakened by the differences of opinion which exist around them. It might be imagined, perhaps, that the comparison of their formal theology with Holy Scripture, as its acknowledged source, would in some cases naturally lead to such a result; but, seldom, comparatively, is this the case. Where a given system of theology has completely preoccupied the mind, the Scriptures always appear to speak in exact accordance with it; so much so, indeed, that the system is regarded, more commonly than not, as being the pure reflection, into human phraseology, of the distinctive statements of inspired truth. When, however, a mind once gets out of the circle of its own traditional ideas; when it finds other minds, having a different religious consciousness awakened in them, equally earnest with their own, and equally appealing to Scripture proofs, the thought soon begins to suggest itself, that there must be some human element, which gives their varied directions and tendencies to these different systems, and which mingles up insensibly with the whole mass of our theological faith. So general has this conviction now become amongst the thoughtful of all parties, that there is a disposition every where apparent, to tolerate various theological differences; to acknowledge all within a certain boundary, as equally entitled to the Christian name; and to single out only a few great points, which are to be regarded as essential to the validity of a theological creed." * * *

He then proceeds to analyze the nature of Christian theology, and to point out the manner in which the "human element" enters into, and modifies, its different forms. And thus he explains the phenomena of change that appear in the history of Christianity.

"The theology of an age naturally embodies itself in books, catechisms, or Church symbols, where of course it remains stereotyped and fixed; in the meantime, however, the living consciousness of the Church ever unfolds, as age after age rolls on, and adds new experiences of the scope and the power of Christian truth. The inevitable result of this is, that those who take their stand perseveringly upon the formal theology of any given period, remain stationary, as it were, in the religious consciousness of this period, while that of the age itself goes so far beyond them, that their theology is no longer an adequate exponent of the religious life of the times, and can no longer satisfy its just demands. Since the time of the Reformation, the religious consciousness of Europe, unfolding the principles then started, has been advancing more and more towards the religious conception of Christianity; and in consequence of this, we find the dogmatic theology of the earlier portions of this era, unable to satisfy the moral and spiritual requirements of the present age." * * *

These views are just in themselves, and clearly expressed; however they may conflict with the opinions of those, who elevate "authority" above the "right of private judgment," in matters of religious faith. How far the author is disposed to extend the circle of charity and toleration, we are not advised. How far it ought to be extended, is a question which, from the causes which he has explained, will be perpetually shifting its ground: the heretic of to-day becoming orthodox to-morrow, and being called on, in his turn, to admit others within the pale. But there is little danger, to judge from the past, that the doctrinal requirements of Christianity will be too suddenly relaxed or diminished. The conservative principle operates, (perhaps fortunately,) with a greater and more constant force in matters of theology, than in those of politics.

THE LITERARY AMERICAN. New York. G. P. Quackenbos, Proprietor.

Our readers will recollect that we had occasion to complain, in the April number of the Messenger, of the publication of a story, in the Literary American, which was taken without recognition from our pages. In the number of the American for April 28, 1849, the editor puts forth the following paragraph in relation thereto:

"AN UNJUST CHARGE.—We abhor and despise that literary piracy so prevalent among journals of the present day. It is therefore with peculiar regret that we find in the 'Southern Literary Messenger' a charge of this meanness preferred against us. We had supposed our character too fair in this respect for such an imputation, or even suspicion. The charge is an unjust one. Mr. Thompson will perceive by a reference to the story in question, that it was NOT published by us as original; we cut it exactly as we published it, from the 'Mirror of the Times'; there being no credit there, we were not aware of its having been originally published in the Messenger. We trust that this explanation will be satisfactory, and Mr. Thompson having materially injured us in the eyes of the respectable body constituting his readers, will make that retraction which we feel is our due."

With regard to the injustice of the charge, we can only say that "by a reference to the story in question" (in the number for March 24, 1849,) we find that it was published AS ORIGINAL, without credit or acknowledgment to any other source whatsoever. We are certainly willing to believe that the editor cut it from the "Mirror of the Times," but why did he not recognize it as an extract? Had he done so, we should have been at no loss upon whom to descend for the "meanness." Did the editor regard the story as a waif upon the tide of letters to be taken by the first person that could lay his hands upon it? Or did he simply forget by a lapse of memory to append to the publication the words—"From the 'Mirror of the Times'"? We are bound to believe that the latter supposition is the true one.

We had no disposition certainly to injure the Literary American in the eyes of our readers; on the contrary we have heretofore sought an opportunity to commend it, but the editor must surely understand how his omission to credit the paper from which he took the story, led us to believe that the plagiarism was his own. We are glad to be assured that it was not. As for the "Mirror of the Times," we were not aware of its existence until the paragraph above quoted met our eye, but we doubt not that it belongs to a class of literary weeklies, whose notions of the right of property are somewhat of the loosest, and whose columns are filled with poetical pilferings and prosaic petty-larcenies. The editor of the American will probably be cautious how he borrows from it in future.

Our thanks are due to Messrs. Harold & Murray, of this city for the "Church Polity" of Rev. J. L. Reynolds, pastor of the 2nd Baptist Church, Richmond, Va., for the "Mirror of Nature," a book of instruction and entertainment, from the German of G. H. Schubert, by William H. Furness—and for "Mitchell's Intermediate Geography," an excellent school-book.

CATALOGUE OF THE OFFICERS AND STUDENTS OF the University of Virginia. Session of 1848-49.

Our State University, we are pleased to see, is fully restored to that public confidence to which its high character so justly entitles it, but which was in a measure withdrawn a few years since in consequence of certain unhappy events that are still fresh in the memories of all. The number of students during the present session is 286. From a long acquaintance with the system pursued at the University, together with some opportunities of observing the systems of other institutions of a similar character, we have no hesitation in saying that the standard of scholarship is higher there than in any college in America. There are certain institutions in the Northern States, where a residence of four years and a bare adherence to the proprieties of gentlemanly conduct are alone necessary for the degree, so that an undergraduate who pays his bills and bides his time, is pretty certain to emerge at the end of his fourth term a Bachelor of Arts, when perhaps he is as ignorant of the Greek and Latin diversions of his Freshman year, as if he had never entered the walls of the College. But at our University, the most rigid examinations test the fitness of the candidates for honors. Accordingly we see that already, in the first twenty-five years of its existence, its Alumni are found in posts of the highest distinction. One is a member of the Cabinet. Others are in the Senate, in the House of Representatives, on the bench, eminent in the learned professions, in science or in commercial enterprise. We rejoice to see the growing prosperity of this excellent seat of learning, which is, in all respects, worthy of the fame of its illustrious founder and of the commonwealth whose name it bears.

A BOOK OF THE HUDSON; Collected from the various works of Diedrich Knickerbocker. By Geoffrey Crayon. G. P. Putnam. New York: 1849.

Our old acquaintances, Peter Stuyvesant, and Rip Van Winkle, vouch for the respectability of their associates in this little volume. Those who are going to visit the Hudson, ought to have such a pocket companion. Those, who are not going, should take it as a substitute for the trip.

THE SOUTHERN METHODIST PULPIT.

Monthly: Original: Thirty-Two Pages in Each Number.

TERMS—$1 per annum, invariably in Advance. Six Copies for $5.

EACH NUMBER CONTAINS:

- I. A SERMON by some Southern Methodist minister;
- II. A PORTRAIT of some distinguished Methodist minister; a superior wood-cut;
- III. A PEN-AND-INK SKETCH accompanying the Portrait and giving biographical and descriptive notices of the Subject;
- IV. ESSAYS on subjects of importance to Southern Methodists;
- V. RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE;
- VI. Notices of LITERATURE.

The second volume begins in July. Remit post-paid to Rev. Dr. Lee, Richmond, Virginia, Rev. Dr. Wightman, Charleston, South Carolina; Rev. J. B. McFerrin, Nashville, Tenn.; Rev. Chauncy Richardson, Houston, Texas; or to the Editor.

CHAS. F. DEEMS, Newbern, N. C.

June, 1849.

A. MORRIS,

SUCCESSOR TO

DRINKER & MORRIS,

Publisher, Bookseller, Stationer and Dealer in Piano Fortes.

Is constantly supplied with the most important publications in every department of Literature. All New Publications received as soon as published. Foreign Books imported to order.

He Publishes the following Books:

Tate's Digest of the Laws of Virginia, 1 vol., 8vo.

Tate's Analytical Digested Index of the Virginia Reports, 2 vols., 8vo.

Tate's American Form Book, 1 vol., 12mo.

Joynes on the Statute of Limitations, 1 vol., 8vo.

Howison's History of Virginia, 2 vols., 8vo., bringing down the History of the State to the retrocession of Alexandria, 1847.

PIANO FORTES.

He is the agent for the sale of the unrivalled Piano Fortes, manufactured by H. Worcester, of New York, and solicits an examination from purchasers.

He is also the agent for the sale of the Magnificent Grand Pianos and Pianinos, manufactured by the celebrated Pianist, Henri Herz, Paris.

WHICH IS THE BEST?

The Salem Gazette says—"Richardson's is the most valuable Dictionary of the English Language, both for definitions and derivations."

Again: The Oneida Whig is of the opinion, that "Richardson's is the most complete Dictionary that any language can boast."

This Dictionary is styled by the London Quarterly Review, "A perfect mine of the English Language."

The Chronicle and Democrat informs its readers, that nearly every publication in England and America has spoken of Richardson's Dictionary in the most exalted terms.

We think the question is answered, so call on the agents, J. W. RANDOLPH & CO., 121 Main Street, Richmond, and get a copy of Charles Richardson's new Dictionary of the English Language—1 or 2 vols. 4to., containing 2222 printed pages, in first rate binding.

Orders for Books, Stationery or Music, will receive prompt attention if addressed to

J. W. RANDOLPH & CO.

Books Bound, or Blank Books Manufactured to order.

June, 1849.

NOTICE.

A Lady who has had much experience in teaching the higher English branches, French, Drawing and Painting, and who could teach the rudiments of Music, wishes to make an engagement in a private family. Address the Editor of the Messenger.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

PROSPECTUS.

This work is conducted in the spirit of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, (which was favorably received by the public for twenty years,) but as it is twice as large, and appears so often, we not only give spirit and freshness to it by many things which were excluded by a month's delay, but while thus extending our scope and gathering a greater and more attractive variety, are able so to increase the solid and substantial part of our literary, historical, and political harvest, as fully to satisfy the wants of the American reader.

The elaborate and stately Essays of the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and other Reviews; and Blackwood's noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contributions to Literature, History, and Common Life, by the sagacious Spectator, the sparkling Examiner, the judicious Athenæum, the busy and industrious Literary Gazette, the sensible and comprehensive Britannia, the sober and respectable Christian Observer; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the United Service, and with the best articles of the Dublin University, New Monthly, Fraser's, Tait's, Ainsworth's, Hood's, and Sporting Magazines, and of Chambers' admirable Journal. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from Punch; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of The Times. We shall increase our variety by importations from the continent of Europe, and from the new growth of the British colonies.

The steamship has brought Europe, Asia and Africa, into our neighborhood; and will greatly multiply our connections, as Merchants, Travelers, and Politicians, with all parts of the world;

so that much more than ever it now becomes every intelligent American to be informed of the condition and changes of foreign countries. And this not only because of their nearer connection with ourselves, but because the nations seem to be hastening through a rapid process of change, to some new state of things, which the merely political prophet cannot compute or foresee.

Geographical Discoveries, the progress of Colonization, (which is extending over the whole world,) and Voyages and Travels, will be favorite matter for our selection: and, in general, we shall systematically and very fully acquaint our readers with the great department of Foreign affairs, without entirely neglecting our own.

While we aspire to make the Living Age desirable to all who wish to keep themselves informed of the rapid progress of the movement—to Statesmen, Divines, Lawyers, and Physicians—to men of business and men of leisure—it is still a stronger object to make it attractive and useful to their Wives and Children. We believe that we can thus do some good in our day and generation; and hope to make the work indispensable in every well-informed family. We say indispensable, because in this day of cheap literature it is not possible to guard against the influx of what is bad in taste and vicious in morals, in any other way than by furnishing a sufficient supply of a healthy character. The mental and moral appetite must be gratified.

We hope that, by "winnowing the wheat from the chaff," by providing abundantly for the imagination, and by a large collection of Biography, Voyages and Travels, History, and more solid matter, we may produce a work which shall be popular, while at the same time it will aspire to raise the standard of public taste. May, 1844.

TERMS.

The LIVING AGE is published every Saturday, by E. LITTELL & CO., Boston; Price 12½ cents a number, or six dollars a year in advance. Remittances for any period will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

Clubs, paying a year in advance, will be supplied as follows:—

| | | |
|-----------------|-------|---------|
| Four copies for | - - - | $20 00 |
| Nine " " | - - - | 40 00 |
| Twelve " " | - - - | 50 00 |

Complete sets, in nineteen volumes, to the end of 1848, handsomely bound, and packed in neat boxes, are for sale at $2 a volume.

Any volume may be had separately at two dollars, bound, or a dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents; and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

Monthly parts.—For such as prefer it in that form, the Living Age is put up in monthly parts, containing four or five weekly numbers. In this shape it shows to great advantage in comparison with other works, containing in each part double the matter of any of the quarterlies. But we recommend the weekly numbers, as fresher and fuller of life. The volumes are published quarterly, each volume containing as much matter as a quarterly review gives in eighteen months.

To insure regularity in mailing the work, all orders should be addressed to
E. LITTELL & CO., BOSTON.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

JNO. R. THOMPSON, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

VOL. XV., No. 7.

JULY, 1849.

Whole Number, CLXXV.

ORIGINAL PROSE ARTICLES.

| | PAGE. |
|--|-------|
| 1. The Corinne, or Italy of Madame De Staël. A reperusal after an interval of many years. Reflections on the character and tendency of the work. By Senex..... | 377 |
| 2. An Article after the Style of the — — Review. Art. V. Illustrations of the Poets. From Passages in the Life of little Billy Vikings, &c..... | 384 |
| 3. Varieties of History. By C. C. Sir Walter Raleigh. Voyage of the Diligence —The Woodsons and Venables of Virginia—Major Andre's tomb—Lord Rawdon—Voltaire—Müller, the German historian..... | 387 |
| 4. The Seldens of Sherwood..... | 389 |
| 5. Broderip's Zoological Recreations. A Review. Natural History—Dogs—Phalanx of curs heading the procession in honor of the Allied Sovereigns—Owls, their habits &c., Owls and Swans contrasted—Old Jack, a tame swan of St. James's Park, his ignominious death—Trout fishing on the Thames—Monkeys,—Mazurier, the man monkey—Distinction between men and monkeys clearly established notwithstanding the most remarkable similarities—"Seeing the Elephant"—Dragons—The Sea Serpent, &c..... | 399 |
| 6. English Ballads. The Book of British Ballads. Sir Lancelot du Lake, The Nut Brown Maid, &c..... | 409 |
| 7. Indian Stories. By Charles Lanman. The Peace Maker, A Tradition of the Senecas. The Strange Woman, A Choctaw Legend..... | 413 |

ORIGINAL PROSE ARTICLES—CONTINUED.

| | PAGE. |
|---|-------|
| 8. Marginalia. By Edgar A. Poe..... | 414 |
| 9. Original Novel. The Chevalier Merlin..... | 417 |
| 10. Glimpses of St. Petersburg. Its Court, Statesmen, and Best Society. Translated from the Journal of Therese, the Baroness the Bacharach..... | 427 |

ORIGINAL POETRY.

| | |
|--|-----|
| 11. Sonnet. By Aglaus..... | 384 |
| 12. Sonnet. From the French..... | 387 |
| 13. Lines. To the Rev. Edward Fontaine of Pontotoc, Mississippi. In reply to some received from him..... | 398 |
| 14. The Autumn Storm, A Proemial Fragment. By David R. Arnell..... | 408 |
| 15. Song. To L. R. L..... | 414 |
| 16. The Ancient Chant. By Miss Matilda F. Dana..... | 426 |

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

| | |
|--|-----|
| 17. Narrative of the United States' Expedition to the River Jordan and the Dead Sea..... | 432 |
| 18. Kavanagh. A Tale..... | 436 |
| 19. European Life and Manners..... | 437 |
| 20. The Shaksperian Reader..... | 440 |
| 21. Blackwood's Magazine and the Foreign Reviews..... | 440 |
| 22. Characteristics of Literature..... | 440 |

LOCAL AGENTS.

KEITH & WOODS, St. Louis, Mo.

J. C. MORGAN, New Orleans,

GEORGE P. PUTNAM, London,

E. P. NASH, Petersburg, Va.

JOHN P. WRIGHT, Lynchburg, Virginia.

MACFARLANE & FERGUSSON, Richmond, Va.

DEWITT & DAVENPORT, New York.

JOSEPH ROBINSON, Baltimore, Md.

C. C. CLEAVES, Memphis, Tenn.

THIS WORK IS PUBLISHED IN MONTHLY NUMBERS AVERAGING SIXTY-FOUR PAGES EACH, AT FIVE DOLLARS, PER ANNUM, INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

RICHMOND, VA.

MACFARLANE & FERGUSSON.

1849.

PAYMENTS TO THE SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

| | | | | | | |
|---|------------------------|-------------------|--|---------------------------|-----------------|-----------------------|
| Anthony, D. E. Alabama | IEJ | vol 12-13 | Lanier, S. C. Georgia | IEJ | vol 14-15 | |
| Apprentices' Library Society | S. Carolina. SH | vol 15 | Laval, Wm. South Carolina | SH | vol 14-15 | |
| Avery, Wm. T. Tennessee | | vol 15 | Leigh, Miss Catharine | Virginia | vol 14-15 | |
| Bealle, J. M. Tennessee | IEJ | vol 12-13 | Lewis, Gen. John M. Texas | | vol 15 | |
| Beaumont, Dr. T. Louisiana | IEJ | vol 13-14 | Lowther, Wm. Georgia | IEJ | vol 14-15 | |
| Beck, Dr. C. F. Pennsylvania | | vol 15 | Lyon, Wm. Alabama | IEJ | vol 12-13-14-15 | |
| Bell, F. Virginia | | vol 15 | Manly, T. S. Ohio | CWJ | vol 13-14 | |
| Bolling, Thos. T. Alabama | IEJ | vol 14 | Marquesa, Miss A. S. Tennessee | | vol 15 | |
| Brinker, Isaac | Missouri. CWJ | vol 14 | Mechanic's Institute | Ohio | CWJ | vol 13 |
| Bruce, Charles | Virginia | vol 15 | Meredith, Dr. John C. | Virginia | vol 14 | |
| Bryan, Wilkinson | Missouri | $7 50 | Minor, Prof. John B. | Univ. of Va. | vol 15 | |
| Cabanis, C. J. Virginia | | vol 15 | Montgomery County Literary Association | Md. | vol 15 | |
| Cage, I. & H. Louisiana | IEJ | vol 13-14 | Morris, Josiah | Georgia | IEJ | vol 14 |
| Campbell, N. H. Virginia | | vol 15 | Morris, Dr. G. W. | Virginia | vol 13 | |
| Cantey, Gen. J. S. Carolina | IEJ | vol 13-14-15 | Murray, T. D. Mississippi | RM & Co. | vol 15 | |
| Chandler, Daniel | Alabama | vol 14-15 | McDowell, Miss Margaret A. | Alabama | IEJ | vol 14 |
| Chapel, John | S. Carolina | IEJ | McNeill, W. North Carolina | IEJ | vol 14 | |
| Chapman, W. W. Louisiana | IEJ | vol 12-13 | Nelson, W. G. Ohio | CWJ | vol 14 | |
| Clarke, W. H. Virginia | | vol 15 | Northrop, C. B. South Carolina | SH | vol 14-15 | |
| Coffman, R. Mississippi | RM & Co. | vol 15 | Pearson, Miss Martha A. | Georgia | vol 15 | |
| Coleman, L. M. Caroline, Va. | | vol 15 | Pegram, Dr. W. E. Alabama | IEJ | vol 13-14 | |
| Coleman, R. H. Virginia | to Nov. 1849. | | Peithesophian Society | New Brunswick, N. J. | vol 14 | |
| Coles, Peyton S. Virginia | | vol 15 | Philanthropic Society | Chapel Hill, N. C. | vol 15 | |
| Cook, W. H. Virginia | | vol 15 | Posey, Carnot | Mississippi | IEJ | vol 12-13-14 |
| Cox, Robert | South Carolina | vol 12-13-14 | Post Master | Glennville, Ala. | vol 13-14 | |
| Dancy, Dr. C. F. M. Alabama | | vol 14-15 | Powell, R. H. Alabama | IEJ | vol 13 | |
| Deal, Joseph R. Alabama | IEJ | vol 13-14 | Preston, Nathaniel | Indiana | vol 15 | |
| Devine, J. S. Florida | TEJ | vol 14-15 | Price, W. W. Virginia | | vol 14 | |
| Dey, A. H. Michigan | CWJ | vol 14 | Railey, C. R. Mississippi | IEJ | vol 15 | |
| Dial, J. R. Alabama | | vol 15 | Raney, D. G. Florida | IEJ | vol 15 | |
| Dunn, W. D. Alabama | IEJ | vol 13 | Reading Room Association | Madison Univ. N. Y. | vol 15 | |
| Eastern Lunatic Asylum | Virginia | vol 14-15 | Redwood, R. H. Alabama | IEJ | vol 14-15 | |
| Eclectic Reading Room Society | Missouri | vol 15 | Reynold's, T. C. | Virginia | vol 15 | |
| Edmonds, Dr. Elias B. | Virginia | vol 15 | Robards, W. L. | Mississippi | vol 13-14 | |
| Euphrasian Society | Columbia, S. C. | IEJ | Rokenbaugh, J. | Georgia | IEJ | vol 14 |
| Fant, James W. | Mississippi | IEJ | Rollins, John W. | Missouri | CWJ | vol 13 |
| Franklin Literary Society | R. M. Col., Virg. | vol 13 | Ruffin, W. H. | Missouri | CWJ | vol 14 |
| Franklin Society | Mobile, Ala. | IEJ | Salmond, Thomas | S. Carolina | IEJ | vol 14-15 |
| French, G. E. Louisiana | IEJ | 13-14-15 to June. | Saunders, G. B. | Alabama | IEJ | vol 13-14 |
| Fry, G. H. Alabama | IEJ | vol 14-15 | Schooler, Miss F. A. | Virginia | vol 15 | |
| Finlow, T. M. Georgia | | vol 13-14-15 | Screven, W. E. | Georgia | vol 14 | |
| Gholson, Mrs. Thos. S. | Virginia | to Nov. 1849. | Shannon, C. J. | S. Carolina | IEJ | vol 13-14-15 |
| Goodwin, D. C. Louisiana | IEJ | vol 13-14 | Shannon, Thos. P. | S. Carolina | IEJ | vol 13-14-15 |
| Gourdine, R. N. | South Carolina | SH | Smith, Dr. A. M. | Alabama | IEJ | vol 13-14 |
| Hall, Dr. R. N. | Virginia | vol 15 | Smith, Dennis H. Jr. | La. | IEJ | vol 13-14-15 to June. |
| Hardaway, R. A. | Georgia | IEJ | Smith, T. K. | Louisiana | IEJ | vol 15 |
| Hardesty, L. | Louisiana | IEJ | Smith, W. P. | Virginia | vol 14-15 | |
| Harris, Nathaniel | Alabama | IEJ | Starke, Maj. A. | S. Carolina | IEJ | vol 13-14 |
| Haymond, W. P. | Virginia | to July 1849. | Taylor, Geo. P. | Virginia | vol 15 | |
| Herring, John B. | Miss. University | vol 15 | Taylor Edmund | Virginia | vol 15 | |
| Herring, Lewis W. | Mississippi | vol 14-15 | Taylor, Dr. E. T. | Georgia | IEJ | vol 14-15 |
| Hodges, J. C. | Alabama | IEJ | Taylor, John A. | Tennessee | vol 14-15 | |
| Hoge, Rev. Moses D. | Virginia | vol 15 | Telfair, Mrs. T. | Georgia | IEJ | vol 15 |
| Holman, J. B. | Alabama | vol 13-14 | Trotte, I. W. | S. Carolina | IEJ | vol 12 |
| Hooze, Rev. A. P. | Virginia | vol 15 | Tucker, Judge B. | Virginia | vol 15 | |
| Hopkins, C. H. | Georgia | IEJ | Turner, T. B. | Mississippi | RM & Co. | vol 15 |
| Jamison, R. S. | Alabama | IEJ | Valentine, Mann S., Jr. | Virginia | vol 15 | |
| Jordan, Mrs. A. T. | Georgia | vol 15 | Watson, Dr. George | Virginia | vol 15 | |
| Kilgore, J. L. | S. Carolina | IEJ | White, Miss Eliza W. | Virginia | vol 15 | |
| Kilgour, John M. | Maryland | vol 14 | Winans, Miss C. E. | Ohio | CWJ | vol 14 |
| King, Hon. M. | S. Carolina | SH | Woodruff Dr. C. Austin | Alabama | vol 15 | |
| Lamar, Miss Frances M. | Georgia | IEJ | | | | |

NASH & WOODHOUSE,

No. 139 Main Street, Richmond, Virginia,

Deal extensively in School, Medical, Law, Theological, Classical and Miscellaneous Books; Paper, Blank Books and Stationery of every description. They are agents for the American reprints of Blackwood's Magazine, the London Quarterly, Westminster, Edinburgh and North British Reviews, and furnish, besides, nearly every respectable periodical published in the United States.

PIANO FORTES.

They are sole agents in Virginia for the sale of the Superb Piano Fortes, made by Messrs. Stodart & Dunham, New York, whose instruments have received the unqualified approbation of some of the most distinguished Composers, Professors and Amateurs in this country and Europe—and from those who have bought and tried them. They are largely engaged in this branch of trade. They publish Charles Campbell's Introduction to the History of Virginia, in one volume, 8vo.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY AT FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM—JNO. R. THOMPSON, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

VOL. XV.

RICHMOND, JULY, 1849.

NO. 7.

THE CORINNE, OR ITALY,

OF MADAME DE STAEL.

Mr. Editor:—I have just read this romance a second time, after an interval of many years, and must confess that it has made a far deeper impression on my mind than at its first perusal.

I can scarcely believe, that in my case, as in some rare instances, the power of imagination has increased with age; but I believe that I was then less tolerant of a foreign style, and of the sentimentality and sententiousness which so strongly distinguish Continental from English literature. It is certain that the translation in which I first read it, could give me no adequate idea of the beauties which I now find in the original, and that Italy, quietly enduring slavery, interested me far less than the same country in its recent struggles for freedom.

Whatever may be the cause of my increased admiration, it induces me to trouble you with a few remarks on a production, which has commanded the admiration of the literary world for more than forty years.

In spite of the defects of the plot, in which few can exactly sympathize with the difficulties of the prominent characters, notwithstanding occasional extravagances of style and sentiment, the genius of the author triumphs over all, and carries us along by its power.

Sir James Mackintosh said that he read it slowly, like an epicure prolonging his enjoyment of a favorite dish.

Its leading moral seems to be, that persons of exquisite sensibility, genius, and cultivation are, as a matter of course, subject to great suffering, for which, as is suggested towards the close, they can find no healing balm except in religion.

The hero is the son of a Scotch nobleman, who possessed all the excellencies of that region, viz: high mental cultivation, great moral purity, strong religious faith, and a rooted attachment to the quiet, demure habits of his countrymen. The fine genius, warm feelings, devoted filial piety, and high sense of moral obligation which characterized the son, seemed likely to realize the hopes of such a father. But two faults, intimately blended with each other, well nigh blasted his fair prospects.

The creature of impulse, he often acted with extraordinary energy and generosity; but he not less often plunged himself into difficulties, which greatly annoyed his sensitive nature. He could not decide between the obligations of ordinary, habitual duty, and those peculiar ones in which he had been involved by his imprudence.

The evil effects of this impulsive, yet undecided character, exhibited themselves at his very first excursion from the paternal hearth. He visited France about the commencement of the reign of terror, when a mixture of old monarchical and new democratic vices made France a perfect pandemonium. He found a friend, however, in one Frenchman, who united the loyalty and refinement of the old regime with the enlightened liberality of the new era. But he became for a time the dupe of an artful woman, the sister of that friend. Once in the net, he could not decide to break it, until his love, if his feeling deserved that name, by an accidental discovery of her baseness, was completely dissipated. Ere he reached Scotland, his father, who had been long urging him to leave France, died, partly of a heart broken at his son's prolonged, and as he feared criminal absence.

Agonized with remorse Lord Nelvil almost follows his father to the grave; but he is at length persuaded to visit Italy with a hope of recruiting his health and spirits.

On his way, he seizes every opportunity of drowning his sorrow in acts of heroic benevolence, which indicated an entire recklessness of his own life. He enters Italy with a French emigrant, kind-hearted, and elegant in manners, but whose levity in real misfortune formed a striking contrast to the despondency of the young Scotchman whose outward circumstances were so prosperous. They are, in spite of this uncongeniality, very good friends, and enter the Eternal City together.

Here they encounter the heroine Corinne. To the readers of Ovid, this is a name of evil augury, especially in Italy, where we fear that female purity had made little progress from the days of Augustus to those of Bonaparte. The author indeed tells us that it is Pindar's Corinna of whom she is thinking; but we may well doubt whether a lady's character would have gained much by a transference from Latium to the foggy Bœotia.

To this ill-omened name is added the freedom of manner and love of notoriety, so common in Italy, but directly opposite to the modest reserve considered in Britain so indispensable a bulwark of female virtue. But notwithstanding these traits, and many overwrought, almost sickly exhibitions of sensibility, the English or American reader must be a strange one indeed, who does not become deeply interested in the fortunes of this extraordinary being. Endowed with universal genius, versed in all literature, uniting all the Italian good nature and abandon with Scotch purity, she had a combination of attractions, which a heart less susceptible than that of the young islander could not have resisted.

His prejudices against Italian women were melting away as the frost of his native hills would have done under an Italian sun. Passion impelled him to an immediate union with this charming creature; but the mystery resting on her origin and early history, the recollection of his former imprudence, and of his father's opinions, and an occasional relapse into his old feelings, always made him shrink back from that final step.

She is nursed by him in sickness, after having first nursed him; she traverses the peninsula from one end to the other in his company, and defies even Italian public sentiment in all her intercourse with him. Their attachment is but strengthened by the most intimate knowledge of each other's sentiments and opinions, and sealed on his part by the most solemn promises.

But she, while not disguising her devotion to him, pleads a presentiment of evil, and will not accept his vows, until he is fully apprised of all the particulars of her story. When he learns that she, being partly of English blood, had found the restraints of English society intolerable, and, to avoid them, had rashly and clandestinely sought a residence in Italy, his indecision revives, although he is still profuse in his professions of attachment.

It appeared that Lord Nelvil's father, who was intimate with Corinne's, had, without the knowledge of his son, and during his absence in France, set on foot and afterwards broken off a treaty of marriage between the two young persons. This circumstance greatly staggered and annoyed the mind of Oswald, who knew also that his father had some wish for his union with her younger sister, who was entirely English, and the perfect antipode of Corinne in every thing but purity and beauty.

This girl very young, and, educated in retirement, was timid, modest and reserved. Corinne confessed herself un peu agée. The frankness of this confession, indeed, proved that time had committed no ravages on her charms, or otherwise that, in this particular, she rose entirely above the weakness of her sex, or rather of her species.

In this state of things, the anxiety of both is not to be wondered at, when Nelvil, who was a Colonel on leave of absence, was summoned to resume the command of his regiment.

With great difficulty he tears himself away, and she gives herself up to entire despair.

The sight of Britain revives his attachment to English manners, and with it his prejudice against those of Italy. The appearance of Miss Edgermond, blushing like a young rose, chimed in with this renewal of old prepossessions. He does not cease to love Corinne; but she is fast losing the monopoly of his heart, and his letters become less frequent and more cold.

Although this only realized the gloomy anticipations of Corinne, it drove her almost frantic, and when the intelligence reached her that he was about starting with the army for the West Indies, she returned to England with more imprudence than she had left it, in actual pursuit of a man whose heart she believed alienated. During her voyage, and after her arrival in London, where she finds him, she writes only a single letter, which does not reach him.

Meanwhile this silence conspired with his early feelings, his father's wishes, and the charms of Lucile in dangerous proximity, to shake his resolution never firm. As usual he halts between two opposing influences, and remains undecided.

Corinne seeing him in the company of her rival, who is also a beloved sister, and hearing of his intimacy in her family, follows him to Scotland, where she sends back the ring which he had given, as a pledge of affection, without informing him that she is in Britain, and without explaining her silence.

This step makes him in turn suspicious of her fidelity, and, by arousing his pride, brings him to a decision, for which his judgment is scarcely prepared. He becomes the accepted lover of Lucile.

Corinne returns to Italy to die of a broken heart. Oswald, in a short time after his marriage, goes to the West Indies, where he encounters the toils and perils of war for four years.

When he returns, the feelings and tastes which had partially lost their hold amid the din of battle, and the horrors of pestilence, resume their power. His conscience is troubled about the unknown fate of the poor Italian; he finds that his English wife, with all her loveliness and innocent affection, lacks the genius and acquirements, which gave such constant attraction to the conversation of her sister. This occasions no actual dissension, but a want of perfect sympathy and confidence, annoying to both.

Finding that anxiety and a northern climate are again bringing on his consumptive symptoms, he goes to Italy, with his wife and child, in search of health and of Corinne.

He finds her, but she refuses to see him until the very hour of her death, although she has many and touching interviews with his wife and daughter. These last melancholy scenes fully realize the gloomy presentations of Corinne, and are exceedingly pathetic.

The charm which Walter Scott has thrown around the plain character of Jeanie Deans, has been always regarded as one of the highest proofs of his genius. But it certainly requires almost equal power to interest a prosaic American like myself in a woman, so exceedingly sentimental, and so exceedingly regardless of our conventional proprieties.

Speaking of Walter Scott, I am reminded of a resemblance between a passage in Corinne, and one in another of his novels, very different from the Heart of Mid Lothian.

Quentin Durward, in one of his aspiring day-dreams, thus speaks of the Countess Isabelle—

“When she hears that a Scottish soldier, named Quentin Durward, distinguished himself in a well-fought field, or left his body on the breach of a disputed fortress, she will remember the companion of her journey, as one who did all in his power to avert the snares and misfortunes which beset it, and perhaps will honor his memory with a tear, his coffin with a garland.”

Oswald, who had far more to encourage his hopes than the poor young Scotchman, thus replies to Corinne's exclamation, “Alas, those dangers of war which you are going to brave”—

“Fear them not, I shall escape; and even if I should perish, I, the most unknown of men, the recollection of me would remain in thy heart; thou wouldst perhaps never hear my name pronounced without tears; is it not true, Corinne? Thou wilt say, ‘I knew him, he loved me.’”

The tragic end of Corinne, although sometimes objected to by those who like all sunshine at the end of a romance, is in perfect consistency with her character and the circumstances of her condition. War, other occupations, and new ties had saved Lord Nelvil from being the victim of sensibility; but they were all wanting to this exquisitely sensitive woman, who had ventured all upon a single cast, and had fallen from earthly bliss “never to hope again.”

In considering Corinne merely as a romance, three inquiries present themselves—viz: Is the plot interesting? Are the characters natural and well-sustained? What is its moral tendency?

The progress of the narrative is considerably retarded by descriptions of the pictures, statues and scenery of Italy, with the reflections suggested to a mind so fertile and well-informed, which, it must be confessed, are equally entertaining and instructive.

They are skilfully interwoven with the tale, which, as before said, is that of a girl, who possessing wealth, rank, intellect and education in Protestant England, first in power and character of all European countries, preferred to all these advantages a wandering and not very respectable life of display in Catholic Italy, the most superstitious and degraded. The author has admirably succeeded in enlisting the sympathies of unimaginative readers in behalf of a woman whose conduct must appear to them absurd and imprudent.

But is her character a natural one, or do we not forget nature, and every thing else, other than the magic tints with which genius has invested it? It must be at once admitted that no exact parallel can be found to her character in real life. But the same may be said of the most celebrated creations of the novelist, whether serious or comic. Who supposes that there ever existed exact counterparts to Don Quixote, Gil Blas, Rebecca, or Diana Vernon?

It has been said that truth is stranger than fiction, and in one aspect there can be no doubt the observation is true.

As nature is more prolific than fancy, which borrows from it, and too often distorts what it borrows, real life presents more striking developments of human passion, and more remarkable events than the imagination of novelist ever conceived. But they are, as it were, bare and unadorned, or concealed in a crowd of other qualities and incidents, which prevents them from making their full impression on any but keen and reflecting observers; just as the book of physical nature reveals its more valuable secrets to none but the sagacious and patient investigator. When one of these observers of character happens to be a writer of fiction, he broods over what he has seen until it becomes exaggerated in his own imagination, and still more by the medium through which he presents it to the world. If this exaggeration, which is almost indispensable to due impression, be pronounced unnatural, then nature can scarcely be found in novels. There is certainly no delineation of it in the one we are now considering.

Madame de Staël found the original of Corinne in herself. She had the same brilliant imagination, powers of reasoning, command of language, versatility of talent and extent of acquirement; and there can be little doubt that her sensibility and independence led her into similar imprudences. In early life she is said to have had little taste for the fine arts, having been thrown into a Parisian circle where politics, wit and literature left small leisure for the study of pictures and statues. The same reason had prevented her from cultivating a fondness for the beauties of nature.

Her first visit to Italy was made when the wound inflicted on her heart by the death of a father whom she literally adored, was yet green. She was therefore predisposed to serious thought, such as well accorded with the melancholy wrecks of past grandeur, which every where met her eye in Italy. Her relative, Madame Necker of Sausure, in her eloquent sketch of her character and writings, tells us that she then imbibed that strong admiration for the works of art and scenes of nature which is displayed in the pages of Corinne.

She was also prepared to delineate a character like Lord Nelvil, in whose mind grief and reverence for a father were such prominent traits; but his remorse for having neglected his father's advice and possibly hastened his death, were the suggestions of her imagination and not of her experience.

While her own consciousness furnished Madame de Staël with the ground of Corinne's character, the colors which she laid on were doubtless more glaring than those of the original. She superadds to her own qualities those which she represents as produced by the heroine's Italian education and heightened by her enforced temporary residence in England.

Oswald is more ordinary, and less colored. His talents, his heroism, a sort of moral excitement to relieve despondency, and his filial affection, although a striking combination, are not grossly improbable. The surrender of his old prejudices and opinions to the influence of his mistress, his irresolution, his impulsive promises of fidelity, and his violation of those promises, when the meshes of early habit close around him, strengthened as they were by his father's wishes, are true to nature. One of less sensibility and honor would either never have conceived an honorable passion for Corinne, or would sooner have forgotten her wrongs in the charms of a lovely wife, high rank, fortune, and military glory. Yet, while we may reason thus, his indecision, a defect in a man's character, that almost always excites something akin to contempt, diminishes the interest which we should otherwise feel in his individual fortunes.

D'Erfueil, the type of the French, represents them better than Mr. and Lady Edgermond do the English. The latter are mere caricatures of their nation, and Miss Lucilia Edgermond is a girl of undeveloped character.

We should think the description of the English provincial town highly colored, if not assured that immediately after the publication of the romance, a certain town appropriated and resented the ridicule. Small towns and villages are proverbially intolerant of every thing which varies a hair's breadth from their own standard of manners, and regularly anathematise all who do not submit to be lengthened or shortened by their own Procustean bed. Yet those who are so prudish at home, not unfrequently throw off restraint when beyond their own circle. We need not wonder, therefore, that Lady Edgermond, who had been shocked at a young lady's love-songs and love-verses in her own house, carried her daughter without a protector to a crowded London theatre, and that too just after the death of a near relative, whose property she had inherited. Yet we cannot believe that she is a representative of English ladies, or that Madame de Staël, with all her admiration of British people and institutions, could fully appreciate their feelings and manners. Although intending to be just and liberal, she could not get rid of the continental taint.

It may be admitted that the English, and perhaps the Americans, are not sufficiently indulgent towards differences of national manners and habits, and are too prone to consider, as indispensable to virtue, those usages which are its safeguards among themselves. It may also be conceded that both nations would be better and more liberal if their charity were more extended. But let them beware of exchanging their own faults for the far more dangerous faults of the Italians.

When therefore a being of exquisite beauty, genius, and sensibility, engrossing almost the whole interest of this splendid romance, steps beyond the boundaries of even Italian license, and yet remains pure and spotless to the last, while the manners of English ladies, with whom she is contrasted, are also caricatured, the effect on young ladies of keen sensibility and ardent imagination must be decidedly pernicious. I do not accuse or even suspect the author of any such design, but on the contrary believe that it was her purpose to give a true picture of human nature and national peculiarities. But while acquitting her of a design, contradicted by the pure, moral and religious sentiment which pervade the book, I cannot be blind to the effect.

A young lady of strong feelings, superior and cultivated intellect, surrounded it may be by uncongenial society, is delighted, as every one must be, with the heroine. Yet that heroine not only leaves England secretly, and lives in Italy for years without protection, and without her true name, a step in itself sufficient to blast the reputation of an English or American woman; but she afterwards roams about Italy with Lord Nelvil, just as if she were his wife, and in utter defiance of the censures of even her lenient Italian friends.

Now it is barely possible that one woman, under such circumstances may escape infamy and ruin; but it would be just as safe for others to follow her example, as it would have been for a man to have jumped down Niagara after Sam Patch. It may be said that none will imitate her. Perhaps not, if we refer to exact imitation; but what will be the tendency with the ardent and imaginative, already galled by restraints, perhaps a little too heavy, and conscious of their own innocence? The spark of resistance to prudent custom may be smothered under ordinary circumstances, but will blaze out when fanned by the breath of temptation.

We must deprecate every thing that encourages human passion to chafe at the barriers, which, although sometimes raised too high, are indispensable for the restraint of its excesses.

We must be struck with the liberal and enlightened views, the rare mixture of enthusiasm and discrimination which characterize the author. But we cannot help believing that, in some important particulars, Madame de Staël would have been a dangerous companion for an imaginative girl, while in others her society would have been a rare blessing. Still more is Corinne, with all Madame de Staël's faults, and tried by circumstances of peculiar temptation, a dangerous reading associate to a class of young ladies who need and deserve most care.

Yet the book is undoubtedly full of valuable thought, and well adapted to cultivate a taste not only for elegant literature and the fine arts, but for the sublime speculations on the political, moral and eternal destinies of mankind.

But we must consider Corinne not merely as a romance, but as a picture of Italy, such as it then appeared to the eye and mind of the gifted author. Naturally it is one of the finest countries on the globe. Its fertile soil, its delightful climate, its extensive sea coast, give it the elements of wonderful prosperity. It is in Italy accordingly that we find one of the most remarkable developments of human greatness. There arose the people which left the impress of its arts, its literature, and jurisprudence on so large a portion of the civilized world, and whose story forms the connecting link between ancient and modern history. There too was formed that museum of the arts, the study of modern artists, which originating in wholesale robbery, has in turn become the prey of modern plunderers. It is a singular fact that those works of art that long constituted the pride of modern Rome, are about being sold, to sustain the republic which has there sprung up, like one of the volcanic isles on the sea-coast, and which, we fear, is destined soon to fall under the combined attacks of anarchy within, and invasion from without.

Modern Italy presents a painful contrast to the ancient. The "eternal Roman empire," whose terminus, according to prophecy, was to remain forever fixed, had left no other moral relic of its existence, than the superstitious tyranny which entered into the souls of the Italians, deadening their sensibilities and making them the willing victims of civil tyranny. As seen by Madame de Staël, they seemed utterly oblivious of their glorious ancestry. The republics established by the French had perished with the bloody liberty tree of which they were but parasites, and Bonaparte's concordat with the Pope had restored the authority of the pontiff.

A mind, so rich in thought and erudition as Madame de Staël's, could not be otherwise than deeply moved by the contemplation of such a region, under such circumstances, nor fail to impress on others the result of her emotions and reflections. It is here accordingly the principal value of the book lies. Coming from one deeply imbued with literature and history, it abounds with remarks calculated to awaken the intellect, to rouse the feelings and stimulate the imagination, in regard to the great questions of social, intellectual and political improvement. Few of either sex had examined these questions more profoundly and impartially than Madame de Staël. She had early imbibed a zealous attachment to rational liberty from her father, who although unable to avert the great crisis of the French revolution, possessed distinguished intelligence and probity. She said just before death—J'ai aimé Dieu, mon père, liberté. Amid the ruins of Rome, Gibbon, once the suitor of her mother, was inspired with that enthusiasm, which sustained him through the arduous labors necessary to the erection of the proudest historic monument of modern times. Disfigured it unfortunately is by scepticism and philosophic cant; but its accuracy is regarded as unquestionable, and its value as incalculable.

The impression of the same scene led to the composition of Corinne. We may find in it an occasional extravagance of sentiment and language, which, however, characterized the age and the continent, more than the individual author. On the other hand, it abounds in thoughts that are not unworthy the author of the Decline and Fall, and are often more elevated, because pointing to an immortality, the brightest evidence of which he labored to destroy.

We English and Americans are much inclined to say, with the Pharisee, "we are not as other nations." Conscious of our political and social advantages, we are prone to feed our vanity by uncharitably exulting over others less favored. We never dream of deriving improvement, as well as amusement from the study of national peculiarities and institutions.

Madame de Staël has a more liberal spirit and more enlarged views. Painfully conscious of Italian degradation, she does not fail to discover the redeeming traits of Italian character.

If the Italians have not the dignity and energy of ancient Romans, they are exempt from their overweening pride and arrogance. If they seek revenge even by assassination, when unprovoked they are exceedingly kind and affectionate. If Qui ne sait pas feindre, ne sait pas vivre, forms, as it were, their national motto, they can urge the slave's as well as the tyrant's plea, necessity. If they have not the brilliant coteries of Paris, nor the shining clubs of London, they are not disturbed by the vanity and envy which the spirit of society excites. If public sentiment tolerates an undue freedom of manners, and even an illicit intercourse between the sexes, there is little of that baneful curiosity, which, unlike the quicksilver used with gold ores, accumulates the dirt, while rejecting the glittering particles that are borne down by the current of human society. We ought to remember also that want of chastity in that country does not necessarily imply the total depravity which almost always follows it in stricter communities.

If we must lament and denounce the dreadful superstition, which has converted the simple, spiritual worship of the gospel into pompous mummerly, the freemen of Jesus Christ into Papal slaves, and the strict purity of the New Testament into licensed immorality, we must avoid extending our indignation to all individuals living under that system, and to those fine arts which have been so ill employed in making its forms attractive.

If Italian literature is miserably deficient in substance and simplicity, we are led by Madame de Staël to observe the imaginative character of the people, the elegant expressions familiar to the mouths of the lowest, their passionate devotion to the fine arts, the softness and flexibility of their language, and their latent capacities of improvement under more favorable auspices.

She could have little anticipated that a Pope would ever strike a blow for the emancipation of Italy; but if he should, it was not difficult to foresee that he himself would be crushed under the mighty car, which he had set in motion down the "easy descent" to anarchy. Every thing seemed then to be retrograding towards the despotism which had driven the oppressed to resistance in so many parts of Europe, and moderate politicians had nothing to cheer them in the contemplation of the future.

If permitted now to witness what is going on upon earth, she would doubtless rejoice that the Italians have again participated in the European movement towards liberal institutions, and at the same time share the fears and anxieties which recent events have occasioned all thinking men as to the result.

Those whose attention has not been specially directed to the subject, are apt to regard the whole population of the Peninsula as an uniform mass of corruption and imbecility. The following remarks show this to be a great mistake.

"It is true that governments form the character of nations; and that in this same Italy, you see remarkable differences of manners between the states which compose it. The Piedmontese, who formed a small national body, have a more military spirit than the rest of Italy; the Florentines, who have had either liberty, or princes of a liberal character, are enlightened and mild; the Venetians and the Genoese show themselves capable of political ideas, because there is among them a republican aristocracy; the Milanese are more sincere, because the nations of the North have long since introduced this character among them; the Neapolitans might easily become warlike, because they have been united for several ages under a government imperfect indeed, but still their own. The Roman noblesse having nothing to do, either in politics or war, are of course ignorant and idle; but the mind of the ecclesiastics, who have a career and an occupation, are far more developed than those of the nobles; and, as the Papal government admits no distinction of birth, but, on the contrary, is purely elective in the order of the clergy, the consequence is a sort of liberality, not in ideas, but in habits, which makes Rome the most agreeable residence for all who have no longer the ambition, nor the possibility of playing a part in the world."

How far this estimate of the different nations in Italy corresponds with their recent conduct, I have not time to inquire.

In regard to Madame de Staël's high genius, there has been little difference of opinion among literary men. The characteristics of that genius are too well known to need description here. She sometimes wandered into a cloudland, in which even the clear vision of Robert Hall could not follow her progress. This, however, is to be attributed, as much to the speculative genius of the age, and her intercourse with the Germans, as to the tendency of her own mind. Her colloquial vanity disgusted the fastidious taste of Lord Byron, who was in truth not a whit behind her in love of excitement and admiration. It may be that a remark in Corinne will in part explain his aversion. "However distinguished a man may be, he never enjoys, without a mixture of pain, the superiority of a woman."

Speaking of Lord Byron, it may be well to notice the resemblance between a celebrated passage in his Childe Harold, and one in Corinne. The passage in Childe Harold commences with the 179th stanza of the 4th Canto, and as all his readers remember, runs thus :

Roll on, thou deep and dark blue Ocean—roll!
 Ten thousand fleets sweep over thee in vain;
 Man marks the earth with ruin—his control
 Stops with the shore;—upon the watery plain
 The wrecks are all thy deed, nor doth remain
 A shadow of man's ravage save his own,
 When, for a moment, like a drop of rain,
 He sinks into thy depths with bubbling groan,
 Without a grave, unknell'd, uncoffin'd and unknown.
 His steps are not upon thy paths,—thy fields
 Are not a spoil for him, &c.

Then, after an intervening passage of the same tenor, the 182nd stanza concludes with the well-known lines :

Unchangeable save to thy wild waves' play—
 Time writes no wrinkle on thine azure brow—
 Such as creation's dawn beheld, thou rollest now.

In describing the church at Ancona, Madame de Staël uses the following language.

"The Catholic church is on the top of the mountain, and hangs over the sea; the noise of the waves is mingled with the songs of the priests; the church is overcharged in the interior with a crowd of ornaments in sufficiently bad taste; but when we stop under the portico of the temple, we love to connect the purest of all the sentiments with the spectacle of that proud sea, on which man can never impress his trace. The earth is cultivated by him; the mountains are cut by his roads; the rivers are confined in canals to carry his merchandize; but, if vessels furrow the ocean for a moment, the wave comes immediately to efface that slight mark of servitude; and the sea re-appears such as it was at the moment of creation."

I do not pretend to charge Lord Byron with a censurable plagiarism; for it is very likely that the genealogy of these ideas may be traced much farther back than either author. But it is interesting to note the coincidence, and also the fact that Childe Harold was published some years after Corinne.

Napoleon persecuted Madame de Staël, and endeavored to bring her into contempt. But his whole conduct towards her manifests his fear of her great powers. Censorship and exile are never used against those believed to be contemptible.

In politics, in historical and philosophical disquisition, in romance and literary criticism, her genius shone forth, if not with equal, yet uncommon lustre. We are sometimes, as it were, crowded by the multitude of her ideas, and at others dazzled by the glittering gems of fancy with which they are encrusted. Those who require truth to be always unadorned, may regard her brilliant sentences as mere tinsel; but they will usually find a substratum of profound and valuable thought. Her imagination, vivid as it was, was little superior in power to her great intellect.

But she evidently regarded imagination as predominant among her intellectual powers; for she had long planned a French prose poem, on the subject of Richard Coeur de Lion, like Fenelon's Telemaque. She regarded French verse as too restricted and monotonous for her purpose.

I had marked a number of brilliant passages for quotation, but will omit all except three or four, which are hardly fair specimens.

"The religion of grief, Christianity, contains the true secret of man's pilgrimage on earth."

"Nothing contributes so much to render works of imagination unnatural, as having a purpose."

"The grief of our modern times, in our social state so cold and so oppressive, is that which is most noble in man; and, in our days, he who has not suffered, cannot have felt or thought. But there was in antiquity something more noble than grief; it was the heroic calm, the feeling of his power which could be developed among free institutions. The finest statues of the Greeks have scarcely ever indicated any thing but repose. The Laocoon and the Niobe are the only ones which represent violent griefs; but it is the vengeance of heaven of which they remind us, and not the passions born in the human heart."

This passage shows how profoundly her intellect and imagination were exercised on the fine arts, as well as every other subject to which her attention was directed.

Again she remarked,

"That sculpture was the art of Paganism, as painting was that of Christianity, and that there was found in those arts, as in poetry, the qualities which distinguish ancient and modern literature."

"Among the arts music alone can be purely religious."

Now I do not vouch for the truth of the opinions contained in these passages, but merely quote them as characteristic, and, to use a fashionable word, suggestive. We shall find the same traits pervading all her other works, and exhibited on all the topics of which they treat.

She was fortunate in the character of her parents, for her mother, as well as her father, was highly intellectual and thoroughly educated. But her father seems to have been her favorite, and indeed her idol. In his house, she early attracted the attention of the most celebrated literary and scientific men in Paris, and cultivated her remarkable colloquial talents.

She afterwards travelled in Germany, Italy, England, and during her exile in Russia and Sweden, she appears to have studied the literature of the three first named countries with great industry and success.

Notwithstanding her religious education, she did not escape the contagion of the prevalent scepticism. It was a time when many were inclined to uproot all old institutions, and to class Christianity among those which should become obsolete. Many passages in her works, as well as the positive declaration of her friend and relation Madame Necker, show that her speculative doubts were removed, if she did not become a practical believer. She often warmly eulogizes Christianity; but it is in the somewhat fanciful strain, which has since become fashionable with such French authors as Lamartine.

Her separation from her first uncongenial husband, and her romantic and concealed marriage to her second are no evidences of her matrimonial prudence; but I am not aware of any imputations on her purity.

In spite of her faults and eccentricities, her character and works deserve study, as proving her to be the most remarkable literary woman of her own, if not of any age.

SENEX.

SONNET.

Poet! If on a stainless fame be bent
The hope of thy ambition, never roam
Afar from thy own happy heart and home—
Cling to the lowly earth, and be content.
So may thy name be heard of among men,
So may the noblest truths by thee be taught,
The charm of fancy and the calm of thought
Bless the else fruitless labors of thy pen.
The brightest stars are nearest to the earth,
And we may track the mighty sun thro' Heaven
Even by the slender shadow of a flower;
Pleasures that die beneath the glare of power,
Unto the poor of heart are freely given,
And bloom unnoticed 'round the humblest hearth.

AGLAUS.

AN ARTICLE

After the style of the ——— Review.

The following, Mr. Editor, is, I maintain no exaggerated imitation of the pretensive and pompous style of a certain celebrated Northern periodical. It always gives its opinions even upon trifles, with the most solemn seriousness. It cannot take or make a joke. It is ever literally in earnest. It is in general dull and dignified. It abounds in common-place Latin quotations, and is the very repository of universal knowledge. It knows but two portions of the habitable globe—namely, Old England and New England. All but the inhabitants of Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Vermont, New Hampshire and Maine, in this country, it considers as "outside barbarians." It looks upon talents as indigenous to Boston and never heard of a great man, South of Mason and Dixon's line.

I defy any man, familiar with this Review, to say that the following article is a caricature. It might pass for a "paper" from its last number.

ART. V.—ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE POETS. From Passages in the Life of little Billy Vikings. Drawn and designed by H. L. Stephens, Engraved by C. S. Hinckley. Philadelphia, 1819. Duodecimo—pp. 32.

In reviewing the history of past events, the mind is incontrovertibly led to the contemplation of present circumstances, colored as they may be, in the future, by the glorious reminiscences of antediluvian deeds. The world commenced with the creation of Adam. He was the first man and Eve was the first woman. They had two sons, who were called Cain and Abel, the latter of whom was, on a certain occasion, killed by the former. The deluge, which, after a lapse of a considerable number of rolling years, inundated the world, so that the only persons saved were the patriarch Noah and his family, produced an entire change on the surface of affairs. To Shem and Ham and Japheth was committed the somewhat difficult, though not hopeless task of repopulating the Earth. They accordingly settled in different portions of this terraqueous globe and from them, the various races, which now occupy and replenish both Hemispheres, were sprung.

It would give us pleasure, after the manner of each and every article that has ever appeared in this Review on any subject whatsoever, inclusive of a learned Treatise on Rowland's Macassar Oil and the Lectures of Professor Agassiz on Fishes, to trace the history of mankind from their earliest period down to the present epoch, to dilate on the remarkable events, which have succeeded, link by link, in the monstrous chain of being, and to fructify our minds on the results of that high philosophy, which teaches that there is, in the language of the most illustrious of British lexicographers, "a certain wildness in the assumptions of manifest folly, which calm and dignified reason cannot stoop to controvert." But, however much we might desire to expatiate on the past, touching on the Merovingian era, and giving detailed and elaborate investigations of the instigations of Alaric to lead on his Goths to desolate the Roman empire, we are forced, notwithstanding the pertinency of such retrospective review to the topic in hand—namely, "Passages in the Life of little Billy Vikings"—to pause, as it were, on the very threshold of the temple of criticism, and exclaim with the golden-minded Mantuan Bard, "Tempus fugit."

However we cannot, as the critics of a Review, published in the capital of New England, made glorious by revolutionary reminiscences, forbear to dwell in this connection, on that fearless devotion to patriotism, that ardent love of country, which induced our illustrious forefathers to pour out their heart's blood, like water, on the field of Lexington and the height of Bunker's Hill. We point with pride and exultation to our Hancocks and Otises and Quinceys and elder Adamses, and all that congregation of revolutionary martyrs, who left a legacy to their descendants that will never be wasted, and whose monuments are graven with epitaphs that can never be effaced by the corroding tooth of Time, whom the Augustan poet felicitously denominates edax rerum. From the day when Harvard University first shed the rays of learning over this land to the present, there has never been a period when the chief intelligence and learning and wisdom and education and accomplishment and taste and virtue of this favored country did not concentrate in and about Boston.

Having offered to the calm and serious contemplation of our readers the foregoing appropriate reflections, let us now turn to "Billy Vidkins." That there have been more recondite works than this cannot be denied. That there are few so full of fascinating humor, and that quality which the French call esprit, cannot be disacknowledged. But, before proceeding with further comments, let us proceed to present our readers with a sketch of this remarkable book.

"Billy Vidkins" has evidently been a naughty boy; for, on the very first page of his history, where his "Early Recollection" begins, the artist has portrayed a hand as wonderful as that which astonished king Belshazzar, holding a rod of flagellation, which is applied à posteriori, as certain logicians reason, with this poetical posy :

"I remember, I remember,
How my childhood fled by."

The very next page portrays "William newly breeched." Rejoicing thereat, remarks his biographer, he goes to slide upon the boards. And here we must observe that his biographer causes him to quote from Dryden,—which supposes a degree of acquaintance with English classical poetry, that so juvenile an individual could scarcely have possessed.

"Tune your harps
Ye angels, to that sound; and thou, my heart,
Make room to entertain my flowing joy."

However elated William might have been at the near prospect of a delightful slide upon the boards, it is hardly probable that he would have expressed himself in the flowing verses of the translator of Virgil and the author of Absalom and Achitophel. The same incongruity is continued through every page of these otherwise valuable memoirs; for the youthful and truant William is not only made to quote Shakespeare and Byron and Coleridge and Middleton and Otway, but Nat Lee the mad poet, and the Bohemian Girl. We need not say to the intelligent reader that these citations betray a depth and variety of literary information that a mere school-boy like Billy Vidkins could not have possessed. Indeed, a learned Reviewer does not know half as much himself. We are happy, however, to show our superiority to William's biographer in one instance. Where on the 4th page he is represented as returning slowly home, with his flags at half-mast, which is a metaphorical setting forth of his trowsers being torn, the following quotation from Nat Lee is introduced :

"There is a kind of mournful eloquence
In thy dumb grief, that shames all clamorous sorrow."

How much more exquisitely appropriate would have been these concluding lines of a sonnet by Coleridge!

"Still on his thighs their wonted brogues are worn,
And through those brogues still tattered and betorn,
His hindward charms gleam an unearthly white,
Ah, thus through broken clouds at night's high noon,
Peeps in fair fragments forth the full-orbed harvest moon."

Passing over page 5, in which "William on his way to the paternal mansion, is much astonished by the appearance of a singular vision," as utterly unworthy of the genius both of the author and designer, we come to page 6, where "doubting the reception he may meet with, William concludes to reconnoitre." William's head is pictured as looking ruefully over the gate, through which he must pass on his way to the paternal mansion, and his lips are conjectured to exclaim tremblingly,

"Let us survey the vantage of the ground."

Richard III.

In the very next pictorial illustration, Billy Vidkins encounters his enraged sire. Fearful conjecture! Well may he sink into his nether integuments and look astonished, when approached by his burly progenitor, Solomon's own disciple, rod in hand. Well may he exclaim with Hamlet,

"My father's spirit in arms! All is not well;
I doubt some foul play: would the night were come!
Till then, sit still, my soul!"

By this time we trust that the reader has become deeply interested in the thrilling adventures of William Vidkins, who, having played truant and badly rent those garments, with which the celebrated John went to bed, together with one stocking, exhibits a fresh example of how facile it is to take the down-hill to wickedness, and how very difficult to climb back again to the summit of good behaviour.

"Facilis est descensus Averni.

Sed revocare gradum; superasque evadere ad auras
Hic labor, hoc opus est."

We quote from memory. After receiving due correction, Billy at length, like the conscience-stricken Duke of Gloster, betakes him to his couch. He is made to exclaim, with Lady Macbeth, for that he really did so the most credulous will refuse to believe—

"Wash your hands,

Put on your night-gown; look not so pale.

To bed—to bed; what's done cannot be undone;

To bed! To bed!"

We hurry over the ensuing three pages of this admirable work, in which William, with singular force and elegance, is represented, first as dreaming, second as donning his brogues, third as receiving an unexpected ablution from a hydrant. The fourteenth page exhibits our charming hero mounted magnificently on the dorsal portion of a female swine, who is followed screamingly by her astonished offspring.

"Away away! my breath was gone,
I saw not where he hurried on;
'Twas scarcely yet the break of day
And on he foamed—away! away!"

Macreppa.

But suddenly, "swift as the flash," William's porcine female courser with her "nine farrow" disappear, having tumbled their rider in the mud to wonder with Macbeth,

"Whither are they vanished?

Into the air; and what seem'd corporal melted

As breath into the wind. Would they had staid!"

It is not for us to linger over the ensuing scene. It is too painful. The elder Vidkins seizes the younger by a peculiar part of his garments and compels him to practise the art of walking, in vogue among the inhabitants of sunny Spain—or, in plainer words, to walk Spanish.

William next enters heels over head into the sugar business, by tumbling into an empty hog-head. After getting out of that, he prepares to lick lasses from another hog-head, but the lasses licked him—that is, two damsels, one of whom is colored, (there are no black persons in Massachusetts,) approached and drove away our hero with sticks. After amusing himself with the intellectual game of leap-frog, Billy, in consequence of the early development of genius, is taken to school, where, being by chance seated on the same bench with one Mr. Muffin, he incontinently commences to instruct that young gentleman in the recondite art of making scratch-cradles. But our hero is suddenly and rudely compelled to leave his cradle and think of his latter end—where the incensed pedagogue bestows certain smart blows. In subsequently recounting this rude attack, the accomplished Vidkins is presumed to have quoted from "The Revenge"—

"One day, may that returning day be night;
For something or for nothing in his pride,
He struck me."

Yet the victim did not long defer retaliation; for no sooner did the pedagogue repose briefly from his cares, by indulging in slumber, than William began shooting him in the face by a pop-gun applied to the mouth. This was certainly an ungentlemanly procedure, but not more so than the exasperated pedagogue himself,

(Ne tantis animis celestibus iræ!) who took the mean vengeance of chastising his spirited pupil—the latter rejoicing with furious bravery—

"Slave do thine office!

Strike as I struck the foe! Strike as I would Have struck those tyrants! Strike deep as my curse!

Strike—and but once!"

The interest of this delightful narrative continues to increase, and culminates towards the conclusion. How forcible and impressive is that passage, illustrated by that picture, where Vidkins makes an experiment with a crooked pin! The scene is deeply dramatic. Mr. Muffin has scarcely risen from his seat by the side of his treacherous friend, when the latter placed a crooked pin, with the point upwards, on the very spot upon which Mr. Muffin was about to sit again. To this picture there is appended no quotation from any author—only a stage direction from the Midsummer Night's Dream—"Enter Bottom." We are at a loss to conjecture the meaning of this, and it seems open to fundamental objections.

"With pathless wound it pierced him to the heart.
Was there some magic in the elfin's dart?
Or did he strike my heart with wizard lance?
For straight so fair a form did upwards start."

Coleridge.

Through perilous ventures and hair-breadth escapes did the redoubtable Billy Vidkins pursue his way—now horsed upon the back of Mr. Muffin to receive more castigation, now perched upon the dunce's stool with an enormous pointed paper cap on his caput. At length, slowly, but surely, the day for vengeance came—for vengeance on Mr. Muffin, who, being like himself, about seven years of age, might be considered as one of his size, weight and metal. In the happy language of his biographer, "William expressed a desire for a small fight, at the same time requesting, as a particular favor, the removal of that chip from his head," and vociferating with hump-backed Richard,

"Of one or both of us the time is come!"

As when two puppy-dogs of minute dimensions encounter accidentally in street or door-yard, they first stare fiercely at one another, curl more tightly upwards their tails, display their dental ivory, snarl, snap, walk in circles and approach sideways, till both eager for the fray and neither daring to begin, one rubs himself against the other and thus they both rush together in ferocious rage, they fight, they tumble, they yelp, they raise a dust,—so at it tumultuously went these two small chaps, whose anxious mothers, alas! little dreamed of the fearful contest in which their darlings were engaged. But Vikings was victor and to him be assigned the laurel. "Palmam qui meruit ferat." Then, mournful to relate, our hero was summarily dismissed from school, and received his diploma in the shape of a kick from his tutor, which sent him flying down the stairs. "Last scene of all which ends this strange, eventful history," is Billy Vikings pensively seated on a two-bar gate, probably ruminating on the issue of his eventful career.

We have thus fulfilled the to us grateful task of reviewing this inimitable narrative. We commend it to the careful consideration of our readers with the assurance that there are few things in the history of past or present times which awake more vivid emotions, or which impress the understanding with the exquisite felicity and elevated truth of that elegant adage of the ancients,

"Tempora mutantur nos et mutamur in illis."

SONNET.—FROM THE FRENCH.

Doris, who knows I spe the poet's trade,
Of me a sonnet asks, but I despair,
Fourteen long lines! and they must come from where?
Four, notwithstanding, are already made:
That rhymes I could not find I was afraid,
But in proceeding one will meet his share,
And then the quatrains need but little care,
But now the three-lined tercets I must braid;
At random I begin, and much mistaken
Am I, if aid the Muses do not lend,
Since of the first, here is so soon the end.
I now essay the next; oh joy awaken!
Of the asked lines, behold the thirteenth one,
Count if there are fourteen, yes, it is done.

L.

VARIETIES OF HISTORY.

Sir Walter Raleigh upon his return to England after his last and disastrous expedition to Guiana, was arrested by the orders of King James and re-committed to the Tower, from which he was only released by the axe of the executioner. In the Harleian Miscellany there is an account of "The Demeanor and Carriage" of Sir Walter about the time of his arrest, from which the following extracts are taken:—"for soon after his coming to Plymouth, before he was under guard, he dealt with the owner of a French barque, pretending it was for a gentleman, a friend of his, to make ready his barque for a passage, and offered him twelve crowns for his pains. And one night he went in a little boat to have seen the barque that should have transported him, but the night being very dark he missed of the barque and came back again, nothing done." * * * *

"Upon Saturday the twenty-fifth of July, Sir Walter Raleigh, Sir Lewis Stukeley and Manoury went to lie at Master Drake's, where the letters of commission from the privy council were brought unto Sir Lewis Stukeley by one of his majesty's messengers, which caused a sudden departure with much more haste than was expected before, and the countenance of Sir Walter Raleigh was much changed after Sir Lewis Stukeley had shewed his commission; for Manoury saw him from the stair-head, he being alone in his chamber, the door standing half-open, how he stamped with his feet and pulled himself by the hair, swearing in these words—'God's wounds is it possible my fortune should return upon me thus again?' From Master Drake's they went on their journey to the house of Master Horsey, distant from thence four miles or thereabouts." * * Sir Walter, it is mentioned, was accompanied at this time by an old domestic, called Captain King. "After dinner, it being Sunday, Sir Walter Raleigh departed from Master Horsey's house and went to Sherburne; when he came within view thereof, turning to Manoury and shewing him the place and the territory about it, he said unto him sighing that all that was his and that the king had unjustly taken it from him—he and Stukeley." This Stukeley was he to whom the infant son of Pocahontas was at first entrusted.

[From the Scots Magazine, Vol. 34, p. 512.]

"Extract of a letter from Capt. James Wilder, of the Diligence brig, dated at Jamestown, in Virginia, August 19, 1772.

"In the month of March last a scheme was proposed by some merchants and other gentlemen of this place, to fit out a vessel in order to attempt the long-wished-for discovery of the north-west passage. It was soon brought to perfection, and a fine large brig was bought, called the Diligence. Every thing necessary being put on board, and well manned, the command of her was given to me. Accordingly on the 4th of April we sailed on our intended voyage, and on the 29th entered Hudson's Bay. We sailed up as far as Churchill river, where we took on board some brandy and tobacco.

"On the 5th of May I saw a head-land bearing N. W. by N. in the latitude of 63 deg. 20 m. I made a trial of the tides and found them to run two miles an hour, close in with the land, which I believe was the flood. On the 10th day we sailed through much ice, and were obliged to grapple with a piece; however, at last we were totally jammed up, and the wind setting right upon us, we were in much danger of being drove on shore; but at last it grew calm, and we continued our course with much difficulty till we made Cape Dobbs, when we entered Wager river. Here we sailed for four days till we made Cape Hope; and the river here being very clear of ice, and a strong current setting in, we were all in hopes that we were now in the desired passage. But after bearing to the N. and the W. for two days longer, we found to our disappointment that we were in a spacious bay, as we could find neither ebb nor flood, and very deep water all along the shore.

"We now imagined that we had overshot the streight; but after seven days' fruitless efforts to find it out, we were obliged to abandon the enterprise, sensible that there is a passage by the increase of the tides; but it is in my opinion almost always frozen up, generally impassable. Pursuant to the above resolution we set sail for Churchill again, where we arrived on the 16th of June; and taking some necessaries on board we set off on our return, and after encountering many difficulties arrived safe here on the 29th of July, having sailed as high as 69 deg. 11 min."

Extract from a MS. genealogy of the Woodsons and the Venables of Virginia.

"William Venables de Vennen assumed this name from the town or district of Vennen in Normandy where he was sole proprietor in 1052. Richard de Vennen, his eldest son, came with William the Conqueror to England, and had great possessions, from whom descended George Venables, father of the present Lord Vennen, (?) born 9th Feby., 1709, and created a peer 2d

May 1792, by the title of Lord Vennen of Kindenston in Cheshire. From the same family is descended Abraham Venable, who came from England into Virginia, and married the widow of John Nix and daughter of — who left issue one son Abraham, who was born 22d March, 1700, (O. S.) died 16th Decr. 1768. This Abraham, son of Abraham, married Martha Davis born 14th July 1702, married 1723 daughter of Obadiah Davis of Hanover County, (died 1765,) and moved and resided in Louisa on Pamunkey river. The name being originally French, and as the final 'S' is not sounded in that language, his father—the first Abraham, dropped the 'S' from his name when he came to Virginia, as it is presumed, to adapt it to the English pronunciation." * * *

"John Woodson from Dorsetshire, his wife from Devonshire, came into Virginia with Sir John Harvey, as Surgeon to a company of soldiers, in the year 1625. Had sons born in Virginia, Robert and John."

The monument erected in Westminster Abbey in honor of Major André is a Sarcophagus, elevated on a pedestal, upon a panel of which is engraved the following inscription.

SACRED

to the memory of

MAJOR JOHN ANDRÉ

who was raised by his merit at an early period of his life to the rank of Adjutant general of the British forces in America, and employed in an important but hazardous enterprise, fell a sacrifice to zeal for his King and Country on the 2d of Octob. 1780, aged 29 universally beloved and esteemed by the army in which he served and lamented even by his foes.

His Gracious Sovereign King George III has caused this monument to be erected.

On the front of the Sarcophagus, General Washington is represented in his tent at the moment when he had received the report of the Court-Martial held on Major André, and at the same time a flag of truce arrived from the British army with a letter for the General proposing to treat with him for the Major's life. But the fatal sentence being already passed, the flag was sent back, without the hoped-for clemency in his favor.

"While we were at Rome, we were acquainted with the Earl of Huntington, and his nephew, who has since distinguished himself in America, under the title of Lord Rawdon, and is certainly among the most promising officers in the British army. Mr. Izard and myself were too zealous not to encounter the British peer in defence of our country. He argued like a gentleman, but, I thought, not with much ingenuity. Lord Rawdon never disclosed his sentiments."—Memoirs and Correspondence of Arthur Lee.

Arthur Lee, together with Silas Deane and Dr. Franklin, American Commissioners at Paris, visited Voltaire during his last illness. As they entered the room he raised himself feebly up in his bed, and in a momentary glow of enthusiasm repeated some beautiful lines from Thomson's Ode to Liberty,

"O Liberty, thou Goddess ever bright," &c.

Johannes Von Müller, a celebrated German Historian, born 1752, at Schaffhausen,—visiting Geneva became there an inmate in the house of Francis Kinloch of Kensington, South Carolina. In the society of this young gentleman, with whom and with whose relations in England he formed a lasting friendship, he passed what he always regarded as the happiest years of his life. In 1776, when Mr. Kinloch returned to America, Müller became an inmate in the house of Bonnet, the celebrated naturalist. In 1804, passing through Geneva, Müller saw, for the last time, his friend Kinloch.—Mrs. Austin's German Prose Writers. pp 302-3.

This Francis Kinloch was the author of a volume of Letters written from Switzerland, and addressed, it is said, to his daughter, Mrs. Eliza Nelson of Belvoir, Albemarle, Virginia.

C. C.

ENIGMA,

BY CANNING.

There is a noun of plural number,
Foe to sleep and quiet slumber;
Now, any other noun you take,
By adding s you plural make:
But if an s you add to this,
Strange is the metamorphosis—
Plural is plural now no more,
And sweet what bitter was before.

THE SELDENS OF SHERWOOD.

CHAPTER I.

"There blend the ties that strengthen
Our hearts in hours of grief,
The silver links that lengthen
Joy's visits when most brief."

Bernard Barton.

James Selden was a Virginia gentleman of the old school; and about the year 1790, the period at which this story commences, this class was so numerous as to give a distinctive tone to society; for though emancipated from the government of England, the spirit of her institutions still exercised a strong influence on the habits, prejudices and feelings of the Virginians. The democratic leaven was infused into the mass, but the changes which it has since effected were gradual.

Mr. Selden had inherited Sherwood, the family mansion, and a large landed estate from his father, and though he indulged in the profuse hospitality which was so distinguishing a characteristic in eastern Virginia, his active habits, and systematic method of managing his affairs, had preserved him from the pecuniary embarrassments so common amongst the gentlemen of his grade in society. He had aided the cause of his country in the revolutionary war, by personal exertions and sacrifices, and he would have resented nothing more warmly than an attack upon the genuine republicanism of his principles, yet it could not be denied that he unconsciously retained many of the aristocratic habits and feelings, in which he had been educated. He had married early in life a lady to whom both nature and fortune had been more than reasonably kind, though, to do him justice, wealth had not the slightest effect in determining his choice. Her family belonged to the class which was once denominated the "grandoes of Virginia," and this circumstance was certainly one of the causes which first attracted James Selden's attention towards her as a suitable match. This attention was soon changed into admiration, and admiration into love, by an unusual degree of personal beauty, unaffected manners, liveliness and originality of mind, and an almost unequalled sweetness of temper, a quality which Mr. Selden esteemed more highly in a woman, than all the cardinal virtues and the wisdom of the seven sages united.

Mental accomplishments and intellectual superiority, in women, were so far from being held in high estimation at that time, that literary pursuits, or even the habits of inquiry and free discussion, so natural to all whose imaginations are lively, or whose reasoning faculties are acute, were thought to savor of self-conceit or pedantry, or worst of all, to be somewhat masculine. The mimosa tree is not more sensitive to the touch, than the daughters of Virginia were to the slightest reflection on their feminine delicacy, and the idea of being masculine was sufficiently formidable to frighten them from pursuing investigations to which few persons devote themselves without some external stimulus. The ways of knowledge, as has been said of those of virtue, "are puzzled in mazes and perplexed in error;" few have the inclination or vigor to pursue them unaided and alone, fewer still when the frown of discouragement and the whisper of derision meet them at every step of the rugged path which they are endeavoring to explore.

Good sense, strength of mind, and liveliness of fancy, must manifest their beneficial and agreeable influence in all states of society, however restricted may be their sphere, or to whatever degree they may be unacknowledged by those who feel their effects.

Mr. Selden could not help perceiving the comfort and simple elegance of Mrs. Selden's household arrangements, the affectionate respect with which his servants treated their mistress, the high estimation and kindness with which his neighbors regarded his wife, the affable dispositions of his children, and the willing obedience they rendered their mother. He deemed himself particularly fortunate in his choice, and thought in his heart that Mrs. Selden was the finest woman in all the country; but he would never once have dreamed of talking to her superior mind, or of attributing the happy results of her energies to the native superiority of intellect, which had aided the kindly feelings of her heart, in so well fulfilling the duties of her social and domestic relations.

Mr. Selden's ample fortune, and his wife's judicious arrangement of her affairs, left her many hours of leisure, which would have hung very heavily on her hands but for her love of reading. She read, however, rather for concealment than display, for she was so well aware of the prejudices of the state of society in which she lived, that she never alluded, even in conversation with her husband, to various subjects, which a thirst for knowledge, natural to so active and inquiring a mind, had led her to investigate; indeed, she actually blushed when Mr. Selden one day surprised her in reading, "Locke on the Understanding."

Her confusion was increased when Mr. Selden said, with a good humored laugh, "Why, Mary, when did you turn metaphysician? I should sooner have expected to find you knitting a stocking, or teaching little Arthur his alphabet."

Mrs. Selden tried to smile as she replied, "Idleness, you know, is the mother of mischief; having finished all my household duties, I found time hang heavy on my hands."

"You have chosen rather an unsuitable book for recreation. For my part, I had rather read the history of Jack the Giant Killer, than a book on metaphysics, at any time: such works only puzzle the brain and lead to infidelity."

Mrs. Selden could not agree with her husband, but she never argued with him, except in cases of the most absolute necessity: though he was good-humored and fond of her, yet he did not like being vanquished by any woman in an argument, and when that woman was his wife, it warred against the supremacy of intellect, to which he considered himself as having a prescriptive right both as a man and a husband. Her affection and tact enabled her at once to perceive this feeling, and to avoid exciting it, her deference for his judgment was so great, and her estimate of his intellectual powers so far beyond its just standard, that she often yielded to him on subjects which her own superior understanding, had it been unbiassed, would have decided very differently. It is well known, that women are prone to carry their heads in their hearts. Strong as Mrs. Selden's mind was, her affections were stronger still, and the medium through which she viewed her husband was too deeply colored by partiality to reflect a true image.

As Mrs. Selden's family increased, her anxieties for her children became more lively. The family consisted of three boys and two girls, and as these children advanced in age, Mrs. Selden became every day more impressed with the importance of their receiving a high degree of mental culture. Mr. Selden could not be roused into any thing like active interest on the subject, beyond providing them with a teacher, as soon as they were old enough to make it necessary. Whether this teacher was qualified to fulfil the duties of his responsible and difficult office, Mr. Selden did not attempt to ascertain, but took it for granted on the recommendation of a common acquaintance, and satisfied himself that he had done his duty by offering an unusually liberal salary, and consenting to be bored for the good of his children, by receiving a disagreeable inmate in his house; for disagreeable manners he conceived to be the universal characteristic of schoolmasters.

Mrs. Selden soon perceived with disappointment how very little the minds of her children were opened, or stimulated to investigation by the common routine of school lessons, given by a teacher, who considered that he had fully performed his duties in demanding a correct recitation of tasks. She set herself to work now earnestly in the arduous task of self-education, and in her endeavors to supply to her children the deficiencies of their teacher, she found as much improvement as themselves. In defiance, however, of the doctrine that all men are naturally equal in intellect, and that the difference amongst them arise solely from circumstances, the same seed, sown by the same hand, will bear fruit differing greatly both in quality and abundance, when sown on different soils. The children manifested very different dispositions and capacities as their characters and understandings were developed by time; and Mrs. Selden perceived the effect of her instructions and efforts for their improvement more plainly in the mind and character of her eldest son Charles, than in any of her other children. His mind was not more inquiring, his memory not more retentive, than those of his second brother, Reginald, but he was more earnest in the pursuit of truth for its own sake, and more distinguished for taste on all literary subjects, a quality of mind, which so nearly resembles what is called tact in conduct, that they are often found united.

The youngest son, Arthur, was entirely different in his turn of mind from either of his brothers, his quickness of observation and restless exuberance of spirits, made it almost impossible to chain his mind down to the application necessary to ensure success in study. Whilst his eye wandered in apparent vacancy over the tenses of a Latin verb, his thoughts roamed careless and free over hill and dale,—he remembered the shadiest spots where the brightest wild flowers grew,—he thought of the birds-nests he had found,—of the hare hunts in which he had been engaged,—of the streams in which he had been fishing,—and as the bright, gay images drawn fresh from nature arose in his mind, forgot that he held a book in his hand, until roused by a kind remonstrance whispered in his ear by Charles, or by an angry reproof from his teacher, Mr. Johnson.

Arthur though kind and good-humored, was quick and fiery in his temper, and he had imbibed from his father a contempt for schoolmasters, as he called them, though Mr. Selden thought he had concealed his sentiments on this subject with the most exemplary prudence from his children. A reproof from Mr. Johnson, only hardened Arthur into contemptuous resistance, and if he submitted to punishment, it was in such a manner as to shew that he set it at defiance, and that respect for his teacher had not the slightest influence in producing submission.

The two girls, one of whom was older, the other younger than Arthur, were docile, sensible and unaffected, but differing greatly in disposition and personal attractions. Virginia, the youngest, was lovely as a poet's dream, her fair hair floated in soft curls over her graceful and snowy neck, and the varying expression of an eye blue as an Italian sky, and shaded by long dark eyelashes, the changing hues of her transparent complexion, now deepening into the brilliant tints of the rose, now fading to the faintest flush of pink, redeemed her beauty from the insipidity which is often found in blondes. Margaret was, at first sight, always considered plain, even her most partial friends never spoke of her as being pretty, but her good-humored and open countenance, the sweet tones of her voice, and a laugh clear and musical, whose merry peals seemed to ring from her heart, and which was irresistibly contagious, prepossessed strangers in her favor.

Many natural gifts may be possessed unconsciously by those who are endowed with them, but it is scarcely possible that uncommon personal beauty can be one of the number. The beauty of coloring, of symmetry, of sweet expression, can be immediately perceived by all, and excites the involuntary admiration and delight of every beholder. The fondness which very beautiful children excite, even in harsh and rugged natures, would appear to the superficial observer to mark them as the peculiar favorites of nature, but nature is a more impartial mother than she appears, and this very fondness and admiration generally fosters vanity and affectation, which counterbalance the advantage of personal beauty.

Virginia often heard praises of her beauty, addressed by the servants to herself, when her mother was out of hearing, and sometimes heard the asides of her father addressed to Mrs. Selden, in commendation of her appearance. These produced a degree of self-complacency in the heart of Virginia, which was only prevented from degenerating into vanity, by the judicious conduct of her mother. Mrs. Selden showed her plainly that she did not value her at all more highly, or love her the better, for the sake of her beauty, but considered it as a mere accidental circumstance, for which she could claim no merit and which gave her no real superiority over those who were not similarly endowed. This conduct had not only the effect of stifling vanity in the bosom of Virginia, but it likewise checked the growth of envy in the heart of Margaret. When Margaret heard sallies from Virginia received with pleasure and applause by visitors, and especially by her father, which from herself would have passed unnoticed, a pang of mortification would sometimes be felt, but she was reassured, and her self-estimation restored whenever she returned to her mother, for children are often very clear-sighted as to the feelings of those around them, and she always perceived that Mrs. Selden listened to her with quite as much interest as she did to Virginia, and was equally ready to encourage or applaud her efforts. Her mother was, in her eyes, the first of human beings, and it removed the humiliating sense of inferiority, that want of personal beauty is apt to excite in children, when placed in continual contact with those who are distinguished by this gift, to perceive she was regarded by Mrs. Selden with quite as much love and esteem as Virginia. It was well for Margaret this counteracting influence existed, otherwise the too evident partiality of Mr. Selden towards Virginia, would have produced very injurious effects upon her character.

As the boys grew old enough they were sent to William and Mary College, where Charles and Reginald made unusual proficiency in their classes, but Arthur's abhorrence of his classical and mathematical studies was not lessened by the lapse of time; he won no academical honors, and scarcely acquitted himself with credit. He was, however, a general favorite with all his young companions, for his good humor, his sprightly turn in conversation, his spirit and bravery, but the powers of his understanding were not appreciated, because they were tried by one of the most common and fallible tests—that is, the power of acquisition in certain branches of knowledge. Had Arthur been directed to studies more congenial to his turn of mind, the result would have been very different.

It was about the year 1790, as we have said, that this story commences, and it was about this time that these young men had finished their college education; and after a few months spent at home, were about to determine on their future pursuits.

Virginia and Margaret had grown into womanhood under their mother's care. Boarding-schools were then scarcely heard of in Virginia, and it was besides a generally received opinion, that girls could be brought up no where so well as at home. It is true, they could not pronounce French or sing Italian songs; many of the "ologies" they knew only by name, many others still slumbered in the dim regions of the unknown; their skill in music consisted in performing a few easy pieces on the piano, for they had had no opportunities of instruction, but a few lessons from an itinerant music master. Nature, however, had gifted them with sweet voices, and Margaret's especially was as joyous, as musical, as clear and sweet as bird notes. They had never heard of a waltz or a polka, but they could trip with light feet and lighter hearts gracefully through the mazes of the lively reel or cotillion. Their deficiencies in modern accomplishments being thus deplorable, it was at least some counterbalance to these disadvantages, that their affections had been cherished, their religious and moral natures cultivated, their minds opened and their characters strengthened by Mrs. Selden's method of education. They had learned, too, much that is useful in the every day routine of life, and considered it not only a duty but a pleasure to be able to assist their mother in household affairs; for this excellent woman had gained the love and esteem of her children in so great a degree as to make them desire to imitate her example.

Mr. Selden was a man of good sense, of strong affections; he would unhesitatingly have sacrificed his fortune or his life for his children, and yet it had never entered his head to form any plan for moulding their characters, or influencing their destinies. The very name of education conjured up a crowd of wearisome images in his mind, and the very mention of a school or schoolmaster, was enough to set him to yawning. The girls he gave up implicitly into the hands of Mrs. Selden, and was scarcely ever known to use the slightest interference as it respected them; the boys he considered more peculiarly his own care, but he was satisfied that he had performed his duty towards them, when he had taught them the manly exercises of riding, shooting and hunting, when he had inculcated gentlemanly and honorable principles of action, and when he had given them the best opportunities of learning which the country afforded.

CHAPTER II.

"O that I had my wish!
And I had mine.
And I mine too, good Lord!"
Love's Labour Lost.

A cheerful fire of huge oak logs was blazing on the parlor hearth at Sherwood, the members of the family were gathered around it, and to the eyes of those who love to look upon pictures of domestic happiness, a more interesting group could scarcely have been presented.

Mr. Selden and his second son, Reginald, were closely engaged in a game of chess, Margaret was seated in another corner of the room, occupied in working a bird-bag, of various bright colored worsteds for Arthur, who sat beside her in close and animated conversation. From the kindling of his cheek, and the sparkling of his eye, it was evident the theme was most pleasing, and those who are shrewd in forming conjectures might have guessed that he was engaged in that most delightful of employments to ardent and sanguine minds—castle-building.

Arthur delighted to rear these airy fabrics for Margaret's especial edification, as she was not only the kindest and most patient of listeners, but also remarkable for her vivacity and readiness in conversation, two qualities which he especially admired. On the hearth rug, at Arthur's feet, lay a beautiful pointer, an especial favorite amongst all the tribe of dogs, that claimed his care and fondness.

At a small table sat Virginia, reading "The Tempest" with such rapt delight that she seemed unconscious there was any other world than that enchanted and beautiful region, through which her imagination was wandering. A painter could scarcely have chosen an apter personification of the pure and ethereal beauty of Miranda, than Virginia's form itself presented. Her fair hair was parted over a brow so smooth, so serene, that care, discontent and sorrow, seemed never to have rested upon it for a moment, and fell in soft, waving tresses over her shoulders, according to the graceful fashion of the time; her stature was rather under the middle height, which, combined with the delicacy and elasticity of her form, gave an air of fairy lightness to her figure. Her cheek rested on a hand of such exquisite delicacy, one might have fancied it moulded of wax, and her sweet face reflected as from a mirror, the bright thoughts that were passing through her fancy.

But all this loveliness was "wasting its sweetness on the desert air," for all seemed too much engrossed in their own occupations to heed any thing else, and none of the group were more earnestly engaged than Mrs. Selden and Charles, who were conversing apparently with the deepest interest, but in tones too low to reach any other ears. They both looked very serious, though certainly not sad, and on Charles' cheek occasionally a bright flush was visible, which showed the enthusiastic earnestness with which he spoke.

Mr. Selden and Reginald at length finished the game of chess, which, to Arthur, had appeared interminable; the warfare would probably have continued much longer but that Mr. Selden had sustained a defeat, and had no inclination to renew the contest. He, however, consoled himself by enumerating to Reginald the oversights he had committed, and showing how the game might have been concluded in two moves less than he had made. Then, satisfied with Reginald's admission of his mistakes, Mr. Selden drew his chair more closely before the fire and looked at the group around him with an air of affectionate satisfaction mingled with pride, as he thought no man in Virginia could show such a wife and such children as himself. Margaret understood the expression of her father's glance, and said in a low voice to Arthur, "see how my father is admiring us all, or perhaps I should rather say you all, for I dare say he is kindly regretting that poor Margaret should be so plain."

"I dare say not," said Arthur with kind warmth, "my father is not so weak as to think so much of mere beauty when you have so many other advantages, and besides, Margaret, you are mistaken as to your own appearance,—you are not half so plain as you think yourself."

"Thank you, Arthur, I value this compliment for its kind sincerity," said Margaret with a smile so natural and so good-humored as to convince Arthur she was quite reconciled to the idea of being plain; "but we will not talk about my beauty, as it is a subject which does not admit of much disquisition, but pass on to something which may well provoke conjecture; what can Charles and Mamma be talking so earnestly about, their whole souls seem absorbed in their conversation."

"Indeed I cannot guess, I fear Charles has taken up some strange, odd notions of late. I see a great change coming over him, I really think the fellow is growing religious, though I don't know how that can be either, for he is as sprightly and agreeable as ever."

Margaret smiled. "You seem to have strange notions of religion, Arthur," she said, "do you know any one more cheerful or agreeable than Mamma, or whose society is more sought even by young people? Many of our companions are greatly more attached to her than to ourselves, and prefer her company decidedly."

"Yes, that is true, but somehow religion appears more natural and suitable in women, especially those who are mothers of families and somewhat advanced in life, than in young men. Only imagine me singing psalms, reading the Whole Duty of Man, or explaining the Bible to the negroes as my mother does,—it would look as ridiculous as to see me dressed up in her cap and apron, making broth and panada for the sick, or knitting a stocking," and Arthur laughed heartily at the idea.

"My dear, rash brother, this is only one of the many prejudices you have contracted from hasty and superficial views of things, if—"

"That is one of Charles's very phrases of reproof, 'hasty and superficial views of things;' I begin to think you have been taking lessons from him, my dear, wise sister."

"If a kind fairy were to appear here to grant us each a wish," said Mr. Selden, "I should be very much puzzled what to wish for. I feel so well contented at present, that I should be almost afraid to alter any thing; but I dare say these young folks feel very differently. I wonder if the trial were made what the wish of each would be."

"Oh I should not be at all at a loss," said Arthur, his eye brightening at the thought, "I would explore lands on which the foot of man has never trod, I would discover continents like Columbus, sail around the world like Anson, see all that is seen both in nature and art in distant regions, encounter perilous adventures from which, however, I should be extricated with safety and honor, and then," he added with a smile, "return to tell my hair-breadth escapes to my mother and sisters and a host of admiring friends."

"To sum up all in one wish, Arthur," said his father, "you would like to be a great traveller."

"Exactly so."

"You have never reflected, my son, upon what such a wish would involve," said Mrs. Selden.

"You see the very wish has driven the blood from your mother's cheek," said Mr. Selden with a smile, "I dare say she sees you already in imagination, exploring wild countries filled with savage inhabitants, sailing over strange seas or traversing sandy deserts, but we will finish the fable before we begin the moral. What would you wish, Virginia?"

Virginia looked up from her book and a beautiful flush passed over her cheek, springing from the timidity with which most persons of great and delicate sensibility speak the feelings of their hearts; "I would wish," she said in a low, sweet voice, "to dwell in some beautiful and secluded island shut out from the cold world, with only those I love best, where I might wander through orange groves and watch the bright birds and listen to strains of unearthly sweetness floating through the air, with a ministering spirit like Ariel to obey my commands and"—

"And," said Arthur, interrupting her with a mischievous smile, "a Prince Ferdinand to be shipwrecked on the shores of this same beautiful and secluded island."

Margaret saw the flush grow deeper on Virginia's cheek, and knowing she could neither understand nor parry railery, interposed for her relief, saying, "come, Arthur, this is not fair, you have no right to interfere with other people's wishes, or finish them, especially when you know Virginia's speeches are like Sancho Panza's story about the goats, never finished if once interrupted."

"Then since Virginia's wish is finished by my unluckily introducing Prince Ferdinand," said Arthur, "we will hear next what you have to say, Margaret; what would your wish be?"

"My highest idea of happiness has already been so beautifully described, that I will only repeat the words which express it. 'When the ear heard me then it blessed me, and when the eye saw me it gave witness to me: because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me; and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy.'

"Does not Margaret really look pretty?" whispered Arthur to his mother, as he watched the color kindle in her cheeks and the light beam from her eyes in pronouncing these words.

"She looks more than pretty," replied Mrs. Selden in the same tone, "the goodness of her heart is reflected in her countenance."

"My wish," said Reginald, "should be to move the will of the people by the power of my eloquence like reeds shaken by the wind,—to command senates,—to preside over the councils of nations,—to transmit my name to the admiration of posterity, to the veneration of ages yet unborn."

"Very moderate indeed," said Arthur laughing, "and quite as easy to obtain as Virginia's enchanted island. For my part, I should be quite satisfied to be admired by my cotemporaries, and trouble my head very little as to the veneration of ages yet unborn. But we have not heard Charles's wish yet, I suppose he has attained true wisdom and finds nothing worth wishing for."

A momentary flush passed over Charles' face as he replied, "as my father is in truth the good fairy who has power to grant my wish I shall reserve it for him until to-morrow."

Though Charles smiled as he spoke, there was something in his tone and manner which convinced all his hearers that he was serious, and that he had indeed some wish to express in which his feelings were deeply interested. Various conjectures arose in the minds of each, but they forebore, from delicacy to Charles' feelings, to urge the subject farther.

"My wish," said Mrs. Selden, "would be a very inglorious one, and cruel likewise, for I should destroy these bright visions,—cause Virginia's island to vanish—permit the undiscovered countries still to remain unexplored by Arthur—deprive the councils of the country of a leader, and keep all my children near me, actively and usefully employed in the quiet and happy pursuits of domestic life."

"Your wish is set in flats, mother," said Arthur laughing, "and inclines me so much to sleep I shall wish you all a good night, and betake myself to bed instantly."

"It is a good idea," said Mr. Selden, "especially for those who have to rise with the lark, as you and I must do, Arthur, if we wish to join the fox hunt."

"There is not much doubt as to my wish on that subject," said Arthur, "I shall be ready by dawn."

The happy party dispersed for the night, but each continued for some time to indulge in their own speculations as to the nature of Charles' wish, which the next day was to unfold.

CHAPTER III.

Reflect that life and death, affecting sounds,
Are only varied modes of endless being.
Reflect that life like every other blessing,
Derives its value from its use alone;
Not for itself, but for a nobler end
The Eternal gave it, and that end is virtue.
When inconsistent with a greater good,
Reason commends to cast the less away;
Thus life with loss of wealth is well preserved,
And virtue cheaply saved with loss of life.

S. Johnson.

Mr. Selden was not without his share of curiosity, as to the nature of Charles' request, but a certain undefined feeling, that a request to be made in private would probably be one which he doubted his willingness to grant withheld him from attempting to renew the conversation on the following day with his son, and he hoped, as the day wore away, that Charles had perhaps changed his mind on further consideration. This hope, however, was of short duration, for as he was taking his evening walk, as he supposed alone, he felt a little startled and discomposed to find Charles had joined him, with a countenance which showed plainly there was something on his mind which he had resolved to communicate.

Some minutes silence ensued; at length Charles said, in a tone which indicated the depth and earnestness of his resolution: "You see I have not forgotten to claim my privilege of making a wish, one too which has this advantage, that it is in your power to grant it."

"That may, perhaps, be the very reason that I shall like your wish less than those of your brothers and sisters. I do not like the responsibility of 'cursing with a granted prayer.'"

"But you have not yet heard it."

"Very true, nor do I mean to give you a harsh or hasty refusal without listening to what you have to say. You are of an age now when I can no longer claim the authority of a parent; my claims are only those of affection and respect."

Charles' color changed a little, and he paused a minute before he said,—“to make professions of love and respect for my mother and yourself would appear to me as idle and ridiculous as to inform you of any other self-evident truth, such as that the sun rose this morning; to win your approbation, to contribute to your happiness are my first earthly wishes, and yet I must acknowledge that I cherish a wish higher, dearer still, one which dwells with me by day and haunts me by night."

"You speak in paradoxes, Charles; in one breath you tell me your highest earthly wish is to obtain the approbation and contribute to the happiness of your parents, and in the next you inform me you have a still higher, dearer wish. I never could guess an enigma, even of the simplest kind, so that it will be necessary you should explain yourself more clearly."

"I will then lay open my heart fully to you; why should I shrink from acknowledging to my father that a change so mighty has passed over my views, my feelings and my wishes, that I can scarcely regard myself as the same being I once was? The aspirations which I once cherished for fame, for power, for the honors and pleasures of this world are now fixed on other and more lofty objects."

"My dear son," said Mr. Selden, staring at Charles with a strange mixture of surprise and vexation depicted in his countenance, "how strangely you are running on. If fame, and power, and pleasure, and honor no longer appear to you desirable, I must confess your state of mind is one I can neither conceive nor comprehend. I could never admire the Stoic philosophy, as I see nothing to which it leads, and should always seek the power of enjoyment rather than that of endurance, as I do verily believe that this world contains objects well worthy the wisest man's efforts to attain."

"I assure you, that I am no convert to the doctrine of the Stoics, but to one far nobler and far more philosophic, because it is founded on the principles of our nature—the religion of Jesus Christ."

Mr. Selden started, "you really talk so strangely, this morning, Charles, that if I did not know you to have good sense, I should be led to doubt the fact. Is there any thing so very marvellous in your believing in the christian religion? I hope we all do the same."

"I can only answer for myself, father. I know that not many months have elapsed since I could truly say that I was a believer in the Christian religion. It is true, I always believed it historically, just as I believed such men once existed as Cæsar and Pompey; I revered its precepts also, I believed there was beauty as well as truth in its doctrines, and even more than this, Christianity exerted a sort of negative influence on my conduct."

"According to my weak judgment then, I should have pronounced you a Christian, I knew not what more can be required than belief and obedience to make us such."

"But a far different belief, a far different obedience from those which I possessed. I had not yet felt the wants and necessities of my nature, I had not experienced within my heart the fearful conflict of good and evil, I had not felt the infirmity of my will, I had not meditated on the dark and painful mysteries of my nature, and when I was aroused to a consciousness of this internal world, I saw there was nothing in heaven or earth that could deliver me from myself, which could harmonize these discordant principles, which could disperse the thick mists of darkness that involved the destiny of man, but the Gospel of Jesus Christ. I felt this, I believed with my heart, light, joy and peace sprung up within my soul."

The deep emotion which Charles' tone and manner evinced, were not wholly without effect on his father. All trace of vexation vanished from his countenance, as he said: "You are naturally of an enthusiastic temperament, Charles, and you have permitted strange fancies to work upon your mind. These notions belong rather to puritans and fanatics, than to rational, sober-minded men. Religion is a very simple matter, as explained in the Church Catechism, to do your duty towards God, and towards your neighbour, is all that is required."

"True, but how difficult, how impossible to perform these duties, unless a life-giving principle has been infused into the heart, unless the love of God has been shed abroad in the soul."

Mr. Selden regarded his son steadily with surprise and concern, as he said, "I cannot perceive the difficulty or impossibility of performing one's duties, at least I have known hundreds of good Christians, who attended to their religious and social duties, without ever troubling their minds with these mystical notions. If we once begin to speculate, to imagine on these mysterious subjects, the result will probably be fanaticism, or even derangement, but it will never be the good of mankind, or our own happiness and high standing in the world."

"Yet, if we acknowledge the divine authority of the Scriptures, as I know you do, father, we must receive its doctrines, and endeavor to understand them. The notions which you condemn as visionary and mystical, are drawn immediately from this source."

"I certainly do believe implicitly in the truth of Christianity, but yet we know that the wildest visionaries and fanatics profess to derive their doctrine immediately from the Bible; we know that all men have not sufficient wisdom and learning to understand it rightly. I am therefore contented to take the opinion of the wise and rational divines of the church of England, as my standard of religious belief."

Charles' eyes brightened with pleasure, as his father uttered these words. "I am quite willing," he replied, "to abide by this standard to test the soundness of the views I have advanced. Only read some of these works, which have always been considered by the church as containing the ablest and most faithful exposition of its doctrines."

"I have not much leisure for theological studies, as my time is very closely employed with the active duties of life, and the employments that unavoidably belong to my station in society. But I am at a loss to conjecture to what this conversation tends, may I ask plainly?"

"Plainly then, I sought this interview for the purpose of expressing to you a wish which I have long cherished in my heart, which I have ardently longed, yet dreaded to avow—a wish to devote my life to the ministry."

Mr. Selden started; surprise and dismay were pictured on his countenance; he turned absolutely pale, and seemed for some minutes incapable of making any reply. At last he said—"Surely, surely, Charles, you are not serious; can you really wish to become a minister? You can never have reflected properly upon what it involves, nor upon what you renounce in entering upon this way of life."

"I have reflected anxiously, deeply, almost continually upon it, and think I can understand not only the duties it requires, but also the sacrifices it involves, and yet I am convinced that the profession of a minister embraces the highest and noblest ends of existence, and as far transcends all earthly pursuits in dignity and importance, as the immortal soul excels in value the mortal body."

"Well, of all the strange fancies I have ever known, I think this is certainly the oddest, Charles, that at your time of life, with your education and prospects, you should think of turning preacher. I certainly respect a learned and good minister, one who can preach a sensible sermon on Sunday, and behave like a gentleman in society, but of all professions, this is assuredly the last I should ever have chosen. There are many other ways of doing good in the world besides preaching, and besides, there are ministers enough already, or at least, if there are not enough, (for facts here stared him too plainly in the face to maintain his assertion,) "the efforts of one man would surely make very little difference in the state of the world, while it would compel you to renounce the pleasures, the useful employments, and honors of life, to drag out a dull, inactive, tiresome existence."

"My dear father, excuse my saying, that my views on this subject differ totally from yours, because my idea of the character and duties of a minister of the Gospel, my opinion of the importance of his office are so much at variance with your own. I agree with you fully in thinking that there are many other ways of doing good besides preaching, but I by no means think that ministers are restricted to this only method. Their duties I believe to be various, incessant, requiring the constant employment of their minds and their time; all the good feelings of the heart, all the highest faculties of the mind must be kept in vigorous exercise for the performance of them. I should enter on this holy office with dread, not because I feared leading a dull, tiresome, or inactive life, but because I should feel most deeply my own insufficiency for the lofty, the arduous duties of the ministry."

"It is certainly necessary, that there should be clergymen to administer the offices of religion, and to instruct the people in their duties; but you appear to me to have very exaggerated and overstrained ideas of the nature of the office. I must confess, I can see nothing very lofty or arduous in the duties of christening a child, marrying a couple, burying the dead, or preaching a moral and sensible discourse on Sunday, which, from the very nature of the subjects that it treats, and the number of standard works, which every well educated minister has in his library, requires nothing but a moderate degree of judgment, taste and memory."

"But is it not a lofty and arduous duty to devote all the powers of the mind to the study of the Word of God, a book containing inexhaustible themes of reflection, unfathomable depths of knowledge,—every portion of which contains some moral lesson if we have only the wisdom to receive it? Think of what unspeakable importance it is that these divine truths, by which alone the souls of men can live, should be explained clearly, justly, forcibly to the world;—remember what crimes, what horrors have arisen from false doctrines of religion promulgated by ignorant and prejudiced teachers. Is it not a lofty and arduous duty to be a friend to all within your influence, not only to their perishing bodies, but to their immortal souls, to sympathise with their joys and sorrows, to reclaim the wandering, to comfort the afflicted, to counsel the ignorant, to proclaim pardon to the guilty, and even to illumine the dark valley and shadow of death, by the promises of the Gospel?"

Charles' eyes kindled as he spoke, and his countenance beamed the fervor of his feelings; the earnestness of his tones not only conveyed a strong impression of his own sincerity, but even caused a momentary doubt in Mr. Sel-den's mind, as to whether his son's views might not be more correct than his own.

After a minute's pause, Mr. Selden replied, "My ideas are perhaps not quite so erroneous on this subject, as you seem to imagine. I certainly do think that many things, not sinful in themselves, do not become the dignity of a minister, and should therefore be given up by one who embraces this profession. I perceive the necessity of making such sacrifices: for instance, I could not endure to see a son of mine a card-playing, or fox-hunting parson, though I think these amusements very innocent pursued with proper moderation. Neither could I tolerate the same conviviality in a minister, which sits gracefully enough on other young men, nor could I ever bear to hear one engaged in angry political discussions. A minister who abstained from all these things, would, however, only possess negative merit, which could not make him a valuable or useful member of society. And yet to a young man like yourself, full of life, spirits and activity, with talents and education, too, which would enable you to shine as a political leader on a new and untried theatre of action, which promises to be the most glorious the world ever saw, because freest from the restrictions which repress talent in other countries, it would be hard to renounce these prospects, and the innocent amusements of life, to turn aside from the noble career that opens before you—and all for what?"

"For what, oh father! I have not words sufficiently strong to express my sense of the importance of the objects to which I wish to devote myself, nor is it in my power to tell you how necessary it is to my happiness, that you should yield your consent, for I cannot be satisfied to incur your displeasure or disapprobation."

Mr. Selden looked very serious for some minutes and seemed lost in thought; at last he replied in a grave, but kind tone, "I am not unreasonable or tyrannical enough to expect to control a young man of your age in his deliberate choice of a profession for life. I should therefore certainly not be displeased at your following your own inclinations, even though they were contradictory to mine. Approbation, however, is not in our own power, and though, as I have said before, I am a firm believer in the truth of Christianity, and perceive the necessity of a priesthood, yet we cannot suppose there is an imperative necessity on all men to become preachers, and I had rather a son of mine should never make one of their number. Yet as you think, that your happiness and duty require that you should pursue this way of life, and your heart seems so desperately set on it, I will not seek to use my influence farther than to request you to wait six months longer and re-consider the matter. Mix more with the world, read less, be less solitary in your habits, and let us see whether your present wishes and state of feeling may not arise from an excited and disordered imagination."

"I thank you most sincerely, father, for this kind concession, and am most willing to accede to the proposal."

F**

(To be Continued.)

MOBILE, ALA., May 26, 1849.

My dear Sir :—Herewith I send you a poem, from the pen of a friend, which he has consented to have published at my instance. Were I at liberty to communicate his name, you would find it one highly distinguished at the South, in many departments, both of Thought and Action. Like the young German, Korner, the author has twined the brightest laurels of the Muses around the crimson splendors of the sword,—with the super-added distinctions of the Statesman. These verses will speak their own praise. They are a touching tribute of paternal affection, and seem almost the very tears of love crystallized into poetry, by the spell of genius. Since the Monody of Mason, on the death of his wife, I know nothing of the kind more beautiful or pathetic. Thus much you can say from me.

Very truly, your friend,

A. B. MEEK.

J. R. Thompson, Esq., Editor Sou. Lit. Messenger.

LINES.

TO THE REVEREND EDWARD FONTAINE, PONTOTOC, MISS.

In reply to some received from him.

A welcome to my minstrel skill,
Dear friend of happier days;
Thy notes are sweet, but sweeter still,
The love that prompts thy lays.
From sorrows deep and cherish'd long,
Thou fain wouldst free the heart,
And by the fragrant breath of song,
New hopes and joys impart.

But vain it is thy harp to strike;
My woes thou can'st not drown,
Unless thy notes, Cecilia's like,
Can draw an Angel down.
Until I meet my daughter fair,
Lost Pleiad of my soul,
The burning tears of my despair,
Must ever, ever roll.

Nor would I, if I could, revive
From my distraction wild;
I love the grief that keeps alive,
The memory of my child;

And if again by hope betray'd,
My soul should court repose,
How poorly were the guilt repaid,
By all that earth bestows!

The morning star that fades from sight,
Still beams upon the mind;
So doth her beauty leave the light
Of memory behind;
Tho' lost to earth—too early gone—
By others seen no more,
She is to me still shining on,
And brighter than before.

The smile she wore when last we met,
The tear she shed at parting,
The kiss upon my eye-lids set
To keep my own from starting,
Like bright, remember'd dreams of bliss,
Are lingering with me yet;
That smile and tear and parting kiss,
O, how can I forget.

And you, my friend, who knew her worth,
And loved that worth to praise,
And how amidst the ills of earth,
She walked in beauty's ways,
Will not condemn the grateful tears,
The ever-flowing stream,
That keeps a loveliness like hers,
In memory fresh and green.

No—let me still in silence keep
My vigils o'er her tomb,
And with my tears forever steep
The flow'rs that o'er it bloom.
Tho' all the world should pass it by,
A place remember'd not,
'Tis meet that I, should linger nigh,
And bless the hallow'd spot.

The sacred love—the holy woes,
Awaken'd by the dead,
Are like the fragrance of the rose,
When all its hues are fled;
And, as beside the grave we stand,
The mournful thoughts that rise,
Are whispers from the spirit-land,
Sweet voices from the skies.

Then leave, O, leave me to my grief,
Too wedded now to part;
'Twill duly work its own relief,
By eating out the heart;
But 'till my daughter pure and bright,
To me shall re-appear,
My life must be a sleepless night,
Without a star to cheer.

You tell me that my grief is vain,
My child will not return,
No earthly tears can wake again,
The ashes of the urn;

You tell me too, that she is gone
To regions blest and fair,
And wrong it is her loss to mourn,
Since she's an angel there.

I know it all—I know it all;
Yet still with grief oppress,
My spirit sighs for her recall,
And will not be at rest;
I cannot, cannot give her up,
I am not reconciled;
O, take away the bitter cup,
And bring me back my child!—

She was the last enchanting ray
That cheer'd me here below,
The only star to light my way,
Thro' this dark world of woe;
And now bereft of that sweet light,
O, how shall I sustain
The shadows of the awful night,
Which must with me remain!

Like him upon the rocky peak,
In wrath and vengeance doom'd
A victim to the vulture's beak,
To suffer unconsum'd—
So am I doom'd in darkness deep,
All desolate and chill,
To bear a pang that will not sleep,
A death that will not kill.

Then be it so—all silently,
I'll bear the adverse weight;
But He enthroned in yonder sky,
Who dooms me to my fate,
Will, in His own good way and time,
My lovely one restore—
If not on earth, in that blest clime,
Where parting is no more.

I know He will—for even now
On faith's enraptur'd eye,
He breaketh like His own bright bow,
Upon me from on high;
Amidst my deep despondency,
He whispers in mine ear—
Thy daughter may not come to thee,
But thou canst go to her.

Enough, enough—I ask no more;
A light hath flash'd within;
My child from earth He only bore,
To lure me on to Him;
Then let Him keep the jewel bright,
O, let Him wear the gem;
I would not snatch so pure a light
From His bright diadem.

The only boon, O God, I crave,
Is soon thy face to see;
I long to pass the dull, cold grave,
And wing my way to Thee—
To Thee, O Lord, and those dear friends
In Thine eternal sphere,
Where I may make some poor amends,
For all my errors here.

Broderip's Zoological Recreations.*

From our childhood, we have always had a strong liking for that branch of natural history, which embraces living animals. We trust we are not deficient in human sympathies; and that we appreciate, in a tolerable degree at least, the inestimable privileges, which distinguish man from even the highest of the brute creation. But we are sometimes tempted to draw unfavorable comparisons, in point of moral character at least, between the sons of Adam and some of the beasts which obey and serve them; and very often should we be rejoiced to exchange the boredom of certain visitors, possessing more than ordinary powers of articulate speech, for the dumb, but intelligent companionship of the domestic favorites. For it is in the light of fellow-creatures, of living beings, participating with ourselves, not merely in the pains and pleasures of the senses, but also to a considerable extent in those joys and sorrows, which have their source in our mental emotions, that we love to contemplate them. Perhaps it may be owing to our ignorance that we do not appreciate the apparent relish with which naturalists pursue investigations of a strictly scientific and technical character. But to us their researches seem far less attractive than the desultory observations of those lovers of nature who have been their pioneers—such men as White of Selborne, Wilson, and Audubon—who have followed the wild denizens of field and forest even to their most secret haunts, and portrayed their character and habits, in a thousand happy anecdotes. We care not to know them by genera and species, and all the dry details of description, which fix their appropriate places in the schemes of Linnæus and Cuvier. All this is, doubtless, excellent and valuable learning; and we acknowledge, (while we are unable to compute,) the debt, which mankind owes to these illustrious benefactors of science. In like manner, the world is proud to confess its obligations to the great masters in the schools of Anatomy and Medicine. But it does not follow that every man is to study his friends and acquaintances with the eyes of John Hunter or Dr. Physic. One seldom extends his survey of a new subject in society, beyond his general appearance and bearing, and perhaps a special scrutiny of the physiognomy. Some there are, indeed, whose fingers itch to manipulate the cranium and explore the bumps; but their hands are commonly tied by the restraints of good-breeding and civility. Now, for our own part, we desire to know bird and beast, (for fishes are out of our element entirely,) just in the same way: to identify and distinguish such as we often meet with—to gather up what is most remarkable about those which we seldom or never see—to learn their outward appearance, dispositions, habits of life, and such like matters, rather than the recondite differences, by which they are classified and arranged in the naturalist's museum. We should as soon think of verifying a friend by the items of an European passport, and taking an inventory of his age, height, complexion, hair, eyes, and other marks—considering his temperament, whether lymphatic, phlegmatic, nervous or choleric—or comparing him with the characteristics of the five great races, and ascertaining from which of them, and in what proportions, his mingled blood had descended. This last inquiry might indeed, under some aspects, be important: but such cases, to employ a new-fangled word, are “exceptional.” The general rule is opposite.

* ZOOLOGICAL RECREATIONS. By W. J. Broderip, Esq., F. R. S., &c., &c. From the enlarged second London edition. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard. 1849.

The volume, which has led us into this train of remarks, (if our gossip be worthy of such a name,) is precisely the sort of book for unlearned readers like ourselves. It consists of a series of popular sketches, first published in the New Monthly Magazine, and embracing notices of birds and beasts of various sorts, from nightingales and wild turkeys, up to dogs, monkeys, elephants, and dragons. Of course, like more elaborate works, it contains some reference to the technical divisions of zoology: but we can assure all such as coincide with us in taste, that these occupy only a small space in the book, and are easily skipped over. The work is for the most part devoted to such descriptions as all can understand and be interested in: with an agreeable variety of quotations from other authors, and anecdotes illustrative of the animals under consideration. We are also favored with biographical and personal notices of some distinguished strangers, such as the Orang Utan, Jenny, and the elephant Jack, late of the Zoological Gardens, in the Regent's Park; personages, who probably deserved and requited the attentions bestowed upon them, quite as well as many foreigners of greater pretensions and celebrity.

We have been a little surprised at the seeming hesitation with which Mr. Broderip several times advances the opinion, that the inferior animals are not confined to mere instinct, but do actually reason. He does it always, by way of query—as if it were something contrary to the received doctrine, but, in his mind, capable of being successfully maintained. We do not design, by any means, “to even ourselves with the likes” of Mr. Broderip—we are guilty of no such arrogance. But we are certainly ahead of him on this tack. We remember well, that our first essay at college was an elaborate, (we thought a highly original and meritorious,) argument, in which we asserted the existence of both faculties, as well in brutes as in mankind: attributing to the former a larger proportion of instinct, and to the latter a preponderance of the reasoning power. Our good old professor returned the thesis, with the dry observation, that its views were very just and correct, and might be found, discussed with great ability in some book, the name of which we have forgotten.

It was obvious, that we were suspected of having “stolen our thunder;” and this mortifying conviction made us anxious to banish all recollections of the subject. Since then, we had always taken it for granted, that the question was no longer an open one in the schools of mental philosophy. Certainly it ought not to be; for nothing, except problems in geometry, can be more clearly demonstrated.

The dog furnishes more frequent, and more extraordinary proofs, of the possession and exercise of the reasoning faculty, than any other animal that we know of: and Mr. Broderip has not failed to call witnesses from the ranks of these intelligent and faithful creatures. Most persons, acquainted with their habits, can remember occurrences conducing to prove the same thing; although very few would possess our author's happy style of telling his story.

Among other instances, he narrates the case of a turnspit, belonging to a clergyman in the west of England, who baffled all his master's endeavors to keep him out of church of a Sunday. On one occasion, after doing duty in the kitchen until noon on Saturday, the poor quadruped was locked up in the wood-hole for safe keeping. “Here,” as our author says, “he revenged himself by drying up the souls of the whole family with his inordinate, expostulatory yells, during the whole of the remnant of Saturday, and the greater part of Sunday.”

We once knew a man cured, by a similar incarceration, of an ill habit he had contracted, in respect of his pecuniary obligations. He was sent to jail, very obdurate, on Saturday evening: Sunday he relented—but it was not a dies juridicus, and his business was delayed. On Monday, as early as possible, he paid the debt and was enlarged, declaring it to be the best way he had seen tried to make an honest man pay a just debt!

But the same treatment did not cure the turnspit: his love of church-going was not to be eradicated. About 12 o'clock on the following Saturday Toby was not to be found. The meat was on the spit, but no Toby was there to mount the wheel, and turn the roast. The barn, where he was wont to "recreate himself by hunting rats," was searched in vain. The gipsies, who seem, (like our Indians,) to have fancied fat dogs, underwent an examination to no purpose. The worthy family retired to rest, disconsolate for their loss—lamenting him no less than the Scotch divine his renowned "Ervie wi' the crookit horn": and the first words of the master, after grace at his Sunday's breakfast, was the mournful inquiry, "Any tidings of Toby?" But the duties of the day could not be dispensed with. The good man, with a saddened heart, after disposing of the village schools, proceeded to church in full canonicals, and slowly paced up the aisle to his reading desk. He entered it, thinking sorrowfully upon him who had been there so often unbidden, but who would now be so welcome any where: and there—to his utter amazement—in the old place, he found the cunning vagrant, squatted upon his funny little legs, with "his eyes twinkling out of the darkest corner." The question was given up: and Toby was "permitted to go to church, with the unanimous approbation of the parish, as long as he lived."

We ourselves knew a large waterspaniel, who certainly kept a reckoning of Sundays, though less exemplary in his way of life on the Sabbath, than the Welshman. Our acquaintance was always at his master's heels, from Monday morning till Saturday night—at home or in the street, at market, at the bank, in court, or wherever else that master's business or pleasure might carry him. But when Sunday came, Carlos never stirred from home, unless especially invited. His master went regularly to church: but we never knew the dog to follow him, morning or evening. Our Carlos knew the day—whether from the closing of stores and the stillness, or in what other way—he never explained to us: but to many others, as well as ourselves, it was notorious that he made it, emphatically, a day of rest.

Another dog of our acquaintance could distinguish the bell of the tavern, where he was fed, from all the other bells in town, and never failed to strike a trot for the kitchen, whenever he heard it at dinner time. But, we confess, he was eclipsed by the renowned dog of the convent, who learned to ring the beggar's bell at the gate, and thus ingeniously to appropriate the victuals, that were passed through the wicket to the supposed pensioner.

Our author gives a diverting account of the conspicuous part, which certain dogs of London were made to play, somewhat against their will, in a royal and civic procession. We think our readers will find it worth the space it occupies in our pages.

"When the citizens feasted the allied sovereigns, we were saugly placed, at an early hour, at the window of a most worthy trader in the precious metals, upon Ludgate-hill; one who had been prime warden of the worshipful company, and had two gowns, and every thing handsome about him. His hospitable house was well filled with honest men and bonnie lassies, but we who had not been long in the small village, were constantly drawn from the well-spread table, and the bright eyes that surrounded it, to the window aforesaid, by the note of preparation. In the street were the heaps of gravel intended for smoothing the path of the Regent and the crowned heads. Workmen were employed in levelling these heaps, which the dogs, already collected in considerable numbers, evidently considered as pitched exclusively for their accommodation. The thickening crowd were in their holyday suits, every thing was bright and gay, the dogs were frisky beyond expression, and the gravel heaps produced the most social feelings among the assembled quadrupeds.

"By and by the gravel was spread—the dogs, that had been chasing each other's tails from an early hour, began to be a little tired, but were still in good spirits. The troops now lined the streets, and at length there seemed to be a disposition on the part of the dogs to consider that they had enough of the fête. Every now and then a canine sceptic, who began to think that matters were taking an unpleasant turn, would go to the sides of the street and try to make his way through the living wall that bounded the carriage-way. In nine cases out of ten he was kicked back by the soldiers, and if some particularly enterprising individual succeeded in passing them, a greater obstacle remained behind; for there was no possibility of getting through the conglomeration on the foot pavements; trampled upon by the crowd, and butt-ended by the soldiers, he was kicked back with curses into the arena, erst the scene of his gaiety, yelping and howling, and then and there immediately pitched into by his now hungry, peevish companions.

"Well, the day wore on, the dogs lay down;—the usual cries, 'They are coming!' brought every body from the creature-comforts to the windows, and the usual disappointments sent them back to their more substantial enjoyments. At last, the pealing of bells and firing announced the advent of the kings of the earth. Shouts were heard booming from the distance—the heads in the crammed windows were all craning westward,—the procession was now coming in earnest. It was headed by a large body of distressed dogs, the phalanx increasing as it advanced. Worn out, kicked to death's door, and scarcely able to crawl, the miserable curs marched in solemn silence, with head depressed, and slinking tail, to which here and there might be seen appended the badge of the order of the tin canister or kettle. By the side there was no escape—they could not retreat, and so the dejected wretches marshalled the way, unwillingly and slow, till our country's honor, and that of Europe, were roofed in the Guildhall of the city of London."

In making selections from this volume, as we designed to do, for the purpose of whetting our readers' appetites, we find ourselves realizing the force of the phrase "L'embarras des richesses." Whether the subject be cats or canary birds, wild swans or monkeys, owls or elephants, dogs or dragons—our author is sure to provide something piquant and provocative, which we can hardly bear to pass by, without making a full meal. And if we were to quote but half the passages which we mark in reading as especially worth notice, our present number would scarce suffice to hold them. We must therefore forego many things which we enjoyed highly ourselves, and be content with a very few extracts; which we trust our readers will use (to borrow a quaint simile) "as a shoeing horn, wherewith to draw on the remainder."

Hear him upon "OWLS"—a portion of the work which we respectfully recommend to certain of our friends, who are addicted to the worship of that Bird of Minerva.

"He who delights in contrasts, need seek none more striking among birds than that exhibited by a swan and an owl. The first with a picturesque profile proudly crowning a neck so beautifully long and graceful as to rivet the attention of the veriest Cymon of a spectator; the last with a great round head, looking almost as if it were made for a hat, and a flat face, placed, apparently, upon no neck at all. The long and flexible neck of the swan is ever and anon elegantly dipped into the wave, as the spotless living gondola glides over its surface, to crop the subaqueous herbage. The disk-like face of the owl turns upon the short-neck like a pivot, to catch and concentrate every twilight ray and arrest every sound, even that made by and the bird, no doubt, derives some of its ill-omened repute from the size of the organs of vision set in this concentrating facial disk. Great staring, goggle, or saucer-eyes are popularly attributed to goblins and demons, and are prominent features in a tale of terror."

The smallest monstrous mouse that creeps on floor;

"Cowper has admirably sung the 'sidling' and 'ogling' of a small-bird flirtation; but he does not appear to have ever witnessed the grand passion of an owl; would that he had! Such a serious affair is only to be observed by the outdoor naturalist, who will bury himself for hours in the depths of the quiet woods near some favorite owl-tree.

"If he is so fortunate as to see the courtship on some warm, gloomy, spring day, whose stillness is only broken by the pattering of the shower, or the 'minute drops' that fall from the moss-grown trees, he will be well repaid for his watching, by the solemnization. The Hudibrastic air with which the lover approaches, making lowly gesticulations, as if to 'Honor the shadow of the shoe-tie.'

of the prim quaker-like figure, that receives all these humiliations with the demure, starched demeanor of one of Richardson's heroines, only now and then slowly turning her head towards the worshipper, when she thinks she is not observed, but instantly turning it away when she thinks she is,—and the occasional prudish snap of her bill, when she is apprehensive that he is going to be rude—make a scene truly edifying."

"This owl is no great respecter of property, in captivity at least, and will often hide things like the magpie and its congeners: we can answer for the abstraction of an anodyne necklace by one; but this brings back another to our remembrance,—that owl of owls, Captain Face as he was named, and his being sent to sea in the horse-pond on a duck's back, and the divings of the animated bark when the captain in his terror stuck his claws into it, and his submersion upon the instant, and his hooting astonishment as he emerged, only to gripe harder and be again more deeply ducked, till both were captured for fear of consequences and the captain was unbound, shaking his feathers and staring at the perpetrators with a vacant expression, as who should say, "what does all this mean?" These aquatic excursions were inflicted upon the captain whenever he got a little seedy and moping, and they certainly did him good."

By way of realizing the contrast to which the first extract alludes, take this description of the Swan.

"Let us examine the body frame-work of a swan. What an admirable piece of animated ship-building it is! How the ribs rise from the broad and keeled sternum to support the lengthened pelvis and the broad back which form a goodly solid deck for the young cygnets to rest on under the elevated, arched, and sail-like wings of the parent; and how the twenty-five vertebræ of the neck rise into a noble ornamental prow, crowned with the graceful head. How skilfully are the oary legs and feet fitted—just where their strokes would be best brought to bear for the purpose of putting the living galley in motion! It is a work worthy of the great artificer."

Speaking of the Hooper or Whistling (wild) Swan, he tells the following spirited anecdote.

"The hooper breeds in captivity, soon becomes reconciled to a state of half-domestication, and is now far from uncommon on our ornamental sheets of water. He is a bird of high courage, and fights stoutly pro aris et focis.

"On a glorious half-spring, half-summer morning, a little family of newly-hatched cygnets were basking in their grayish downy coats on the banks of one of the islands in the gardens of the Zoological Society, drinking in the rays at every pore, with half closed eyes and outstretched legs, their delicately transparent webs expanded to the genial sun. The parents complacently rowed guard near them in all the enjoyment of honest family pride; and the happy little ones were so close to the deep water, that their forms were reflected therein as in a mirror.

Suddenly a carrion crow made a dash at one of the cygnets. The enraged father seized the felon on the instant with his bill. In vain the surprised crow struggled and buffeted to escape from the living vice which firmly grasped him: the old hooper's blood was up, he dragged his enemy into the water and held him under it till he was drowned. When the swan loosed his hold, an inanimate lump of flesh and feathers floated to the surface, and as he spurned the black mass for the last time, he looked in his snowy robe like some good but indignant spirit trampling the evil one."

The tame swans, according to Mr. Broderip, sometimes exhibit no less courage. In an epitaph upon "Old Jack," a veteran of 70 years, which he republishes from the Morning Post of 9th of July, 1840, we are told that he frequently put to death canine trespassers upon his domains, in the same way that the belligerent Quaker was reported to have disposed of his enemy, without shedding blood—i. e.—by "holding them under the water, until the breath did depart from their bodies." On one occasion, he even seized a boy of twelve years old, (who had been teasing him,) by the leg of his trousers, and dragged him into the water up to his knees. Old Jack, it seems, was a dweller on the canal in St. James's Park; and being a Native, he resented bitterly the intrusion of certain foreigners, introduced there by the Ornithological Society. Through many fierce conflicts, he always came off victorious, until a body of Polish geese, regardless of all rules of honorable war, overpowered him by mere force of numbers and pecked him to death. Since the day when Æsop's moribund old lion was kicked in the face by a cowardly donkey, we do not remember a noble brute to have endured a death so ignominious.

Before we dismiss the swans, we must even at the risk of prolixity, copy one more sketch, in which we flatter ourselves many of the author's traits of style are happily grouped together. He is talking of trout fishing on the Thames—

"But for a lover of nature, even when fortune smiles not, this kind of fishing has many charms:—the bright river, the continual change of scene, the rich beauty of the highly cultivated and picturesque country through which it flows, and the exhilarating freshness of the air as it comes laden with the perfume of the new-mown hay, or of the honeysuckle blossoms from

'the cottage of thatch,
Where never physician has lifted the latch,' make mere existence a pleasure.

"Then there is always something to be seen by one who has eyes and knows how to use them. There are the wild flowers that enamel the banks, the insects, the fish—it requires a practised eye to see them—the birds. Here, a king-fisher shoots by like a meteor—there go the summer-snipes—the swift darts by close to the boat, like

'An arrow from a Tartar's bow'—

That back-water is positively carpeted with the green leaves and snowy star-bloom of the water-lily—and the nightingale hard by, in shadiest covert hid, fairly sings down all the host of day-songsters, though the blackbird and thrush make melody loud and clear.

"On one of these expeditions not long ago, we observed below — Lock, just as a thunder-storm was coming on, a pair of swans with seven young ones. There was evidently something more than usual going on—some sensation as the French say, among them. The young were collected between the parents, and the whole party pushed up stream. At first we thought they were nearing our punt, as we were dropping down from trying the weir, in the hope of bread; but three of the young ones mounted on the back of the female swan, who elevated her wings to receive them, the brilliant whiteness of her plumage contrasting beautifully with the gray down of the little creatures, and there was a sacred appearance about the whole party. The cause was soon manifest.

"A magnificent swan, worthy of Leda herself, came ploughing up the water, indignant at a trespass on his domain. The family hurried on; and in their haste, one of the young slipped off its mother's back. There was distress! A weakling was left behind in the wake of its father, and whilst it scrambled along, non passibus æquis, uttered shrill cries as the enemy advanced. Up came the mighty bird, and then the father, evidently inferior to the attacking swan in age, size, and strength, turned to meet him, while the little family huddled close to the mother, made haste to escape up the river. Proud as the senior, the young father threw back his neck between his arched wings, and confronted the giant. This was unexpected; they kept sailing backward and forward abreast of each other, across the stream like two war-ships; and the watchful turns of their graceful necks and bodies, as each tried to take the other at advantage, was a sight to see. We thought at last that they would do battle; for each of the rivals elevated himself on the water, and made show of combat to the outrance. But, by this time, the family, under the guidance of the affectionate mother, were safe, and the elder male swan seemed to think that the better part of valour is discretion, and that he had driven the intruders from his royalty. So they parted. The young one went up to receive his reward from the mother of his family, and the old one rubbed his neck on his wings, and dived, and dropped down stream again, evidently comforting himself that he had given the trespasser a lesson.

"There was a dog belonging to the Lock-house. He, from experience, seemed to know that all swans are bullies; but still the encounter was something for a dog at a lock-house, where any thing is an incident. And, indeed, this was so much more earnest in show than the usual conflicts, that he moved down towards the brink, though the rain was coming on. At first he sat upon his tail; but, as the affair gave hope of becoming serious, he couched, and when the birds lifted themselves, as in act to fight, dropped his head on his outstretched forelegs, with all the ecstacy of an amateur. When, however, he found it was no go, and that the menaces ended as usual—much in the same way as they have done of late among the unfeathered bipeds, according to the new code of chivalry,—he shook himself, like a sensible dog, and went back to shelter.”

Those who witnessed the recent performances of Marzetti, as the Brazilian ape—and, still more, those who remember the superior activity of his “illustrious predecessor,” Monsieur Gouffe, some 16 or 17 years since—will appreciate the following notice of their great prototype. To us, it was both new and interesting.

“Mazurier it is said, after a long and patient attendance upon the monkeys, domiciled in the Jardin du Roi, sewed up in skins, and with a face painted and made up in a concatenation accordingly, raised at last the benevolence of a tender-hearted one to such a pitch, that it offered him a bit of the apple it was eating, and drew from him that rapturous exclamation, pregnant with the consciousness of his apparent identity with the monkey-character—‘Enfin! enfin, je suis singe!’”

“Poor Mazurier! when he died, Polichinelle was shipwrecked indeed. We can see him now gaily advancing, as if Prometheus had just touched the wood with his torch, in a brilliant cocked hat of gilt and silvered pasteboard, with rosettes to match, gallantly put on athwart ships; that very pasteboard, so dear to recollection as having glittered before our delighted eyes when old nurse unfolded the familiar little books of langsyne—books which in these philosophical days are shorn of their beams; for ‘Cock-Robin,’ ‘Little Red Riding Hood,’ ‘Jack and his Beanstalk,’ ‘The Children in the Wood,’ ‘The Seven Champions,’ ‘Valentine and Orson,’ with the other dearly-beloved legends of our childhood, when permitted to enter the nursery, are more soberly clad: their splendid and many-coloured attractive coats have almost entirely disappeared.

“Mazurier was the personification of that invincible Prince of Roués, Punch; but if the comic strength of this elastic, this Indian-rubber man lay in Polichinelle, it was in ‘The Ape of Brazil’ that his tragic power lay—and that power, absurd as the expression may seem to those who never beheld him, was great. There was but one blot in his inimitable performance. It was perfect as a piece of acting—if that be called acting which, like Merris Barnett’s Mousieur Jacques, is nature itself; but alas! Mazurier had dressed the character without a tail. The melodrama was admirably got up; but there, to the great distress of zoologists, was the tailless quadrumanus in the midst of Brazilian scenery, where no traveller—and traveller is proverbial for seeing strange things—has ever ventured to say that he saw a monkey without that dignifying appendage. How true is it that wisdom—such wisdom as it is—brings sorrow; all the rest of the world were in ecstasies; the zoologists shook their heads, and the scene ceased to affect them.

“Be it remembered henceforth by the gettens-up of monkey melodramas, that all the monkeys of the New World yet discovered rejoice in tails; the anthropoid apes of the Old World have none.”

We were glad to see the assurance which Mr. Broderip gives, that, notwithstanding the apparent resemblances between men and monkeys, they are not really of kin to one another. It is now some years since we had the good fortune to fall in with the lectures of Professor Lawrence of London, on the Natural History of Man. From this source we first derived the information, that a broadly marked distinction between even the highest specimens of anthropoid apes, and the lowest forms of human existence, was demonstrable from the differences of physical construction, and of the animal economy. And although, in common with the great majority of intelligent men, we had never believed otherwise, it was some comfort to know that our title to supremacy over all other living creatures was capable of sustaining, without injury, the test of this rigid analysis. It must be admitted, that, to a superficial observer, the similarity is often alarmingly close, and cannot be witnessed without serious mortification. Sometimes the monkey imitates the man, sometimes the man plays the monkey—but in different costume and character from Messrs. Mazurier and Marzetti. Nay, it is not unfrequently hard to determine, to which family the individual claims to belong, or to which of them, (as David Crockett said,) we owe an apology for our mistake. We should, therefore, be proportionably grateful to those, whose labours counteract these impressions, and prove to mankind, that in spite of all their self-stultification, they cannot obliterate the stamp of sovereignty, which has been impressed upon them by the hand of their Creator.

The following anecdotes, illustrative of monkey-character, are novel and amusing—

“In a country town, no matter where, there lived the worthiest and most philosophical of old bachelors, with a warm heart and a sound head, from whose well-powdered exterior dangled that most respectable ornament, a queue. Long did this august appendage, now no longer seen, linger among the benches of the inns of court. Two worthies we have yet in our eye.—Ultimi Caudatorum! with what veneration do we look up to ye! with what fear and trembling did we regard the progress of the influenza!—the destroying angel has passed by, and the tails still depend from your ‘frosty paws’—blessings on ‘em!

“Pardon the digression; and return we to our bachelor, who entertained a monkey of such good breeding and so much discretion, that Jacko was permitted to make one at the dinner-table, where he was seated in a high child's chair next to his master, and took off his glass of perry and water in the same time and measure with his patron, and in as good a style as Dominic Sampson himself could have performed the feat. Now, his master's housekeeper made the best preserved apricots in the county, and when the said apricots were enshrined in a tart, the golden fruit set off by the superincumbent trellis, a more tempting piece of pâtisserie could hardly be laid before man or monkey. One of these tarts enriched the board at a small dinner-party, and was placed nearly opposite to Jacko, who occupied his usual station. The host helped one and another to some of this exquisite tart, but he forgot poor Jacko, who had been devouring it with his eyes, and was too well-bred to make any indecorous snatch at the attraction, as most monkeys would have done. At last Jacko could stand it no longer, so looking to the right and left, and finally fixing his eyes on the guests opposite, he quietly lifted up his hand behind his master's back, and gave his tail such a tug as made the powder fly, withdrew his hand in an instant, and sat with a vacant expression of the greatest innocence. People don't like to have their tails pulled. His master gave him a look, and Jacko gave him another, but even the eloquent expression of Hogarth's monkey on the offending bear's back, fell short of it. It said as plainly as look could speak—'Don't be angry—don't thrash me—they did not see it—I beg your pardon, but I must have a bit of that apricot tart;'—he was forgiven and helped.

* “At last! at last, I am an ape!”

"Authors generally seem to think that the monkey race are not capable of retaining lasting impressions; but their memory is remarkably tenacious when striking events call it into action.

"One that in his zeal for imitation had swallowed the entire contents of a pill-box—the cathartics, fortunately, were not Morisonian—suffered so much, that ever afterwards the production of such a box sent him to his hiding place in a twinkling.

"Another that was permitted to run free had frequently seen the men-servants in the great country kitchen with its high fireplace, take down a powder-horn that stood on the chimney piece, and throw a few grains into the fire, to make Jemima and the rest of the maids jump and scream, which they always did on such occasions very prettily. Pug watched his opportunity and when all was still, and he had the kitchen entirely to himself, he clambered up, got possession of the well-filled powder-horn, perched himself very gingerly on one of the horizontal wheels placed for the support of saucepans, right over the waning ashes of an almost extinct wood-fire, screwed off the top of the horn, and reversed it over the grate.

"The explosion sent him half-way up the chimney. Before he was blown up he was a smug, trim, well-conditioned monkey as you would wish to see on a summer's day: he came down a carbonadoed nigger in miniature, in an avalanche of burning soot. The ♂ plumb with which he pitched upon the hot ashes in the midst of the general flare up, aroused him to a sense of his condition. He was missing for days. Hunger at last drove him forth, and he sneaked into the house close-singed, begrimed, and looking scared and devilish. He recovered with care, but, like some other great personages, he never got over his sudden elevation and fall, but became a sadder if not a wiser monkey. If ever Pug forgot himself and was troublesome, you had only to take down a powder-horn in his presence, and he was off to his hole like a shot, screaming and clattering his jaws like a pair of castanets.

"Le Vaillant, in his African travels, was accompanied by an ape, which lived on very good terms with the cocks and hens, showing, in defiance of the legend, no antipathy to the former, and a strong penchant for the latter, for whose cacklings he listened, and whose eggs he stole. But this and other peccadillos were amply atoned for, by the bonhomie and other good qualities of Kees, for that was the name of the traveller's ape, which seems to have almost realized the virtues of Philip Quarl's monkey."

"Turn we to that grotesque race, the Sapa-jous.

"They are slender, mild in disposition, flat in face, long in tail, and spidery in general appearance. The genus Ateles of M. Geoffrey St. Hilaire stands first upon the roll. With anterior hands, either entirely deprived of thumbs, or only supplied with mere rudiments, and weak, long limbs, justifying their popular names of 'Spider Monkeys,' they are compensated by a prehensile tail of such exquisite sensibility and power, that it may almost be considered a fifth hand. For a length of six or seven inches from the tip, this is naked; and, on the under surface, it is comparatively callous, for the purpose of prehension. Humboldt asserts that the animal can introduce it, without turning its head, into narrow clinks or clefts, and hook out any substance; but he never saw it employed to convey food to the mouth, though the natives will have it that the monkey goes a fishing with it. Leap the species of this genus cannot, or, at most, but very imperfectly; this tail of all work, however, amply makes amends, for by it they hang suspended from the branches or swing themselves from bough to bough, and from tree to tree, with the utmost agility. Dampier relates, and his statements are generally worthy of credit, that, when troops of them have occasion to cross rivers, they look out for a point where the trees are most lofty, and project farthest over the water. Having arrived at such a place, they climb to the boughs best suited to their purpose, and form a long chain by grasping the tails of each other. This chain hangs free at the lower end, while it is held on at the top, and the living pendulum is swung backwards and forwards, till it acquires sufficient vibration to carry the lower end to the opposite bank. Then the lowest joint catches hold of the first branch within his reach, and mounts as high as he can. As soon as he has made himself fast, the upper joint on the other side lets go, and the whole conjoined 'tail' swings, and is carried safely over. Humboldt and Bonpland saw some of them which inhabit the banks of the Orinoco suspended in great numbers from the trees, and hanging on to each other by tail and hands in the most ridiculous groups."

"In captivity the Sanglains are great pets, and Edwards relates a curious instance of the craving for something that possessed life breaking out in one that was the favourite of a lady. Once, when he was let loose, he snatched a gold fish from its 'watery glass,' and instantly killed and devoured it. The lady, upon this, made him a present of some live eels, and, as the little fellow was not more than eight inches long without his tail, these lively gifts frightened him at first a good deal by twisting round his neck when he seized them. His carnivorous nature, however, prevailed, and, without a well sanded hand, he soon mastered and ate them.

"M. F. Cuvier had an opportunity of observing their domestic arrangements in a conjugal state. He had a pair who were blest with three young ones; but it seems to have been the Lady Sanglain's first accouchement, and she had no experienced female friend to direct her; so after regarding her interesting progeny, she proceeded to bite off the head of one of them; the other two in the meantime, took to the breast, and the moment the mother felt them she was all affection. The papa was even more affectionate than the mamma, and assiduously assisted in the nursery. The favourite position of the young ones was upon the back or bosom of the mother; and when she was tired of nursing, she would come up to her mate with a shrill cry, which said as plainly as cry could speak, "Here! do take the children." He, like a good-natured father, immediately stretched forth his hands and placed his offspring upon his back or under his body, where they held on while he carried them about, till they became restless for want of that which he could not give them; and then he handed them back again to his partner, who, after satisfying their hunger, again turned them over to their papa.

"Cuvier seems to think that their intelligence is inferior to that of many of the smaller monkeys. That their attachment to each other is sometimes great, the following anecdote, related by a lady who kept a couple of them, and who could never tell the story unmoved, will prove.

"These playful Sanglains had not, indeed, any family, but they were very happy and were all in all to each other. One of them, unfortunately, died. The other seemed to be unwilling to believe the change that had taken place, and continued to caress the body until it became absolutely necessary to remove it. Every thing was done to console the survivor that its fond and distressed mistress could think of; but as soon as its mate was taken away, the poor widowed Sanglain pressed its little hands to its eyes, refused to be comforted, and remained pining in that attitude till death relieved it from its sufferings."

But we must tear ourselves away from the monkeys, and hurry over many other portions of the menagerie, equally worthy of our attention, but which we have not room to notice.

The Elephant! "Vell, vot of 'im?" asks some cockney, "hevery body 'as seen the helephant!" Perhaps so. These are days of progress. But we well remember the day, when every body had not seen him, and when that individual was sure of attentive listeners, who could boast of such experience. When some town-bred boy, for the benefit of country air and pure morals, was sent to ruralize at our provincial school,—or some country lad returned after a visit to the courthouse, (on court-day,) fresh from an encounter with a travelling menagerie—with what an air of consequence did he impart the results of travel and observation, to a group of urchins all agape with wonder and credulity! But when the great occasion came at last, so often dreamed of, so long hoped for—when, in our own proper person, we entered that mighty rotunda of canvas, and found ourselves in the august presence of "The Emperor of Siam" himself—words cannot describe our awful astonishment. We have a vague recollection of having felt some disposition to retreat, until we were reminded of our great anxiety to come and take a ride upon the elephant! A dreadful suggestion: which, at the same moment cut off all hope of escape, and made us tenfold more anxious to effect it! How we nerved ourself for the effort—and with what a pleasing horror—a sort of heroic trembling—we submitted to be swayed to and fro in the embrace of that mysterious trunk, and lifted on and off the broad neck of the benevolent monster! We have seen some sights in our time, and undergone some trials. We have stood on the cedar stump and peeped over the Natural Bridge—we have passed under the great fall at Niagara, and planted our foot on Termination Rock—we have been out on the big Lakes in storms, that made old sailors thoughtful—we have been within range of hostile cannon shot—we have grinned and endured the worst that dentists could inflict—we have sat for long hours, under details of mesmeric phenomena, witnessed and vouched for by "people of the highest intelligence and veracity"—all these things have we gone through—even the last and most terrible—with more composure than we could command when we "saw," and rode, the elephant. And after all, elephants are not to be sneezed at, as witness Mr. Broderip—

"A very intelligent elephant was shown, some years since, in a caravan of wild beasts at a fair in the West of England. One of those practical jokers, whose wit lies in pouring melted butter into a friend's pocket, or conveying a putrid oyster into his plate, had been doling out some gingerbread nuts of the first quality to the elephant, who received the instalments, small as they were, with satisfaction and gratitude, manifesting the latter by the spontaneous performance of some of his tricks between the somewhat protracted intervals of supply. Suddenly, his benefactor produced a large paper parcel, weighing some two or three pounds, and presented it en masse. The elephant took it as it was, and consigned the whole to his powerful crushing-mill. Hardly, however, had he swallowed the dose, before he gave a loud roar, and exhibited all the symptoms of suffering severely from internal heat, handing—yes, handing, for the trunk acted as dexterously as a hand—the bucket to his keeper, as if beseeching for water, which was given to him, and of which he continued to pour floods sufficient to drive a mill down his capacious and burning throat.

“Ha!” said the joker, addressing his victim, ‘those nuts were a trifle hot, old fellow, I guess!’

“You had better be off,” exclaimed the keeper, ‘unless you want the bucket at your head, and serve you right too.’

“The dispenser of ginger and pepper took the hint; for there was an angry glare in the drinker’s eye, while the distressed beast was pumping up his sixth bucketful; and in good time he took it, for he had scarcely cleared the entrance of the show, when the empty bucket was hurled after him by the elephant with such force and correctness of aim, that if he had been a moment later, his joking would, in all probability, have been terminated, with his life, on the spot.

“A year had passed away, and the wayfarers from the country villages trod over the withered leaves that had, when fresh, green, and vigorous, shielded their heads from the burning summer’s sun as they again bent their steps to the same annual autumnal fair, where the elephant had been before exhibited, and where he was again ready to receive company.

“Our joker was again among his visitors, and, forgetful of his narrow escape from the bucket, which, at the time, another wit observed he had been near kicking, came, as before, with one coat-pocket filled with ‘best nuts,’ and the other with hot nuts. He gave the elephant two or three nuts from the best sample, and then drew forth and presented him with a hot one. No sooner had the elephant tasted it, than he seized the coat-tails of his tormenter, and, with one whirling sweep with his trunk lifted him from the ground, till, the tails giving way, the man dropped half-dead with fright, and with his coat reduced to a jacket. The elephant, meanwhile, quietly inserted the end of his trunk into the pocket containing the best nuts, and leisurley proceeded, keeping his foot on the coat-tails, to discuss every nut of them. When he had finished the last, he trampled upon the pocket containing the hot nuts, till he had reduced them to a mash; and then, after having torn the tails to rags, threw the soiled fragments at the head of his facetious friend, amid the derision of the assembled crowd.”

The seventy pages which are devoted to elephants in this work are among the most interesting portions of it. They treat of the animal as he appears in his native haunts, and in confinement—of his employments in war and peace, and of his connexion with many of the most important events in ancient and modern history. The progress of zoological knowledge concerning him is also traced, from the “Historie of Four Footed Beasts,” by Edward Topsell in 1607—with occasional glances at the Greek and Roman accounts of Pliny and others—down to the discovery of the Siberian elephant, preserved in ice, at the mouth of the river Lena, in 1799. But we have no space for the tempting passages which meet us on every page, and must conclude our notices with a brief extract, in which the reader is introduced to the “ancient and honorable” family of Dragons.

“The Dragon of Wantley churches ate

(He us’d to come of a Sunday),

Whole congregations were to him

A dish of Salmagundi.

Parsons were his black-puddings, and

Fat aldermen his capons,

And his tit-bit the collection plate

Brimful of Birmingham halfpence.

The corporation worshipful

He valued not an ace:

But swallow’d the mayor, asleep in his chair,

And pick’d his teeth with the mace!”

Heroic Ballad.

“Great as has been the progress made in the wide field of natural history within the last thirty years, in no direction has the advance been more decided or more satisfactory, than in that hitherto obscure part of it which sepulchres the remains of animals that lorded it over sea and land when this earth was young.

“And although there is nothing among the earliest known organized forms fashioned by the hand which weigheth all things, that is not pregnant with proof of the same care and design and harmony in the construction of the animal, as shines forth in the being born into the world yesterday, let no one picture unto him or herself the youth of our planet as lovely to any but the grosser natures then placed upon it to breathe an atmosphere which no human lungs, nay, no lungs of any vertebrate of a high grade could have long breathed as the breath of life. It was a place of dragons: fit only for Saurians, Batrachians, and the like.

“Dragons?”

“Yes, dragons: not such as the small, living winged reptiles, that skim from place to place in search of their insect food, relying on their natural parachutes, constructed upon a somewhat safer principle than that of poor Mr. Cocking, and rejoicing in the generic name of Draco: but downright enormous dragons with bellies as big as tuns and bigger; creatures that would have cared little for Bevis’s sword ‘Morglaye,’ nor that of the Rhodian Draconicide, nor St. George’s ‘Askalon,’ no, nor the ‘nothing-at-all’ of More of More Hall, even if those worthies could have existed in the pestiferous region in which the said dragons revelled.

“For in a slough where Calamites and other gigantic marsh-plants, now extinct also, rooted themselves at ease, and roared themselves into a damp jungle; in a dreary bog, to which the undrained Pontine marshes would have been the land of health, was their lair. In such a nauseous quag, wholesome to them, these monsters roared and wallowed: there they growled their horrid loves, and there they made war upon each other—the strong devouring the weak, and the carnivorous ‘chawing-up’ the herbivorous in the midst of the widest convulsions of a nascent world.

“While this was going on upon what then passed for dry land, great sea-dragons rushed through the waves, or sported on the surface of an ocean not unlike, as far as the waters were concerned, our own, while flying dragons hovered, like Shakspeare’s Witches, through the fog and the filthy air. These last ancient Saurian forms have left no living representative upon the earth.”

After this beginning, we are led gradually along, from the classical and fabulous history of dragons, in earlier and later times, to the developments of modern science, and the stupendous “dragonnades,” attended by the fossil remains of these pre-Adamite lords of creation. We pass in review Sea Dragons, Dragons Amphibious and Terrestrial, and Flying Dragons; with their sesquipedalian names, (Ichthyosaurus, Megalosaurus, Pterodactylus, &c.,) almost worthy the extinct leviathans themselves. And we find, that, notwithstanding some allowance for exaggeration—for the way in which the form of a dead hero looms up through the mists of antiquity—there was yet a substantial leaven of truth in all the old traditions about these aboriginal tenants of our planet. If it be true, indeed, that the conditions of their existence were so incompatible with our own, that they must all have perished before man could have inhabited the earth it is hard to conceive in what way, (short of revelation,) the memory of their lives and exploits could have been transmitted to our illustrious predecessors, the ante-diluvians. From them, it is easily deducible, through Noah and his descendants, to its general diffusion among all the nations of the earth. As the French lady said, of the saint who walked half-a-mile after his head was cut off,* “the first step is the only difficulty.”

We are not very prone to believe in things marvellous; on the contrary, we are commonly reckoned to be rather skeptical. But there is one thing of popular ridicule, which has long appeared to us to be worthy of more serious consideration: and that is the Sea Serpent. We are not disposed to swallow all that good Bishop Pontoppidan relates of the “Kraken;” nor to believe that he could outdo Ariel, by “putting a girdle about the earth” in less than “forty minutes.” Nevertheless, in view of the immense extent of the seas, the huge proportions of many known aquatic animals, the constant voice of tradition, and the repeated declarations of modern voyagers, down to the very year in which we live, we cannot but believe that there does exist a species of sea-monster, rare in proportion to its extraordinary size, which has not yet found a place “in our philosophy.” Fifty years ago who believed that such things as dragons ever existed, except in tales of romance, and coats-of-arms from the Herald’s College? Fifty years hence, the existence of what we call the Sea Serpent may be established by proofs as solid as the rocky tablets, in which the geologist reads the long-buried annals of the great Saurian dynasty. We have great faith in rail roads generally, and a little hope for that one which aims at the Pacific; but if Mr. Whitney and the Sea-Serpent would make a race against time, for a vacant berth in this nineteenth “century of inventions,” we would certainly—as they say in California—“go our pile” upon the Snake!

THE AUTUMN STORM.

A PROEMIAL FRAGMENT.

BY DAVID E. ARNELL.

Smit with the loss of what to me had been
A passion and a purpose, I had strayed
Beyond the narrow confines that shut in
The ken of those I shrank from: and I prayed,
In the dark sanctuary of a fearful shade,
If aught there were not false, to see its sign,
That He who manifest himself had made
Of old unto his servants, thus benign
Would by some semblance pass before my drooping eyes.

It was the Autumn time, and e’er I knelt,
My soul had yearned back on the path I’d trod,
Ah me! it was a scene well could be felt,
It looked the smile of a departing God;—
The orchis and the pansies graced the sod,
Lovers of woods and silent thoughts are these,
And up the hills clomb the bright golden-rod,
While round, with its invisible arms, the breeze
Shook fast their glories down from the complaining trees.

The sun had set; and wold, and stream, and air
Slept in the Sabbath of his chastened light,
While, scarce discerned in blue, a crescent fair,
Upturned, poured dewa upon a neighboring height;—
When, suddenly, all the sky between grew white,
And silvered into cloud, that, as it drew
Towards the horizon, was in blackness dight;
Till, as some bird of prey had thither flew,
Above the dying day its condor wings it threw.

* “Ce n’est que le premier pas qui coûte!”

And then a mumbing, suffocating sound,
As if it gorged the distance, filled my ear,
Till, swift, it left its place, and circling round,
Swept the pale stars from the blank atmosphere,
And its black, blinding swoop sent chilling fear
Through all my frame till turning there, I saw
A hut untenanted, and haply near,
To that my unnerved limbs I scarce did draw,
And knelt we down in prayer within that place of awe.

Oh, God! I prayed for strength to overcome,—
Or else to bear my abject life, nor sigh,—
A few weak words I spake and then was dumb,
And but the wind in storming joy went by;
Then I arose, and looked out for the sky,
And saw—what? Nothing; but I felt a sense,—
A horrible feeling that I there should die,
And then there passed o'er me a wish intense
To rush out in the storm, and dare Omnipotence.

But as the lightning its fire deluge poured
Above the scene, the pitiless Demon there
Tore the cloud-pall, through which it seemed there soared
A fairer shape above that hideous glare;—
And as another gleam lit up the air,
The Demon and the trees I saw in fight,
And heard the thunders laugh where they did dare
Toss upward their great, suppliant arms and smite
In scorn, the Fiend with their unconquerable might.

Wind—bail—ye elements of wrath, and ye
Invisible spirits that do lead abroad
Your hellish company o'er earth and sea,
Called falsely scourges of the dreadful God!
Then I did stand and scorn ye, and did laud
The mightier spirit that gave outcry there,
From the strong tree-tops, and the smitten sod,
And from my own roused soul, and then did swear
Henceforth to confront all Demons of earth and air.

• • • • •
Mary county, Tenn.

ENGLISH BALLADS.*

If fine paper, and clear type, and beautiful and appropriate illustrations can ever render books "suitable for presents"—and such is the intended character of these volumes—then assuredly has the publisher achieved the most brilliant success in his present effort. Certainly such paper and type would invite even a senile eye, and no one, not wholly destitute of all taste in pictorial art, could fail to dwell with delight upon the illustrations so cleverly executed, so full of variety, so pregnant with dramatic spirit.

But the matter of the book is well worthy of its manner. A choice selection of British Ballads—ancient and modern—beginning with Chevy Chase, which rang like the call of the clarion in the ears of our English ancestors, reaching through intermediate ages to the moving story of Ruth, as told by the bard of Rydal Mount, who still lives in "an old age serene and bright," has furnished volumes such as we have not often met with. It is not our intention at present to enter into an extended notice of the contents of the book. It would occupy too much space. But we purpose giving an outline of one or two of the more ancient ballads—less known, perhaps, to some of our readers than those of Scott, Coleridge, Wordsworth and Motherwell—yet well worthy of the exalted regard which has for generations been extended towards them by men of critical might and men of poetical renown.

* The Book of British Ballads. Two Volumes. Edited by S. C. Hall, Esq., F. S. A. London. Jeremiah How.

The first of these is the Ballad of "Sir Lancelot du Lake"—a tale of England's palmy days of chivalry. The copy before us is taken from a black-letter copy in the folio collection at the British Museum; and on comparison with that in Percy's Reliques, will be found a much purer version. It is quoted by Shakspeare in the second part of Henry IV. It may be as well, however, to give a slight sketch of the hero, whose glorious deeds are sung in this ballad.

Amongst the four and twenty knights, whose names were inscribed on the far-famed Round Table of King Arthur, there was no one whose life surpassed in its romance that of this chevalier. No one of those who had ever sat in the seats of that order, instituted by Uther Pendragon, was better entitled to the praise of "Perfect Knight." When a child he was snatched almost from the arms of his widowed mother by the fair and beautiful Vivian, the mistress of the great sorcerer Merlin, and carried by her to dwell beneath the waters of that fair Lake in which she abode, and which bestowed on him his surname. She who had robbed him of a mother's care was not unmindful of a mother's duties, but had him taught all knightly accomplishments. At eighteen she carried him to King Arthur's court, where she obtained for him the boon of knighthood: and in all after life, in his perils by land and by sea, exercised over him an ever-vigilant guardianship. Thanks to her protection, backed by his own brave heart and stout arm, he won for himself such peerless fame, that ancient romances record him as "the curtest knight—the goodliest person—the truest friende and lover—the kindest man that ever stroke with sword—the meekest man and the gentlest, that ever sate in hal among ladyes—the sternest knighte to thy mortale foe that ever put spere in reste." Indeed, the ballad before us tells that in the jousts and tournaments which King Arthur gave, the Knights of the Round Table always bore off the palm of victory. But bright as was their fame, and well approved as were their feats, yet amongst them was one whose glory shone transcendent—whose prowess was invincible: It was

One Sir Lancelot du Lake,
Who was approved well,
Hee, in his fights and deeds of armes,
All others did excell.

Finding no competitor, however, fully his match, our Knight grew tired of

The play, and game, and sport, and therefore sallied forth into "the forest wide" in search of some adventure. Here

He met a damsel faire—

a species of sylvan population, which seemed to be "as plenty as blackberries" in those days—who, after subjecting him to much critical investigation, decides that he is "a knight full good," and, with the mischief-making propensities so often ascribed to her sex, proposes to lead where he might find a knight who never was O'er matched of any man—a proposition which he cheerfully embraces, and forthwith proceeds under her direction to the castle of the formidable Tarquine—the name, by-the-way, usually bestowed on all Paynims, Giants and other defeated individuals. Tarquine promptly appeared; whereupon Sir Lancelot challenged him to try our force together;

For, as I understand, thou hast,
As far as thou art able,
Done great despite and shame unto
The knights of the Round Table.

This was a part of Tarquine's life which he could not gainsay, for he had no less than threescore and four of our hero's predecessors in his dungeons at that very time. Indeed, the Infidel seemed rather to glory in his work, for he had hung the shields of the vanquished on a tree, and moreover was engaged at the very moment, when first seen by the English champion, in driving a horse before him straight, Whereon a knight was bound—a sight well calculated to irritate the excitable spirit of this gallant Revenger of wrongs. Besides, hearken to his reply—

"If thou art of the Table Round"—
Quoth Tarquine speedily—
"Both thee and all thy fellowship
I utterly defy."

When men in such a frame of mind meet on hostile thoughts intent, they do not indulge in much conversation. It is not surprising therefore to find that

They sett their spurs unto their steeds,
And at each other fie, with spears duly couched, and all the other means and appliances of this species of warfare in fine killing order. There was a general smash. Indeed, so general, that

Their horses' backs brake under them—a proceeding which seemed to "astound" the riders no little, and with admirable prudence, therefore,

To avoyd their horses they made haste
To fight upon the ground.

This little accident did not droop their ardor, for

They tooke them to their shields full fast,
Their swords they drew out then;
Wyth mighty strokes most eagerly
One at the other ran.

This spirit of enterprise produced the usual consequences, and,

They wounded were, and bled full sore,
For breath they both did stand.

And here, when in this breathless and damaged condition, like any other couple of belligerents, conjugal or otherwise, they proceeded to hold such colloquy as their short wind would permit, and endeavor to adjust the matter on "terms honorable and satisfactory to both parties." Their mutual phlebotomy had been very effectual in mollifying their eagerness for the conflict, and they accordingly exchanged compliments and proposed arrangements in a spirit of the greatest amiability. Unluckily for their rapidly cementing friendship and also for Tarquine's welfare, he excepted from amicable relations, one cavalier—and only one. The inquisitive Sir Lancelot asks the name of this individual, so distinguished as a mark of hatred. For Tarquine's reply and the rest of the adventure we will quote the Ballad itself—

"His name 's Sir Lancelot du Lake,
Hee slew my brother deare;
Him I suspect of all the rest;
I wold I had him here."

"Thy wish thou hast, but now unknowne;
I am Lancelot du Lake,
Now of King Arthur's Table Round;
King Hand's son of Benwake;

"And I defy thee; do thy worst."
"Ha, ha," quoth Tarquine tho,
"One of us two shall end our lives
Before that we do go."

"If thou be Lancelot du Lake,
Then welcome shalt thou bee;
Wherefore see thou thyself defend,
For now defe I thee:"

They buckled them together so,
Like unto wild boars rashing;
And wyth their swords and shields they ran
At one another slashing:

The ground besprynkled was wyth blood:
Tarquine began to faint;
For he had backt and bore his shield
So low, hee did repent.

Repentance, however, came to him, like to many other sinners, too late to be of any service. Sir Lancelot perceived his advantage, hacked off his head, and delivered his "threescore and four" comrades in arms from their durance vile.

We hear no more of Sir Lancelot—but presume that he passed the balance of his life in similar chivalrous exploits; meeting beautiful girls in the woods and slaughtering fierce and vindictive giants.

The next Ballad to which we invite attention, is that of "The Nut Brown Maid." Nut brown maidens are the theme of much poetic rapture, but we believe,—for we were never much given to bucolics and seldom "babble of green fields"—nut brown maidens are generally stout young women, with healthy complexions none the whiter for exposure, whose occupations are chiefly of a culinary character. As we are as ignorant of the mysteries of the cuisine as we are of the best mode of raising mangel-wurtzel, we do not profess to know much of the thoughts and feelings, the education or refinement of this much sung class of individuals. If the one described in this ballad be at all a correct example of the class we can only say that they will compare to great advantage with the fair maidens of our aristocratic circles. Certainly it has never been our good fortune to meet anywhere, in the world of romance or in that of reality, with a nobler, purer, more generous specimen of woman's love and faith—a love and faith second only to that which lifts the soul above the gross things of this nether earth and bears it aloft to dwell amid the delights, the solemn glories of Heaven.

This ballad is as antique as it is beautiful. It probably dates back as early as the year 1400. The oldest known copy is that contained in Arnold's Chronicle, printed in 1502: as its author was even then unknown, it is but reasonable to suppose that it was owing to its age. Dr. Percy bestowed upon it vast pains, and thanks to his industry, learning and research, this exquisite tribute to the noblest traits of the female character has been restored to its pristine purity and nervous elegance of expression. Upon it Prior has founded his "Henry and Emma," but we trust our readers will see from our notice how much the original has lost in delicacy of sentiment by its transmutation in the hands of a modern poet.

The poem itself is a dialogue between the hero, who turns out to be the son of the earl of Westmoreland, and the nut brown maid, "a baron's chylde." The lover distrusts the truth, the faith of woman, and especially of her whose affections he has won and to whom he has plighted his troth. The guileless girl, rich in affection, innocence and confidence in her lover, never suspects the tricks to which he is resorting, but answers him as she is prompted by her own true heart. The object of the poem is best told by the first two stanzas—

Be it right or wrong, these men among
On women do complayne
Affermyng this, how that it is
A labour spent in vayne,
To love them well: for never a dele
They love a man agayne:
For lett a man do what he can,
Theyr favour to attayne,
Yet, yf a newe do them persue,
Theyr first true lover than Labourereth for naught: and from her thought
He is a banished man.

I say not nay, but that all day
It is both writ and sayde
That woman's faith is, as who sayth,
All utterly decayde:
But nevertheesse, ryght good wittnesse
In this case might be layd,
That they love trewe, and continewe:
Recordes the nut-brown mayd:
Which from her love, (when, her to prove,
He cam to make his mone,)
Wold not depart; for in her herte
She loved but him alone.

The author then begs us to "discuss the manner" in which he tested her affection, and she proved herself worthy of it—no, not worthy of such affection as this suspicious lover bestowed upon her, but worthy of the noblest, highest love which mortal man may be permitted to give to a fellow-creature. With this reasonable request we cheerfully comply, for though argumentation is but little to our taste, yet such a discussion as this waxeth well to the soul.

The lover steals upon her by night, to tell her that he is a banished man. His hand hath wrought a deed,

Whereof much harm shall growe;

the wages of which is death to its perpetrator. That death, shameful and dishonoring, must be his fate, or else he must escape to the greenwood, to lead the life of an outlaw and earn a precarious subsistence by his bow. A natural sigh of regret bursts from her heart as she contemplates this speedy ruin of her lately anticipated happiness, but her gentle piety forbids her even repining at the dispensations of Providence, for such she regards it. To it, however, she submits without complaint, or murmur, or even question, but expresses her willingness to go with him whithersoever he should go. She had given her love to him ere the deed of darkness had thus hunted him from the society of honest men, when she might look forward to sharing a fair fame and honorable home with him. And now, when crime had stained his hand, when he was a beggared wanderer, a vagabond and fugitive upon the face of the earth, that promise was still sacred, that love more than ever gushed forth from the deep fountains of her heart.

Most men, even though suspicious, would have been satisfied with this proof of unswerving affection. At least not many would have indulged in sneers and sarcasms. Not so with our Earl's son. Hear him—

I can beleve, it shall you greve,
And somewhat you destrayne;
But afterwarde, your paynes harde
Within a day or twayne
Shall soon aslake; and ye shall take Comfort to you agayne.

But the taunt is unheeded. She meekly tells him she will be "playne" with him. She will suffer no one to say that the nut brown maid was to her love unkind. No! she had promised to share his weal: she would now share his woe. And the bitter taunt is forgiven as the chafings of a wounded spirit.

He tells her of the world, how it will deal lightly with her good name. This is to her indeed a deep sorrow. Nevertheless her motives of action render her pure alike in her own conscience and in the sight of her God. Therefore,

Theys be the charge, that speke so large,
In hurtyng of my good name :

it is hers to prove, that in his dystresse and hevynesse

her faithful love stands not in awe of the scandal and jeers of a misjudging world.

But this generous youth now paints other pictures of her "grene wode" life to the now heavy-laden and heart-wrung girl. He wants to know, if needs be, whether she can follow him day after day in the fatigues of the chase, lend a helping hand at times—nay, even become as an hired servant unto him? Can she, if he is pursued by those who hunt after the precious life, can she yield him any aid? Can she bring any rescue to the captured felon? Can she, at his command, wend her way through thorns and briars, over hills and valleys? Can she render herself insensible to

The snowe, the frost, the rayne,
The colde, the hete—

and lodge in quiet ease upon the ground beneath the starry canopy of heaven?

These are but to her minor trials. She hath been the partner of his joy and bliss, and therefore she gladly goes to partake of his misfortunes and alleviate his sufferings. She will cheerfully assist him in purveying for their frugal household.

The water clere of the ryvère
Shall be full swete

to her. The heath and the hush shall be ample couch and covering. And as for danger, why —women have

From deth saved many one, and such, perhaps, may be her good fortune with him. But if not, she stands ready, "bowe in hande," to fight unto the death in his cause. One regret, one prayer, one blessing for her "sweet mother" escapes her anguish-torn heart, and then she once more declares her willingness to follow him, banished though he be.

But he has reserved the heaviest woe for the last. He tells her that her readiness to share his broken fortunes is dictated by wanton love. More than that. He cares no longer for her brown skin, for he has found a love with fairer cheek and golden tresses.

Wherefore I, to the wode will go
Alone, a banished man.

This is indeed the heaviest woe. Nevertheless she has plighted her troth—and though sorrow and suffering await her—though the world speak lightly of her conduct,—though she grieve a heart throbbing with maternal affection—though he, for whom she sacrifices all, requites her love with neglect and desertion, yet the path of duty is plain before her. Sin shall not be cast upon her. Still will she go with him, if he will suffer her, and whilst life will permit, be to him all that she may; and then, as speedily as God wills, lay her head in the dust and repose in the quiet calm of the grave.

The reward of all this trial, this purgation of the spirit, is the information that he is an Earl's son and will make her a true and loving husband; a promise, which a trifling knowledge of human nature teaches us was doubtless faithfully kept by so generous and trusting a soul.

But the Poet extracts from it a wholesome moral, which, like the Poem itself, makes us regret that history hath not preserved from oblivion the name of one whose confidence in the might of love is only surpassed by his genuine, unaffected piety. Listen to his closing strains :

Here may ye see, that women be
 In love, meke, kynde, and stable :
 Late never man reprove them than,
 Or call them variable :
 But rather pray God that we may
 To them prove comfortable ;
 Which sometime proveth such as loveth,
 If they be charytable.
 For syth men wolde, that women sholde
 Be meke to them each one,
 Moche more ought they to God obey,
 And serve but him alone.

We here take leave, for the present, of these Ballads. We trust ere long to make our readers acquainted with some other specimens of this species of literature, which, to our thinking, is unsurpassed in beauty, humor, pathos, simplicity and grandeur.

INDIAN STORIES.

BY CHARLES LANMAN.

THE PEACE MAKER.

A Tradition of the Senecas.

The following story was obtained by the writer, directly from the lips of a Seneca Indian, and the hero is said to have been the grandfather of the celebrated orator Red Jacket.

There was a time when all the Indian tribes in the world were at war with the great Seneca nation, whose hunting grounds were on the borders of Lake Ontario. So fearful had they become of their enemies, that the bravest hunters and warriors never left their wigwams without bending their bows, and little children, were not permitted by their mothers to gather berries or hickory nuts in the neighboring woods. The head Chief of the nation at that time was Sa-go-you-wat-ha, or Always Awake. He was a good man, and being sorely grieved at the unhappiness of his people, he conceived the idea of securing a permanent peace. It was true, he said, that his father had been a cruel and unpopular chief, but he did not think it right that the generation which followed his father should be made miserable for crimes never committed by them. And therefore it was that he prayed to the Great Ha-nee to tell him, in a dream, what he must do to accomplish his end. Night came, and in spite of his name, Always Awake fell into a deep sleep and had a dream.

He was told that in the direction whence came the warm winds of summer, and distant from his village a journey of one moon, there was a very large mountain. On the summit of that mountain, as he was told, were living a few people from all the nations of the earth, excepting the Senecas. The place alluded to was called the Mountain of Refuge, and it was so sacred a place, that its soil had never been wet with human blood, and the people who lived there, were the peculiar favorites of the Great Ha-nee, and were the law-makers of the world. The dream also told the Seneca Chief, that he could secure a permanent peace only by visiting the sacred mountain, but as the intervening distance was so great, and his trail would be only among enemies, the dangers of the expedition would be very numerous. By travelling at night, however, and sleeping in the day time, the task might be accomplished, and he was at liberty to try his fortune.

Always Awake pondered a long time upon this strange vision, but finally determined to start upon the appointed expedition. Great was the fatigue that he endured, and often-times was he compelled to satisfy his hunger with the roots and berries of the forest. Many a narrow escape did he make from his enemies, but in due time he reached the mountain of Refuge. He was warmly welcomed among the Indians of the mountain, and when he told his story and talked of peace, they honored him with many a loud shout of applause. A council was held, and a decree passed, to the effect that the important question at stake, should be settled by another council composed of the head chiefs of all the Indian nations in the land. The fleetest runners were employed to disseminate the news, and at the appointed time the council of chiefs was held. They formed themselves into a confederacy, and with one exception the nations of the wilderness became as one people, and so continued until the white man crossed the great waters and taught them the vices which have almost consumed them from the face of the earth. The only nation that would not join the confederation was the Osage nation, and because of their wickedness in so doing, they were cursed by the Great Ha-nee, and have ever since been a by-word and a reproach among their fellows.

And when the Seneca Chief returned to his own country, he was very happy. His trail through the forests and over the mountains was lined with bonfires, and in every village that he tarried, he was feasted with the best of game. One moon after he returned to his people he died, and was buried on the banks of the beautiful lake where he lived, and ever since that time the Great Ha-nee has permitted his people to live upon the land which they inherited from their fathers.

THE STRANGE WOMAN.

A Choctaw Legend.

It was in the olden times, and two Choctaw hunters were spending the night, by their watch-fire in a bend of the river Alabama. The game and the fish of their country was, with every new moon becoming less abundant, and all that they had to satisfy their hunger on the night in question was the tough flesh of a black hawk. They were very tired, and as they mused upon their unfortunate condition, and thought of their hungry children, they were very unhappy, and talked despondingly. But they roasted the bird before the fire, and proceeded to enjoy as comfortable a meal as they could. Hardly had they commenced eating, however, before they were startled by a singular noise, resembling the cooing of a dove. They jumped up and looked around them to ascertain the cause. In one direction, they saw nothing but the moon just rising above the forest-trees on the opposite side of the river. They looked up and down the river, but could see nothing but the sandy shores and the dark waters. They listened, and nothing could they hear but the murmur of the flowing stream.

They now turned their eyes in that direction opposite the moon, and to their astonishment they discovered, standing upon the summit of a grassy mound,—the form of a beautiful woman. They hastened to her side, when she told them she was very hungry, whereupon they ran after their roasted hawk and gave it all into the hands of the strange woman. She barely tasted of the proffered food, but told the hunters that their kindness had preserved her from death, and that she would not forget them, when she returned to the happy grounds of her father, who was the Hosh-tah-li or Great Spirit of the Choctaws. She had one request to make, and this was, that when the next moon of midsummer should arrive, they should visit the spot where she then stood, and then a pleasant breeze swept among the forest leaves, and the strange woman suddenly disappeared.

The hunters were astonished, but they returned to their families and kept all they had seen and heard, hidden in their hearts. Summer came, and they once more visited the mound on the banks of the Alabama. They found it covered with a new plant, whose leaves were like the knives of the white-man. It yielded a delicious food which has since been known among the Choctaws as the sweet ton-cha or Indian maize.

SONG.

TO L. R. L.

She came like a zephyr,
Like a zephyr she passed,
And we know by the sweets,
That around her she cast,
That the home where she dwelt,
Was a garden, whose flowers
Were warmed with bright sunshine,
And bedewed with soft showers.

She came like the morning,
When in sadness my heart,
Was shrouded in shadows,
And she bade them depart,
Then were touched the deep chords,
That too long had lain still,
And I woke to new life,
'Neath their echoing thrill.

C. C. L.

MARGINALIA.

BY EDGAR A. POE.

The fishes described by Athenæus as ἀσπρότεροι θῆσαι ψῆμα καὶ ἰδιος δίψοιαι, were, beyond doubt, a shoal of Preserved Fish, like the one who spoke up so boldly for President Tyler.

The eloquence of the Honorable G— strikes me as being of that class which, "si absit," as Cicero says, speaking generally of eloquence in a philosopher, "non magnopere desideranda."

In saying that "grace will save any book and without it none can live long," Horace Walpole had reference, I fancy, to that especial grace which managed to save so many books of his own—his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury.

Until we analyze a religion, or a philosophy, in respect of its inducements, independently of its rationality, we shall never be in condition to estimate that religion, or that philosophy, by the mere number of its adherents:—unluckily,

"No Indian Prince has to his palace
More followers than a thief to the gallows."

In omitting to envelop our Gothic architecture in foliage, we omit, in fact, an essential point in the Gothic architecture itself. Of a Gothic church, especially, trees are as much a portion as the pointed arch. "Ubi tres, ecclesia," says Tertullian;—but no doubt he meant that "ubi ecclesia, tres."

"If, in any point," says Lord Bacon, "I have receded from what is commonly received, it hath been for the purpose of proceeding melius and not in aliud"—but the character assumed, in general, by modern "Reform" is, simply, that of Opposition.

A strong argument for the religion of Christ is this—that offences against Charity are about the only ones which men on their death-beds can be made—not to understand—but to feel—as crime.

That Demosthenes "turned out very badly," appears, beyond dispute, from a passage in "Meker de vet. et rect. Pron. Ling. Græcæ," where we read "Nec illi (Demostheni) turpe videbatur, optimis relictis magistris, ad canes se conferre, etc., etc.:"—that is to say, Demosthenes was not ashamed to quit good society and "go to the dogs."

When — and — pavoneggiarsi about the celebrated personages whom they have "seen" in their travels, we shall not be far wrong in inferring that these celebrated personages were seen ex—as Pindar says he "saw" Archilochus, who died ages before the former was born.

To see distinctly the machinery—the wheels and pinions—of any work of Art is, unquestionably, of itself, a pleasure, but one which we are able to enjoy only just in proportion as we do not enjoy the legitimate effect designed by the artist:—and, in fact, it too often happens that to reflect analytically upon Art, is to reflect after the fashion of the mirrors in the temple of Smirna, which represent the fairest images as deformed.

The modern reformist Philosophy which annihilates the individual by way of aiding the mass; and the late reformist Legislation, which prohibits pleasure with the view of advancing happiness, seem to be chips of that old block of a French feudal law which, to prevent young partridges from being disturbed, imposed penalties upon hoeing and weeding.

I cannot help thinking that romance-writers, in general, might, now and then, find their account in taking a hint from the Chinese, who, in spite of building their houses downwards, have still sense enough to begin their books at the end.

Surely M— cannot complain of the manner in which his book has been received; for the Public, in regard to it, has given him just such an assurance as Polyphemus pacified Ulysses with, while his companions were being eaten up before his eyes. "Your book, Mr. M—," says the Public, "shall be—I pledge you my word—the very last that I devour."

In examining trivial details, we are apt to overlook essential generalities. Thus M—, in making a to-do about the "typographical mistakes" in his book, has permitted the printer to escape a scolding which he did richly deserve—a scolding for a "typographical mistake" of really vital importance—the mistake of having printed the book at all.

Mozart declared, on his death-bed, that he "began to see what may be done in music;" and it is to be hoped that DeMeyer and the rest of the spasmodists will, eventually, begin to understand what may not be done in this particular branch of the Fine Arts.

Nicholas Ferrar, were he now living, would be not a little astonished to find thoroughly established here, by our Magazine poets, that very "perpetual chant" which he so unsuccessfully struggled to establish in the village of Little Gidding.

In the tale proper—where there is no space for development of character or for great profusion and variety of incident—mere construction is, of course, far more imperatively demanded than in the novel. Defective plot, in this latter, may escape observation, but in the tale, never. Most of our tale-writers, however, neglect the distinction. They seem to begin their stories without knowing how they are to end; and their ends, generally,—like so many governments of Triuculo—appear to have forgotten their beginnings.

It has been well said of the French orator, Dupin, that "he spoke, as nobody else, the language of every body;" and thus his manner seems to be exactly conversed in that of the Frogpondian Euphuists, who, on account of the familiar tone in which they lisp their outré phrases, may be said to speak, as every body, the language of nobody—that is to say, a language emphatically their own.

The vox populi, so much talked about to so little purpose, is, possibly, that very vox et preterea nihil which the countryman, in Catullus, mistook for a nightingale.

It is folly to assert, as some at present are fond of asserting, that the Literature of any nation or age was ever injured by plain speaking on the part of the Critics. As for American Letters, plain-speaking about them is, simply, the one thing needed. They are in a condition of absolute quagmire—a quagmire, to use the words of Victor Hugo, d'où on ne peut se tirer par des périphrases—par des quemadmodums et des verumtamen-veros.

I believe it is Montaigne who says—"People talk about thinking, but, for my part, I never begin to think until I sit down to write." A better plan for him would have been, never to sit down to write until he had made an end of thinking.

There is an old German chronicle about Reynard the Fox, when crossed in love—about how he desired to turn hermit, but could find no spot in which he could be "thoroughly alone," until he came upon the desolate fortress of Malspart. He should have taken to reading the "American Drama" of —. I fancy he would have found himself "thoroughly alone" in that.

Alas! how many American critics neglect the happy suggestion of M. Timon—"que le ministre de L'Instruction Publique doit lui-même savoir parler Français."

I cannot tell how it happens, but, unless, now and then, in a case of portrait-painting, very few of our artists can justly be held guilty of the crime imputed by Apelles to Protogenes—that of "being too natural."

M—, as a matter of course, would rather be abused by the critics than not be noticed by them at all; but he is hardly to be blamed for growling a little, now and then, over their criticisms—just as a dog might do if pelted with bones.

To villify a great man is the readiest way in which a little man can himself attain greatness. The Crab might never have become a Constellation but for the courage it evinced in nibbling Hercules on the heel.

Our "blues" are increasing in number at a great rate; and should be decimated, at the very least. Have we no critic with nerve enough to hang a dozen or two of them, in terrorem? He must use a silk cord, of course—as they do, in Spain, with all grandees of the blue blood—of the "sangre azul."

No doubt, the association of idea is somewhat singular—but I never can hear a crowd of people singing and gesticulating, all together, at an Italian opera, without fancying myself at Athens, listening to that particular tragedy, by Sophocles, in which he introduces a full chorus of turkeys, who set about bewailing the death of Meleager. It is noticeable in this connexion, by the way, that there is not a goose in the world who, in point of sagacity, would not feel itself insulted in being compared with a turkey. The French seem to feel this. In Paris, I am sure, no one would think of saying to Mr. F—, "What a goose you are!"—"Quel dindon tu es!" would be the phrase employed as equivalent.

They have ascertained, in China, that the abdomen is the seat of the soul; and the acute Greeks considered it a waste of words to employ more than a single term, ψυχή, for the expression both of the mind and of the diaphragm.

Let us be charitable and account for M—'s repeated literary failures by the supposition that, like Lelius in the "Arcadia," he wishes to evince his skill rather in missing than in hitting his mark.

L— is busy in attempting to prove that his Play was not fairly d—d—that it is only "scotched, not killed;" but if the poor Play could speak from the tomb, I fancy it would sing with the Opera heroine:

"The flattering error cease to prove!
Oh, let me be deceased!"

"What does a man learn by travelling?" demanded Doctor Johnson, one day, in a great rage—"What did Lord Charlemont learn in his travels, except that there was a snake in one of the pyramids of Egypt?"—but had Doctor Johnson lived in the days of the Silk Buckingham, he would have seen that, so far from thinking anything of finding a snake in a pyramid, your traveller would take his oath, at a moment's notice, of having found a pyramid in a snake.

The next work of Carlyle will be entitled "Bow-Wow," and the title-page will have a motto from the opening chapter of the Koran: "There is no error in this Book."

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1849, by John R. Thompson, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia.]

THE CHEVALIER MERLIN.

CHAPTER FOURTH.

"The Emperor Jovinian went into a river to bathe; whilst he bathed there came one who stole his clothes."
Gesta Romanorum.

Merlin Brand, on coming into Livonia, was obliged to correct the news, which he had heard in Sweden, with more authentic, and more disagreeable information. The Swedish king had not delayed to concentrate his forces at Grodno. Marching eastward from Saxony, where he had fixed his ambition with heroic musings upon the battle-fields of Gustavus Adolphus, the royal conqueror had come to Grodno at midwinter, and, beating the Russian in its streets, passed on through frosts and snows, without a pause, into the region of forests, morasses, and waste plains lying toward the Beresina. Months had followed; midsummer had arrived; the Swedish arms, delayed by no obstacles, had penetrated far and deep into the wildernesses of the Boristhenes: so far and deep that the rumour of battles in which fortune remained constant to the new Alexander seeking a new Babylon, came slowly and vaguely to enlarge the fears, gratify the curiosity, or quicken the admiration of civilized Europe. To gain this advanced camp a labour vastly greater than the journey to Grodno lay before the Norwegian. Preparing to encounter it, he procured a strong horse at Pernau; and afterward, at Mittau in Courland, equipped himself, by the aid of an armourer who remodded and enlarged some old pieces, in the defences of a cuirassier.

As he advanced into Southern Courland, he found many marks of the ruin of war. Great armies had contended upon its soil; the vagabond Tartars had made their forays upon it; raging home factions, led and sustained by Primates, Bishops, Palatines, and Castellans, had desolated it. But there had been a lull. The armies of the Swede, buying like peaceful townsmen, and disciplined to destroy only on the field of battle, had repassed from the Saxon borders. The theatre of war had been removed; the flying Tartars were before the Swedish van in the East; faction had grown tame like the kite under the shadow of the passing wings of the eagle. The royal eagle was now, indeed, far away, but that Swedish falcon, Lewenhaupt, still circled near to prolong the calm. Nature, even in so short a respite, had done much to conceal her scars; and industry, awakened from despair, had ventured to renew her toils.

Looking abroad upon a landscape swelling into gentle hills, marked here and there with small forests of pine, and fir, and groves of oak, and at wide intervals with fields of corn or flax, the Norwegian journeyed on a July day, an hour before sunset, along a tributary of the Niemen. The water near at hand, ran clear, and with an inviting sound. His black armour, and a furred cloak which he wore over it, had been unseasonable. He was in the melancholy case of Don Bellianis at the gate of the castle of Brandezar; that is to say, he was nearly roasted in his armour. He determined, when he should gain a secluded spot, to bathe in the stream.

He came at last to a suitable place. A copse grew in the bend of the river and screened its bank from the high-way; penetrating this copse he found the water deep, and flowing between margins white with pebbles. He secured his horse to the branch of a tree, and removed from its place at his saddle the same wallet from which he had taken provisions at the fountain in Gothland. Then ridding himself of his armour and clothing, and leaving them upon the grass in an open space of the thicket, he entered the river. He had continued but a short time at his bath, when he heard the rustle of footsteps, and presently a low tittering. Through the leaves which fringed the bank he was sure that he saw more than one pair of peeping eyes. He buried himself as deeply as possible in the stream; the eyes were in company with the smooth cheeks and curls of women. Presently the rustling of the footsteps became louder; the suppressed laughter grew distinct enough to show that many female mouths struggled with it.

"Mesdames," cried the Norwegian in French, "I give you warning that I am about to issue from the water."

"Ah! Mordieu!"—came back a fine clear voice from the copse,—"tarry cavalier until we are enabled to escape."

"I give you two minutes, Mesdames."

Then there was a scampering.

Prolonging the two minutes to five, Merlin left the river. As happened in the case of the Emperor Jovinian, he found that his clothes were gone—his arms, armour, and every part of his equipment with them. On the grass where he had left them were a woman's mantle and a pair of very small slippers.

Nothing remained to be done but to wrap the mantle about him, and adventure at a modest distance in pursuit of the robbers. The mantle answered his purpose badly; the slippers would scarcely have received the point of his feet, and so he bore them in his hand. Equipped in this ridiculous manner he passed through the thicket by a narrow glade, which scarcely wider than a path wound away toward the road upon which he had lately travelled. The women had evidently come and gone this way, for the grass was trodden, and the foliage on either side deranged. In a few moments he reached the road; a number of slender footmarks were visible in its dust. They led directly across it into an open wood. He followed the footmarks, and having passed through the narrow wood, presently came to a low ridge crowned with a few stately oaks. He ascended this ridge; as he reached its top he saw a castle at no great distance beyond. It was a place of unusual strength, with a double range of walls and courts around its keep. Terraces and gardens gave something of beauty to redeem the grim and warlike aspect of the feudal fortress.

But Merlin Brand could bestow little observation upon this castle, which he now saw for the first time. In the open country before him, and already near the walls to which they were hurrying, were a number of ladies. They were in possession of his unfortunate suit of buff, of his armour, of his arms, of his jack-boots, of his wallet, in a word, of the whole of his lost property. Three of them bore his sword on their shoulders, one at the hilt, one midway, and one at the tip of the sheath. Two bore his jack-boots and furred mantle, dangling from a straight branch, the ends of which rested on their shoulders. One like Minerva marched under the helmet, but without the strong grace of the goddess, for the black head-piece came nearly to her chin. One wore his coat, whilst another like a train-bearer bore up the heavy skirts. A young huntress went armed with his petronel. The company numbered more than a dozen, and his property was so distributed that all carried a share of it.

The Norwegian, with the short mantle drawn close about him, looked on in despair. He could not venture to pursue into the open land. He stood looking after the merry company until it disappeared behind the outer wall.

"This," he meditated, "is one of those ridiculous misfortunes in which the misery of the victim gives point to a cruel jest. I am converted into an Orson. I have prepared myself for such losses as a brave man may lament with dignity, but not for so absurd and unusual a misfortune. What is to be the end of this extraordinary adventure?"

At length, as he stood looking toward the castle, several horsemen issued from it. They came briskly to the foot of the ridge. Each man wore, wrapped loosely about his left arm, a blue scarf. In the van galloped a round little person with a broad ruddy face, a flowing wig, and above these a peaked hat. In the rear, separated from his leader by five or six others, came at a swift amble a tall cadaverous figure of a horseman with the saddest visage imaginable, but with a fool's cap, tipped with little sharp-tinkling bells, to mock its melancholy. He rode one of those small, fine-limbed piebalds, which are common on the heaths of Lenna. Merlin became visible to the party as it ascended the hill. With a sweep of his riding wand the leader wheeled to the right; several of his men followed at his heels; the others wheeled to the left. Presently they had made a circle about the Norwegian, and come together again behind his position.

The leader of the party then advanced, and, with a tone and style somewhat inflated, said:

"Illustrious sir, know that I have the honour to be the steward of a noble lady, the Countess Hermione of the Chateau d'Amour. These are courageous serving men of the same noble lady. We are now in the execution of an office to which we are reluctant, but which we trust that your highness will discover, in the end, to have led to a most agreeable misfortune, a most sweet sorrow." With this the orator turned to the Fool, and said—"I think, my dear Paikel, that no one could have turned that final sentence more successfully." The Fool shook his bells and signified his approbation.

Merlin availed himself of the pause to demand an explanation. The spokesman of the party resumed in reply:

"Surrender, sir, to our superior numbers; and advance, not as one enforced, but rather as one courteously entreated. I trust that you perceive in my address nothing of that rudeness which is the only honesty of common persons." Again he turned to the Fool for approval, and added: "My polite and tender animosity binds with a silken cord, and beheads with a golden axe. Advance, sir, in all honour to the Chateau d'Amour."

"You speak a fantastic gibberish, which I do not understand," Merlin replied. "If you assail me, I will beat you off with this tree which you see me wrench from its roots."

He armed himself, as he spoke, with a young fir, which grew amongst the knotted roots of one of the large oaks near at hand; he was evidently prepared to use this weapon with as free a will as that Spanish hero, Diego Perez the Pounder, used a similar substitute for a lost sword. He leaned upon his fir tree, and continued to speak: "Go to the ladies of the Chateau d'Amour—if by so gentle a name the fortalice be called—and say that a poor soldier is prevented in a service requiring haste, by their mischief. The jest has been accomplished. Let restitution be made of my goods."

"Night approaches, sir," said the steward, "and if my noble mistress were to be moved from her purpose, of which, so pertinacious is the female will, there is no probability, we have yet too little daylight left for riding to and fro. Advance, sir; otherwise we must resort to extremities which"—

As the steward hesitated in his selection of words to soften his meaning, and dignify his rhetoric, Merlin answered him roughly:

"Do you suppose, you jackanapes, that I shall go to the castle in my present condition? What I can do under these extraordinary circumstances is not clear; only, of this be assured, I hold myself in readiness to beat you and your fellows soundly, if you carry your insolence too far. I say again, go back, and deliver my message to the countess who has played this immodest prank at my cost."

The steward, outraged by the title jackanapes, applied as it was in the presence of his subordinates, did not condescend to parley longer. His company, after a brief consultation, separated, formed a loose ring around the Norwegian, and then made a rush upon him. Instead of weapons, each man of the party used nothing more formidable than the scarf which he had worn on his left arm. Merlin opposed himself to the onset with a good use of his club. He struck the horse of the steward a fatal blow upon the frontlet; with a single sweep of the rough weapon he next unhorsed two of the most forward of the serving men. The Fool, and his remaining companions, upon this issue of the first half minute of the conflict, wavered and presently drew off to a safe distance. The unfortunate steward, speaking from the ground where he remained in an attitude of humility, addressed his victor with a tone of depressed courage.

"Spare," he exclaimed, "victorious champion, spare!"

"Restore to me, rascal, the property which the jades have carried off."

"Jades!" groaned the steward. "Mon Dieu! to speak so of noble and honorable ladies, who are the very roses of beauty and lilies of purity! Sir, I promise to do all that man can do. But alas! the female purpose is, after all, uncontrollable; the female heart is full of charming obstinacies. What shall I say? To regain your goods, I fear, is impossible."

"Then I must hang you to a tree by one of these scarfs," Merlin answered. "Send one of your company to the countess; let him say that her steward will, in twenty minutes, be hanged by the neck, unless my goods are in the mean time restored to me."

The steward had fallen upon a scheme so promising as to disarm this menace of a great part of its terrors. A cheerful change came over his countenance—a countenance whose unctuous and complaisant expression fitted very badly with misery.

"Permit me, sir," he said, to return to the chateau. I pledge my honour to be gone but a short time; my unfortunate friends, one of whom I perceive is bleeding at the nose, and the other too much alarmed to raise his face from the ground, will remain as hostages in your hands. If I fail you, hang them sir, hang them."

The steward in giving this last direction, implied by his manner that such a consummation of the business would be neither undeserved by the proposed hostages, nor unpleasant to himself personally.

Merlin replied: "Go then, and return quickly. I am in no case to lose time in doubting you, or in debating with you."

The Fool drew near to discover the result of the steward's conference with the terrible stranger. He found that peace had been, to some extent, restored, and ventured to come quite up, and aid his discomfited leader in mounting the piebald ambler. When this had been accomplished, the steward rode away in the direction of the castle at a rapid pace. The eyes of those remaining on the hill followed his course, until he gained the chateau, which, dusky in the twilight, was yet beginning to be silvered on its eastern outlines by a rising moon.

CHAPTER FIFTH.

"At Citheron (he said) without a doubt,
The Queen of Love, and all her noble routs
Keep state within a castle royally."

The Court of Love.—Chaucer.

The moon had climbed high, and her light fell full and strong upon the turrets and walls of the chateau. Merlin, looking down from the hill-top, awaited the return of the steward. The two serving men, whose fate it had been to be overthrown, remained in a state of trepidation. The Fool, with his back against a tree, meditated: doubtless weaving rare fancies in the loom of an unsound mind. The moon shone upon his wasted face and fantastic dress, and at times a motion of his head drew a fine tinkle from his bells.

At length a horseman dashed out from the shadows of the castle, and the peculiar gait of the piebald was distinguishable by both eye and ear. The steward reached the hill-top. He carried before him a pile of garments, so high and large as to conceal him quite to the chin as he approached.

"Sir, I found it to be as I feared," he said with some shortness of breath. "My noble mis-dress is determined to force her hospitality upon you. Nothing so exciting as your arrival has recently occurred; and an opportunity of amusement is not to be lost."

"What is it that you bring with you?" Merlin demanded. "Your face, over the mass before you, looks like a full moon above a black cloud."

"Your highness speaks in a strain of playful fancy which increases my confidence," answered the steward. "The clothes which I bring are not indeed your own, but they are costly and rich, embroidered and laced; and although your highness is doubtless one of the two largest persons in the world, it is yet a fact that the suit belongs to the other, and will fit you."

Merlin speedily put on the dress which the steward had brought. He found it rich even to splendor, and, to his surprise, quite large enough. Even to the boots of bright Spanish leather, every part fitted as if fairy hands had been plying for him in the shadowy chateau.

"Steward," said the newly arrayed Norwegian, "this is wonderful enough. There are two giants then for whom buff-coats are made. But now answer my questions. What has become of my own proper suit—of my armour—of my weapons!—and how am I to recover them?"

"My mistress retains them in safety," the steward replied. "You can only recover them by condescending to demand them in person. If I may advise, sir, do not reject the hospitality which my noble mistress proffers to you. Re-created by the festivities of the chateau, you may in a short time continue your journey, in all respects to your fullest satisfaction, and carry with you, in addition to your recovered property, some pleasant recollections. Pleasant recollections"—added the steward, with a moralizing manner—"are certainly something."

Merlin replied at once: "Send one of the varlets for my horse. He stands in the covert beyond the road."

This order was obeyed. The horse was soon brought. The Norwegian sprang to his saddle, the gold and silver threads of his apparel glittering in the moonlight. He then said to the steward:

"Advance, and lead the way. I will follow you to the castle."

One of the company stole away, and galloped on before. Merlin drew near the walls. Preparation had been made to receive him. Files of domestics with lighted torches marked his course through the courts; a burst of various music, first heard when his horse's hoofs struck the drawbridge, welcomed him; lights streamed suddenly out at loophole and casement. Dis-mounting in the inner court, he ascended, escorted by the steward and a train of lackeys and pages, the great steps of stone which led to the principal entrance of the central building. Through this arched entrance he passed into an immense eating hall paved with squares of marble. When he had reached the middle of this hall, whose walls were hung with trophies of war and the chase, double doors opened slowly at the farther end of it. As they opened, the musical mechanism of the hinges betrayed itself by giving out a loud and sweet tune. The apartment to which they opened the way was a large antechamber; and again, at the opposite side of this, similar doors swinging open renewed the failing tune of the first. Through these last doors broke a flood of light, and a large apartment splendid in its decorations became visible to the Norwegian.

Against the tapestry, the blue flutes of which gleamed with flowers of gold, many female figures were visible; they might be images of the arras with which their robes blended, they were for a moment so motionless. But the female forms presently advanced—a company as rare as that troop of Ladies of the Flower whom Chaucer saw in a dream. The phalanx led by a tall and queenly woman, of that magnificent and voluptuous mystery of beauty with which the Helens of the world have ensnared princes and overthrown empires, came forward to receive the dazzled Norwegian. There was not a trace of the mischief, which had recently made him its victim, in one of the bright but composed faces before him. Such a reception as an empress and her ladies might bestow upon a stranger prince, was given by the Countess Hermione of the Chateau d'Amour, and her damsels, to the son of the fisherman.

Then passed some sparkling hours. The Norwegian was the first to allude to the adventure of the day. He did not allude to it ungraciously. There had been a feast of fruits, and he had recruited his spirits with some cups of a heady and powerful wine. Music had done its part also in reconciling him to his lot. The damsels sang like syrens, and touched the harp and the lute with a skill careless and perfect. He was therefore in the humor to say:

"Madam, it seems to me that I have been supremely fortunate. It is true that my reflections were at first of a different character. But I reject, renounce, and abhor those censorious first impressions. I assure you that you are not only welcome to my buff-coat and jack-boots, but to myself into the bargain."

"Monsieur," replied the countess, with a merry light in her dark eyes, "the theft, could we but steal yourself, would be something as glorious as the conquest of a kingdom."

One of the damsels added,

"Say also, madam, as the conquest of a king."

She who spoke was the least fair of all, and much the least jocund. Her complexion was dark; her face, an exaggerated oval, wore an expression distrustful and perhaps rebuking. Her features resembled those of the melancholy Fool.

To Merlin's surprise, the countess seemed to be stung by the girl's words, and retorted impudently,

"Hold your peace, Giselle." In the next moment, however, she softened and added: "It is the nature of such linnets as you, my good Giselle, to be content with captivity; but the queen-falcon must roam at times: it is by hours of freedom that her spirit comes to endure years of restraint."

"I do not presume to curb your dispositions, madam," the dark girl replied; and withdrew behind her companions.

Merlin passed the night at the Chateau d'Amour. As often happens, when youth is tempted by beauty, he yielded his better purpose: he did not renew his journey on the day following. The day passed in luxurious pleasures, and the second evening brought an increase of those undermining emotions which the scarlet lip and dewy eyes of the countess Hermione had awakened. And then other days of dalliance followed. Fidelity to Mariana, the true-hearted and pure girl whom he loved first of all living creatures, and to whom he felt that tender gratitude with which we receive a love lowered to our rank from a higher—a love lowered to a faulty nature from one proud, chaste, and humanly perfect—did not seem to him to be at all in question. The profounds of that first great passion lay serenely enough; the zephyrs of the castle of Love could not trouble them. So he thought—if he thought at all—and gave himself, without reserve, to the enjoyments of his temporary position. But the peril, concealed in flowers, stole on surely and swiftly. How it mastered him, a scene of the tenth evening will discover, and I pass on to that scene without delay.

In a room of the castle, hung with velvet cloth, and rich in ornaments and in devices for luxurious indulgence, sat the Norwegian, with the countess Hermione at his side, whilst the fairest of the lady's damsels sang and touched the lute.

The girl's song was tender and passionate, and when its last notes died away, the countess said:

"That chanson is as old as the Meliader of the Duke of Luxemburg. It is a charming strain from the past. Monsieur, passionate hearts have always yielded to the sway of love; and the ancient poets of a world young in other knowledge have been known to sing sweetly and wisely of its agonies of delight and sorrow."

"It is truly a rare song," Merlin replied; "and the melody, to which the maiden weds it, is free as the summer wind, and gushing as a fountain which rises on a highland and runs sparkling to the valleys. But, madam, there is a song, made by a poet of England, which I am inspired by your presence to sing. You will perceive that it surpasses the maiden's chanson in delicate fancies, and graces of expression."

Taking the lute, the Norwegian touched it skilfully, and sang.

"Do but look on her eyes! they do light
All that love's world compriseth:
Do but look on her hair! it is bright
As love's star when it riseth!
Do but mark her forehead, smoother
Than words that soothe her!
And from her arched brows such a grace
Sheds itself through the face,
That all must declare of this lady divine
That her cup has no dregs for the base of its wine.

Have you seen but a bright lily grow,
Before rude hands have touched it?
Have you marked but the fall of the snow,
Before the soil hath smutched it?
Have you felt the wool of the beaver?
Or swan's down ever?
Or have smelt o' the bud of the brier?
Or the nard i' the fire?
Or have tasted the bag o' the bee?
O, so white! O, so soft! O, so sweet is she."

The countess Hermione listened to this song, the forced flatteries of which the Norwegian, with kindling looks, directed to herself, with a pretty glow of modesty upon her cheeks, and depressed eye-lids; from under these lids, however, she contrived to pour tender glances in return to the fixed regard of the singer. As Merlin ceased, the mistress signalled with her hand to the damsel. The latter brought a salver with a single cup of wine.

"Your English poet," said the countess, "caught the inspiration, which is the soul of that exquisite song, from love, but I think also from wine. Such winged fancies, and such free grace in the flow of the mere utterance, can only come from lips red with the nectar. Mercury, Monsieur, might have sung your song, immediately after a divine feast, to some nymph of Diana. I kiss this cup of wine; imitate your bard and drain it."

The hand of the countess lingered on the cup. Was it a bright drop, or a ray from her jewelled fingers, that descended into the wine? The Norwegian drained the cup. As the damsel bore away the salver, she met understandingly the eyes of her mistress. Presently the countess and Merlin Brand were alone, and the lute of the banished girl sounded from a corridor. The music, deadened by the walls, came as if from a distance.

As they sat alone the gentlest hours descended upon them. A casement opened to the west; the breath of roses came from the terraces with the slight wind which scarcely disturbed the lull of some delicate boughs near the casement sill. The crimson of sunset had become a purple mist which dropped over a clearly marked horizon. Venus shone serenely at the upper edge of the mist, and seemed to repel it from her golden feet. Beyond that clear horizon crowned with its purple atmosphere, was much to engross a mind meditative and of wholesome imaginations: the hearts of the mighty races which, succeeding the Roman, have made the later strength of the world, beat there. Over central Europe, like some encroaching tide of a dark sea, night was advancing. Shining mountain tops, dim plains, rivers cleaving the hills and widening upon the levels, ancient towns, castles on craggy perches of the eagle, and abbeys on gentle hills embosomed in solemn groves, were yielding, little by little, to the dark airy tide. And in these homes of men, on these hills and levels, by these winding rivers, the daily toil of the races was ending at the divine signal. From the artisan's hammer on the Niemen, to the bill of the vine-dresser on the Rhenish ranges, the implements of labour were dropping from weary hands which had added the wealth of a day to the stores which human energy amasses. The human birds of the night, too, were preparing for their occupations which court the shadows: statesmen to steal away into the meditations of wise plots, the outlaw to come from his covert, marshalling his minions of the moon on the dewy heath, the poet to coin his mind into artful utterances, lovers to wander and feed on illusive thoughts.

The casement of the Chateau d'Amour might have been Agrippa's mirror, to show to the eye of imagination such scenes and moving images: but Merlin Brand saw only the Lady Hermione. With the jarrings of the lute giving wild life to impulse and fancy, with the bewitching beauty of the countess full in his gaze, with her voice, sweeter than the sweetest cadence of the fitful melody, stealing upon his ear, with the touch of her soft hand thrilling the fibres of his own—the hour and the fate were near: the fire of the planet blazing above the purple mist had reached his heart."

"Enchanter!" said the Countess, "you are well named Merlin. That sorcerer possessed no spell more subtle than a glance of your eyes."

"Madam," the Norwegian answered, "how shall I be sure that you are not playing some fantastic jest upon me? I scarcely understand that a noble and beautiful lady can suddenly discover in a rude soldier merit enough to gain for him the honour which you show to me."

"Ah! Monsieur," cried the Countess, exchanging her earnest and elevated manner for the naiveté of a French woman—"I have a weakness for giants." She laughed as she said this, and presently clapped her hands together, and added—"I have, within a moment, made a charming arrangement. Enchanter! you shall be my husband."

Whatever impressions such a declaration as this might have made upon the Norwegian at another time, and under other circumstances, it certainly did not come now with a shock to his good sense or to his heart. For some moments he had experienced remarkable sensations; then his nature seemed to have undergone some strange revolution. Those men who have surrendered duty, and fame, and happiness, to the seductions of beauty, have generally been rash, reckless spirits, men whom the gods have intoxicated beyond prudence, and fashioned for self-ruin. But the Norwegian was not, in his usual moods, unmindful of duty, or apt to be led astray by passion: his mind was not altogether unpoetical, but its poetry merely at times gave warmth of coloring to his thought, and elevation to his language, never seriously affected his action. Moreover a pure and worthy love, long cherished, and recently favored beyond his wildest hopes—was it not a buckler to him? A few hours before torture could not have wrung from him a surrender of that love and its fair hopes. Now, however, there was a great change. His reason was cheated by the more soaring faculties. That cold mistress even lent herself in aid of their suggestions. Landmarks of old thought, principles long recognized and established for self-guidance, above all, his long cherished passion for the Swedish maiden, with its sweet solaces, faded out of view. He floated chartless without the pole-star, without a recognized headland; but then the sea upon which he floated seemed to his madness to be one vast field of glorious splendors. His brain teemed with deceptions; his veins ran hot with a fatal calenture. There are drugs which thus overthrow reason, or make her the mad ally of imagination and passion. Was it the bright drop from the jewelled finger of the countess which perfected the spell and completed the ruin?

In answer to the speech of the countess, Merlin said:

"Madam, you hold me captive in a land of dreams."

The lady, with a fervid rush of speech, replied:

"And is it not a brighter land than this cold world, which who shall say is, after all, more real?"

What is life? It is a course bright, or dark, as the inward nature may be mirthful or saturnine. Happiness and sorrow are not a smiling field and a grim wilderness, separated by a strait; they are not in themselves real, or thus separable, like things palpable; they belong to the Idea. Monsieur, linger in the land of dreams; you cannot return from it to anything more real."

"It seems to me that your words are wise," said the Norwegian. "They are surely very gentle in their tone." He mused, but soon continued—"sinking, far away, is a pale star; but the moon has risen, full and with a perfect radiance, and who can look upon this poor paled light so nearly lost in the greater?"

"Now, Monsieur, I do not understand you."

Merlin answered:

"The setting star is a maiden whom I have loved—so I think. But we love, or are cold, as the mystery of the inward nature prompts; and now, surely—surely, I have lost that love."

"And I," said the countess with a bewitching smile, "am the risen moon, surpassing that star! I will cast wide the clouds which, catching my splendor, increase it."

With swift fingers she unbound the folds of her glossy brown hair. It fell in bright masses, and, parted by the ivory round of each shoulder, followed the undulations of her person. Rising, she stood before the Norwegian, as beautiful, in the shining stream of her dark locks, as the mistress of the swimmer of Abydos—

"That nun of Venus, Hero young and fair,
Whom bright Apollo courted for her hair,
And offered as a dower his burning throne."

Her enchanting face glowed with blushes, her eyes sparkled but were melting in their light, the released locks ran darkly over her white arms, which were a little raised, and half-extended, as if modestly debated with and checked love.

An insane fire blazed in the Norwegian's eyes.

"Beautiful vision!" he exclaimed, "angels have come down from the crystal battlements led by an earthly temptation less than this. Why should I hesitate to ascend to the supreme joy which you proffer to me?" A shudder ran through his frame. "I have no soul," he continued, "no reason, no heart, no life, which you do not wholly sway."

The countess whispered from his arms, which now imprisoned her—

"Haste then—O, come with me! The merry music is ringing: do you not hear it? The wedding girls have their heads wreathed with flowers."

Leaning upon his shoulder she sounded a silver whistle. She then spoke on with a quick tone:

"Do you not understand? I foresaw this issue. Who ever said nay to Hermione? My damsels have made ready the wedding feast. Enchanter, if such forethought, such haste, be immodest, forgive me. Your spells have bound me."

"Lead on," answered the Norwegian. "I go to the summit of all joys."

In answer to the call from the silver whistle, a face had appeared at a fold of the tapestry; appeared to disappear in a moment. The countess grasped the Norwegian's hand, parted the arras, and passed by a concealed way into a long corridor. As she led the way bold and blithe strains were heard. Wind instruments were roaring and raving. With a step so quick and impatient as to outstrip the stride of the bridegroom whom her nervous hand drew onward, she traced the corridor. The din of the wind instruments became more tremendous. Then a flood of light, through suddenly withdrawn doors, met the advancing lovers, and the music, with such a crash as the rising and fall of a dome might create, suddenly ceased, whilst among its ruins of sound some softer strains came like gentle echoes. A train of damsels, in white robes, advanced. One with a chaplet in her hands approached the countess, who bowed her head: upon this beautiful head, with its brown locks still flowing, was placed a milk-white garland. Then a sonorous priestly voice began to utter in Latin a prelude to the nuptial rite.

An unhappy face might have been seen over the bars of a gallery above. It was the face of the girl Giselle.

"My poor mistress!" the girl sighed. "How excellent her heart, how true her courage, how miraculous her beauty—and yet—and yet—"

She did not finish her speech, scarcely perhaps her thought, for turning at a slight sound, she saw at her back the steward with whom the reader has some acquaintance.

"What is to be the end of this? Can you tell me, Mistress Giselle?" inquired the little man.

"Shame," the girl answered.

"Ah!" groaned the steward; "when one is resolved to go to such lengths, Wilhelm the steward—an honest Saxon, Mistress Giselle—is not a man for the purpose. Morals are something—yes, they are something. Shame, mistress is to be the result of this, as you have the penetration to foresee; but something worse will come of it. The devil will come of it." The last clause of this speech was spoken with great energy.

"Where is Paikel?" Giselle asked.

"He has crept into his nest in the tower of the martlets. I think, mistress, that your brother has more wisdom than his betters, and also an affectionate heart."

"He grew up near our mistress," answered the girl, "and knew her, as I did, in another land, in the castle of her father. Ah! good Wilhelm, you should have seen her in those days. Thinking of them now I could weep."

"If you did, mistress, you would do no more than Paikel. The fool was weeping as he crept into his tower to hide himself."

CHAPTER SIXTH.

"Sir Godwin. Stable my steed. Now, page, go on before. And say you, Gertrude, that the dame plays false?"

Gertrude. She has wandered sir.

Sir Godwin. Shall I go mad, and storm,
And meet with furious vengeance this light woman?
Or shall I reason with a fonder spirit,
And patiently endure? The latter seems
Most good, most charitable, and befits
My easy mood. Ermil, my favorite hawk,
When last I used her, flew ten miles astray,
But came again; I did not wring her neck,
For the brave bird has long been true to me,
And may be true again."

The Tragedy of Sir Godwin.

Day followed day. The Chateau d'Amour had proved the grave of Merlin Brand's truth, honorable ambition, bold purposes, and, indeed, in spite of magnificent pleasures, and the thousand arts with which love and beauty whispered peace to his conscience, and a forgetful contentment to his heart, the grave also of his happiness. The miracle of resurrection—how could he hope for it? Despair was before and around him.

The pale brow of Mariana—her blue eyes so proud, but to him so gentle—the chaste beauty of her maidenhood—her ardent trust in his merit and confidence in his steadfastness—these haunted him more and more as the days passed. And he, the dreamer of dreams, in whose ears the bugle had sounded a call to great fields where kings should pause to witness his supernatural prowess, he who had dared to vaunt his unperformed deeds, and mouth like a strutting actor such fine speeches sonorous with proud and bold words—what had he become in this briefest space of time that ever saw the heart of man undermined? He answered this question in his daily self-communings with a vehemence and bitterness which argued perhaps more than anything else the lingering presence of some redeeming worth.

He did not dare, in his musings of the deserted maiden, to picture the grief of a betrayed heart: it was under her scorn, under her cold glance and contemptuous lip, that in imagination he fell abased and writhing. And with these pictures of the scornful Swedish lady, would rise before him her grave and good father, the benignant old man who stooped in his wide charity to favor one who seemed worthy, and, because of his worth, higher than his fortunes.

If Merlin Brand had retained no spark of his affection for Mariana, these reviews of the recent past, and self-assurances of the scorn of the good, would yet have made him miserable. But he retained that earliest passion in its full force. Indeed now that it seemed to have become hopeless, it grew all the fiercer, like a hunger after the forbidden.

The despair which follows our faults is very different from that mere torpor with which, when borne down by the visitations of an adverse power, we bow and endure. When our errors or crimes breed our despair, it is not to the callous stone of Niobe that we harden; passionate self-reproach, a quick anger directed to those who have aided our weakness to undo us, stir the elements and prevent that lethargy which is at once an extreme result of suffering, and a shelter from suffering.

It happened, I am sorry to say, that Merlin became, before the honey-moon expired, a petulant husband. The countess employed all her endearments upon him in vain. Her arts had beguiled him to ruin; this was not a reflection to quicken their effect in softening his humors. But, as often happens, his petulance and coldness, instead of repelling, increased the gentleness and affectionate eagerness which sought to soothe him. The countess became more devoted; she expended her tears, smiles, and caresses with an increasing prodigality, as their value seemed to diminish.

Summer passed away. Autumn was advanced nearly to the fall of the leaf. On a bright October day, whilst the sun was yet but a few hours risen, Merlin Brand, leaving his beautiful countess in tears, drawn from her by his irritable despair, entered the gardens, and walked musingly in their most secluded walks. As he strolled up a peached alley, shaded with low-growing trees, he heard voices at a postern which the hand of some one on the outside held partly open. He overheard the following words:

"Ah! sir, it is only a merry folly—only a merry folly."

"How long has the stranger dwelt here?"

"How can I tell?" the first voice answered querulously. "One day is like another." Then the speaker added with a return to his tone of petition—"But pause, sir, be forbearing, sir. It is my lady's merry nature. She was fond of a jest from a child."

"Poor Fool! my wisdom and your folly are both forgiving enough. Go back to D'Imhoff who follows me, and say to him that until he speaks to me I desire that he shall be dumb."

When this was said, the postern opened, and a stranger entered the gardens. He turned into the alley in which Merlin walked; the two met front to front. Then each scanned the other with looks of surprise. Both were gigantic in stature, and of superb proportions; only there seemed in the stranger to be substituted for the youthful grace of the Norwegian that heaviness of outline, and motion, which generally belongs to great bodily strength thoroughly matured. The new comer recovered from his surprise first, as perhaps the more prepared of the two for the meeting.

"Sir," he said, "I have trespassed upon your meditations."

"Your courtesy more than excuses the trespass," Merlin replied. He spoke with self-possession, but his mind began to be bewildered with thronging conjectures, and a host of doubts.

"We stare at each other," said the stranger. "It is not wonderful sir. We are a pair of Colebrands. Two men of our mould seldom have met, except in those romances which profess to give an account of the adventures of the giants. It is singular that your fame has never reached me."

"I retort your words, sir," Merlin answered. "Why is it that I have never heard of one so physically remarkable as yourself?"

"Perhaps more of my deeds, follies, and misfortunes have reached you, fair sir, than you guess," said the stranger. "But I interrupt your walk and its reflections. I salute you, and venture to proceed."

The stranger advanced on his way.

The Norwegian muttered—"He enters like a person accustomed to the place. This must be the giant from whose wardrobe I equipped myself on the day of my arrival. There have been unreflected words of the damsels, and servants, which I now connect with him. He is also the owner of the arms, and armour, which I discovered in an apartment of the castle, and which are too large and heavy to be used by ordinary men. Who is this stranger? What brings him here? These are questions to be pursued to a satisfactory answer."

We must leave the Norwegian, and follow the new-comer. As if familiar with the premises, and entitled to free entrance, he passed on. He was presently in an antechamber: from the point which he had gained he saw, through an open door, the countess Hermione. He paused; the lady turned as his step was arrested; their eyes met; then springing to her feet, with a quick cry, the countess ran to meet him. Her face, flushed with recent weeping, became at once bright and joyful.

"Come at last!" she exclaimed, "come at last!—a thousand times welcome."

"Countess," replied the stranger, "you seem to have been quite satisfied with my absence."

"Satisfied? Why do you say satisfied? I have not been so—I have been unhappy, very unhappy. But you rebuke me now with your looks. What is it, my friend? you seem as solemn as the Holy Father's nuncio, who, you recollect, could reduce one to a state of misery without speaking a word."

"I do not presume to rebuke you, madam. But you, perhaps, understand that I cannot be very cheerful."

"Yes, I understand. The terrible monster of a Swede used you hardly at Altranstad. My friend, I felt for you; I shed many tears for you."

"You dried them, however, countess, when the young northman came to your gates."

The Lady Hermione clapped her hands and laughed charmingly.

"Is it that then?" she said. "Ah jealous creature! Some one then has sung to you this passage in the epic of my life. Why—you should be excessively flattered. Is not the northman your very self? Darken his eyes, make his nose much longer, give a wrinkle or two and some gray hairs, then steep the features in wine; and one might mistake him for your very self."

"Countess, you have not lost your gayety."

"No—surely not." Her manner changed at once; she became earnest and touching in her utterance. "If I lost my gayety, what should I do? very little save her light heart, her jocund spirits, is left to her who flew over the borders with you, on that bright night so many long summers ago. Do you not remember how we fled?"

"It is a romantic and sweet recollection," said the gentleman. "But now let us understand each other. You have not been true to me."

This check to her progress produced another swift transition in the lady's feelings and manner. She had been jocund, then tender; now she became imperious.

"Do you question me," she said, "with cold looks, and searching words? Sir, am I your slave? What claim have you upon my fidelity? To you I owe it that the ancient honours of a noble house have been sullied in my keeping; it is to you that I owe the evil fame which extends to the borders of all Europe. Sir, you have freed me from the restraints which are a wall around the pure; you have taught me to roam with a wild freedom, to know no law but my own moods. I have obeyed them, and I will obey them."

"Countess, do you no longer love me?"

"Love you?—shall I say yes, when you come frowning to meet me?"

"I came with no frowns, countess. My spirits have lost something of their alacrity—that is all. I hold you by a mere bond of love, if I at all hold you. I have no remedy, when you forget me, except to forget you in turn; and that, I fear, is after all no remedy; for I cannot forget you."

This was spoken sadly. The lady seemed touched by the words and their tone.

"After all," she said, "we are surely dear to each other. I have not displaced you from my heart, in placing another there, for a brief time, with you. Indeed I scarcely love this worthman now. Do you not understand that a heart full of love may yet be inconstant?"

"Perhaps in your mad, whimsical nature," replied the gentleman, "such contradictions may, in fact, exist. But if our bonds are to be renewed, this stranger must be dismissed and forgotten."

The countess reflected. She presently said: "I find something to tear away from my heart in doing this. But, mark me, this shall be our contract. I will live as a nun, for such time as this poor gentleman, whom I have wronged with a deceit, and made the victim of a mad masque, shall delay here. You too must remain impenetrable; he must learn nothing of the truth. Perhaps we will determine to fly, leaving him to learn some part of the truth when we are far away. Upon this we must consult. But there is one thing upon which I shall be obstinate. You must bestow some honour upon him—some honour easily bestowed, but dignifying to him who receives it from such hands."

"You are moderate indeed," said the gentleman. "I am to forget your follies. Then that is not enough. I am to reward my rival."

"Certainly. Does it strike you as unreasonable? You must, at least, make him a chevalier of the White Eagle. Now, are we not reconciled?"

Then seating herself by the stranger's side, the countess added with an affectionate tone:

"We will talk, my friend, of many things of higher moment. Tell me what has chanced to you since we parted in so much sadness. Your messengers acquainted me with much, but not with all. But hark! this poor gentleman has repented of some slight pique which ruffled him, and wounded me, and comes to make atonement to his weeping wife. Ah! my friend, this bridegroom is not so amiable as yourself. We have already passed through several such scenes. But we forget; I must imagine a name for you. Yes: you are Sir Ludwig of Felseck, my kinsman."

THE ANCIENT CHANT.

It was an old custom at Oxford for the choristers to chant Latin hymns from the tower of Magdalene College, at sunrise on the morning of the first of May.

—Night in the Eternal City,
Imperial Cæsar's pride,
Where the mighty Eagle's pinions
Are waving far and wide;
The voice of mirth and music
Bursts forth upon the air,
From many a kingly palace
Standing in beauty there;
Pale gleams each shrine and temple
On the moon's clear, soft light,
And shield and spear are glistening
On battlement and height:
—But a sign of holier power
In silence draweth nigh,
Nor the war-bird's pinions only,
Flutter against the sky.
He comes with mighty rushing
Yet unrevealed to view,
The Holy Dove that hovers
Above the chosen few;—
Rome's stern centurion guardeth
With bolt, and sword, and spear,
The lowly Christian lying
In dungeon dark and drear,
But "the strong might of weakness"
To the chained prisoner given,
Clothed him 'mid stripes and nakedness
In panoply of Heaven,
And the sentinel, whom battle
Nor mighty foes, may daunt,
Weepeth to hear at midnight
Arise in solemn chant,
From hearts that still are throbbing
All fetterless and free,
The loud and clear "Hosanna,
Christ gives us victory!"

Night in the Eternal City!
O'er many a flower-wreathed shrine
For Lares and Penates decked,
Broodeth a Power Divine,
Watching, if through the darkness
Of centuries, gathered round,
There may, unquenched, some feeble ray
Of the True Light be found.
Earth's wisdom hath no altar reared
Save to an unknown God,
And silent are the streets, save when
By Christians' footsteps trod,
Who, shrinking not from danger
Press on, with toil and dread,

♦ Luther.

Unto the only abode they know,
The Dwelling of the Dead!

Again a sound of music
Upon the midnight air,
Again a chant triumphant
Of blended praise and prayer,
As old men's voices mingle
With maidens, in the song :
A resurrection-anthem,
The sepulchres among !
They fear not pain or peril
Or th' arena's coming strife,
But at midnight chant forth praises
Unto the Prince of Life :
They stand, in darkness shrouded,
Beside the martyr'd slain,
While higher still and higher
Peals the triumphant strain,
And Golgotha re-echoes
" Christ hath arisen again !"
Still sing they, as the morrow
Perchance their last, draws nigh,
" We go in peace, our eyes have seen
The Day-Spring from on high !"

And the echo of that solemn chant
Shall sound through ages dim,
And on, through coming centuries
Shall peal the holy hymn !

* * *

Morning in " merrie England !"
Morn in the mouth of flowers,
And a glad hosanna pealeth
From lofty minster-towers :
'Tis not the voice of prisoner
In dungeon lone and drear,
But at early dawn the orison
Soundeth forth loud and clear,
And the way-worn traveller pauseth
The wondrous song to hear,
For he knows that it tells of a Saviour
Whose story his heart shall cheer :
And the train that in early ages
Was heard, the graves among,
Where the Christ-freed chanted praises
And woke the mighty song.
Hath sent the voice of its chorus
Afar, o'er land and sea,
For the Lord, by his prophet bard, hath said
" The isles shall wait for me !"

And the echo of the solemn chant
Still sounds through ages dim,
And loud in coming centuries
Shall peal that holy hymn !

MATILDA F. DANA.

Boston, Mass.

GLIMPSES OF ST. PETERSBURG.

ITS COURT, STATESMEN, AND BEST SOCIETY.

*Translated from the Journal of Therese.

Having now been some weeks at St. Petersburg, I will endeavor to describe to you the impressions made upon me by the city, the court, and the society. You must expect no topography. When I travel, I regard men more than streets; the inhabitants more than the houses. Wherever we go, too, our own peculiarities go with us, and we invest all we see with the coloring of our own feelings. The sunlight shining through colored windows loses its own hue and takes the shade of the glass; thus it is with the impressions received from realities. I perceive through the medium of my eyes, and venture not to say that they are so clear and crystal-like that the objects are not colored. Yet there is some merit surely in a sincere effort at impartiality and in a fixed intention to represent truly what is evident to our perceptions.

On my introduction into high life at St. Petersburg, it was my most anxious wish to be presented to the Emperor and his family. I received an early invitation to the Winterpalace, where I found assembled the whole court and the whole corps diplomatique.

The Winterpalace, risen since the last fire like a phoenix from its ashes, cannot be compared with other palaces, and is far superior in dimensions, in splendor, and in taste, to the celebrated Tuileries which I had lately such an opportunity of seeing.

The splendid interior staircases of the Winterpalace led to several immense halls, of which the White Hall, now almost covered with gilding, is the most magnificent. I stood amid the crowd of invited guests; the anxious silence prevailing, which usually forebodes a great event. Such indeed for me was the appearance of the Emperor. I never could separate in my mind the man from the power which he wields—that power from the man. I saw in imagination a great Empire personified in him. When he entered the hall I saw a hero-figure of antiquity; the forehead high, the eyes sharp and penetrating; the whole form of Herculean size. He advanced a few steps, bowed on all sides, shook hands with one, nodded cordially to another and conversed here and there, expressing himself with astonishing facility in German, Russian, English, or French. When I was introduced to him, he spoke long of objects of interest abroad, rambling from East to West, from North to South, and making such striking remarks about different countries and their inhabitants, and showing such profound knowledge of all, that I forgot the sovereign in admiring the thinking man.

* THERESE, Baronesse de Bacharach, wife of the Russian Ambassador at the free city of Hamburg in Germany, is a literary lady of great celebrity, and is well known to the translator. Educated in the highest circles of society in her native land, she unites to the refined manners of a high born lady uncommon talents for observation and description, with a depth of thought that gives value to her sketches.—M. H.

How has he found time to acquire such just views of all things? The colossal administration of the Empire is in his hands; nothing of importance can be decided without him. All the petitions of his subjects are read by him. His ministers come every day early in the morning to work with him. The first in place, the Minister of War, is Prince Czernitchin, who in former times rivalled the Emperor Alexander in beauty of person, and who caused such a sensation when he entered Paris with the allied armies. "Quel bel homme!" was the universal exclamation of the susceptible French women, "le Cosaque n'est pas un barbare comme on nous l'a dit; c'est un Adonis, un demi Dieu!" Small walking canes were named after the prince "des soupirs," and he had his "vogue" like some lady of renowned beauty. It seems as if his active life has preserved his youthful appearance; no sign of approaching age can be observed in him; he defies Time, and Time has rewarded the boldness by forgetting him.

Prince C. stands at the right hand of the Emperor, as the Military department is the most important in Russia. I must mention next another Minister, Count B. Lofty as is the position he occupies, his own personal judgment having to decide in matters shrouded with mystery, his character is the best guaranty to those who come in contact with him. He is more loved than feared. Once, during a dangerous illness, his palace and even the street where he lives was filled with crowds of all classes who came to enquire anxiously after him. The Emperor, who visited him daily, pressed his hand in great agitation, seeing the danger of his friend. "Sire," said the patient, "je puis mourir en paix; cette foule qui attend et qui demande de mes nouvelles parlera pour moi, elle est ma conscience." The appearance and manner of the count are altogether German; chivalric with the ladies, he is at once the active man of business and of society.

Insignificant in external appearance, the little figure of the Count Nesselrode is scarcely seen among those noble forms grouped around the Emperor: but who can deny his mental greatness? He presides over foreign affairs, and has gained respect, esteem and admiration in many difficult parts which he had to undertake. Besides, this celebrated politician is so thoroughly amiable as a man, that he is beloved by every one about him. He takes recreation from business in his favorite pursuit, botany. At his beautiful country-seat, where his green-houses are filled with blooming plants, chiefly dahlias of great beauty, he spends all his hours of leisure; and is sometimes lost in rapturous admiration while contemplating these various gifts of Flora. His devotion to his family is touching. His wife is one of the most intellectual ladies in Russia. Claimed by the world on account of her high rank, though not devoted to it from inclination, she has formed her own circle, which is the most attractive among the aristocracy of St. Petersburg. She is decided in character, energetic, and superior to all ordinary female foibles. Whoever is happy enough to be noticed by her, finds a protector for ever. She is indeed a character of antiquity, a Roman matron of the time of Portia transplanted to the icy North, where she is obliged to adapt herself to circumstances and conceal the heroism of her soul. This superior woman is always occupied in some female employments. You go to see her in the morning—she is embroidering;—in the evening she embroiders still. Leaning negligently on the cushions of her ottoman with her tapisserie work in her hands, she leads in the most interesting and intellectual conversation. She is at home in politics as well as in literature, and has the clearest and most impartial views in both.

On the same day that I was presented to the Emperor, I was so happy as to kiss the hand of the Empress. In the midst of her magnificence with every earthly desire fulfilled to satiety, this exalted lady appears to turn her eyes from all to fix them on her family. Her looks, full of soul, appear to say, "here are my treasures!" She has very ill health and owes her prolonged life chiefly to the love and careful nursing of the Emperor, who in her severe attacks of sickness, sleeps for weeks together on the floor beside her bed watching all her movements. Thus the bloom of youth has left her beautiful face, which in former years so much reminded all of her mother, the lovely Queen Louisa of Prussia. When, however, you look at that slender, majestic form—when you regard her elegance of deportment—when you observe her slow and dignified movements, you discover still in her that ideal beauty, that charm of the soul, which neither age nor sickness can take away. Her whole manner is full of gentleness and kindness. In a word, before the Empress ascended the throne, she was a true woman, and this characteristic throws a lustre about her which is more ornamental than her crown or her diamonds. How touching, how elevated appeared the Empress to me in the height of her greatness, wearing so meekly the faculties of her exterior life, bestowing such serious attention on the life within! The Emperor calls her sometimes, in his pleasant humor, "Madame Nicholas," and so it is that the representative of empire is lost sometimes in the relations of peaceful, domestic life. The Emperor, the father, sits at night with his family, when the business of the day is over; he talks kindly with the grandduchesses, his daughters; he plays and jokes with the little granddukes, and has before his eyes and in his heart the fruits of pure religious sentiments.

The Grandduke Constantin, notwithstanding his youth, is already an Admiral. He is intelligent and full of vivacity, and altogether the sailor in his imagination. Some time ago he climbed upon his father's shoulders, and when the Emperor asked, "Ou est tu?" he answered, "Sur le grand mat." The prince royal has a round youthful face, a free, manly deportment and thoughtful countenance. Of the princesses, the Grandduchess Olga, is the most beautiful. Her sylph-like form, her transparent complexion, the light curls which surround her Grecian profile, gave her a claim to singular loveliness. When she is standing beside her mother, wearing a simple white dress, and looking so thoughtful, so pure, so maidenlike, it would require little imagination to suppose that she might unfold a pair of wings to carry her to heaven, her home!

The Emperor calls her in jest, "Ma fille sans dot," and truly she is so beautiful, that she needs not her high rank and riches to render her beloved. Her sister, the Grandduchess Maria, wife of the Duke of Leuchtenberg, is already the mother of two princesses. She is united to the husband of her choice, and is the beloved daughter of her parents. Maria is the miniature portrait of her father, and has all his features softened by feminine grace and mildness.

Her husband, the Duke of Leuchtenberg, the grandson of Napoleon's Josephine, has a southern but not a French physiognomy. He seems youthful and sprightly; is an elegant rider and a good dancer; he enjoys a high standing in the Russian army, and withal devotes himself to the study of natural philosophy with great success, having made some valuable collections.

Soon after my presentation to the Emperor and the Empress, I was invited to a splendid court ball, which afforded me an opportunity of seeing the whole court in its utmost magnificence. At such fêtes all appear in uniform, none being admitted otherwise, which gives to the whole a truly imposing appearance. The gigantic halls illuminated with thousands of wax torches, the assembly, including fifteen hundred persons, the ladies in their becoming and elegant costumes, rivalling each other in taste and splendor, all combine to produce the effect of a fairy-scene. These balls are generally opened with Polonaises, and by the Emperor himself, who dances first with the Empress, then with the princesses, and lastly with the most beautiful ladies, or those of highest rank. Beauty is at the Russian court a passport, which introduces even those who cannot boast of rank or noble birth. The Empress loves to be surrounded by the most charming faces of the Empire. The daughters of parents in an inferior position are often selected to be maids of honor because they are handsome.

When the Emperor has gone through his Polonaises and bestowed the honor of his hand on those ladies who have a right to expect it, the dance begins, consisting of French Contredances and Mazurkas. The Empress, who in former times was passionately fond of the amusement and danced extremely well, now dances only occasionally half a Waltz or a Contredanse. At midnight the company adjourn to the Marble Hall, where the imperial family are seated at one supper table, and the rest of the company at different large tables. The Emperor himself does not sit with his family, but has a small table placed in the winter garden, where he takes his supper with a few chosen friends. This garden, ornamented with magnificent palm and orange trees, forms the sweetest contrast to the gorgeous supper-hall. The subdued light, the little singing birds suspended in cages from the branches, who frightened by the noise, often begin to warble,—the fragrance of the blooming plants, and to set off this the icy winter out of doors, all appeared to me like the victory of light over darkness! A gentle breeze stirs the palm branches; the strelizia with its large flowers bows its head; the whole atmosphere is filled with delicious odors, which appear to spring out of the earth, or to come down from above.

That evening I was like one in a state of enchantment. Sometimes I was tempted to believe the whole a fairy vision of my excited fancy. At supper my neighbor, Prince G., was evidently amused at the manner in which I expressed myself with regard to the wonders of St. Petersburg. He put me au fait of many things, which perhaps I should not have noticed if left to my own observation. The supper, which consists of warm dishes, is handed by a countless number of servants. From such little matters my attention was soon diverted to the ladies. These indeed form the principal ornament of a salon—throw over the whole a couleur de rose, and give to a reunion both action and reaction. I could hardly restrain my looks, never weary of gazing at these masterpieces in a living gallery of pictures. The aristocratic women of St. Petersburg are remarkable for beauty. There is a Baroness de K., of German descent, who seems formed like Galathea out of a block of marble. Never did I behold such a figure: the neck is perfect, the shoulders, arms and hands are in the purest proportions. The consciousness of her singular beauty is legible on her lofty brow, and in the corner of her mouth, where you perceive a little touch of scorn. Perhaps this is because this magnificent creature knows, that one so richly endowed with charms and intellect is not free from the attacks of Envy's scorpion tongue. The Russian ladies are generally covered with treasures of jewelry; (many of them wear in an evening to the value of a million on head and arms,) but the Baroness de K. is distinguished by her simplicity. I saw her in a black velvet robe; no diamonds sparkled in her hair, which surrounds her head and neck with profusion of light curls. She is superb in the Russian national costume, which is worn on great gala days at the court. It consists in a white satin underdress, with a row of diamonds from the waist to the hem, a colored robe over it, open in front with a long train of velvet, or gold, or silver brocade. The sleeves are long but hanging down open that the whole arm can be seen. On the head is the Russian cap surrounding the face like a glory, in which the ladies display their wealth, covered as it is with diamonds; a veil is attached hanging down in graceful folds, not hiding, but showing the whole form to the best advantage. Figure to yourself in this costume eight hundred women assembled in one room, and you will confess that neither the elegant, refined little German courts, nor the Tuileries, can boast of such magnificence. But to return once more to the Baroness de K. I must mention an odd fancy of hers. This truly delicate creature—delicate in all she does—delights in nothing so much as the pleasures of the chase and killing wolves. It seems singular to hear from such sweet lips an enumeration of the slaughtered animals. She might tame them, but to kill scarcely becomes these snowy fingers, which should be dipped in Aurora, not in blood. Another unpleasant habit of many of these ladies, is the smoking of cigarrillos. In their intimate circle five or six ladies are seated at the tea table, the thumb of the right hand often burned brown, and looking like Odalisks of the Turkish harems; their whole persons have an Asiatic aspect. To what will lead at last this eager stirring after something extraordinary? Besides Madame de K., I would mention the Countess W., whom I often saw in my visits at St. Petersburg. She is the same who caused so much furere some years ago in England—a plastic beauty, of bright color, and full in form with a melodious voice. Her eyes express not happiness, but a kind of longing and melancholy. They look as if accustomed to shed tears; sometimes suffused as with a mist; which gives her a mysterious charm. Does this charming woman belong to the past with its faded hopes—to the present with its stimulating impulses—or to the future with its uncertain expectations!—Who dares disclose the secret of the soul—the sanctuary of thought?

One of the most fashionable persons in St. Petersburg is the Princess W., a delicate, graceful little figure, whose almond-shaped eyes show her descended from high Tartarian race. She says every thing she chooses, and has truly the face of a Zana. Sometimes she appears grave, moves with princely dignity through the saloons, among which her own is by far the most elegant in the city: anon she throws off all regard to appearances and form, races through the wildest dances, offends general opinion and creates numberless jealousies. Another distinguished woman, Princess B., is full of charms and grace. She seems to me like a pocket edition of female beauty. Her eyes are large and enthusiastic, but the little short nose and the elevated cheek bones would indicate an Eastern origin. She was just then busy in preparing to open her house, which in luxurious splendor rivals the residence of kings, and as she is very amiable, she will soon be without doubt the centre of the higher circles at St. Petersburg.

But as in fireworks what we call the bouquet is left to the end, so I speak last of the court of the Grandduke Michael and his Duchess. He calls it in his moments of lively humor, "la basse cour," (in France the name for the poultry-yard,) so great is the contrast to the grande cour of his Imperial brother; but this basse cour is full of the rarest and most precious birds, that show the true wealth of a house. Youthful, handsome, and profoundly learned, the Grandduchess Helena has early found that life has higher aims than the splendor of a court can give. She is the pearl of Germany's princely daughters, transplanted to this distant northern soil, where she spends her time not merely in festivals and matters of the toilet, but in assembling around her all that St. Petersburg can furnish of intellectual celebrity. In her palace you will meet every day a circle of distinguished politicians, literary men and poets. Her mind is so thoroughly cultivated, and her eagerness after improvement in knowledge of the sciences and arts is so great, that she takes an interest in everything; and in the rapid flight of her thoughts, she sounds the depths and soars amid the heights of learning. Besides, she bestows the greatest attention upon the education of her three daughters, and devotes her utmost care to the administration of the immense property and revenues of her husband, the Grandduke Michael. He is altogether the soldier, being attached to the profession heart and soul with a sort of fanaticism; but his character is amiable. Many elevating traits of him are known to the public, and he is winning enough in his manners to be popular, even if he were not Grandduke. He, as well as his brother, the Emperor, often visits private houses, converses, and sometimes dances with the ladies. A truly chivalric feeling is implanted by nature within him, and his whole deportment shows the descendant of the great Peter.

Among the politicians, Prince L., former minister of the finances in the kingdom of Poland, occupies the most distinguished place. He is a member of the States Council, and in several crises of the finances his advice was found necessary. His speculative mind and his rich experience render him remarkable. In that bloody struggle, when two closely allied nations strove, and unsuccessfully, to separate from each other, the luxuriant crown of his tree of life was broken. It stands there still, but the leaves are withered, the stem is bent. Who would wish to live after such changes in human destiny, were it not for the pure and pious belief, that out of those clouds shall rise the rainbow of heavenly glory.

An interesting man replied to my remark, that in Russia every one of the nobility was obliged to enter the service of the state: "il est terrible qu'il faille être quelque chose et qu'on ne puisse pas être quelqu'un." This may be true; but for some time past the dignity which high rank used to command in Russia has been bestowed upon personal merit. There are men who are not in office, who wear no uniform of the government, who yet possess the greatest influence.

The house of the interesting poet Karamsin, who died several years ago, is still an Asylum for the most distinguished literary characters in St. Petersburg. His widow is a kind and gentle person; her eldest daughter, who is still unmarried, possesses with a strong masculine mind and a keen wit, the most attractive feminine manners and virtues. The memory of the deceased poet is honored by the literary circle that meets daily with his family. The large pension Madame Karamsin receives from Government enables her to see much company. Her sons are in office; one of them possesses great intellect and talent. I think those happy whose talents are aided by external circumstances, which foster their development and improvement. Poetry is of too noble a nature to prosper in the school of adversity: it can only be nourished by that liberty which enables it to take with unfettered wings its flight heavenward. Oppressed with sordid cares, it dies with vexation on the ground it scorns.

Of the now living Poets, prince W. is perhaps not the most gifted, but to me he is the most agreeable. He is in deep affliction on account of the death of two lovely young daughters, and the only one left to him is married,—he calls her in jest, "la jolie laide," because she looks like him. His description of the great fire of the palace some years ago is a masterpiece, and does him the more credit, as he, though a Russian, wrote it in French.

I have given you slight notices of individuals at the court and in society; but have said nothing of the whole, of the general movement, of the cheerful sociability in the streets, in the salons; of the continual opening and closing of doors, the bell-ringing of the Portiers, of the noise without interruption! I feel sometimes frightened at the everlasting excitement. I visit daily at four or five houses, go to dinner-parties, balls, and soirees. I talk, I listen; but after all hear no conversation; at least none that does me good. The exterior appearance is every thing here, thought has little place. The diamond is there but it wants the polish. Every thing appears in the beginning; the bud begins to be formed ere the breath of spring has kissed away the masses of snow. If that will take place in ten or in fifty years, or in a century; who knows? It takes a long while before a higher tendency, an aim at true cultivation supervenes in society. Art is sometimes at home in their saloons, but it is according to nature? I wish to end with praise, and lo! I am finding some cause for blame! Yet what I say is not blame, but the result of comparisons between what is and what will be. I know Germany; I know France and the intellectual improvements of those countries, and this elevates my hopes for Russia. I think her not at present what she might be, but she has a future before her promising happiness not yet in her possession.

To go a little farther in my knowledge; Important characters have more than one predominant quality; sometimes we find contradictions in them which seem unaccountable, but are understood after long observation.

So there are two principles in the Emperor; one that of strength, which sometimes degenerates into harshness; the other softness and kindness. Beside the Empress, who possesses a truly feminine influence over him, and is his wife in the higher sense of the word, surrounded by his children who love him passionately, the mild traits of his character, his generosity, his affection shine forth. But in public, particularly when roused, you may see his other characteristic, that of strength most prominent.* His melodious voice is then piercing, he speaks loud and quick; his majestic form has something awful. His room is like that of a private person; there are books, military maps, models of cannon and other warlike implements, with a fieldbed, on which is nothing but a straw mattress—furniture which shows the strong man, the industrious self-denying chief. Early in the morning he visits his brother, the Grand Duke Michael, who accompanies him to the parade, or to the imperial council. He is often seen in the streets; crowds of people around him, with many of whom he converses. It is said that during a severe sickness of his eldest Grandduke, an old Russian, with a long beard, approached him and said, "father, thy son is sick; how is he to day?" "He is better," replied the sovereign. "Well! may God bless and preserve him;" added the old man.

Sometimes he appears inclined to fatalism. for he believes in predestination. In all important crises he manifests a religious feeling, which explains many of his actions. What else when he ascended his throne would have given him that calm and high courage in the midst of rebellion, and in times of cholera when he cried with a voice of thunder to the people, "on your knees, fall down, pray for pardon, not of the Emperor, but of God, whom you offend by your murmurings."

It seems as if the conviction that he is an instrument in the hands of the Most High and as such protected by Him, is deeply grounded in his breast! Sentiments of this kind are the more touching when thus united with energy of evil and with the power of an absolute sovereign. What heart would not be moved at the sight of a Monarch who, on solemn occasions, dismounts from his horse to utter upon his knees his morning prayer in company with his soldiers! Envy will say: "these are forms;" but I say, these forms are expressions of faith, of truth, which no man can feign; it is the necessity of a great soul, to trust in Fate and to acknowledge a higher power than his own.

He has made every effort to abolish abuses

* Our readers will scarcely recognise in the portrait here given, the ambitious Czar, whose unscrupulous designs upon Hungary the lover of republican government everywhere now watches with the deepest interest. Some allowance must be made, however, for the "stand-point," as the Germans say, from which this view of the Emperor is taken. To the accomplished Baroness de Bacharach, amid the splendors of his court, we do not doubt he was complaisant in the extreme and exhibited to advantage that "softness" of demeanor, which she tells us is one side of his character.—[Ed. Sou. Lit. Mess.]

and to make all classes participate in the progress of civilization. It is really astonishing to observe what has been done under his reign! The establishment of a complete code of laws is one great step towards the civilization of the Russian Empire. A university of which St. Wladimir is the patron—the astronomical observatory, various manufactories, institutions for the culture of the forests, splendid botanic gardens—all these have been created by him in a few years. Even a rail-road is begun; the streets of St. Petersburg are lighted with gas; the electrotype has been introduced—the city, the habits are changing every day—and all has been accomplished more or less by one will—by the one command: "LET THERE BE LIGHT!"

M. H.

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

NARRATIVE OF THE UNITED STATES' EXPEDITION TO THE RIVER JORDAN AND THE DEAD SEA. By W. F. Lynch, U. S. N. Commander of the Expedition. With Maps and Numerous Illustrations. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard. 1849.

We have risen from the perusal of this volume with an excusable feeling of pride that it has been reserved for an officer of the United States' Navy and a Virginian, to furnish the first authentic account, drawn from a personal exploration, of that distant and mysterious sea, whose acrid and pestilential vapors have hitherto thwarted the efforts of individual enthusiasm and even the well-directed schemes of national enterprise. This gallant officer, who shows himself a man of science and seamanship, seems to have entered con amore upon the labors of his difficult mission, with a full consciousness of the perils and annoyances that he would have to encounter. No whisperings of fevered sentimentalism, no motives of mere idle curiosity urged him onward. He sought not the Holy Land like Lamartine, to cast tattered couplets into "Siloa's brook" or carve his name on the cedars of Lebanon. Nor was he impelled by the same desire with the pilgrims from Threadneedle Street, who go in crowds

To gaze at things in foreign lands
No soul among them understands.

His purpose was well enough set forth in his letter to the Secretary of the Navy, asking leave to undertake the Exploration. "The proposition," says he, "pertains to a subject maritime in its nature, and therefore peculiarly appropriate to your office; and it is involved in mystery, the solution of which will advance the cause of science and gratify the whole Christian world. So far as this mystery can be solved by careful and accurate observations of the phenomena of the sea, Lieut. Lynch's wishes have been attained.

We are glad that this contribution to learning comes from the American Navy, for it furnishes a gratifying assurance that our officers are very different characters from the ocean heroes of Smollett and Marryat, who swore roundly and drank deeply, and filled the quarter-deck with the fumes of tobacco and the staves of coarse ballads. We are pleased to know that our vessels of war are commanded by men of refinement and general intelligence, as distinguished for their attainments in the arts of peace as for their gallant bearing in the hour of naval battle.

The public has already been made acquainted with the outline history of Lieut. Lynch's labors, by means of the article on the Dead Sea Expedition, published in this magazine in September, 1848, and extensively copied by the periodical and newspaper press of the country. The officers of the Expedition, leaving the ship Supply at Smyrna, first visited Constantinople for the purpose of obtaining a firman from the Sultan to allow them to prosecute their investigations. Lieut. Lynch gives an interesting description of this oriental metropolis, which he saw under very favorable circumstances. Since Lady Montagu's time, however, we have had so many accounts of "the Asian pomp of Ottoman parade," that we know it all by heart, and we should not have learned any thing from this portion of the book, had not Lieut. Lynch seen a very rare curiosity—the Sultan himself. We quote the entire passage relating to the interview.

"We were led to the entrance of the southern wing, (of the palace of Chérighan on the Bosphorus,) and again throwing off our overshoes, entered a lofty and spacious hall, matted throughout, with two broad flights of stairs ascending from the far extreme to an elevated platform or landing, whence, uniting in one, they issued upon the floor above.

"On the right and left of the hall were doors opening into various apartments, and there were a number of officers and attendants on either side and stationed at intervals along the stairway, all preserving a silence the most profound.

"The Secretary, who had gone before, now approached and beckoned to us to follow. But here an unexpected difficulty was presented. The Chamberlain in waiting objected to my sword, and required that I should lay it aside. I replied that the audience was given to me as an officer of the United States; and that the sword was part of my uniform, and that I could not dispense with it. My refusal was met with the assurance that the etiquette of the court peremptorily required it. I asked if the custom had been invariably complied with, and inquired of the dragoman whether Mr. Carr, our minister, had, in conformity with it, ever attended an audience without his sword, but even as I spoke, my mind, without regard to precedent, had come to the alternative, no sword, no audience.

"Whether the Secretary had, during the discussion, referred the matter to a higher quarter, I could not tell, for my attention had been so engrossed for some minutes, that I had not noticed him. He now came forward, however, and decided that I should retain the sword. At this I truly rejoiced, for it would have been unpleasant to retire after having gone so far. It is due to Mr. Brown, the dragoman, to say that he sustained me.

"The discussion at an end, we ascended the stairway, which was covered with a good and comfortable, but not a costly carpet, and passed into a room more handsomely furnished and more lofty, but in every other respect of the same dimensions as the one immediately below it. A rich carpet was on the floor, a magnificent chandelier, all crystal and gold, was suspended from the ceiling, and costly divans and tables, with other articles of furniture, were interspersed about the room; but I had not time to note them, for on the left hung a gorgeous crimson velvet curtain embroidered and fringed with gold and towards it the Secretary led the way. His countenance and his manner exhibited more awe than I had ever seen depicted in the human countenance. He seemed to hold his breath, and his step was so soft and stealthy that once or twice I stopped, under the impression that I had left him behind, but found him ever beside me. There were three of us in close proximity, and the stairway was lined with officers and attendants, but such was the death-like stillness that I could distinctly hear my own footfall, which, unaccustomed to palace regulations, fell with untutored republican firmness upon the royal floor. If it had been a wild beast slumbering in his lair that we were about to visit, there could not have been a silence more deeply hushed.

"Fretted at such abject servility, I quickened my pace towards the curtain, when Sheffie Bey, rather gliding than stepping before me, cautiously and slowly raised a corner for me to pass. Wondering at his subdued and terror-stricken attitude, I stepped across the threshold, and felt, without yet perceiving it, that I was in the presence of the Sultan.

"The heavy folds of the window curtains so obscured the light, that it seemed as if the day were dawning to a close, instead of being at its high meridian.

"As with the expanding pupil the eye took in surrounding objects, the apartment, its furniture and its royal tenant, presented a different scene from what, if left to itself, the imagination would have drawn.

"The room, less spacious, but as lofty as the adjoining one, was furnished in the modern European style, and like a familiar thing, a stove stood nearly in the centre. On a sofa by a window, through which he might have looked upon us as we crossed the court, with a crimson tarbouch, its gold button and blue silk tassel on his head, a black kerchief around his neck, attired in a blue military frock and pantaloons, and polished French boots upon his feet, sat the monarch, without any of the attributes of sovereignty about him.

"A man, young in years, but evidently of impaired and delicate constitution, his wearied and spiritless air was unrelieved by any indication of intellectual energy. He eyed me fixedly as I advanced, and on him my attention was no less intently riveted. As he smiled I stopped, expecting that he was about to speak, but he motioned gently with his hand for me to approach yet nearer. Through the interpreter, he then bade me welcome, for which I expressed my acknowledgments.

"The interview was not a protracted one. In the course of it, as requested by Mr. Carr, I presented him, in the name of the President of the United States, with some biographies and prints, illustrative of the character and habits of our North American Indians, the work of American artists. He looked at some of them, which were placed before him by an attendant, and said that he considered them as evidences of the advancement of the United States in civilization, and would treasure them as a souvenir of the good feeling of its government towards him. At the word civilization, pronounced in French, I started; for it seemed singular, coming from the lips of a Turk and applied to our country. I have since learned that he is but a student in French, and presume, that, by the word 'civilization,' he meant the arts and sciences.

"When about to take my leave, he renewed the welcome, and said that I had his full authority to see anything in Stambohl I might desire.

"While in his presence, I could not refrain from drawing comparisons and moralizing on fate. There was the Sultan, an Eastern despot, the ruler of mighty kingdoms and the arbiter of the fate of millions of his fellow-creatures; and, face to face, a few feet distant, one, in rank and condition, among the humblest servants of a far-distant republic; and yet little as life has to cheer, I would not change positions with him, unless I could carry with me my faith, my friendships, and my aspirations.

"My feelings saddened as I looked upon the monarch, and I thought of Montezuma. Evidently, like a Northern clime, his year of life had known two seasons only, and he had leaped at once from youth to imbecility. His smile was one of the sweetest I ever looked upon,—his voice almost the most melodious I had ever heard; his manner was gentleness itself, and every thing about him bespoke a kind and amiable disposition. He is said to be very affectionate, to his mother in especial, and is generous to the extreme of prodigality. But there is that indescribably sad expression in his countenance, which is thought to indicate an early death. A presentiment of the kind, mingled perhaps with a boding fear of the overthrow of his country, seems to pervade and depress his spirits. In truth, like Darius, this descendant of the Caliphs sits beneath a suspended fate. Through him, the soul of the mighty monarchs who have gone before, seem to brood over the impending fate of an empire which once extended from the Atlantic to the Ganges, from the Caucasus to the Indian Ocean."

The firman having been obtained, the officers at once rejoined the ship, and proceeded to St. Jean D'Acres in Syria. Here they landed, and after some delay in making the necessary preparations for their toilsome overland journey, they took up the line of march for the Sea of Galilee. We cannot follow them in their subsequent movements, (which have already been traced in brief in the article before mentioned)—the visit to Tiberias—the perilous navigation through the sinuosities and fearful rapids of the Jordan—the arrival at the Dead Sea—the storm, the calm and the sirocco. These undoubtedly form the most valuable and interesting portion of the volume which we commend to the attention of the reader. It would be injustice to Lieut. Lynch, even had we the space here, to draw so largely upon his pages. We shall be content to quote a few passages, descriptive of scenery, incident or character, to be taken as specimens of his whole production.

At St. Jean D'Acres they received an important accession to their party in the persons of 'Akil Aga el Hassé, a great Sheikh of one of the border tribes, and Sheriff Hazza of Mecca, the thirty-third lineal descendant of the prophet. The former had signalized himself in former years in carrying on a predatory warfare against the government, plundering whom he pleased, and had finally been bought off with a commission, like many a more enlightened man before him. Junius, who still remains the shadow of a name, surrendered his pen as 'Akil did his sword, for a consideration. But our Sheikh was a dashing fellow, and if he sometimes disregarded the rights of property, it was in a way to be admired—the very poetry of pillage; and his fidelity in friendships made some atonement for his offences in this respect. Lieut. Lynch acknowledges the important services he rendered the Expedition, and we must look upon him as an Admirable Crichton of Arabs, if the following description does not make him out a sort of Musulman Murat. He was, says Lieut. Lynch,

"a magnificent savage, enveloped in a scarlet cloth pe-Hase, richly embroidered with gold. He was the handsomest, and I soon thought also, the most graceful being I had ever seen. His complexion was of a rich, mellow, indescribable olive tint, with glossy black hair; his teeth were regular, and of the whitest ivory; and the glance of his eye was keen at times, but generally soft and lustrous.
 With the tarbouch upon his head, which he seemed to wear uneasily, he reclined, rather than sat, upon the opposite side of the divan, while his hand played in unconscious familiarity with the hilt of his yataghan. He looked like one who would be

"Steel amid the din of arms
 And wax when with the fair."

Of Sheriff Hazza, our author says,

"He was about fifty years of age, of a dark Egyptian complexion, small stature, and intelligent features. His father and elder brother had been sherifs, or governors of Mecca until the latter was deposed by Mehemet Ali. He was dressed in a spencer and capacious trousers of fine olive cloth. His appearance was very prepossessing, and he evinced much enlightened curiosity with regard to our country and its institutions. We were told that from his descent he was held in great veneration by the Arabs; and I observed that every Mahomedan who came in, first approached him and kissed his hand with an air of profound respect."

Sherif Hazza accompanied the party throughout the whole exploration, and proved of great service in conciliating the natives.

The features of the country around them are depicted in this volume in the happiest manner. Gainsborough, could he teach his pencil to forget the verdant slopes of the English landscape, or Durand, could he leave the gnarled oaks of the North American forest, might transfer to canvas the scenery of the Holy Land from these animated descriptions. Witness the following, of the descent of the Jordan—

"The boats had little need of oars to propel them, for the current carried us along at the rate of from four to six knots an hour, the river, from its eccentric course, scarcely permitting a correct sketch of its topography to be taken. It curved and twisted north, south, east, and west, turning, in the short space of half an hour, to every quarter of the compass,—seeming as if desirous to prolong its luxuriant meanderings in the calm and silent valley, and reluctant to pour its sweet and sacred waters into the accursed bosom of the bitter sea.

"For hours of their swift descent the boats floated down in silence, the silence of the wilderness. Here and there were spots of solemn beauty. The numerous birds sung with a music strange and manifold; the willow branches were spread upon the stream like tresses, and creeping mosses and clambering weeds, with a multitude of white and silvery little flowers, looked out from among them; and the cliff swallow wheeled over the falls, or went at his own wild will darting through the arched vistas, shadowed and shaped by the meeting foliage on the banks; and above all, yet attuned to all, was the music of the river, gushing with a sound like that of shawms and cymbals."

"The birds were numerous, and at times, when we issued from the shadow and silence of a narrow and verdure-tinted part of the stream into an open bend, where the rapids rattled and the light burst in, and the birds sang their wildwood song, it was, to use a simile of Mr. Bedlow, like a sudden transition from the cold, dull-lighted hall where gentlemen hang their hats, into the white and golden saloon, where the music rings and the dance goes on."

Here is a scene, farther down the river, of a very different kind—

* "HENRY BEDLOW, Esq. and HENRY J. ANDERSON, M. D., were associated with the Expedition as volunteers after its original organization,—the first at Constantinople, and the other at Beirút. More zealous, efficient, and honorable associates could not have been desired."—Preface.

"Last evening I had a different entertainment. I saw advertised a meeting of an anti-slavery league, and that Garrison, Wright, and Douglass, &c., were to hold forth. I thought I should like to hear some familiar and accustomed voices and to shake hands with some old friends. The meeting was well attended. Mrs. Bailey, a good friend, where I dined at five, (still dining and in bad grammar too!) wished to go with me, and we did not leave the meeting, which was then in full blast, until after twelve. I got home about half past one.

"Douglass rivals Matthews in his powers of imitation; (credit Judaea!) he was exceedingly entertaining, and was received and heard with a tempest of applause continually bursting about his ears. Wright was very caustic. (Hear this, oh good subscribers on the Pedee and the Apalachicola and be thereat greatly distressed!) Garrison, whom I believe to be honest and disinterested, and certainly to be admired for his consistency and perseverance, was violent and virulent beyond precedent."

After learning that Mr. Colman was "entertained" with this remarkable demonstration of "black spirits and white," we are sorry to be informed that

"The Speeches were a continued attack upon the United States and some Presbyterian clergymen, who have come here to attend the Evangelical Alliance, the object of which is to put down popery."

Our author confesses that this was not "altogether to his taste" from which we may infer that he was not greatly offended by it. Now we do not know how much human nature can stand, but we should have thought that to hear a slanderous and seditious negro, in a crowded hall, pouring out abuse of America, to an English audience, would have been too much for the olfactories and the temper of even a New England philanthropist. But not so. For he observes in this connection, doing violence at once to our feelings as a slaveholder and an admirer of Lindley Murray,

"I cannot say that a fugitive slave, knowing by his own experience the miseries of the condition, and again a man, have not the right to be plain spoken, denunciatory and severe."

In another place, however, to his credit be it said, he admits that "the miseries of the condition" are not comparable with the sufferings of another class of persons, whom the sympathising English abolitionists might well assist, before affiliating with Garrison & Co.

"The condition of a large portion of the Irish people," says he, "involves an amount of destitution and wretchedness which admits of no description, and in comparison with which, the physical condition of the Southern slaves is almost a condition of felicity."

And again of a party of Quakers whom he saw in Dublin he says—

"The good souls, however, seemed to be sadly afflicted when I told them that in all physical and political comforts, the condition of the American slaves was infinitely better than that of the lower Irish."

In Scotland also Mr. Colman met with destitution enough to occupy the attention of British Charitable Societies for years. The Anti-Slavery Associations might profitably direct their efforts to the slaves of Edinburgh and Dundee. We heartily agree with Mr. Colman that there is little of true religion in those wrangling fanatics who talk of "Free Church," while their fellow-beings are starving all around them.

Of a part of Edinburgh, Mr. Colman writes—

"The street crowded with people, bare-headed and bare-footed, exhibited an assemblage of thousands of miserable, starving, drunken, ignorant, dissolute, poor, forlorn, wretched beings, in the midst of what is called a Christian community. After this sight, I went to church, and with what heart I leave you to conjecture—and here I found churches crowded with people full of rancor, breathing anathemas against those who do not agree with them in opinion, and contending with each other with all the fury of the ancient clans, about church government. What a commentary suggests itself to a reflecting mind! It seemed to me to resemble nothing more than a contention between the Priest and the Levite about sacrifices over the body of a wounded, robbed and bleeding traveller by the wayside. These people, too, will spend thousands and thousands for missions to the Heathens, many of whom are really more of Christians than they are themselves, and neglect their poor, suffering brethren, wallowing in wretchedness, and destitution, and vice, at their own doors!"

At Dundee the state of things was even worse. After describing the repulsive sights that assailed him in that city, he says—

"Here, too, the Christians are engaged heart and soul in fighting against heresy, and contending about church government. Away with such controversies, miscalled religious, from the earth!"

Mr. Colman sometimes tells a home truth, in his simple way, which comes with all the greater force from across the water. What could be more just than the following paragraph,

"My companions have been most agreeable; but a Bostonian* myself, yet I cannot help being amused, as I confess I have been for years, with the prejudices of my townsmen. They think always that Boston was made in the morning, while the materials were fresh, and before they had been culled for any other places. It takes a long time to make any breach in this wall of prejudice, and with them every thing is measured by this standard. It requires, in many cases, not a little time to satisfy such persons that other countries have their advantages, other people their virtues, and other cities their beauties, and to pick our way out of the shell, from which, at best, we emerge only half-fledged."

Of the style of these volumes we need say little. It is as easy and as slipshod as "familiar letters to friends" generally are. We have been somewhat amused at Mr. Colman's surprise in finding himself out of the atmosphere of New England provincialism and hearing certain English words used as they should be. The word "clever" seemed to have been a novelty to him in the sense of "expert" or "adroit," for in referring to a sprightly lady with whom he became acquainted, he tells us that he was, "in the English sense of the word, one of the cleverest women" he knew.

But our remarks and extracts must close here or our readers will be likely to urge the same objection to our critical notice as we did in the outset to the volumes themselves.

The work is for sale by Messrs. J. W. Randolph & Co.

* It is to be observed that our author here calls himself a Bostonian, yet as there are frequent passages in which he refers to Salem as the place of his domicile, we presume that he regards Salem as but a suburb of Boston, as Little Pedlington is of London. We have seen persons who considered Plymouth Rock as to all intents and purposes a part of Boston.

THE SHAKSPERIAN READER: a collection &c., by John W. S. Hows, Professor of Elocution in Columbia College. New York: Appleton & Co. Philadelphia: G. S. Appleton. 1839.

This is a very neat little volume, gotten up in the usual good style of these excellent publishers. We have no fault to find with type or paper. But we cannot approve the license which the compiler has confessedly assumed, of reducing his author to his own standard of decorum—substituting his own words for Shakspeare's—and cutting out the passages which are too strong for his taste. Selections are one thing—emasculated plays are another. Think of a man finding "synonymes" for Shakspeare's words! Did Mr. Howe ever hear of "gilding refined gold," or "painting the lily?" He evidently believes that he has been sinning. He makes many apologies—says that to "do a great right," he has "done a little wrong"—admits that he may have "cut beyond the wound, to make the cure complete"—and pleads that he has "high medical authority" for such treatment of desperate cases." Who told him that Shakspeare's was a desperate case? His own is much more so. He has done a great wrong, without any right at all: so that his Jesuit maxim shall not avail him. Away with such mutilators! They would mar the Apollo Belvidere, or the Greek Slave, because ladies and gentlemen don't like to study them in company: or perhaps they might encase the one in a sack coat and pantaloons, and surround the other with skirts and stomachers. Again, we say, down with such mutilators! We insist upon the integrity of the great masters.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE and the FOREIGN REVIEWS.

These sterling publications for the last few months have possessed more than usual interest. Blackwood still harps on the old string of legitimacy, so that its political strain has somewhat jarred upon our ears, but there is no lack of stirring music of another character thrown out by master hands. Part XIII of "The Caxtona" appears in the June number, together with the first of the "Dies Boreales," in which we recognise Christopher North again. The Edinburgh, for April, contains a noble article on "The Vanity and the Glory of Literature," worthy of its best fame. But perhaps the most striking paper of the day is the slashing criticism of Croker upon Macaulay, in the last number of the London Quarterly. In former times, we read in Froissart, there was a custom for gentlemen to rig themselves out in vizor and corselet, mount fiery steeds and ride at full speed at each other with lance in rest, for the purpose of amusing "gay ladies" by tumbling each other in the dust. At a much earlier period, there was even a more naughty practice, among the higher classes, of placing two brave men in the open space of an amphitheatre, and cheering them on to kill each other, amid the waving of scarfs and the pomp of regal festivity. Such things are no longer. The age of chivalry is gone. Gladiatorial exhibitions do not now delight civilized people. Nous avons changé tout cela. But we have a diversion of a no less cruel character. Two authors, "clad in complete steel," rush on to a conflict more stirring than any ever fought by knight or gladiator, in the lists or the arena. The Review is the field of engagement and the subscribers are the audience, who look on with the most engrossing interest for the result. This is always the same. Both are well up. It is an affair like the feline skirmish of Kilkenny, where nothing remains to mark the spot of the action. Such has been the case with Croker and Macaulay. In the pages of the Edinburgh and the Quarterly, both these accomplished littérateurs have been "butchered to make a London holiday." We commend the encounter to the ingenious person who parodies passages of Childe Harold for the Punch, and ask that he will give it to us in Spenserian verse, beginning with the stanza,

"I see before me the Reviewer lie."

But to the article.

We have read Mr. Croker's review with some attention, and while we admit that he convicts Mr. Macaulay of occasional exaggeration, arising out of his antithetical style, we cannot see that he has succeeded in establishing any great fault in the History as a whole. The most remarkable thing to our mind that Mr. Croker brings forward, is the wondrous similarity between passages of Mackintosh and Macaulay, relating to the same events. This could scarcely have been accidental and yet Mr. Macaulay makes no acknowledgment of having borrowed anything from his predecessor. Mr. Croker quite fails, we think in sustaining his wholesale accusations of party prejudice and sometimes "falls on 'other side'" by convicting himself of the bitterest tory feelings. Some of his verbal objections to the History are altogether below the dignity of criticism and remind us of his complaint many years ago against Lord Byron, that he called one of his poems, "The Bride of Abydos" when in point of fact the heroine was not a bride, but only about to be one.

The Reviews have reached us through Messrs. Nash & Woodhouse, the Richmond agents, at whose store subscriptions will be received.

CHARACTERISTICS OF LITERATURE, Illustrated by the Genius of Distinguished Men. By HENRY T. TUCKERMAN. Philadelphia, Lindsay and Blakiston. 1849.

We have before us, collected into a volume, the entire series of Essays on literary characters, which Mr. Tuckerman has contributed to the Messenger during twelve months past,—Sir Thomas Browne, John Sterling, Mark Akenside, Lamb and Keats, Channing, Swift, and Burke,—together with three others, Shenstone, Roscoe, and Macaulay, and one written many years since on Charles Lamb as a Humorist. To the readers of the Messenger it is scarcely necessary to say a word in praise of this most excellent book. We regard Mr. Tuckerman as one of the most thoughtful and philosophical writers of our acquaintance, and we do not remember to have seen any book from his pen, that is not to be considered as a valuable acquisition to a library. There is a certain finish to his style that shows the true scholar,—a finish derived from wide and intimate knowledge of books imparting a charm to every sentence—while the reflections in which he indulges betray a habit of attentively observing the springs of human action. Mr. Tuckerman does not write books to order, as many of our modern author-craft do, and in his composition he has generally acted in accordance with a good old maxim touching conversation, long since obsolete,—be sure you have something to say before you open your mouth.

The present volume is very handsomely printed and is for sale by A. Morris.

We are indebted to Messrs. Robert Carter & Co., of New York for some of their recent publications which we shall take an early opportunity of noticing. This firm has become famous for the number of theological and devotional works which they send forth constantly from the press.

THE SOUTHERN METHODIST PULPIT.

Monthly: Original: Thirty-Two Pages in Each Number.

TERMS—$1 per annum, invariably in Advance. Six Copies for $5.

EACH NUMBER CONTAINS:

- I. A SERMON by some Southern Methodist minister;
- II. A PORTRAIT of some distinguished Methodist minister; a superior wood-cut;
- III. A PEN-AND-INK SKETCH accompanying the Portrait and giving biographical and descriptive notices of the Subject;
- IV. ESSAYS on subjects of importance to Southern Methodists;
- V. RELIGIOUS INTELLIGENCE;
- VI. Notices of LITERATURE.

The second volume begins in July. Remit post-paid to Rev. Dr. Lee, Richmond, Virginia, Rev. Dr. Wightman, Charleston, South Carolina; Rev. J. B. McFerrin, Nashville, Tenn.; Rev. Chauncy Richardson, Houston, Texas; or to the Editor,

CHAS. F. DEEMS, Newbern, N. C.

June, 1849.

A. MORRIS,

SUCCESSOR TO

DRINKER & MORRIS,

Publisher, Bookseller, Stationer and Dealer in Piano Fortes.

Is constantly supplied with the most important publications in every department of Literature. All New Publications received as soon as published. Foreign Books imported to order.

He Publishes the following Books:

Tate's Digest of the Laws of Virginia, 1 vol., 8vo.

Tate's Analytical Digested Index of the Virginia Reports, 2 vols., 8vo.

Tate's American Form Book, 1 vol., 12mo.

Joyne's on the Statute of Limitations, 1 vol., 8vo.

Howison's History of Virginia, 2 vols., 8vo., bringing down the History of the State to the re-occupation of Alexandria, 1847.

PIANO FORTES.

He is the agent for the sale of the unrivalled Piano Fortes, manufactured by H. Worcester, of New York, and solicits an examination from purchasers.

He is also the agent for the sale of the Magnificent Grand Pianos and Pianinos, manufactured by the celebrated Pianist, Henri Herz, Paris.

WHICH IS THE BEST?

The Salem Gazette says—"Richardson's is the most valuable Dictionary of the English Language, both for definitious and derivations."

Again: The Oneida Whig is of the opinion, that "Richardson's is the most complete Dictionary that any language can boast."

This Dictionary is styled by the London Quarterly Review, "A perfect mine of the English Language."

The Chronicle and Democrat informs its readers, that nearly every publication in England and America has spoken of Richardson's Dictionary in the most exalted terms.

We think the question is answered, so call on the agents, J. W. RANDOLPH & CO., 121 Main Street, Richmond, and get a copy of Charles Richardson's new Dictionary of the English Language—1 or 2 vols. 4to., containing 2222 printed pages, in first rate binding.

Orders for Books, Stationery or Music, will receive prompt attention if addressed to

J. W. RANDOLPH & CO.

Books Bound, or Blank Books Manufactured to order.

June, 1849

NOTICE.

A Lady who has had much experience in teaching the higher English branches, French, Drawing and Painting, and who could teach the rudiments of Music, wishes to make an engagement in a private family. Address the Editor of the Messenger.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE.

PROSPECTUS.

This work is conducted in the spirit of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, (which was favorably received by the public for twenty years.) but as it is twice as large, and appears so often, we not only give spirit and freshness to it by many things which were excluded by a month's delay, but while thus extending our scope and gathering a greater and more attractive variety, are able so to increase the solid and substantial part of our literary, historical, and political harvest, as fully to satisfy the wants of the American reader.

The elaborate and stately Essays of the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and other Reviews; and Blackwood's noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contributions to Literature, History, and Common Life, by the sagacious Spectator, the sparkling Examiner, the judicious Athenaeum, the busy and industrious Literary Gazette, the sensible and comprehensive Britannia, the sober and respectable Christian Observer; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the United Service, and with the best articles of the Dublin University, New Monthly, Fraser's, Tait's, Ainsworth's, Hood's, and Sporting Magazines, and of Chambers' admirable Journal. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from Punch; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of The Times. We shall increase our variety by importations from the continent of Europe, and from the new growth of the British colonies.

The steamship has brought Europe, Asia and Africa, into our neighborhood; and will greatly multiply our connections, as Merchants, Travelers, and Politicians, with all parts of the world;

so that much more than ever it now becomes every intelligent American to be informed of the condition and changes of foreign countries. And this not only because of their nearer connection with ourselves, but because the nations seem to be hastening through a rapid process of change, to some new state of things, which the merely political prophet cannot compute or foresee.

Geographical Discoveries, the progress of Colonization, (which is extending over the whole world,) and Voyages and Travels, will be favorite matter for our selection: and, in general, we shall systematically and very fully acquaint our readers with the great department of Foreign affairs, without entirely neglecting our own.

While we aspire to make the Living Age desirable to all who wish to keep themselves informed of the rapid progress of the movement—to Statesmen, Divines, Lawyers, and Physicians—to men of business and men of leisure—it is still a stronger object to make it attractive and useful to their Wives and Children. We believe that we can thus do some good in our day and generation; and hope to make the work indispensable in every well-informed family. We say indispensable, because in this day of cheap literature it is not possible to guard against the influx of what is bad in taste and vicious in morals, in any other way than by furnishing a sufficient supply of a healthy character. The mental and moral appetite must be gratified.

We hope that, by "winnowing the wheat from the chaff," by providing abundantly for the imagination, and by a large collection of Biography, Voyages and Travels, History, and more solid matter, we may produce a work which shall be popular, while at the same time it will aspire to raise the standard of public taste. May, 1844.

TERMS.

The LIVING AGE is published every Saturday, by E. LITTELL & CO., Boston; Price 12½ cents a number, or six dollars a year in advance. Remittances for any period will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

Clubs, paying a year in advance, will be supplied as follows:—

| | | | |
|-----------------|---|---|---------|
| Four copies for | - | - | $20 00 |
| Nine " " | - | - | 40 00 |
| Twelve " " | - | - | 50 00 |

Complete sets, in nineteen volumes, to the end of 1848, handsomely bound, and packed in neat boxes, are for sale at $2 a volume.

Any volume may be had separately at two dollars, bound, or a dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents; and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

Monthly parts.—For such as prefer it in that form, the Living Age is put up in monthly parts, containing four or five weekly numbers. In this shape it shows to great advantage in comparison with other works, containing in each part double the matter of any of the quarterlies. But we recommend the weekly numbers, as fresher and fuller of life. The volumes are published quarterly, each volume containing as much matter as a quarterly review gives in eighteen months.

To insure regularity in mailing the work, all orders should be addressed to
E. LITTELL & CO., Boston.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

JNO. R. THOMPSON, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

VOL. XV., No. 8.

AUGUST, 1849.

Whole Number, CLXXVI.

ORIGINAL PROSE ARTICLES.

| | PAGE. |
|--|-------|
| 1. The Panama Rail-Way and the Gulf of Mexico. Surveys of the Isthmus. Moro's Survey unreliable. Survey of Lieut. Leigh: the routes via Tehuantepec and via Panama—the Rail-Road considered commercially,—The Seas and River basins of the old and new world compared. Benefits likely to result to the Pacific Whale Fisheries from a connection across the Isthmus. The Cotton Trade. Reflections on the destiny of America. | 441 |
| 2. Richard Savage. By H. T. Tuckerman. The Literary Adventurer portrayed. Savage's life, works and character. | 459 |
| 3. "Feudalism in the Nineteenth Century." A magnificent scheme of bondage proposed by Blackwood's Magazine. | 465 |
| 4. Original Novel. The Chevalier Merlin. Chapters Seventh, Eighth and Ninth. | 473 |
| 5. Provincialisms. By P. | 482 |
| 6. The Seldens of Sherwood. | 484 |
| 7. A Day in Dalarne. By the Author of "Glimpses at Europe during 1848." Scenery of Northern Sweden,—The Village of Leksand; Lake Siljan; breach of hospitality in the village Prost; Water-cure-Establishment; Ride to Rattvik; The young postillion; Rattvik Church, its services and congregation; return of the people to their homes by the Lake: A Regatta: Mora, Recollections of Gustavus Wasa. | 492 |
| 8. The Streets. (Extract from an Unpublished work.) By Ik. Marvel. | 499 |
| 9. From our Paris Correspondent. Political complexion of the Republic—the War upon Rome—New Gironde under the lead of Dufaure. Marriage in Paris now made a matter of business. | |

ORIGINAL PROSE ARTICLES—CONTINUED.

| | PAGE. |
|--|-------|
| M. de Foy, the negociateur des mariages , a visit to his Apartments. The Cholera and Electricity; Incombustibility of the human body; credulity of modern superstition—the Saviour's tunic exhibited at Argenteuil, &c. | 501 |
| 10. Frances Sargent Osgood. A Review of her Poems. By Edgar A. Poe. | 509 |

ORIGINAL POETRY.

| | |
|--|-----|
| 11. The Pearl. By Gretta. | 457 |
| 12. A Morning Dream. Addressed to a Lady. | 464 |
| 13. Letters at Sea. | 472 |
| 14. Apostrophe to Niagara. By Margaret Junkin. | 472 |
| 15. Afflictions. By Sidney Dyer. | 482 |
| 16. Sonnet. By Aglaus. | 484 |
| 17. Lament. By James Wynne, M. D. | 492 |
| 18. Bion. Idyll 4. Translated by J. J. S. | 499 |
| 19. The Grave of Byron. By Matilda F. Dana. | 501 |
| 20. Sonnet. Friendship. | 509 |
| 21. Weyer's Cave. By the Rev. J. Newton Brown. | 516 |

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

| | |
|---|-----|
| 22. Mr. Baldwin's Address at the Dedication of Holly-Wood Cemetery. | 517 |
| 23. The Histories of Caius Cornelius Tacitus. | 518 |
| 24. A First Book in Greek. | 518 |
| 25. Loyola and Jesuitism in its Rudiments. | 518 |
| 26. The Philosophy of the Beautiful. | 519 |
| 27. Lady Alice or the New Una. | 519 |
| 28. Italian Comedies. | 519 |
| 29. Southey's Common-Place Book. | 519 |
| 30. Kaloolah. | 519 |
| 31. Chalmers's Sermons. | 520 |
| 32. The Adventures of Capt. Bonneville, U. S. A. | 520 |
| 33. President Green's Inaugural Address. | 520 |
| 34. An Apology. | 520 |

LOCAL AGENTS.

KEITH & WOODS, St. Louis, Mo.
J. C. MORGAN, New Orleans,
GEORGE P. PUTNAM, London,
E. P. NASH, Petersburg, Va.

JOHN P. WRIGHT, Lynchburg, Virginia.

MACFARLANE & FERGUSON, Richmond, Va.
DEWITT & DAVENPORT, New York.
JOSEPH ROBINSON, Baltimore, Md.
C. C. CLEAVES, Memphis, Tenn.

THIS WORK IS PUBLISHED IN MONTHLY NUMBERS AVERAGING SIXTY-FOUR PAGES EACH, AT FIVE DOLLARS, PER ANNUM, INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

RICHMOND, VA.
MACFARLANE & FERGUSON.
1849.

GENERAL COLLECTORS FOR THE LITERARY MESSENGER.

Wm. Gouldin, General Agent and Collector for Virginia.

Thomas L. Jones is our General Collector for the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee and Louisiana.

Israel E. James, is our General Travelling Agent, for the following States, District of Columbia, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana and Arkansas—assisted by James K. Whipple, Wm. H. Weld, O. H. P. Stem, John B. Weld, T. S. Waterman, R. A. Henry, John Collins, James Deering, and Isaac D. Guyer.

Henry M. Lewis, is our General Agent, for Alabama and Tennessee.

C. W. James, is our General Collector, for Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois and Missouri; Wisconsin and Iowa—assisted by James R. Smith, J. T. Dent, E. Y. Jennings, T. G. Smith, and Frederick J. Hawae. Mr. C. W. James also makes a Fall trip to the Eastern States, and the District of Columbia.

Eli M. Stevenson, General Collector for Kentucky, and specially authorised to solicit new subscriptions.

Wm. Wertebaker of the University of Virginia is our authorised agent for the county of Albemarle, Va.

Addison A. Bell, of Ala., is authorised to procure New Subscribers.

J. F. Stanton is authorised to procure New Subscribers for the Messenger, generally.

R. Morris & Co., Jackson, Miss., are authorised to Collect and procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

J. W. B. Garrett, is authorised to procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

Bralis Davis is duly authorised to Collect Money and procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

W. Ramsey, Frankfort, Ky., is authorised to procure new subscribers for the Messenger.

B. F. Somerville, Locust Dale, Virginia, is authorised to procure New Subscribers.

NASH & WOODHOUSE,

No. 139 Main Street, Richmond, Virginia,

Deal extensively in School, Medical, Law, Theological, Classical and Miscellaneous Books; Paper, Blank Books and Stationery of every description. They are agents for the American reprints of Blackwood's Magazine, the London Quarterly, Westminster, Edinburgh and North British Reviews, and furnish, besides, nearly every respectable periodical published in the United States.

PIANO FORTES.

They are sole agents in Virginia for the sale of the Superb Piano Fortes, made by Messrs. Stodart & Dunham, New York, whose instruments have received the unqualified approbation of some of the most distinguished Composers, Professors and Amateurs in this country and Europe—and from those who have bought and tried them. They are largely engaged in this branch of trade.

They publish Charles Campbell's Introduction to the History of Virginia, in one volume, 8vo. Price $1 50.

MACFARLANE & FERGUSSON,

BOOK AND JOB PRINTERS,

MESSENGER OFFICE—NOS. 14 & 15, LAW-BUILDING—UP STAIRS.

The Panama Rail-Way and the Gulf of Mexico.

1. Carta del Istmo de Tehuantepec, copied by order of Commodore M. C. Perry, Commanding U. S. Home Squadron, Mexico 1847, by Wm. May, Lieutenant U. S. N.
2. Plan de la Boca del Rio Coatzacoalcos, copied by order of Commodore M. C. Perry, Commanding Home Squadron, Mexico 1847, by Lieut. Wm. May, U. S. N.
3. Sketch from the Mouth of the Coatzacoalcos River, to the town of Mina-Titlan made by order of Commodore M. C. Perry, Commanding Home Squadron, 1847, by Lieuts. Alden, Blunt and May, U. S. N.
4. Mouth of the Coatzacoalcos River, Surveyed, January 1848, by order of Commodore M. C. Perry, by
WM. LEIGH, Lieut. Commanding,
E. T. NICHOLS, Acting Master,
A. L. BRADBURY, Master's Mate,
Officers of the U. S. Brig Stromboli.
Hydrographical Office, Washington.

The continent must be cut in two. The convenience of the world requires that the two great oceans should be joined together.

The subject is attracting a large share of public attention. Two propositions were submitted to Congress, at the last session, for opening a way for commerce across the Isthmus. The routes proposed were, one via Panama, the other via Tehuantepec.

It will be recollected that Mexico granted, a few years ago, to Don José Garay and others, extraordinary privileges for constructing a railroad or ship canal across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec. Under this grant, Cayetano Moro, an Italian engineer, was employed to survey the route. The map of Tehuantepec and the plan of the Coatzacoalcos, mentioned as 1 and 2, at the head of this article, are the results of that survey.

They were found by Commander McKenzie, U. S. N., at Mina-Titlan, 1847, in the hands of the agent of the Company which had been formed in England upon the faith of Moro's survey; from this agent they were borrowed by Commodore Perry; they were copied by his order, and the copies sent to the Bureau of Ordnance and Hydrography. By authority of the Bureau, these with the two other charts named above, were engraved and published at the National Observatory.

The surveys of Moro have been widely circulated both in this country and in Europe. They have produced a general impression, both here and there, that this Tehuantepec route is very favorable, if not the most favorable that has been proposed across the continent either for railroad and ship canal.

Moro's Survey cannot be relied on. He gives twenty feet water on the bar of the Coatzacoalcos. The survey, both of Lieut. Leigh, and of Lieuts. Alden, Blunt and May, agree in giving not more than twelve and a half feet there. Commodore Perry states further that he had, in 1847 and '48, three several surveys made of the mouth of that river; that he had himself been in and out of it several times, sounding both ways; and that his own observations, as well as the three surveys, all by different officers, agree; and that they show that more than twelve and a half feet cannot be carried into that river.

Misled by this survey, Messrs. Hargous & Co., in their memorial, last winter to Congress, state that "thirty miles of the river Coatzacoalcos is navigable for ships of the largest class." Our officers followed Moro only fifteen or twenty miles up the river (they went up as far as Mina-Titlan;) they give twelve feet only that far; he gives thirty-three—a difference of twenty-one feet. What difference they would have made for the thirty miles, we cannot say. These are vital points; points upon which the merit of the route depends, and which form serious objections to it.

Moreover, there is reason to believe that Moro took his soundings in the rainy season, when the river was swollen with a flood from the mountains. Yet, no mention is made of this fact. Now, what would be thought of an Engineer with us, who should be employed to examine the navigability of one of our rivers for the purpose of giving the public correct information as to its depth of water, with the view of connecting some internal improvement with it, and with the view of getting subscriptions to the stock upon the faith of that report; what, we repeat, would be thought of the Engineersent for instance to ascertain the navigability for ships, of the Illinois river, with the view of connecting the Mississippi through it by ship canal with the Lakes, and who should take his soundings when there was a fresh in the river, and report the depths thus obtained as the true depth?

Before the Tehuantepec route can be considered, it is incumbent upon those who advocate it as the best, to show how, and at what cost, the bar at the mouth of the Coatzacoalcos can be deepened, and also to show how a harbour can be constructed on the Pacific side of that Isthmus; and how it can be kept open after it is constructed.

The coast there resembles very much our own Southern coast; like it, it is skirted with a chain of low and narrow islands, separated by inlets or bars. Let those who think it an easy matter to make a harbor there, recollect the difficulty of forming harbors on our own shores, where they have been either closed or obstructed by the formation of bars.

This chart has been suppressed at the Hydrographical office on account of its gross errors and absurdities, and therefore it is needless to say more about it.

It is true, as stated by Hargous & Co., in their memorial to Congress that the distance of the sea voyage, from New Orleans via Tehuantepec to San Francisco is about 2000 miles less than it is by Panama. But the expense of transportation by land exceeds, per mile, that by sea some 30 or 40 times. The freight, per ton, per sea mile, on long voyages, is seldom more than at the rate of two mills per ton, and is often less. Over the rail roads of the United States it is about 5 cents, per ton per mile. These facts show that it costs no more to send a ton of merchandise 25 miles by sea than it does to send the same one mile by rail road in the United States. At least double the rates in the United States, where there are opposition lines, shops, mechanics and facilities for supplies of all sorts, should be allowed for the Tehuantepec rail-road, which is far away from shops, mechanics, supplies, &c., and which would have no opposition.

According to this, and taking the length of the Tehuantepec route at 115 miles, as stated in the memorial, it would be as cheap, as to money, to send a cargo 5,750 miles by sea as it would be to send it over the 115 miles of Tehuantepec rail-road.

But a rail-road across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec must be longer than 115 miles. In a straight line across the Isthmus, the distance from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific is 140 miles; and we have shown that the memorial, ists have not by 7 or 8 feet as much water on the bar, and not as much by 21 feet in the river as their Engineer reported, and consequently, that they cannot have their "30 miles of river navigation for ships of the largest class." A rail-road, if a rail-road be ever built there, must go from sea to sea; and, allowing for detour, its length would probably not fall short of 150 miles, which, at 10 cents per ton, per mile, would give 15 dollars as the cost of transporting a ton of merchandise from one end of this road to the other. Fifteen dollars per ton is what shippers usually pay to send their goods from New York around Cape Horn, to Chili and Peru. This route then could not at present compete with Cape Horn for the carrying trade between the two Oceans: for the expense of the sea voyage to and from Tehuantepec must still be added to the 15 dollars of rail-way transportation.

The distance across the Isthmus of Panama is but one third as great as the distance across Tehuantepec; consequently, giving each route the same rate of tolls, the freight over the Panama, compared with that over the Tehuantepec, road, would be as 5 dollars to 15 dollars, per ton. For 15 dollars the ton, goods are taken from New York around Cape Horn and landed in the ports of Chili and Peru, 13,000 miles off; and yet Tehuantepec, it is alleged, offers the more eligible route than Darien, because it cuts off 2,000 miles of the sea voyage to California. As far as California is concerned, this would be a great advantage, if there were no offsets to it. But, while it lessens the distance 2,000 miles more than the route via Panama does, it increases the expense nearly at the rate of 10 dollars more the ton on merchandise. Will our shipping merchants say it is worth 10 dollars a ton on freight to lessen a sea voyage 2,000 miles?

The mere statement of the distance to be saved does not enable one to judge correctly as to the relative merits of the two routes. Time and expense are the true arguments to consider. Time to California, and only time to California, alone is in favor of Tehuantepec; but expense in every direction, and time to all places, except California and the North, are in favor of Panama; and the gain in time to California is not sufficient to compensate shippers for the increase of expense which the Tehuantepec road would require.

The time may come when a communication across Tehuantepec would be used for transporting certain articles of commerce; but before we can form any idea as to when that time will be, we require to have of the route an examination that is worthy of confidence. We are of opinion that the want of a harbour on the Pacific—even if there were a rail-road already across—would render the communication unavailable for commerce. The “harbour” to which the proposed route is to run, is no harbour at all. It is blocked up by a bar of not more than 6 or 8 feet water—that bar and coast are Carolina like, and therefore it will be a difficult matter to deepen the bar and to keep it open. Our people, states and government have never been able to do as much with one of our own Southern bars.

When the rail-road that is to run from the Mississippi valley to California is built, and built it certainly will be, the most direct route, the shortest, in time and money, for travellers from Peru and other South American States to California, China, &c., will be via Panama, New Orleans, and the California rail-road. A rail-road across the Isthmus of Panama would be but a continuance of the Mississippi and California line to South America. At present the stream of travel sets from the United States across Panama; but, when the road to California is completed, the stream will be turned the other way, and the tide of travel from South America to the above named places will probably flow through the United States.*

Therefore we say the Panama rail-road must be built. The present generation wants it, and posterity will have it. We propose to view this measure in some of those manifold lights in which the wants of commerce and the great interest of the country hold it up before the world.

Rightly to consider it and the effects which are to arise from uniting the two oceans, it is necessary to take in review the position in respect both to the Old World and the New, of our Mediterranean, which consists of the Gulf of Mexico, with its Archipelago, the Carribean sea.

The geographical position of this sea and its shores, the size of the rivers which flow into it, the climates and the soils of their valleys, and the hand with which nature has strewed the elements of commerce among them, all conspire to make it the most useful to the greatest numbers of men and therefore the most interesting sea in the world. It is situated midway between the two Americas. Rivers whose head waters reach back north and south into the very heart of the country, run into it.

* For a full discussion as to a rail-road from the Valley of the Mississippi to California, see a letter addressed by Lt. M. F. Maury, U. S. N. to Hon. T. Butler King of Georgia. Ho. Doc. No. 596, 30th Congress, 1st Session. Also a letter from the same to Hon. Solon Borland, published in the Southern Literary Messenger for May, 1849. These two papers show in detail the difficulties in the way of Tehuantepec, and the importance of a rail-road to California. They are recommended to the attention of all our readers who take an interest,—and which of them do not take a lively interest—in the subject?

A line from the Delta of the Orinoco to the east end of Cuba, is but a thousand miles long; and yet to the west of it, lies this magnificent basin of water locked in by a continent that has on its shores the most fertile valleys of the earth; in the midst of these valleys ships may sail thousands of miles on the largest rivers that bring tribute to the Ocean. They contain the elements of dormant wealth, of national power and greatness, which it requires facility of communication with the Pacific to begin to develop, and which, when fully developed, will astonish the world. An era and an epoch in the affairs of nations will date from the opening of this communication. All and more too, that the Mediterranean is to Europe, Africa and Asia, this sea is to America and the world.

A sea is important for commerce in proportion to the length of the rivers that empty into it, and to the extent and fertility of the river-basins that are drained by it. The quantity and value of the staples that are brought down to market depend upon these. The Red Sea is in a riverless district; few are the people and small the towns along its coast. Its shores are without valleys; not a river empties into it; for there is no basin for it to drain. Commercially speaking, what are its staples in comparison with those of the Mediterranean which gives outlet to rivers that drain and fertilize basins containing not less than one million and a quarter of square sea miles of fruitful lands?

Commercial cities have never existed on the shores of the Red Sea. Commerce loves the sea, but it depends for life and health on the land. It derives its sustenance from the rivers and the basins which they drain—and increases the opulence of nations in proportion to the facilities of intercourse which these nations have with the outlets of such basins.

The river basins drained into the Gulf and Carribean Sea, greatly exceed in extent of area and capacity of production the river basins of the Mediterranean. The countries in Africa, Asia and Europe which comprise the river basins of the Mediterranean are in superficial extent but little more than one fourth the size of those which are drained by this sea in our midst. It is the Mediterranean of the New World, and nature has laid it out on a scale for commerce far more grand than its type in the Old: that is about 45° of longitude in length, by an average of 7° of latitude in breadth. Ours is broader but not so long; it is therefore more compact; ships can sail to and fro across it in much less time, and gather its articles of commerce at much less cost.

The two seas cover each about the same superforial extent, but from one extreme to the other of that of the Old World, the route is tortuous and the voyage long; it cannot be accomplished without sailing a distance quite equal to that between Europe and America. Whereas, from the most remote point in the Carribean Sea to the farthest port in the Gulf, a straight line may be drawn on the water, and the distance from one extremity to the other of it will be but little more than 2000 miles.

From the ports of the Levant and Black Sea to the ocean, a vessel under canvass requires a month or more, but from any point on the coast of this central sea of America, a vessel may be out upon the broad ocean in a few days. Winds and currents, with all the adjuvants of navigation, are here much more propitious to the mariner than they are in any other part of the world.

There is a system of perpetual currents running from the ocean into this sea, and from this sea back into the ocean. They are literally rivers in the sea, for they are as constant, and almost as well marked, as rivers on the land.

Had it been left to man to plan the form of a basin for commerce on a large scale,—a basin for the waters of our rivers and the products of our lands, he could not have drawn the figure of one better adapted for it than that of the Gulf, nor placed it in a position half so admirable.

The shores of the Mediterranean are indented by deep bays and projecting points of land which greatly lengthen the sailing distance from port to port. The sinuosities of shore lines add to the expenses of commercial intercourse. By land the distance from Genoa to Venice is that only of a few hours travel, but by water they are more than a thousand miles apart. There are no such interruptions to navigation in the Gulf of Mexico. The shortest distance from port to port there, as from New Orleans to the ports of Texas and Mexico, to Pensacola, Havana and the like, is by water.

The windings of the Mediterranean shore line, exclusive of its islands, measure 12,000 miles in length; whereas those of the Gulf and Carribean Sea do not mete out half that distance.

Ships therefore which go into the Mediterranean, have, to gather the produce which is brought down from its river basins containing less than two millions of square miles, to wind along a coast line 12,000 miles in length; whereas those which go into the Gulf of Mexico may by sailing 5000 miles reach the mouths of rivers that drain of water and surplus produce, more than four millions of square miles of fruitful plains and fertile valleys.

Easy access by sea to the mouths of rivers which drain extensive basins of rich land has always been regarded as the best basis upon which the foundations of commerce can be laid. The character and extent of the back country which supplies such outlets, are the true exponents of the commercial prosperity of the cities, and of the condition of the people who dwell there. The closer these outlets are together, and the greater the diversity of the climates drained by them, the more numerous are their products, and the more active is their commerce. Hence the commercial importance of every bay, gulf and sea of the ocean may be considered as in direct relation to the extent, variety and fertility of their river basins.

Because the Red Sea is in a riverless region it has no markets. Consequently it has, in the eye of commerce, ever been regarded as valueless in comparison to the Bay of Bengal, and the Mediterranean Sea, with their broad basins and beautiful tributaries.

Every one who takes the trouble to examine, is struck with the fact that the greatest commercial cities of the world, are and ever have been those whose merchants have been most advantageously situated with regard to the outlets, natural or artificial of great river basins and producing regions.

Rightly to perceive how admirably located and arranged for the purposes of commerce, are the Gulf and Carribean Sea, and duly to appreciate the advantages arising therefrom, let us, before comparing the river basins of America with those of Europe and Asia, or before tracing further the effects which the course of the rivers of a country, has upon its commerce, take a glance at the geographical position of this our central sea.

Curtained on the east by a chain of fruitful islands stretching from Trinidad to Cuba, it is on the north and the south and the west, landlocked by the continent which has bent and twisted around this sea, so as to fold it within its bosom and hold it midway between the two semi-continents of the New World.

In this favored position it receives on one side the mountain streamlets of a sea of islands; on another, all the great rivers of North America; and on the others the inter-tropical drainage of the entire continent.

The Atlantic Ocean circulates through this our Mediterranean. Its office in the economy of the world, is most important. It not only affords an outlet for the great American rivers, but it makes their basins habitable by giving them drainage and sending off far away into the ocean the drift and the over-heated waters which the rivers bring down. It also, through its system of cold and warm currents, makes its own shores habitable to man, tempers the climate of Europe, and by its genial warmth makes productive the soil there.

The Amazon rising in the Andes and emptying into the ocean under the line, also finds its way through the magnificent llanos and pampas of the tropics down to the margin of this sea.

In consequence of the Gulf Stream the mouth of the Mississippi is really in the Florida pass. The waters of the Amazon flow through the same channel. The great Equatorial current of the Atlantic sweeps across the mouth of this river and carries its waters into the Carribean Sea; from the Carribean Sea they flow into the Gulf of Mexico, and thence by the Gulf Stream back into the Atlantic. Such is the channel through which the waters of the Atlantic complete their circuit and are borne back into the ocean again. The distance in a straight line from the mouth of the Amazon to the Florida pass is only twenty-four hundred miles. Therefore the Amazon may very properly be regarded as one of the tributaries, and its basin as a part of the back country, to this our noble sea.

The connexion is even more close; for one mouth of the Amazon is that of the Orinoco, which empties directly into the Carribean Sea. These two streams present the anomaly of two great rivers having sources that are common. A person sailing up the Amazon, may cross over into the Orinoco, and re-enter the sea through that river without having set his foot on shore or disembarked once. The Rio Negro takes its rise from the eastern slope of the Andes, and after having run several hundred miles, it divides itself into two streams, one of which flows into the Amazon, the other into the Orinoco. This is nature's canal between them.

The Mississippi and the Amazon are the two great commercial arteries of the continent. They are fed by tributaries with navigable length of channel more than enough to encircle the globe.

This sea therefore is like a heart to the ocean. Its two divisions of Sea and Gulf perform the office of ventricles in the system of ocean circulation. Floating bodies from the region of Cape Horn, from the coast of Africa and the shores of Europe are conveyed into the Carribean Sea and thence into the Gulf of Mexico, whence its waters supplied anew with heat and motion, are again sent forth through their channels of circulation over the broad bosom of the Atlantic. To Western Europe the heated currents of this sea distribute their warmth, and then return back to their sources through the invisible channels of the deep.

We have seen that the river basins of the Mediterranean cover but little more than one-fourth the area which is drained by the streams which empty in the Central Sea of America.

That we may realize the extent of these river basins of America, let us add to those of the Mediterranean the chief river basins of Western Europe and Southern Asia, and see then if they can out-measure the valleys drained by our Mediterranean alone.

Before doing this, however, we will take a glance at the geographical features and physical condition, which regulate the size of the river basins to be considered.

It is a remarkable feature in the formation of this continent that there are no great basins in the interior without sea-drainage, and no rainless districts of any considerable extent. With one or two exceptions as the inland basin of the City of Mexico, and the Salt Lake, which comprise but small districts of country, all the water courses of America empty into the sea. The extent of country for sea drainage here is far greater than in any other part of the world. Hence we have larger valleys, valleys that are longer and broader than any in the Old World. Consequently, they collect more water, call for more drainage, and hence give rise to more and larger rivers. In the Old World there is a region of country 80° of longitude by 17° of latitude in extent, in which it never rains. Here, between the Andes and the Atlantic there is no such rainless region. The annual fall of rain between the tropics in the Old World is 6 feet; in the New World it is 11; and it is greater here than there in the temperate zones also. More than one half of all the fresh water in the world is on the continent of North America. In facts like these is found the explanation as to the cause of the surprising length and volume of many of the American rivers. Big rivers are required to drain broad valleys.

In Europe and Asia the great continental declivities are such as to leave no room for any remarkable length of river and breadth of valley.

In North America there is an immense valley between the Alleghany and the Rocky Mountains. The great Lakes form the northern edge of this valley, the entire drainage of which is therefore carried off towards the south into the Gulf of Mexico.

This is the basin of the Mississippi.

In South America the Andes skirt the western coast very closely and send off to the East a chain of mountains from Bolivia to the Atlantic coast of Brazil. These mountains divide South America into two great systems of river basins; the drainage of one is to the north and east, of the other to the south.

In the broadest part of the continent therefore, which is its northern portion, the continental slope gives rise to the first mentioned system. The district of country included in it is an immense one, the rains are heavy, and the drainage great. Hence the direction and volume of the Para, the Amazon and Orinoco. The basin which slopes to the south, is much less in extent; it is drained by the La Plata. In one part of Europe the drainage is in all directions towards the Black sea, which is sunk down in a sort of basin of its own, and receives the drainage from several quarters. But the longest slope on the sides of this basin runs up west towards the centre of the continent. Here the Danube and other draining streams which empty into the Black sea and thence into the Mediterranean, take their rise.

On the shores of this last, we have the drainage to the south which gives rise to the Rhone, &c. Europe has its Atlantic slope also, and there the rivers, as the Tagus, the Rhine and the Elbe, run west. Thus we see that the Geographical features of Europe leave no room for a Hydrological expression like that of the Amazon and the Mississippi, with their valleys.

In the interior of Asia there is a grand continental basin 85 degrees of longitude in length. It is spread out over the middle of the continent and extends from the borders of Europe to the eastern districts of China. It embraces a region of country more than four millions of square geographical miles in extent, which has no ocean drainage. In the midst of the old world, it is surrounded by steppes and mountain ranges which shut it out from the world of waters beyond. It gives rise to many large rivers as the Volga and the Oural; but they empty into the Caspian and other continental seas, which have no visible outlet or communication with the ocean. For all the great purposes of commerce, this immense and fertile basin is as blank as the desert of Sahara. Of course, then, the rivers above this basin must run north into the frozen ocean, which also is a blank as white as snow, in the book where commerce records her statistics. They embrace nearly four millions of geographical square miles.

On the south side of this inland basin, the inclination of the continental level, is towards the China seas and Indian ocean. Here then we must look for those river basins and the origin of those streams which give rise to the commerce of the east, and here accordingly we find the teeming valleys drained by the Euphrates, the Ganges and the Yangtse Kiang—all of which descend from fruitful plains, and all except the last, are open to trade and traffic with "Outside Barbarians."

The distance from the Bay of Bengal and Arabian sea, to the southern edge of this great inland basin, varies from 3 to 10 degrees of latitude, consequently the climates, through which the rivers of India flow, are limited to 10 degrees of latitude; the produce that comes down those streams for market, has no greater range of climate than that which is due a north and south line of five or six hundred miles in length. Neither can the rivers themselves be very long, nor their basins very broad, nor their volume of waters very great. Their valleys may vie in fertility with those of the Mississippi and the Amazon, but as for diversity of climate, variety of productions and navigable capacity of water courses, there is no comparison.

Let us now return to the comparison as to extent of the river basins of the old world with those under consideration in the new.

According to one of the most remarkable works of the age—Professor Johnson's Physical Atlas—the river basins in the old world, contain in geographical square miles, stated in round numbers as follows, viz.

| | |
|---|----------------------|
| Of Mediterranean Europe, | 1.160.000 sq. m. |
| Nile, - - - - | 520.000 " " |
| Euphrates, - - - | 196.000 " " |
| Indus, - - - - | 312.000 " " |
| Ganges, - - - - | 432.000 " " |
| Irawady, - - - - | 331.000 " " |
| Others of India, - | 173.000 " " |
| Those of Western Europe, as | |
| Rhine, &c. - - - | 730.000 " " |
| Total Med. India and Western Europe, | 3.854.000 " " |

Area in geographical square miles of river basins drained into the Gulf of Mexico and Carribean sea.

| | |
|--|----------------------|
| Basin of Mississippi River, | 982.000 sq. m. |
| Basins in Florida and Texas (estimated) - - - | 520.000 " " |
| Do. Mexico and Central America, do. - - - | 300.000 " " |
| Do. Amazon, - - - - | 1.796.000 " " |
| Do. Orinoco and all others of Carrib. sea, - - - | 700.000 " " |
| Total Gulf and Carrib. sea, | 4.298.000 " " |
| * Including the basin of Para. do. Medit., India and West. Europe, - - - - | 3.854.000 " " |

Difference—call it nothing, though it measures an area containing nearly half a million of square miles.

From this statement we are led to the very remarkable conclusion—and it is an important physico-commercial fact—that the area of all the valleys which are drained by the rivers of Europe which empty into the Atlantic, of all the valleys that are drained by the rivers of Asia, which empty into the Indian ocean, and of all the valleys that are drained by the rivers of Africa and Europe which empty into the Mediterranean, does not cover an extent of territory as great as that included in the valleys drained by the American rivers alone, which discharge themselves into our central sea. Never was there such a concentration upon any sea, of commercial resources. Never was there a sea known with such a back country tributary to it.

The produce which comes down the rivers of Europe, has, when, it arrives on the shores of the Atlantic, to be transported 15 or 20,000 miles to be exchanged for that which comes from the river basins of India. From the mouth of the European rivers discharging into the Atlantic ocean, the voyage to the mouth of the Asiatic rivers which run into the Indian ocean, often occupies 200 days; consequently it requires a ship more than a year to take on board a cargo from the river basins of Europe, go with it to India, exchange it, and return with the proceeds thereof to the place whence she started; so great the distance and so long the period of time which separate these two fountains of commerce.

One ship, therefore, trading between the American system of river basins, may fetch and carry, exchange and bring back in the course of one year, as many cargoes as ten ships can in the same time, convey between the remote basins of the system in the old world.

The products of the basin of the Mississippi, when they arrive at the Balize may, in 20 or 30 days, be landed on the banks of the Orinoco and Amazon. Thus in our favored position here in the new world, we have, at the distance of only a few days sail an extent of fruitful basins for commercial intercourse which they of the old world have to compass sea and land and to sail the world around to reach.

On this continent nature has been prodigal of her bounties. Here, upon this central sea, she has with a lavish hand grouped and arranged in juxtaposition, all those physical circumstances which make nations truly great. Here she has laid the foundations for a commerce, the most magnificent the world ever saw. Here she has brought within the distance of a few days, the mouths of her two greatest rivers. Here she has placed in close proximity the natural outlets of her grandest river basins. With unheard of powers of production, these valleys range through all the producing latitudes of the earth. They embrace every agricultural climate under the sun, they are capable of all variety of productions, which the whole world besides can afford. On their green bosom, rests the throne of the vegetable kingdom. Here commerce too in times to come, will hold its court.

The Mississippi comes down from the grain producing regions of the north, bearing vessels deeply laden with produce; freighted with all varieties of the fruits of the temperate zones, they convey to the sea large cargoes of merchandise, gathered from the products of the field, the forest and the mine. Hills of iron, mountains and valleys filled with coal are found on its banks. Its waters are mingled in the Gulf with those of the Amazon and Orinoco, which run between the tropics. From their basins they are ready at the bidding of civilized man to place on this sea in all variety and abundance the products of the Torrid Zone. Arrived in the Gulf with these goods, the mariner then finds a river in the sea to speed him on with its favoring currents to prosperous voyages. Through the Gulf stream the productions of this grand system of river basins will be distributed over the world, passing by and enriching as they go, Norfolk, Philadelphia, New York and Boston, all the Atlantic slope and all the Pacific slope too of the United States.

From 50° north to 20° south, the Mississippi and the Amazon take their rise. A straight line from the head waters of one to those of the other, measures a quadrant of the Globe. They afford outlets to all the producing climates of the earth. Upon this Gulf and sea, perpetual summer reigns; and upon their shores, climate is piled upon climate, production upon production, in such luxuriance and profusion that man, without changing his latitude, may, in one day, ascend from summer's heat to winter's cold, gathering as he goes the fruits of every clime, the staples of every country.

To gather such things in the old world, commerce must first plume her wings and sail in search of them through all latitudes and climates, from the extreme north to the farthest south.

In the small compass of the West India sea, are crowded together the natural outlets of the ocean, from mountains, plains and valleys, that embrace every variety of production, every degree of latitude and climate, from perpetual winter to eternal spring. The largest water courses of Europe and India, do not run through more than 10° or 15° of latitude. The greatest variety of climate possessed by the river basins of India, the Mediterranean and Atlantic Europe, is included between 10° and 55° of north latitude. Only forty-five degrees of latitude there against 70° here. There they are all in the same hemisphere, and when it is seed time in one basin, it is seed time in all; and short harvests there produce famine. Here, in the American system, we include both hemispheres—and therefore when it is seed time in one basin, it is harvest in the other.

With this blessed alternation of seasons, so near at hand and so convenient to our great sea-port towns, and avenues of trade, famine on these shores is impossible. With this American sea between the two hemispheres and in the lap of both, nature has endowed it with commercial resources, and privileges of infinite variety. Here come together and unite in one, the natural highways to the ocean, from mountains, plains and valleys teeming with treasures from the mineral, the vegetable and the animal kingdoms—nature's most princely gifts to man.

Were it given to us of this day to look down through future generations, and to see the time when the valleys of the Mississippi, the Orinoco and the Amazon shall be reclaimed, peopled and cultivated up to their capacities of production, we should behold in this system of river basins and upon this central sea of ours, a picture such as no limner can draw, no fancy can sketch. All the elements of human greatness which river, land and sea can afford, are here crowded together. For their full development, easy access to the Pacific is necessary.

The course of a river exercises important bearings upon commerce. A river that runs east or west, has no diversity of climate, its basin is between two parallels of latitude, and there is no variety of production from source to mouth, except such as is due to elevation. The husbandman who inhabits the banks of such a stream, when he descends it with his surplus produce for exchange and barter, finds on his arrival at its mouth, that he has but come to New Castle with coals only. He is there offered duplicates in exchange for what he has brought to sell; all sellers and no buyers never can make commerce brisk. Such a river may have a staple, it may be corn, it may be oil, but whatever it be, it is all they who dwell in its valley have to sell, and whatever they buy they buy with that staple. The commerce of such a basin therefore must be with other latitudes, with other climates and with regions which afford variety.

On the contrary, one who descends a river that runs north and south finds his climate changing day by day; at every turn new plants and strange animals meet his eye. He brings with him from its head-waters the furs, the cereal grains, and a variety of articles—productions of the north, to exchange for the coffee and sugar and the sweets of the south, which are gathered on its banks below.

It is the business of commerce to minister to the fancies as well as the necessities of man; she therefore delights in variety of climate and assortments of merchandize. It is owing to the diversity of climate and production afforded by the States of this Union and to the facilities of intercourse with them, that the trade of a single State, as Massachusetts, with the rest exceeds in value the entire foreign commerce of the whole country with all the world besides. The pursuits of commerce abound in secrets of high import to the happiness of man; an easy communication from the Gulf to the Pacific is the key to some of them.

The products of seventy degrees of latitude are to be found in the river basins drained by this central sea. All nations want of them; but the 600 millions of people who live on the shores that are washed by the Pacific Ocean, are excluded from them. They are barred out from this great Cornu Copia of the World, by a strip of land but a span in breadth. From the mouth of the Amazon and the delta of the Mississippi to the Isthmus of Panama, the distance in each case is less than two thousand miles. Shall this barrier forever remain in our way to the markets and the wants of six hundred millions of people? Let those who study the sources and understand the elements of true national greatness ponder this question, while we consider the effects which the course of a river has upon the character of the people who inhabit its basin.

The most superficial observer remarks the effect which the course of a river has upon the flora and fauna that inhabit its banks; as the traveller ascends an east or west stream, he finds all the way up the same fish, the same beasts, birds and reptiles. There is as little variety among those as there is among the plants and herbage upon which they feed. But along rivers whose beds lie north and south, he sees as he descends from source to mouth, entire changes in the families, species and genera both of plants and of animals.

Can it be so, that climate which with its multitudinous influences so strongly impresses itself upon the vegetation of a country, upon its beasts, birds and fishes—upon the whole face of organic nature, should produce no effect either upon the outer or the inner man! His habits depend in an eminent degree upon climate and soil, and these upon latitude; they operate upon his organization and affect his appearance; else whence the difference between the Caucasian and the Ethiopian; the Esquimaux of the north and the Aztec of the south?

The frigid zone is a niggard, yielding scanty returns to labor; there man is a beggar, and from the cradle to the grave, he has a hard struggle to snatch from the land and water the bare means of animal subsistence. He has no time for moral developments; his severe climate, with its consequently barren soil and stunted vegetation, taxes all his energies to make provision for the night of his long and dreary winter. It should not be forgotten that man in the climates of severe cold requires more food for sustenance than he does in the temperate regions; while on the other hand nature is much less generous in her sources of supply. These are based on the vegetation, which goes on decreasing in perfection and development from the Equator—where its energies are most active—to the poles, where they are most torpid. The torrid zone is most favorable for the development of vegetable as well as for purely animal life. But for man in the true nobleness of his being, the temperate zone is the place. Here he is neither pinched with hunger nor starved with cold as in the frigid, nor surfeited with plethora as in the torrid zone. Extremes are closely allied, the abundance of one and the scarcity of the other of the zones each tends rather to the development of the animal passions than of the moral attributes. The temperate zone is the happy middle for these. Here nature is not the severe task-master of the polar regions, nor the prodigal host of the tropics. She lures man to labor, and in the wholesome necessities of labor, he finds exercise and incentive to the intellectual being. Here he is surrounded with all the physical conditions most favorable to progress and improvement. Within the tropics he is enervated by the climate. Nature does not impose the necessity of severe toil there, but invites to luxury and repose; and in so doing stimulates and excites the animal propensities at the expense of moral advancement.

The facts are curious and ought to be mentioned: Not only the temperate zones, but certain places in them seem to be best adapted as the nurseries of civilization and Christianity, and therefore for the development of those faculties, attributes and qualities which distinguish and ennoble the human race most of all.

These favored spots are secluded places; they have been for the most part surrounded by mountains, and separated from the world beyond by barriers difficult to pass. They are inland basins, the most striking peculiarities of which are that they have no ocean drainage; their streams all empty into closed seas or lakes which have no visible connexion with the great salt seas that cover two-thirds of the earth's surface.

When man was created in God's own image, he was placed in the garden spot of the earth, near one of these basins, and on the banks of a river that crosses parallels of latitude and runs through varieties of climate. Here he waxed strong and became wicked, and caused God to repent of the work of creation. Then the condition of things was changed: the earth was cursed for man's sake; and after the flood, the ark was landed within an inland basin which has since had no connection by water with the ocean.

The promised land of the Israelites is another inland basin. It is so good, that as a special mark of Divine favor, Moses was permitted to look down upon it and die. It is drained by the Jordan and other streams which are shut out from the ocean. Here Christianity had its birth.

For the want of natural barriers to make their country an inland basin and to exclude them from liability to incursions from the savage hordes without, the Chinese built a wall, and under the shelter of that they attained the highest degree of civilization known among the ancients. Interference with the world during the primitive ages seems to have been unfavorable to the well-being and advancement of civilization.

It is remarkable that in the New World, there should be but two inland basins, and they the spots where the Aborigines had attained their highest degree of civilization. When compared with the whole continent, the area which these basins occupy is found to be quite inconsiderable as to size. Grants of land of larger extent on the continent have been made to single individuals. The Incas of Peru and the Aztecs of Mexico each dwelt in inland basins. The basin of the sealed lake Titicaca is the only inland basin of South America; and with the exception of the great salt basin, the basin of Mexico is the only one in North America from which there is no outlet to the ocean. Each of those basins is partly within the tropics, but their elevation above the level of the sea is such as to give them the climate, the flora, and the fauna with all the advantages and conditions of the temperate zones. More striking examples as to the effect of geographical conditions upon the character of man could scarcely be mentioned.

But civilization has now attained a growth which no longer requires the shelter of the mountains and their fastnesses to protect it from the rude shocks of savage man and his blighting passions. It now delights in free intercourse among nations, and flourishes best where commerce is most active and institutions are most liberal. The history of civilization in its early stages is that of a tender plant, which, while young, requires the protection and shelter of the hot-bed; but which, after it has attained a certain degree of vigor, thrives best in the open air. Since the transplanting of civilization from its secluded valleys it has attained a vigorous growth; under its shadow liberty finds shelter, man safety, and nations freedom of intercourse. Its seeds and its fruits have been borne to distant lands on the wings of commerce. Its branches reach all parts of the habitable globe.

There is this further analogy; as the plant which has been nurtured in the green-house acquires the power to withstand the vicissitudes of the open field, the conditions of the nursery become less and less adapted to its habits and the promotion of its vegetable health. It cannot, therefore, after having acquired in the grove the magnitude and habits of the forest tree, flourish in the green-house again. It will pine away there and die, or at least it will cease to thrive. So with the moral and the intellectual culture of man. These inland basins seem to have been not only most favorable to its early development, but after civilization acquired the strength to advance beyond its green-house in the mountains, it seems to have acquired organs and powers, for the unfolding and growth of which the conditions of secluded valleys were altogether unfavorable.

The people who now inhabit the river basin of the Jordan have fallen back into a semi-barbarous state. Neither can the basin of Mexico nor the shores of the Peruvian lake any longer be considered as the seat of the highest degree of civilization in the New World.

Considering the small area of these inland basins in comparison with the extent of the whole earth, it cannot be that chance should have made them the nurseries of civilization. Effects here as elsewhere must have their causes; mere coincidences would be miraculous. It would be interesting and profitable too to trace out those physical conditions, cosmical arrangements and terrestrial adaptations peculiar to those places and which must have been especially favorable for the development of those traits and attributes of man, which, when fully matured, are destined perhaps to make him only a little lower than the angels of heaven.

"As the external face of continents," says Humboldt, "in the varied and deeply indented outline of their coasts, exercises a beneficial influence on climate, trade and the progress of civilization, so also in the interior, its variations of form in the vertical direction, by mountains, hills and valleys, and elevated plains have consequences no less important. Whatever causes diversity of form or feature on the surface of our planet—mountains, great lakes, grassy steppes and even deserts surrounded by a coast line margin of forest—impresses some peculiar mark or character on the social state of its inhabitants."

Our lofty mountain chains and majestic water courses, have served, according to the same great philosopher, to furnish a more beautiful and rich variety of individual forms and to rescue the face of the continent from that dreary uniformity which tends so much to impoverish both the physical and intellectual powers of man.

Had the Missouri river, after taking its rise under the Rocky Mountains, and uniting with the Mississippi, held its course eastward until their waters were emptied in Long Island Sound, how different would have been the present condition of these United States; had the drainage of the country been in this direction, the Gulf of Mexico would have been as a stagnant pool, and we should have been as indifferent to New Orleans and the purchase of Louisiana, as we now are to Merida and Yucatan. Because the Mississippi river runs from the north to the south, it is one among the strongest of the bonds which hold this Union of States together.

All the great rivers of the United States, lie wholly within the temperate zone. Their basins are spread out under climates which call for the highest energies of man. Dwelling in such regions, he is constrained to be diligent; to labor; to be prudent; to gather into barns; to study the great book of nature; to observe her laws; and whilst it is summer to take thought for winter.

The perpetual summer of the tropics presents no such alternatives. On the same tree may be seen the bud, the flower, and the ripe fruit. Here, therefore, nature urges no such necessities, imposes no such tasks, and savage man is as careless of the morrow as are the lilies of the field. The people of the two climates are therefore different. Frequent intercourse between them will improve the character of each, and the most ready channels for such communication are afforded by the rivers that run north or south. With the exception of the Nile, the general direction of all the rivers of Africa, is east or west, and not one of their valleys, except the valley of the Nile, has ever been the abode of civilized man.

Civilized society can not be stationary. Vacuity is not more abhorrent to nature, than is a state of rest, either in the moral or the physical world. The materials of the latter she has divided into ponderables and imponderables, and invested them with antagonistic principles. By the action of light, heat and electricity upon ponderable matter; "the morning stars were first made to sing together;" the earth is clothed with verdure; the waves lift up their voices, and the round world is made to rejoice.

She has divided the former into animal and spiritual; and they are antagonistics,—the one elevating, the other depressing man in the scale of being. When his course ceases to be upward and onward, the spirit yields to the animal, virtue gives way to vice, the force of evil prevails, and the course of men in their social state is no longer onward and upward, but backward and downward. The sphere that lags behind in its course, is hurled from its orbit. History bears witness to the fact, that when nations cease to rise, they begin to fall. The laws of nature are her agents; they cannot act and be still; action implies motion; nature herself is all life and motion; she knows no rest, brooks no pause either for her moral or her physical agents.

Wise men say that she has attached a curse to standing still. This is German philosophy; but the idea is beautiful because it is true. We want the stimulants to energy, the incentives to enterprise, which a highway across the Isthmus is to give, to urge us on to the high destinies that await us. The energies of the country are great; they require some such highway to the Pacific to give them scope and play.

It is for time, and time alone, to decide the question as to whether the highest degree attainable by man in the social scale, will not first be reached by those people who, with the blessings of free institutions, live on rivers that run north or south through the Temperate Zone.

On account of this central sea, and its system of winds and currents; on account of the course of the rivers which run into it and of the direction of mountain ranges that traverse the continent and on account of the character and extent of the river basins and other geographical features with us, the Old World affords no parallel either in history or example by which to judge of the destinies of this country. Our mountain ranges are longer, our rivers are more majestic, our valleys are broader, our climates are more varied, our productions are more diversified here, than they are there.

The wheat harvest on the Lower Mississippi commences in June; and in the Upper Country, Christmas is at hand before the corn crop is all gathered in. Thus we have in the Valley of this majestic water-course a continued succession of harvests during more than half the year. In the other hemisphere, the seasons are reversed; and on the banks of the Southern tributaries to our central sea, reapers are in the field during the remainder of the year. A sea, which is the natural outlet to market of the fruits of regions where seasons are reversed, and the harvest is perennial, is no where else to be found.

Such advantages, both moral and physical, such means of power, wealth and greatness as have been vouchsafed to us, no nation has ever been permitted to enjoy. We have already more works of internal improvement, a greater length of rail-road and canal, built and building, and of river courses open to navigation,—more of the buds and blossoms of true greatness,—than all the world besides.

In these facts we see the effect of geographical features, as well as of free institutions.

As a general rule our rail roads and rivers are at right angles in their courses. In the New England States, where the rivers run South, the rail roads run East and West; in the Middle and Southern States, where the water courses run eastwardly, the rail-roads take a more northwardly direction. Rivers run from the mountains to the sea. Rail-roads run across the mountains. They go from valley to valley.

In calculating the sources of national wealth, prosperity and greatness which are contained, for this country, in river basins, central sea, mountain ranges, water courses and geographical features, the lights of history are of no avail. The canvass is prepared and the easel ready, but colors that are bright enough for the picture cannot be found. The exceeding great resources of our Mediterranean beggar description.

We know that other places, with the elements of commerce in far more scanty proportions, with facilities less abundant and obstacles far greater, have grown opulent and obtained renown in the world: while one calls to mind the history of such places, he feels that here is room and scope enough for individual wealth, far more dazzling, for national greatness far more imposing, and a renown far more glorious.

From all this we are led to the conclusion that the time is rapidly approaching, if it has not already arrived, when the Atlantic and Pacific must join hands across the Isthmus. We have shown that there is no sea in the world which is possessed of such importance as this southern sea of ours; that with its succession of harvests there is, from some one or other of its river-basins, a crop always on the way to market;—that it has for back country a continent at the north and another at the south, and a world both to the east and the west; we have shown how it is contiguous to the two first, and convenient to them all. The three great outlets of commerce, the Delta of the Mississippi, the mouths of the Hudson and the Amazon, are all within 2,000 miles, 10 days sail of Darien. It is a barrier that separates us from the markets of 600 millions of people—three fourths of the population of the earth. Break it down, therefore, and this country is placed mid-way between Europe and Asia; this sea becomes the centre of the world, and the focus of the world's commerce. This is a highway that will give vent to commerce, scope to energy and range to enterprise, which in a few years hence will make gay with steam and canvass parts of the ocean that are now unfrequented and almost unknown. Old channels of trade will be broken up and new ones opened. We desire to see our own country the standard bearer in this great work.

The rail-road across the Isthmus of Panama, will speedily lead to the construction of a ship canal between the two oceans, for a rail-road can not do the business which commerce will require of it, and by showing to the world how immense this business is, men will come from the four quarters to urge with purse and tongue the construction of a ship canal.

The two shores of the Atlantic have been brought nearer together, but by means quite different from those proposed for uniting those of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans. In both cases there is a saving of time with increased facilities of commerce. The Atlantic has been narrowed so as practically to bring America within two weeks of Europe, instead of leaving them as many months apart, as they formerly were. Whether this has been done by rail-road or canal, or by the improvements of the age and the enterprise of man, the effect so far as the saving of time and the advantages to intercourse resulting therefrom, is the same.

We therefore propose to call to mind the benefits that our people and the world have derived in consequence of bringing the two shores of the Atlantic closer together, that we may the better judge as to the effects of the proposed connexion with the Pacific.

Rightly to appreciate these benefits which it required ages to bestow, it is necessary to contrast our present condition with what it would have been under the old state of things, when "coward commerce" crept along the frightful shores and scarce had nerve or strength of wing to venture out upon the blue water—when ships were tubs at sea, that found it as much as they could do to average fifty miles a day, even under a press of canvass—and when, for the want of roads and canals, the fruits of the earth could only with great difficulty and expense be conveyed to market. Less than 200 years ago, the roads in England were so bad, the difficulties of communication so great, that entire crops were sometimes suffered to rot in one place, while in another place, distant only a few miles, the supply fell far short of the demand.* No marvel then that plagues, pestilence and famine were common in those days; and that great nations were eager to have access by sea to the mouths of large rivers;—for navigable rivers were, and still are, the most ready channels for conveying the surplus produce of their basins to market.

What would the commerce of the country now be worth? what would its maritime consequence, its wealth, its power, its greatness now be, in comparison to what they are, had the passage of the Atlantic been as tedious, the difficulties in navigating it as great, and the obstacles in the way of trade and commerce as formidable now, both by land and water, as they were a century back? The very causes which have contributed to remove them and to shorten the passage across the Atlantic, are so important, by reason of their effects, upon the condition of men and nations, that the great Humboldt, in his admirable Cos-mos, considers them as constituting an epoch in the history of the universe.

According to him, the discoveries and improvements of navigation—the use of the compass, the variation of the needle—the log, chronometers, the means of determining the place of a ship at sea, improvements in ship-building, the introduction of steam in ocean navigation, and the like, ought all to be regarded as exerting a favorable influence in bringing within the reach of civilization and the christian religion, all parts of the earth's surface, and in shaping the fortunes of men—the destinies of nations. These causes have been ages in producing their effects, and the epoch is spread over centuries; the obstacles which ignorance and prejudice, the trammels which unwise laws and blighting monopolies place in the way of commerce, had all to be removed, before the passage of the Atlantic could be narrowed down to its present limits. But here the means are different; a continent is to be cut in twain, and the four quarters of the globe are to be brought in closer proximity per saltum. The task is easier. The people are ripe for it: the husbandman who supplies commerce with her staples, is enlightened and free; mechanics are all powerful with their achievements; the principles of free trade have gained strength; the blossoms of civilization sheltered by wise laws and free institutions have unfolded themselves vigorously; every thing conspires to make the work easy.

Progression and improvement are the order of the day; instead of throwing obstacles in the way of commerce the spirit of the age demands for it every facility that is calculated to promote friendly contact and free intercourse among nations.

Great revolutions in trade are to follow the separation of the two parts of the continent whether by rail-road or ship canal. Let us consider some of the most obvious results, but by no means, therefore, the most important, that are to arise from it.

At present the whale fishery is the most important branch of business which the citizens of the United States carry on over the waters of the Pacific. The floating capital annually employed in it does not fall much short of fifteen millions of dollars.

It so happens that we have cruised over the Pacific for a number of years, that we have seen much of the whalers, and enjoyed rare opportunities of obtaining statistics and other information touching this interest.

Here is some of it:

According to the Whalemens' Shipping List of January 9th 1849, published at New Bedford, there are at this time out upon the high seas, a whaling fleet of 613 sail, carrying, in round numbers, 200,000 tons. We subjoin a comparative statement drawn from the same authority as to the quantity of bone and oil, (sperm and right) imported for the last nine years.

* Macaulay's History of England.

| | Bbls. Spm. | Bbls. Wh. | Lbs. Bone. |
|-----------------------------|-------------------|------------------|-------------------|
| Imports for 1848, | 107.976 | 208.856 | 2,008.000 |
| " 1847, | 120.753 | 313.150 | 3,341.680 |
| " 1846, | 95.217 | 207.493 | 2,276.939 |
| " 1845, | 157.917 | 272.730 | 3,167.142 |
| " 1844, | 139.594 | 262.047 | 2,532.445 |
| " 1843, | 166.985 | 206.727 | 2,000.000 |
| " 1842, | 165.637 | 161.041 | 1,600.000 |
| " 1841, | 159.204 | 297.348 | 2,000.000 |
| " 1840, | 157.791 | 207.908 | 2,000.000 |
| Total for 9 years, | 1,271.174 | 2,047.300 | 20,926.206 |
| Average for 9 years, | 141.242 | 225.456 | 2,324.578 |

The present value of Sperm Oil is $1.40 per gallon, but usually about $1, equal to $32 per bbl. The value of Whale $10.50 per bbl., and of bone 33cts per lb., equal to $4,519.744 for the average of sperm; $2,472.288 for whale; and $367.110 for bone. Total, $7,356.142 annually fished up out of the sea. This is a sum far greater than that which is annually gathered for commerce out of all of our magnificent forests.

We are not able to state the precise number of vessels employed in the Pacific, or how much of this seven millions and a third should be credited to that ocean, though in 1846 there were 292 vessels fishing on the North West Coast alone, and they took while there 253,500 bbls. of oil. We may safely assume that two thirds of the whole number of vessels engaged are employed in the Pacific; and that three fourths of the oil taken, comes thence, for the vessels in the Pacific are larger than those in the Atlantic fishery. This would give for the Pacific, in round numbers, 400 vessels, yielding annually five millions and a half of money!

The cost of outfit and vessels for this fleet is about $28,000 per vessel; the average length of a voyage (mean of Right and Sperm Whalers) is three years; of which one third is lost in going to and returning from the whaling grounds, laying in port to recover, refresh, &c., leaving but two years of actual fishing, or eight months in twelve.

The rate of insurance upon vessels and outfits is 3 per cent per annum; and the legal interest upon the money invested in ships and outfits, which make no return until the end of the voyage, is 6 per cent.

The loss of oil, by leakage is five per cent during the voyage.

Now Panama is on the confines of one of the most valuable whaling grounds in the Pacific. In that vicinity and near the Gallapagos islands, the sperm whale resorts in large numbers, and if a rail-road or ship canal were constructed across that Isthmus, it would vastly benefit this interest in which there is a floating capital greater than that employed in all our commerce with China and the ports and countries bordering on the Pacific and Indian Oceans put together.

If this oil, then, instead of remaining on board the vessel from one to two years (for that which is taken the first year, remains on board two years, and that which is taken the second, one year) as dead capital, could be sent home across the Isthmus at reasonable tolls, the gain would be great, for there would be a saving of both time and substance: the leakage would amount to but 1 per cent., instead of 5;—half the time at least that is now employed in consequence of having to desert the whales to cooper the oil, refit and refresh, would be saved;—the whaling year might be made to consist of 10 instead of 8 months, with of course a proportional increase of profits on the original outlay for the additional two months of fishing;—the vessels employed in the business, instead of being large ships capable of holding 2,800 bbls.—the proceeds of three years—would be small ships capable of holding only one year's gathering;—and the cost of smaller vessels, say of one third the size of those now employed, instead of running up to $28,000 each for vessel and outfit, would by a liberal estimate be brought down within half that sum.

Estimating the charge per ton for storage, freight and handling at the enormous rate of $20, or $2 per bbl. across the Isthmus (this is 20 cents per ton per mile, over rail-road) and the freight thence to the United States, to be $1 per bbl., or $10 per ton, the following comparative statement is obtained in illustration of the importance to this interest alone of such a communication.

Cost, outfits and expenses of vessels employed on a three years whaling voyage in the Pacific Ocean.

| | |
|---|--------------|
| Cost of 400 vessels of 2800 bbls. at $28,000 | $11,200,000 |
| 6 per cent interest on same, for one year, | 672,000 |
| 3 " " insurance, " " | 336,000 |
| 10 " " wear and tear on costs and outfits, | 1,120,000 |
| Two years interest on $1,833,333 being one-third of the value of the oil taken during 3 years, of which one-third is kept on board ship as dead capital for two years, | 220,000 |
| One year's interest on the oil taken 2nd year, | 110,000 |
| Leakage being 4 per cent on $5,500,000 | 220,000 |
| Annual average disbursement per ship, $2,000 | 800,000 |

Original outlay and expenses for one year's whaling in the Pacific, $14,678,000

Credits and Receipts.

| | |
|--|--------------|
| Value of vessels and outfits after one year's wear and tear, | $10,080,000 |
| Value of cargoes returned, | 5,500,000 |
| | 15,580,000 |

Gross profits, $902,000

Per contra, supposing a communication across the Isthmus and the whaling business to be revolutionized, by the substitution of vessels of one-third the present size and half the cost, and by sending the oil home once a year.

| | |
|---|-------------|
| Cost of 400 vessels of 933 tons at $14,000, | $5,600,000 |
| 6 per cent interest on same for one year, | 336,000 |
| 3 " " insurance, | 168,000 |
| 10 " " wear and tear, | 560,000 |
| Annual disbursements per ship, $1,000, | 400,000 |
| Loss by leakage, 1 per cent on $6,875,000, | 68,750 |
| Freight, &c., over rail-road of 48,540 tons, at $20 per ton, | 970,800 |
| " thence home, at $10 per ton, | 485,400 |

| | |
|--|-------------|
| Original outlay and expenses of whaling one year, and sending proceeds home by Panama rail-road, | $6,588,950 |
|--|-------------|

Credits and Receipts.

| | |
|---|--------------|
| Value of vessels and outfits, deducting one year's wear and tear, $5,040,000 | |
| Value of bone and oil collected by fishing 10, instead of 8 months, 6,875,000 | $11,915,000 |

| | |
|------------------------------|-------------|
| Gross profits via rail-road, | $3,326,050 |
| do. do. around Cape Horn, | 902,000 |

| | |
|--|-------------|
| Margin in favor of Panama rail-road, on account of the whaling business, | $2,424,050 |
|--|-------------|

Two millions and a half is a large margin; but there is room here for a large margin. Whether the national wealth would be increased to the full extent of it or not, it is evident from the exhibit, that the communication in reference to this one interest alone, is of sufficient national importance and magnitude to command the most attentive consideration. The prospect of gain, is, to say the least, inviting.

It has been the policy and practice of the United States, acknowledged at an early day and carried out for many years to encourage nurseries for seamen; with this view bounties are given to the cod and mackerel fishermen; and the sum paid them from first to last as "fishing bounties," would be quite sufficient to lay double tracks of rail-road across the Isthmus. The whale fishery is by far a more valuable nursery than those of the grand banks of Newfoundland for seamen, and it has never received any bounties or direct encouragement whatever. It has been left very much to itself. Some of our readers will recollect the fact and we mention it in this communication with some feelings of pride, that "Old Ironsides" and the "United States," in the last war, were both manned and fought principally by Marblehead men; New England whalers they were.

Neither Tehuantepec nor a rail-road from the valley of the Mississippi to California, would afford the whalemens the advantages gained by this route; and this is a hardy, adventurous and interesting class of our fellow citizens; are they not worthy of public consideration?

Other great interests of state no less than this, require such legislation as the constitution allows and as is necessary to secure the early completion of the road.

There be those who clamor for protection—and those again who preach the doctrine of free trade. Both classes may meet on this highway to the Pacific, and each may there occupy its own ground. For while it would protect home industry, it would also advance free trade. Nature may as effectually as legislation protect certain branches of industry, for when she places obstacles across the roads to market, she lays a tariff on the merchandize passing over them, by the amount which it has to pay to overcome these obstacles. Taking this view, all roads, canals and internal improvements, may be regarded as modifications which free trade and its advocates have made upon the tariffs that nature imposes upon traffic.

Southern people have watched with interest the attempts made in India by England to rival them in the cultivation of cotton, and Southern people have breathed more freely as she has met with failure after failure. They cry free trade—and yet by failing to give their countenance to well laid plans for uniting the two oceans, they are not only assisting to perpetuate the tariff which nature, by the obstacles she has placed in the way, has imposed upon commerce with the Pacific, but they are fostering a rival interest in opposition to their own great staple.

Mexico is protecting the manufacture of coarse cottons, known as tucuyos—and is seeking by this means to make Guadalajara her Lowell. Formerly the raw material from this country was sent there around Cape Horn. Cotton is indigenous to Peru. There it bowls and opens all the year, and our merchants have discovered that by encouraging the Peruvians in the cultivation of this staple, it is to their interest to send other cargoes in their ships around Cape Horn, exchange them for the cotton of Payta and Lambayeque, and take that to Guadalajara. During the last year ten thousand bales were taken from these two ports by American ships alone to Mexico.

This is quite as great as the exports of cotton from the United States were fifty years ago, and the demand is on the increase. It is dangerous to foster in a foreign country any rivalry, however humble in the beginning, to great national staples.

The freight on cotton around Cape Horn to Mexico is $25 the ton; with this Panama rail-road, it would be from New Orleans less than one third that sum. We call this freight around Cape Horn nature's tariff, for it is as effective in obstructing trade, as though it was written on the statute book.

In consequence of it, the cotton of Peru meets that of Carolina in the West Mexican markets with the advantage of more than a half a cent the pound—which is ample protection. The southern planter therefore who opposes the opening of a communication across the Isthmus is unwittingly fostering and giving protection to a foreign and a rival interest.

Costa Rica, on the Pacific, produces sugar and the finest of coffee. They are exported to Chili and Peru. The voyage around Cape Horn and other conditions of commerce exclude them from our markets. A rail-road across the Isthmus would bring New Orleans within two weeks of these coffee and sugar plantations. Thus it would carry the principles of free trade there, encouraging competition with the coffee of Brazil and the sugar of the West Indies. Such are the results which the protectionist of home industry seeks to accomplish, and such are the results which the free trader advocates, and therefore, as before remarked, each in advocating a great highway over the Isthmus, stands on his own grounds.

We have investigated the subject of freights around Cape Horn, and have collected statistics that we might form an opinion as to the probable cost of the transportation of merchandise via Panama rail-way and via the "The Horn" to the ports of the Pacific, say to Lima in Peru. We have supposed the freight over the Panama road will be at least double the usual rates in this country, and have taken it as at 10 cents per ton per mile. The conclusion is, that a cargo of merchandise can be sent from New York via Panama to Lima in one fourth the time and for less than half the money that it now takes to send it around Cape Horn.

Here are the facts, the statistics and estimates from which this conclusion is drawn. The sailing distance from New York to Lima, via Cape Horn, is 13,000 sea miles—the time four months, the freight $15, or one mill and fifteen hundredths of a mill per ton per mile.

The distance, via Panama, exclusive of the 45 miles of rail-road, is 3,700* and the time 30 days.

The average value of a ton of merchandize is supposed to be $250, on which three month's interest is charged for the excess of the Cape Horn passage.

Comparative statement as to the cost of freight per ton from New York to Lima.

| | | |
|--|--------------------------|--------|
| 13,000 miles at 1.15 mill, | Via Cape Horn. | Panama |
| Interest on $250 for 3 mo. 6 pr. ct. 3.75 | 45 m. R. R. 10 cts. 4.50 | |

| | |
|---------|--------|
| $18.75 | $8.75 |
| 8.75 | |

Difference in favor of R. R. $10.00

* 3,700, which is less than the distance by canvass from Charleston to Liverpool.

There are eight millions of people inhabiting the Pacific coast—all of them want things that we have to sell. They are four or five months removed from us; this road would bring them within 30 days.

For those of them who travel, the route to California and to China, would be across the Isthmus this way, to New Orleans, thence up the Mississippi to the California rail-road. This when opened, will be their shortest and best travelling route to California, China and India. And unless both the California and Panama routes be established, the line of travel between the Pacific shores of North and South America, never can be brought through the United States. These two roads are links in the same line and when once completed, the world cannot prevent all the South American travel from coming this way.

We see Cities and States pushing forward rival schemes of internal improvements, and setting up opposition after opposition to bring travel their way. They consider themselves rewarded when they secure the business between places containing a few thousand people engaged in traffic. This Panama improvement would bring us the travel from countries inhabited by millions and send it through the length and breadth of the land, dispensing national, sectional and particular benefits all the way. The advantages that business and travel scatter on the way side of their great thoroughfares, are and ever have been objects of desire with the greatest nations as well as with the smallest corporations. Here they are offered to us on a scale grand in proportion to the water courses, mountain ranges, lakes and river basins of the new world, and sublime in proportion to its free institutions. The rail-road will build a ship canal across the Isthmus of Panama, upon the same principle that one internal improvement in our own country begets another. How many rail-roads has the Erie Canal caused to be built, that but for that improvement would not now be in existence?

In the same way the Panama rail-road will stimulate commerce with the Pacific, and by showing the amount of business to be done, men of business will see and be satisfied that the road is insufficient and a ship canal is necessary.

In our poor judgment it is wise, prudent, constitutional and right that the federal government should encourage this undertaking, so far at least as encouragement may be necessary to secure its early completion.

Magnets and electrical batteries have their positive and negative poles, some questions have negative and positive sides; and this is one of them. Suppose this rail-road to Panama were already built, it is immaterial by what agency, and that this country were in the actual enjoyment of all the great advantages that are to flow from it. Suppose now that some power were to attempt to snatch these advantages out of our hands and to deprive us of them; the nation would rise up in arms; the vile coffers for keeping filthy lucre in, and the precious caskets in which the jewels of the land are concealed, would be broken open and their contents scattered, as though both life and money had lost their value.

There is nothing that the country would not do to preserve these advantages after once having tasted them, and, according to some, there is nothing she ought to do to get them before she has tried them. Such are the negative and positive sides of this question. We give nothing to get, that's unconstitutional; but having got, we give every thing to keep—and that is constitutional.

We find the Constitution in the general welfare of the people, in the common defence of the country and in the elements of domestic tranquillity.

Books and wise men teach and tell us that "law is the perfection of reason." We know that the Constitution is founded on the everlasting principles of right, tempered by the spirit of compromise.

The humblest freeholder in the land has the right of way from his homestead to the common highway. The law secures to him a way through the estates, if need be, of his neighbor to market. It is a fundamental principle of civilized society, and one upon which the peace and harmony of all communities and neighborhoods essentially depend, that no man has a right to hem his neighbor in and shut him out from free communication with the common highways and the markets of the world.

Have not the people of the United States in their national character, a like privilege? Else why did their government treat with a neighboring nation for the right of way across the Isthmus? Their possessions are far remote from one point to another; the way to them is circuitous and remote, passing through latitudes where the seasons are reversed, the skies are changed, and where both day and night are lengthened out into the dreary alternation of the polar seasons. Shall they continue to pass through the cheerless latitudes, to brave the dangers of the stormy cape, and to sail twenty thousand miles and more to reach a part of their own country, when by the construction of a road a few miles in length, the journey may be confined to our own hemisphere, the distance may be reduced from 20,000 to 5,000 miles and the time may be brought down from months to weeks.

With what show of reason, with what consistency of argument, can it be maintained, that although there be in this government the power to treat for a road to market through foreign territory, the power to guarantee the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama and the free right of way across it to all nations, yet there is no power under the Constitution to encourage the construction of a commercial highway there—no principle of action or rule of conduct known to the federal government by which it can render that guaranteed right of way, a right practicable to its own citizens and available for its own great and manifold purposes? The principle of "the greatest good to the greatest number" is one of the pillars of the Constitution.

"Of all inventions," says Macaulay, "the alphabet and the printing press alone excepted, those inventions which abridge distance have done most for the civilization of our species." Every improvement, by which time or distance from place to place is lessened, benefits mankind morally and intellectually, as well as physically; not only facilitates the interchange of the various productions of nature and art, but tends to remove national and provincial antipathies, and to bind together all the branches of the great human family. Dragon's teeth would not be sown in this our day, that nations might reap therefrom harvests of steel-clad warriors; those seeds are now most esteemed that bring forth the engines of peace and civilization. No nation has scattered them with a more liberal hand than this. The people of the United States are the only people who have expended more of their treasure for works of improvement than on the engines of blood and destruction. The consequences that are to result from the breaking down of the barrier between the two oceans, are vast and important. It is an achievement the effects of which upon the industry of this country our children will class with the effects of the steam-engine and the cotton-gin.

It is an achievement easy of accomplishment; and it is an achievement from which vast consequences to civilization are to follow; and it is an achievement so fraught with increased prosperity and greatness for our country, that we earnestly desire to see it undertaken speedily, that we may have the privilege of witnessing in our day some of its glorious results.

Other times will call for other and additional channels of communication. No one can doubt it, for there is wealth for the world on the margin of our sea, and treasures, inexhaustible treasures scattered over its magnificent system of river basins, that will induce other nations to break through Panama, Nicaragua and Tehuantepec, were each "twenty times" an Isthmus. At present, we want to get to other people across it.

The time will come, when they will want to come to us. But that time is not yet.

There is a classic and a sacred duty which makes it incumbent upon this nation above all others to cause a commercial highway to be opened across the continent between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. An unknown voice told Columbus in a dream, on that Isthmus, that God had made his name great in the earth, and had sent him to "unbar the gates of ocean."* He was not permitted to realize the idea closest to his heart and to show that the nearest way to India lies through the Carribean Sea; nevertheless he executed his high commission and "unbarred the gates of ocean," but the gate across the land has never been unlatched; the office and the honor of throwing it wide open that the commerce of the world may pass through—we claim for the people of this nation. The task commends itself to their feelings, to their spirit and their enterprise, and in this our day-dream, a voice whispers us—it must be done.

* The voice said—"Maravillosamente Dios hizo sonar tu nombre en la tierra; de los atamientos de la mar Oceana, que estaban cerradas con cadenas tan fuertes, le dió las llaves.

THE PEARL.

BY GRETТА.

PART FIRST.

Come, maiden with the glowing cheek,
Bright maiden with the sunny glance,
Let us yon leafy bower seek
And leave awhile the festive dance.
Let the music rise and fall and float,
Eddying in many a rippling note,
And the dancers whirl in the dizzy round
Led by the fairy troops of sound;
Let the laugh ring out right merrily
And the bright lips quiver with repartee,—
But we will leave the noise and glare
To seek the purer open air;
For the still cold moon, the calm pale stars,
High throned above all mortal jars,
The solemn night, and the dewy air
Wet with the tears of spirits at prayer—
Earnestly praying for this dull earth,
Where their mortal bodies had their birth—
Have strange, mysterious influences
To open the spirit and shut the senses.

And I have a tale of the olden time—
A simple tale, and a simple rhyme—
To breathe in thy listening ear,
Which I pray thee heed, for a warning rings
In unison with my lyre's weak strings.
It may touch thy heart to hear!

My partial eye, oh maiden bright,
Has rested on thee all this night;
It marked thy cold, averted look,
It marked the mien that ill could brook
That one should seek thy side,
And, though uncall'd, unwelcome there,
Still whisper the forbidden prayer
That thou wouldst be his bride.
It saw thee turn in scorn away,
To waste thy smiles on one more gay—
And it saw the poisoned, rankling dart
Pass through and through that lone one's heart,
As you gaily laugh'd—"No art is thine
To win this young warm love of mine."

Thou call'st this lover cold and stern
And solemn as a funeral urn,
But ah! thine eye has not discerned
The truth that in his heart has burned,
Like the bright lamp whose constant ray
Glows ever in the inmost shrine,
Seen but by those, who day by day
Pray where its faint beams shine.
Then, lady, listen, while I sing
About a maiden fair,
Who was, like thee, in life's young spring,
Like thee as strange to care.
Come rest awhile, and lend thy smile
A moment to my strain,
Ere in yon room, like soft perfume,
It falls on all again.

In the olden time, the olden time,
When earth was in her summer's prime;
And the stars that lend their silvery gleam
Were nearer men than now they seem;
When all was bright as childhood's day;
And life was one immortal May;
And the young roses, withered now,
Were fresh as morning's cloudless brow;
And old romance that's only known
In these dull days by carved stone,
Or canvass, or remembered song,
Was then as vigorous as young;
When fairies lived in every dell;
And spirits guarded every well;
And angels blessed the solitude,
And drowned the shadows of the wood
In floods of radiance rained from heaven;
And blessings were to mortals given
Now all unknown—sweet interviews
With the celestial hosts that use
To bathe in that melodious river
O'er heavenly plains that murmur ever,
And foretastes of that sweet Elysian
Caught now and then in blissful vision,
And converse with the mighty powers
Who rule this universe of ours—
Then in morning's balmy hour
A virgin roved adown the vale
Near where a castle's rock-built tower
Gave out its banner to the gale.
Oh she was fair, this youthful maid,
Her dark eyes beamed with hope and glee,
Her step was light along the glade,
Her song as woodland warbler's free;
And when Aurora's rosy ray
Poured o'er the scene the flush of day,
She seemed like Hebe, young and bright,
When first she to the gods was given,
Bathed in the glorious golden light,

Of Greece's old Olympian heaven.
 Close at her side a manly youth
 Walk'd pensively because, in sooth,
 He loved, and was not loved again,
 No gentle smile of greeting shone
 When he appeared, to lure him on,
 Or soothe his bosom's pain ;
 When absent, still no gentle tone
 Would sadly ask where he had gone,
 And had his spirit left the earth
 A sigh would scarce have chid the mirth.

But, like the star whose constant ray
 Beams ever o'er the Norseman's plains,
 Nor heeds the boat that far away
 Watch o'er the flowery South's domains,
 So he, for weary days and years,
 Had hovered near this cold one's side,
 His bosom torn with hopes and fears,
 The rivalry of Love and Pride.
 And when at last his struggling heart,
 No more could act this silent part ;
 And pent up Love refused to dwell
 A prisoner in his secret cell ;
 And words broke forth, tho' all too cold,
 To tell what had been never told—
 Oh how the jerring laugh he heard
 The deep founts of his being stirred,
 Though she who scorned that love to share
 Knew nothing of the conflict there.

And why was this ? The youth was brave,
 Of noble race, but cold and grave
 In midst of jollity ;—
 He could not, like the courtly throng,
 Flatter with false and sippant tongue,
 Nor, like the roving bee,
 From each bright flower-lip snatch a kiss,
 Then fly to seek a newer bliss,
 To dally with as short a time :—
 He would have deemed such roving crime,
 When once his constant heart had bowed
 To her, as to a saint divine,
 Though scarcely marked amid the crowd
 That pressed around the shrine.

Yet sometimes in a darkened hour,
 (For storms will shake the fairest flower.)
 When friendships words were doubly dear,
 Because they stayed the gushing tear ;
 When all the gilded throng had gone
 Save he who then was ever near
 With softer tread and gentler tone ;—
 Silent she'd wonder why he stay'd,
 And why his own her sorrows made,
 And why, when any spoke her name,
 The crimson flush like lightning came ;
 But still as soon as sunshine gleamed,
 And hope and gladness on her beamed,
 And those who fled in hour of pain,
 The fawning throng, returned again,
 She would not heed that constant eye,
 But like the world, would pass it by.

Oh maidens fair ! when will ye learn
 How worthless oft are glittering things ?
 When will ye pause awhile and turn,
 And leave the gleam the meteor flings
 For a less dazzling, constant ray,
 That will not fade so soon away ?
 By the dream of Beauty's spell,
 By the woe I may not tell,

By the secret sorrows known
 Only to His ear alone
 In yon heaven's starry cope,
 By the silent death of hope,
 By the young cheek's faded bloom,
 By the darkness of the tomb,
 Trust not, trust not glittering things !
 Ere the soul around them clings,
 Look beneath the surface fair
 If true gold be hidden there !

Now turn we again to the maiden fair
 Who roved in the olden time,
 Amid the beauties rich and rare
 Of that soft summer clime,
 And him who pensive by her side,
 Walk'd sadly, softly on,
 Though, had he listened to his pride,
 She would have been alone.
 Still on, o'er dewy fields they passed,
 All bright with morning's gleam,
 Until they came and stood at last
 By a dark and sullen stream.
 Onward it roll'd in its rapid course
 With no play of dancing waves,
 And no music but the murmur hoarse
 In its deep and gloomy caves.
 And here the maiden paused awhile,
 And turned to the youth with a merry smile,
 And said : " See'st thou this stream ?
 Mark ! how it darkly rolls along,
 Amid these fields of light and song,
 Without one sunny gleam
 Upon its cold, repulsive face.
 No dashing waves in sparkling grace
 Play on its sullen tide ;
 But deep it is, and cold, they say,
 As it rolls on its onward way,
 While other waters glide
 With light and song and laughter gay
 To the far-off glorious deep away.

" See'st thou this stream ? E'en such art thou
 Yes, thou ! Look ! all is bright ;
 For day, upon the mountain's brow,
 Has oped the gates of light,
 And every thing that feels its kiss
 Rejoices in its radiant beams,
 Except this tide, and, as it is,
 To me thy spirit seems.
 Thou art the stream—and other men
 The light, the flowerets fair,
 The dew, the birds in yonder glen—
 Oh ! all things sweet and rare.
 But darkly rolls this dreary tide
 Cold, distant, and alone ;
 Say ! what has it to win a bride
 And clasp her for its own ?"

The listening youth no answer gave,
 But stood and mused awhile,
 Till softly o'er his face so grave,
 There broke a pensive smile.
 " Then seek again," he cried, " this shore,
 To-night, when the moon is high.
 Come, but this once, if never more,
 And hear my heart's reply !
 I'll meet thee when the heavens gleam
 With myriad apangles sown—
 I am, I am like the stern deep stream !"
 And he turned away alone.

PART SECOND.

Twas eve, and the cheek of the West was pale;
 And the fairies began their glee;
 And the moon's light boat was launched to sail
 On her blue and boundless sea;
 And here and there a glimmering spark
 Gleamed on that ocean's breast,
 A beacon star hung out to mark
 An island of the blest.
 And again the maiden lonely roved
 By the banks of the distant stream,
 And again the voice that was not beloved
 Dispelled her spirit's dream.
 "Queen of my soul, have you come?" it said,
 "Have you come in your beauty's pride,
 A glance from your bright, glad eyes to shed
 On me, the sullen tide?"
 Then listen, ere the last adieu
 From the heart that has loved so long and true
 Falls softly on thine ear;
 For never lady, never more
 May I tread again this pebbly shore,
 Then hear I pray thee, hear!
 I have been to the depths of this cold, deep stream,
 My feet have its deep ooze pressed,
 And lo! in its caverns I caught the gleam
 Of a PEARL within its breast.
 I struggled, I fought with the swelling waves,
 That flung me back from their golden caves,
 But I would have entrance there,
 For I saw the gem on its secret shrine,
 And I knew if I battled it must be mine,
 And thou, in thine ebon hair,
 Might'st wear a sign that this lonely stream,
 Deep in in its breast has treasures rare,
 Though not for the worldly eye they gleam
 Which never may know they slumber there.

"Lady I've proved, and I know its worth,
 Rich, rich, is the sullen tide!
 Though it sweeps along to the eyes of earth
 In dark and scornful pride.
 But well I know where its treasures rest,
 For its depths are revealed to me,
 And the Pearl that I won from its inmost breast,
 I kneel to offer thee!"

And he laid in her palm, on his bended knee,
 A gem, like a gleam of light;
 It glowed in its beauty tremblingly
 Like a beam from the lamp of night.
 'Twas soft as the look when woman's eye
 Is raised from things below;
 Pure as the tear which gives reply
 When her heart is touched with woe.

And the maiden fair, with the ebon hair,
 Gazed on the quivering ray,
 But her throbbing breast the truth confessed
 That her thoughts were far away,
 Summoning from the chambers vast
 Of the silent, but all-recording Past,
 Memories of many a gentle deed,
 And tender care in the hour of need,
 And the changeless love of neglected years;—
 And the gem was dewed with her gushing tears.—
 She gazed in the depths of his earnest eyes,—
 Clear as the blue of the summer skies,—
 And she saw the Pearls of his spirit hid
 Deep in his inmost heart.

Now as he softly rose unbid,
 And turned him to depart,
 She saw that he was like the rolling stream—
 Rich, rich in gems of worth,
 Though hidden deep they might never gleam
 For the careless eyes of earth.
 And these she felt she had flung away
 For the tinsel glitter, the sparkle gay,
 Though in their living shrine,
 Lit by her smile, they would stand revealed,
 As in a gloomy mine
 The treasures that were all concealed
 Gleam where the torches shine.

She spoke, and her glowing cheek was wet
 'Neath the veil of its floating curls,
 "Ah! go not now!—can I forget
 That the lonely stream has Pearls?"
 And she silent gave, and he trembling pressed
 Her hand as the lily fair,
 While she laid the Pearl on her throbbing breast
 And let it linger there!

* * * *

Ho! maiden with the ruddy cheek,
 Bright maiden with the merry glance,
 Come, it is time the throng to seek,
 To join the festive dance.
 Ha! lingerest thou to think awhile
 Upon my foolish lay,
 Oh come, I only craved a smile,
 Come, loiterer, come away.
 But if thou wilt retain a part,
 Remember, maiden fair,
 There's many a Pearl in the still deep heart,
 If we would but seek them THERE!

Baltimore, June, 1849.

RICHARD SAVAGE.

BY H. T. TUCKERMAN.

The distinction of civilized society is that human life is systematic, and the natural effect of those circumstances which, in any degree, except an individual from its usual routine and responsibilities, is to induce the impulsive action and precarious expedients that belong to wild races. In the world of opinion and habit we occasionally see those who, goaded by misfortune or inspired by an adventurous temper, break away from the restraint which custom ordains and by hardihood in action or extravagance of sentiment, practically isolate themselves from nearly all the social obligations acknowledged by mankind. Indeed every human pursuit may be said to have its respectable and its vagabond followers. In trade these extremes are obvious in the merchant and the pedlar;—in the church, we have the bishop and the field-preacher; and in literature, the author who devotes the leisure that intervenes between the care of his estates and the engagements of fashionable society, to a review, a poem or a history, and the man about town who lives by his wits and whose dinner is contingent upon a happy epigram or a successful farce. Even when fortune and rank obtain, natures imbued with a vagrant or adventurous spirit will cut loose from social bondage through mere waywardness or courage, as if there were gipsy blood in their veins, or the instinct of heroism or discovery in their hearts. The enthusiasm of misanthropy made Byron a pilgrim, that of reform drove Shelley into exile and that of sentiment won Rousseau to a picturesque hermitage. How much of human conduct depends upon the source whence is derived the inspiration or the sanction of existence! Family pride leads to a constant reference to the standard of external honor; the desire of wealth to a keen adaptation of all occasions to interest; while the consciousness of having nothing beyond personal resources to look to for advancement or happiness, breeds in earnest minds, an independence of mood almost defiant. To this we attribute, in no small degree, the recklessness of Savage. Every circumstance of his life tended to encourage self-will. He found neither in his birth, his fortunes nor the incidents of his daily experience, any vantage-ground for confidence. Fate seemed to ordain between him and society a perpetual enmity. Hence his dauntless egotism; driven from the outworks of life, he fortified the citadel. Sure of no palladium but his genius, he held it up as a shield against the arrows of scorn or thrust it forth as an authentic emblem of his right to demand from others the satisfaction of his wants. Perhaps there is no instance, if we except Benvenuto Cellini, of more ferocious self-reliance, or rather, pertinacity in levying tribute. In his career we realize that the essential traits of civilized and barbarian life may assimilate; that refined mental aptitude may co-exist with extreme personal degradation; and that the support of existence is often as precarious and the habits of life as vagrant in a christian metropolis, as among the Indian tribes of America, or the wild hordes of the East.

The genuine literary adventurer is, indeed, a kind of social Ishmaelite, pitching the tent of his convenience as necessity or whim suggests. It is his peculiar destiny to "take no note of time," for he falls into any incidental scheme of festivity at morning, noon or night, joins any band of roysterers he may encounter, takes part in the street-corner discussions of any casual knot of politicians, and is always ready to go to the theatre, the club, a private domicile, or a coffee-house with the first chance acquaintance he meets. He hangs loose upon the skirts of society. If the immediate is agreeable, he scorns change, and hence will prolong his social visits to the infinite annoyance of those who keep regular hours. Where he breakfasts, dines or sleeps is problematical in the morning. As the itinerant musician goes forth to win entertainment by his dulcet notes, the vagabond man of genius trusts to his fund of clever stories, his aptitude as a diner-out, his facility at pen-craft, or his literary reputation to win upon the sympathies of some humane auditor, or chain the attention of the inquisitive, and thus provide for the claims of physical necessity. His appeal is threefold—to the benevolent, the curious and the vain; and in a large city, with the entrée of a few circles and places of resort, it will be, indeed, a strange hazard that deprives him wholly of these long-tried expedients. His agreeability makes him friends which his indiscretions at length weary; but as he generally prefers to do all the talking himself, he gradually ceases to be fastidious, and when he cannot fraternize with a scholar or a gentleman, contents himself with inferior society. The consciousness of superior gifts and singular misfortunes, soon blunts that delicacy which shrinks from obligation. He receives a favor with the air of a man to whom consideration is a birthright. He is, as Landor says of woman, more sensitive than grateful; borrows money and books without a thought of returning them, and, although the most dependent of beings, instantly resents the slightest approach to dictation as a personal insult. He is emphatically what Shakespeare denominates a "landless resolute"; considers prudence too mean a virtue for him to adopt, and industry a habit unworthy of his spirit. His wits are his capital, which he invests, day by day,—now and then, perhaps, embarking them in a more deliberate venture, by way of polishing his tarnished escutcheon. Equally exempt from the laws of sentiment as those of economy, he makes unconscionable drafts upon the approbateness and the malignity of others, by inditing panegyrics and lampoons. A subscription, a dedication, or a satire by awakening the generosity, the pride or the fear of the world, alternately supply the exigencies of the moment; while the utter loss of self-respect is prevented by some occasional effort in a nobler vein, or complacent memories of past renown. Custom renders him at home everywhere; address repudiates individual rights; and a kind of happy boldness annihilates, by a stroke of humor or a phrase of geniality, the barriers of artificial reserve. He is the modern knight-errant—prompt to challenge recognition, and, with gallant bearing, win the guerdon for which he aspires, whether it be the smile of beauty, the companionship of rank, or the privileges that wealth dispenses. Experience in shifts and a sanguine temper united to capacity for reflection render him withal a philosopher; so that, although keenly alive to present enjoyment, he can suffer with fortitude, and heroically sport with deprivation. He is vividly conscious of what Madame de Staël declares is one great secret of delight—its fragility. His existence is singularly detached from routine, and, like a bird or a butterfly, he soars or alights, as caprice suggests,—a chartered adventurer to whom has been presented the freedom of nature. Leisure gives scope to his observation; need quickens his perception; and the very uncertainty of subsistence adds infinitely to the relish of each gratification. A voluntary outlaw, he claims ransom from those his talents have made captive; regarding himself as a public benefactor, he deems society obligated to take care of him; prodigal in his mental riches, he despises those who are parsimonious either of their time or their hospitality, and sincere in his admiration, and perhaps in his advocacy, of all that is magnanimous and beautiful, he learns to regard material advantage as his just inheritance, which directly to seek, would obscure the heraldry bestowed by his genius and sanctioned by misfortune.

It is peculiar to this class of men to be unconscious of the diverse attractions of talents and character. Their egotism prevents an habitual recognition of the important fact that the entertainment afforded by conversational abilities and personal sympathy are two very distinct things. Because their talk is listened to with avidity, their wit productive of laughter, and their reputation of deference, they deduce the erroneous conclusion that individually and for themselves an interest is awakened; whereas, in most cases, the charm is purely objective. By men of the world, genius of a literary kind is regarded in the same light as dramatic, artistic and juggling cleverness—the result is not associated with the person; it is the pastime, not the man that wins. A conviction so wounding to self-love is not easily adopted; and, as a natural consequence, the deluded victims of social applause continue, in spite of mortifying experience, to look for a degree of consideration, and demand a sympathy which it is absurd to expect from any but the very liberal and the naturally kind, who confessedly form the exception, not the rule, in general society. Yet in actors, authors and artists who possess great self-esteem, this error is the rock upon which the barque of hope invariably splits. There seems to be a kind of inevitable blindness in this regard. Slowly and by long degrees, comes home the feeling that it is what the man of genius does, not what he is, that excites admiration. When the pageant of an hour fades, what care the narrow-minded and the selfish for those who have ministered to their pleasure? Only enthusiasm lingers and pays tribute; only gratitude is sensible of an obligation incurred; reverence alone dreams of any return, and conscientiousness is the sole monitor that pays the debt.

The incidents of his life rather than the creations of his genius have preserved the fame of Savage. His poems are his only writings now recognized, and we find them regularly included in editions of the British anthology; it is, however, but here and there, scattered through a long array of heroics, that we can detect either originality or raciness. Like his life these effusions are crude and unsustained; they lack finish, completeness and unity. Deformed by coarseness and sometimes by obscurity, they often repel taste; and their frequent want of clear and uniform design induces weariness. Their most genuine interest is personal; we naturally associate them with the misfortunes of the author, and the special references are not without a pathetic zest. The "Progress of a Divine" and "The Bastard," although redeemed by wit and cleverness, are too grossly indelicate for general perusal. The bitterness of the one and the confident hilarity with which the other begins, are very characteristic of Savage. It is evident that he possessed, in an uncommon degree, what the phrenologists call the organ of wonder, and metaphysical writers a sense of the sublime. In his descriptions of nature and life, we perceive the inspiration of a reflective ideality. His couplets occasionally glow with vital animation, and his choice of epithets is often felicitous. Vigor, fluency and expressiveness, at times indicate that there was an original vein in his nature, though too carelessly worked to produce a great and consistent result. "The Wanderer" is the poem upon which he evidently bestowed the greatest care. It may be regarded as his own epitaph written by himself and embodying the dark phases of his career, the most vivid of his sensations, and the beauty of his moral sentiments, combined with the want of system, the self-esteem, recklessness and courage which alternated in his feelings and conduct.

The following passages evidently allude to actual experience:

Is chance a guilt? that my disastrous heart
For mischief never meant, should ever smart?
Can self-defence be sin? Ah, plead no more!
What though no purposed malice stain thee o'er!
Had heaven befriended thy unhappy side,
Thou had'st not been provoked or thou had'st died.

—No mother's care
Shielded my infant innocence with prayer;
No father's guardian hand my youth maintained,
Called forth my virtues or from vice restrained.

He learned the process of glass-manufacturing, by sleeping during winter nights, when a vagrant, near the furnaces :

You limeless sands, loose driving with the wind,
In future cauldrons useful textures find,
Till on the furnace thrown, the glowing mass
Brightens and brightening, hardens into glass.

The homeliness of such lines is like Crabbe, yet his capacity for more polished versification is shown in his allusion to Pope, as polished and emphatic as that of the master rhymer himself :

Though gay as mirth, as curious thought sedate,
As elegance polite, as pow'r elate,
Profound as reason and as justice clear,
Soft as compassion and as truth severe ;
As bounty copious, as persuasion sweet,
Like nature various and like art complete,
So firm her morals, so sublime her views,
His life is almost equalled by his muse.

In metaphor, also, Savage is effective. Thus he compares the "steamy currents" at morning twilight, to "veins blue winding on a fair one's arm," and of a river hidden in umbrage, observes

Yet, at one point, winds out in silver state,
Like virtue from a labyrinth of fate.

He calls shells "tinctured rivals of the showery bow," and, describing a vast prospect, says

The herds seem insects in the distant glades
And men diminished as, at noon, their shades.

His adjectives are sometimes very graphic, however inelegant ; he speaks of warming himself at "chippy fires" and detailing a repast, informs us

That o'er a homely board a napkin's spread,
Crown'd with a heapy canister of bread.

The gleams of high sentiment that, like flashes of heat-lightning from a dense cloud, emanate from Savage, are refreshing, and justify his biographer's tribute to his better nature. Self-indulgent as he was, he declares that Reason's glory is to quell desire.

Although he obviously is in his element when

In gay converse glides the festive hour,

he yet recognises a providence in affliction ;—

Why should I then of private loss complain,
Of loss that proves, perchance, a brother's gain ?
The wind that binds one barque within the bay
May waft a richer freight its wished-for way.
Man's bliss is like his knowledge, but surmised,
One ignorance, the other pain disguised.
When seeking joy, we seldom sorrow miss,
And often misery points the path to bliss.

Know, then, if ills oblige thee to retire
Those ills solemnity of thought inspire.

The following random extracts betray a vivid consciousness of his own fate and tendencies :

False pride ! what vices on our conduct steal
From the world's eye one frailty to conceal !
Ye cruel mothers ! soft ! those words command !
So near shall cruelty and mother stand !
Can the dove's bosom snaky venom draw ?
Can her foot sharpen like the vulture's claw ?

Loos'd to the world's wide range, enjoined no aim,
Prescribed no duty and assigned no name,
Nature's unbounded son, he stands alone,
His heart unbias'd and his mind his own.

From ties maternal, moral and divine,
Discharg'd my gasping soul ; pushed me from shore,
And launched me into life without an oar.

Born to himself, by no profession led,
In freedom fostered, and by fortune fed,
Nor guides, nor rules, his sovereign choice control,
His body independent as his soul.

Inly secure, though conscious soon of ill,
Nor taught by wisdom how to balance will,
Rashly deceived, I saw no pits to shun,
But thought to purpose and to act were one.

That we have not exaggerated the prominent claim of Savage to represent the literary adventurer, a glance at the account of him by Johnson—the most remarkable and original of his Lives of the Poets)—will, at once, evidence. We are there told that when a guest, he "could neither be persuaded to go to bed at night or rise by day;" that "he considered himself discharged by the first quarrel, from all ties of honor and gratitude;" that "when he loved a man, he suppressed all his faults, and when he had been offended by him, suppressed all his virtues;"—"always asked favors without the least submission or apparent consciousness of dependence;" "purchased the luxury of a night by the anguish of cold and hunger for a week;" "though he scarcely ever found a stranger whom he did not leave a friend, he had not often a friend long, without obliging him to become a stranger;" and that "the reigning error of his life was that he mistook the love for the practice of virtue."

We could easily multiply well authenticated instances of the foibles and the inconsiderateness, the casual triumphs and low expedients that doomed him to vibrate "between beggary and extravagance." To indicate the relative value he attached to his inward resources and his outward obligations, a few anecdotes will suffice. While an inmate of Lord Tyrconnel's family he sold several books which his host had presented him with his lordship's arms stamped upon them ; and, at the same time, betrayed the most fastidious and even "superstitious regard to the correction of his proof-sheets." While on the most intimate and friendly terms with Dennis, he wrote an epigram against him; and when his friends, their patience quite exhausted, contributed to secure him a permanent retreat in the country, he indulged in the most illusive dreams of rural felicity, and before he was half-way on the road to Wales, sent back to London for new supplies, which he soon expended among pleasant companions in Bristol, whose never keen appreciation of his social qualities induced a versified comparison of their merits with those of his London protectors, by no means to the advantage of the latter, notwithstanding his recent obligations. The reverse of Dominic Sampson, he was very scornful at the idea of new habiliments being furnished him without the intervention of his own taste and authority. The mortification of illegitimacy was solaced by that of noble blood and the advantages he traced to "the lusty stealth of nature." Scenes of profligacy, social ostracism, and a criminal trial utterly failed in undermining a "steady confidence in his own capacity;" while he only regarded poverty as an evil from the contempt it is apt to engender; and he always thought himself justified in resenting neglect "without attempting to force himself into regard." Such a combination of traits developed under extraordinary vicissitudes, completely illustrate the spirit of literary adventure, and the perversity of unregulated talent.

Yet this dark biographical picture, gloomy as one of Spagnoletto's martyrdoms, is not without mellow tints, nor its hard outlines unrelieved by touches of humanity. Upon his first discovery of a mother's name and existence, revealed to him by several documents found among the effects of his deceased nurse, the heart of Savage awakened to all the latent tenderness inspired by a new-born affection. It was his habit, long after the determined repulse of his unnatural parent had quenched the hope of recognition, to walk to and fro before her house, in the twilight, amply compensated if, through his tears, he could obtain but a glimpse of her robe as she passed near the window, or see the gleam of a candle in her chamber. At the period of his greatest want and highest mental activity, he composed while perambulating a verdant square, or retired mall, and then entered a shop, asked for a scrap of paper, and noted down his conceptions. In this manner he is said to have written an entire tragedy; and certainly few instances of resolute authorship in the grasp of poverty, can equal its touching fortitude. His speech to the court when arraigned for sentence after being convicted of homicide, is said to have been manly and eloquent, and certainly won for him great sympathy and respect. There must have been something in his character that inspired esteem as well as in his fortunes to kindle compassion, from the interest so frequently excited and patiently manifested in his behalf by individuals widely separated in position and opinions. In some instances, too, the independence of his nature exhibited itself in a noble manner. The spirited letter which he addressed to a friend from the prison at Bristol, where he was incarcerated for debt, and so drearily terminated his eventful career, is a fine example of self-respect and elevation of sentiment. Hunt justly remarks, in his notice of the once celebrated Mrs. Oldfield, that her annuity to Savage gave posterity a liking for her; and Dr. Johnson assures us that the subject of his remarkable memoir, when banished from London, parted from him with tears in his eyes.

Indeed the phases of character and the actual experiences of Savage, if analysed and dramatically unfolded by a thoroughly sympathetic delineator, would afford a most fruitful theme. Imagine it handled by Dickens, in his best vein; we should have night-wanderings as forlorn as those of little Nell and her grandfather, a trial scene more effective than that of Barnaby Rudge, jollities eclipsing those of Dick Swiveller, and reveries more grandly pathetic than the death-bed musings of Paul Dombey. For accessories his acknowledged relation to the nobility and his intimate association with the men of talent of the day would furnish ample scope, for so notorious was his story at the time, that Macaulay, in his History of England, says that Earl Rivers is remembered chiefly on account of his illegitimate son; and the Countess of Macclesfield, brazen as was her temper, was obliged to fly from Bath to escape the observation of fashionable crowds induced by the satirical poem of Savage called The Bastard.

Prompted by that love of excitement which becomes the ruling impulse of the improvident and forlorn, Savage went forth one night, from his obscure lodgings in search of profitable meditation, a boon companion, or a lucky adventure. There was in his elongated and rough face a sad expression that indicated habitual melancholy—not the resigned air of meek endurance, nor the gravity of stern fortitude; but that dark, brooding pensiveness which accompanies undisciplined passions and a desolate existence. There was, however, a redeeming dignity in his measured gait and an unsteady accent in his voice as he soliloquized, that would have "challenged pity" in a sensitive observer. He entered a tavern—an accustomed haunt, where conviviality had often beguiled him of "the thing he was." The sight of one or two familiar faces, and the anticipation of a jolly evening changed, at once, the mood of the homeless wit. That coarse exterior suddenly wore a milder aspect; that solemn air gave way to abandon; and, all at once, he looked like a man ready to "flit the time lightly" and "rouse the night-owl with a catch." It was thoughtfulness eclipsed by good fellowship.—Hamlet transformed into Sir Toby Belch. The carousal brought on the hour of feverish re-action, and the party, at length, sallied out to breathe the fresh air and vent their superfluous merriment. Attracted by a light that gleamed from another house of entertainment, they entered, and unceremoniously disturbed a group already in possession. High words arose, swords were unsheathed, and when the morning dawned, Savage found himself a prisoner awaiting trial for murder. At this crisis of his fate, with the ban of the law impending, amid the solitude of captivity—how must the events of his life have passed, in gloomy succession, before his mind, and what desperate emotion the retrospect engendered! We can scarcely imagine a more contradictory and pathetic story invented by fiction. The illegitimate offspring of a Countess and an Earl, brought up by a hireling, taken from St. Albans grammar-school, in boyhood, to be apprenticed to a shoemaker; cut off, by an infamous falsehood, from the inheritance assigned him by his father;—accidentally discovering his birth only to become the object of relentless maternal persecution; with the loss of his nurse, cast adrift upon the world and forced into authorship to escape starvation, and now only with the prospect of an ignominious death incurred in a tavern brawl—what incentives his memory could furnish to remorse and despair! His whole experience was anomalous. Of noble origin, yet the frequent associate of felons and paupers, with a mother for his most bitter enemy, and the slayer of one who never offended him; long accustomed to luxury, yet finding his best comfort in a gaol; conscious of superior abilities, yet habituated to degrading expedients; his written life touching the hearts of thousands, while his actual condition annoyed more often than it interested; the guest of a wealthy lord, the confidant of men of genius, the intimate of Wilkes and Steele, and the cynosure of many select circles in London and Bristol, he sometimes famished for want of nourishment and "slept on bulks in summer and in glass-houses in the winter." From the king he received a pardon after being condemned to the gallows, and from a fashionable actress a pension; the queen's volunteer-laureate, he died in a prison cell and was buried at the expense of the gaoler. The records of human vicissitude have few more painful episodes; the plots of few tragedies boast more pathetic material; and the legacies of genius, to those who explore them to analyse character and trace the influence of experience upon mental development, rarely offer the adventurous and melancholy interest that is associated with the name of Richard Savage. He is the type of reckless talent, the ideal of a literary vagabond, the synonym for an unfortunate wit. In his history the adventures of hack-writers reach their acme; and his consciousness embraced the vital elements of dramatic experience—the internal light of fancy and reflection, and the external shade of appalling fact.

A MORNING DREAM.

ADDRESSED TO A LADY.

"Oh! I've passed a miserable night."—Richard III.

I never knew the lazy hours,
Depart at such a limping pace,
Late, they were crowned with Pleasure's flowers,
And something, something owned of grace—
But now it seems, upon my word,
As if the motley, cheerless band,
Thinking their usual course absurd,
Had vowed a solemn vow—to stand.

Two weary months have slowly past—
(In sooth I'd almost swear it ten.)
Since I gazed on thy dark eyes last,
And prayed that we would meet again—
Was it a dream? I thought: the light
That danced within those orbs divine,
For one brief moment grew less bright,
And softened 'neath the glance of mine.

I mingle with the unthinking throng,
That bow at Fashion's glittering shrine,
I join the dance, and list the song,
But ah! its notes are not like thine;
Fair faces beam 'neath many a tress,
And graceful forms, like dreams float by,
Ye Gods! to worship loveliness,
Like this, were scarce idolatry.

The blaze of chandeliers and eyes,
Dazzling as gas-light—or a star,
Voices of silvery tone that rise,
Like music echoing from afar—
The laughing lip, the enchanting smile,
The grace, the buoyancy, the mirth—
Pray are we borne to Plato's isle?†
Ah! Madam, tell me, where's the earth?

† Among the many golden fancies of the visionary Philosopher of Greece, none is more beautiful, or attractive, than his dream of the "blessed Islands," whose inhabitants were ever in possession of a pure and uninterrupted felicity.

Alas ! alas ! the lamps grow dim,
 And Beauty's cheek is paling too—
 My new black hat has lost its rim—
 My varnished boots, how tight, parbleu !
 My partner leaning on my arm,
 Declares she's caught a shocking cold.
 'Tis Daylight—she has ceased to charm—
 Since three o'clock A. M. was tolled.

At last ! the evening's work is done,
 Now for some hours of genuine bliss.
 I seek my couch, just as the sun Arises much refreshed from his ;
 The morning breeze with perfumed sigh,
 Like frolic sprite from Fairy clime,
 Pursues its wanton gambols by,
 And lulls me with its drowsy chime.

I had a dream : Methought I gazed
 Once more on that night's pageant fair—
 Once more eyes, lamps, and dresses blazed,
 And thou, beloved one ! wert there.
 I sought thy side—I took thy hand—
 I gently whispered of the love,
 That, like a pure and golden band,
 Would link our souls below—above.

I led thee from the crowded hall
 To a green arbor's safe retreat,
 And trembling there, was fain to fall
 With protestations at thy feet ;
 I said I was a being lone
 With none my hopes or griefs to share,
 And if you would but be my own,
 We'd make—an interesting pair.

I vowed your wishes should be mine—
 Your slightest whim I'd not refuse ;
 I whispered of the Holy Shrine,
 And hinted—we'd no time to lose.
 Wherefore should youth's most precious hours
 Thro' the dark glass all lonely run,
 When two such joyous hearts as ours
 Were ever destined to be one.

My feelings I'm not used to school,
 Much more I vowed, and whispered low—
 In short, I ranted like a fool,
 And—and—I think you told me so :
 Your rosy lip was curled with scorn,
 And haughty did your presence seem,
 I'd wish that I had ne'er been born,
 Were it not all—a Morning Dream !*

P. H. H.

July, 1849.

* Morning Dreams, says the Irish legend, always go "by contraries."

AN OLD EPIGRAM. CLERICAL COMFORT.

As the corpse of the Vicar the Curate was eyeing,
 "O grieve not so much," said his Spouse, "for the dying."
 "'Tis good the advice," cried the Curate, "you're giving—
 For I muse on the dead, but I think on—the Living."

"Feudalism in the Nineteenth Century."

Such is the title of an article of fourteen pages in the Blackwood for June, 1849, which has entertained us as much as any novelty of the season. At first, we were disposed to think it a sort of hoax—an ironical joke—designed, by carrying out to an extreme of absurdity the conservative torism of that journal, to provoke a little mirth at the expense of honest, hearty, (albeit somewhat prejudiced and dogmatical,) old Christopher North himself. But an attentive reading has brought us to the conclusion that the author is in sober earnest—that he is fully convinced of the wisdom of his project, (whereof more presently,)—and entertains sanguine hopes of seeing it realized. Of this consummation we think the probability not quite so great as that of the Balloon line to California ; and, were we to fix a time for its occurrence, it would be certainly the Greek Kalends or the day after the Millennium. But our readers shall judge.

Poor, dear, old Don Quixote has been so often dragged before the public, by writers who had no business with him, that we are loth to disturb his repose. He has been so often compelled to the characteristic duty of "pointing a moral" where there was no moral to point, or of illustrating a flimsy theory, which would never have been visible, but for its obscuring our view of the worthy knight himself, that we do really feel some scruple of conscience, at evoking his shade from its repose on the present occasion. But it appears to us that our call is made under circumstances peculiarly appropriate. If there be any truth in the transmigration of souls, we are convinced that the spirit of the honored Hidalgo now animates the contributor to Blackwood. They have the same exaggerated ideas of the greatness and strength, the goodness and virtue, that lie buried in the past—the same strange medley of history and fable, fairy tale and reality, which serves them for experience and knowledge—the same distorted and discolored views of the men and things actually about them, which they despise too much to look at with attention—and the same chimerical designs for the reformation of a degenerate age, and the establishment of a grand military fabric of government—based, built up, and dominated—"from turret to foundation stone"—by the genius of Feudal Chivalry.

Our author prefaces his scheme with an assurance, (which commands our full belief,) that he has no disposition to encourage innovation, or to promote changes in the time-honored institutions of England ; but on the contrary, that he desires to restore and revive them, with as near an approximation to what they were in the good old days of mediæval feudalism, as the present condition of the world will permit. He then proposes to make "one or two very common place observations, professing to take no other guide than a small modicum of common sense, and to have no other object than our (his) readers' delectation, and the good of our (his) country." We believe that his treatise will do no harm to his country, nor to any other—we have already said that it has afforded us at least some "delectation"—but, as to the small modicum of common sense, which he proposes as his guide to some common-place observations, we fear that he has reckoned sadly without his host. "L'homme propose, et Dieu dispose," says the French proverb. It has pleased Providence to deprive him of even that "small modicum," upon which he relied for safe guidance; and the result is the widest departure from the limits of the "commonplace," that this century has witnessed in the field of political speculation.

The great principle of the "restoration" proposed by our modern Lyeurgus, is physical force: physical force, disciplined by military science, cemented by privileges of caste, supported upon inalienable landed property, and dignified by the exclusive honors of hereditary nobility. He believes that a nation advances in true greatness so long as its power is wielded and its destinies controlled by a warlike aristocracy: that, just in proportion as commercial wealth, scientific attainments, professional excellence, or skill in the useful arts, are permitted to raise their possessors to any share in the direction of public affairs, the nation must necessarily sink in the scale of grandeur and prosperity; and that the only salvation for Old England lies in such a reform as will promise the nearest approximation to that palmy state, from which she has been degenerating ever since the decline of the feudal system commenced. To this end he proposes the establishment of a domestic standing army, to consist, with proper gradations of rank, of the nobility and gentry alone: to embrace in its muster rolls, none but those who can serve without pay, being supported by their own estates, or those of their relatives; to be animated by the highest impulses of loyalty to the feudal constitution, and devotion to the system, whereof they constitute the essence. In addition to these motives, they are to cultivate a laudable contempt for the inferior classes of society. As the author elegantly expresses himself, it is to be "no crowd of pot-bellied citizens, with red noses and spectacles, who are afraid of firing off a musket, and cannot march above ten miles a day, nor go more than six hours without plenty of provisions tucked under their belts, nor sleep anywhere except between clean sheets and warm blankets." Not at all. He eachews "the whole generation of pot-bellied, red-nosed, counter-thumping fellows alluded to above." He repudiates "the misery, discontent, and degeneracy, abounding in the manufacturing towns." But, inasmuch as there must be men to be commanded, as the force cannot consist exclusively of full-blooded captains, and field marshals of forty quarterings, a measure of extreme condescension is vouchsafed, and the privates may be recruited "from the adult sons of respectable farmers, the sons of the country gentry, and the younger gentry from the towns."

To sustain and perpetuate this engine of state policy, as well as the privileged orders, which are to originate and direct it, a nobility is to be created, graduated by the quantity of landed estate in the possession of the members thereof, and the number of generations through which it has descended. Thus £10,000 per annum of rental, or 5,000 acres of land, held for four generations, will rank their owner in the lowest grade of nobility, as a Baron: and so on, ascending in the scale, until £100,000 a year of clear rental, or 50,000 acres of land, shall "ipso facto and de jure" make their possessor a Duke. Baronets are to be qualified by a rental of £5,000 a year, for four generations: and no man is to be admitted into the House of Commons, unless he be "previously adorned with the honor either of knighthood or of the baronetage, or unless the younger son of a peer of the realm." The orders of the garter, thistle, shamrock, bath, &c., are no more to be conferred upon nobles, but to be reserved as rewards for eminent public services on the part of the commoners, who can aspire to nothing more. In very extraordinary cases, however, it is suggested that great commanders, or distinguished lawyers, may be summoned to the Upper House, as peers for their lives only: while the Bench of Bishops and The Twelve Judges, (for their lives only, we presume,) are to form "two of the purest ornaments in the bright galaxy of the peers of the realm."

To satisfy our readers that we have not overcharged the picture, we subjoin some copious extracts—

"(1.) How was it that nobles came to be nobles and commons came to be commons? how was it that the great territorial properties of this kingdom were originally set agoing and maintained? and how was it that you and I, and millions of others came to be put in the apparently interminable predicament of having to toil and struggle with the world, or to be sentenced to something like labor, more or less hard, for life;

you and I, we say, you and I, and our fathers and our children? Tell us that, gentle reader, whether you be good old Tory, or moderate Conservative, or slippery Peelite, or coldblooded Whig, or prodigate Radical, or demoniac Chartist? FORCE, my good friend—FORCE, PHYSICAL FORCE—a good strong hand, and a stout arm, and a heavy sword, and a brave heart, and a firm determination—and no shilly-shally hesitation as to legality or illegality, no maudlin sympathy nor compunction—these were the things that did it; these carried the day; these were the moving powers of old, they raised the lever, and they settled down society into that bed in which it has been arranging itself ever since. And right good things they were, too, in their proper time and place; and so they ever will be: they are some of the mainsprings of the world; they may become concealed in their action, they may be forgotten, they may even fall into temporary inaction, but they come out again into full play ever and anon, and when the wild storm of human passion drives over the world in a reckless tornado, they go along with the whirlwind, and they hover all around it, and they follow it, and they reassert their permanent sway over mankind. The Norman William's barons, the noble peers of Charlemagne, the princes and marshals of Napoleon, all found their estates at the points of their swords; and while they kept their swords bright, their estates remained intact; but when military prowess declined, legal astuteness and commercial craft crept in, and the broad lands decreased, because the sharp point and edge were blunted. The remote origin, the first title of every crowned head and noble family of Europe, is to be traced to the sword, or has been derived from it. We speak not of parvenus, we allude to the great families of the various realms of the ancient world; all old and real nobility is of the sword, and of the sword only. The French used to express this well, and understood the true footing on which nobility ought to stand; they always talked of la noblesse de l'épée, as contradistinguished from la noblesse de la robe: the former referred to the feudal families and their descendants, the latter to those who had become ennobled for services at the bar. As for nobility granted for any commercial or pecuniary causes they never dreamed of such a thing; or, if a spurious ennobling took place, it was deemed a glaring and an odious violation of the fundamental laws of aristocratic society.

"Now the ideas of the world have become so changed, or rather so corrupted on this point, that the prime notion of nobility no longer is attached to military tenure or service; but, on the contrary, we find titles given, nay, bought and sold, for any the most miscellaneous services, and the meridian of nobleness, of elevation, of power, altogether eliminated from the qualifications that the nobleman ought to possess. Back-stair services, lobby services, electioneering services, counting-house services, any services as well as military services, have been deemed sufficient causes for procuring a patent of nobility to those who could allege them. Titles and causes of distinction they might have been, but surely not of nobility, not of hereditary honour and disinction, the tenure and essence of which should ever be attached to territorial power gained and held by the sword. And this lowering of the tone of nobility, this communising of what ought ever to be held up as a thing apart, as a thing originating with the first beginnings of a nation, and remaining fixed till the nation becomes itself extinct, has done no good to society: it has not raised the tone of the commons, it has only lowered that of the nobles: it has emasculated the one without adding any strength to the other. In all nations, as long as the nobility have remained essentially a military order, holding their own by their own strength, the fortunes of that nation have advanced; but whenever the nobles have become degenerate, and therefore the commons licentious—the former holding only by prescriptive respect, and the latter subjected to them only in theory, not in practice—the fate of that nation has been pronounced, and its decline has already begun. The destruction and absorption of the good fiefs of France, in the time of Louis XI., laid the way for the razing of the châteaux, and the decapitation of their owners by the Cardinal de Richelieu, in the time of Louis XIII.; and this gradual degenerating process of undermining the true strength of the nobles, led to the corruption of the nation, and to its reduction to the primary starting point of society in the reign of Louis XVI. So, too, in England, the sapping of the strength of the nobles, in the reign of Henry VIII., added to the corrupt proceedings of the times of James I., caused the Great Rebellion in the reign of his successor. The nation has never recovered from this fatal revolution of the seventeenth century. Like France, England has shone awhile, and sustained itself both in arts and arms; but the dissolving process has begun long ago with us as it did with them. One order of the state—the order of nobles—has been constantly decreasing in power and influence; and the descent towards the level of anti-social democracy seems now as easy and as broad as that to the shades of Avernus. The nobles of Russia, on the contrary, still retain their feudal power—they all draw and use the sword: their nation is on the ascendant. In Spain and Italy the nobles have descended so far as almost to have lost their claim to the title of men; while in most parts of Germany the result of recent movements has shown that the power of the nobles had long been a mere shadow; and they have evaporated in empty smoke, while the nations are fast sinking to the level of a common and savage democracy.

We would propose a remedy for this state of things. We consider the profession of arms, when joined to the holding of territorial power, as the highest form of civilisation and political excellence to which man has yet been able to rise. It constitutes that union of all the highest and best feelings of human nature with the supreme possession of power and influence over material objects—over land and the produce of land—which seems to be the ultimate and the worthy object of the good and great in all ages. And, therefore, the nearer a nobleman can revert to the principles upon which his order is, or ought to be, based, the greater security, in the working out both of himself and the nation, that the strength and dignity of the whole people shall be maintained inviolate. Of all men in the state, the noble is he who is most endangered by any approximation to effeminacy and inactivity: he is the representative, the beau ideal, of the virility of the whole nation: he is the active principle of its force—the leader, the chief agent, in building up the fortunes of his country. Let him but once degenerate from the elevating task, and he renounces the main privileges of his order, he does wrong both to his fellow-countrymen and to himself—he diminishes his own force, and he weakens their national powers. Whenever, therefore, any such departure, more or less wide, from the ancient principles of his order has taken place, let the nobleman hasten to return to them, if he would stop the course of ruin before it become too late. We would hold it to be the duty of every nobleman in this country—and we include herein his immediate descendants—to enter the profession of arms, and to adopt no other save that of afterwards serving the state in the senate: we hold it to be his duty to avoid all approximation to the engagements of commerce—we would even say of the law, of any of the learned professions. These pursuits are intended for other orders of men, not less essential, to the state than the noble, but still different orders. The noble is the leader, the type, the example of public military strength. Let him keep to that lofty function, and discharge it and no other."

Now this seems to us to be a very unqualified and deliberate adoption of the sentiments which Wordsworth puts into the mouth of Rob Roy:

"For why?—because the good old Rule
Sufficeth them, the simple Plan,
That they should take, who have the power,
And they should keep who can.

"A lesson that is quickly learned,
A signal this which all can see!
Thus nothing here provokes the Strong
To wanton cruelty—

"All freakishness of mind is checked;
He tamed, who foolishly aspires;
While to the measure of his might
Each fashions his desires.

We have already hinted at the manner in which the corps d'élite is to be constituted. Here is a passage or two from the text—

"Two methods of effecting this present themselves. In the first place a regulation might be easily and advantageously made, in connexion with the army, whereby any nobleman, or son of a nobleman, or in fact any person belonging to the class which the law might define to be noble, (for some modification is wanted on this head,) might be allowed to attach himself as a volunteer officer to any regiment, and be bound to serve in it as such without pay. He should receive his honorary promotion the same as any other officer, and should be subject to all the same duties and responsibilities; but "pay" he should not need; himself or his family should provide for all his charges. Or, in the second place, he should serve as an officer in a national force, the constitution of which we propose and advocate below: in this case, too, entirely without pay, and subject to all the articles of war. In either instance, we think it the duty of the country to give the nobleman an especial opportunity of serving her in a military manner; and we hold it to be his especial duty—one of the most essential duties of his order, without which his order degenerates and stultifies itself—to serve as a military man, and to serve with distinction."

"A volunteer force, if it is to be merely a parade force, a make-believe force, is a "sham," a humbug, and a gross absurdity. If it is to be a "National Guard," playing the part of armed politicians, it is a dangerous nuisance, and ought never to be formed. If it is to consist of a crowd of pot-bellied citizens, with red noses and spectacles, who are afraid of firing off a musket, and cannot march above ten miles a day, nor go more than six hours without plenty of provisions tucked under their belts, nor sleep anywhere except between clean sheets and warm blankets—why, a set of wooden posts, sculptured into the human form, and painted to look like soldiers, would be far more serviceable. We are not going to commit the absurdity of advocating the formation of any such corps of men as these; but we wish to point out how a really efficient corps of volunteers might be raised throughout the kingdom, kept on a footing of constant service and readiness, costing the country not one farthing, and constituting a really useful and valuable auxilliary force to co-operate with the regular troops.

"If these qualifications are to exist in any volunteer corps, then it is quite manifest that the following kinds of persons cannot form part of it. First of all, the whole generation of pot-bellied, red-nosed, counter-thumping fellows, alluded to above, would not be admissible; next, no man who is not endowed with a good quantity of bodily activity, health, and vigor of mind, could remain in its ranks; and further, no one need apply for admission who wanted merely to "play at soldiers," or whose means and occupations would not allow of his giving up regularly a certain portion of his best time to the service, and occasionally of absenting himself from home for even a considerable period—say of one, two, or more months, and proceeding wherever the government might wish him. Furthermore, no such corps could have the smallest pretensions to be effective, if it were left to its own guidance and command: it must be as much under the control, and at the orders, of the commander-in-chief—for home service—(for we do not contemplate the possibility of its being ordered abroad,) as any of the regular corps in her Majesty's army."

"We do not expect many persons engaged in trade and manufactures, nor indeed that many inhabitants in large towns—at least of those classes—would like to enrol themselves in a corps the service of which would be constant, and might frequently take them away for a considerable time from their homes and occupations. We should not wish to see them joining it, for, however warm their goodwill might be, we know that their pockets and stomachs would be continually rebelling, and that, far from being "volunteers," they would more commonly be found as "deserters." We would rather see them staying at home, and acting as good members of their municipalities, or as special constables, or forming "street associations" for the keeping of the peace—all most necessary and laudable purposes, and not a whit less useful to the country than the serving as volunteers. We would rather see the force we meditate drawn exclusively from the gentry and the farmers of the country, and in fact from the same classes as now furnish the yeomanry cavalry,—only, we would have it most especially to include all the gentry of the nation: and we would have it thereby made an honour even to belong to the corps. To see a country gentleman heading his tenants, and his sons serving in their ranks, as some of themselves, and the younger gentry from the country or provincial towns also coming forward for the permanent military service of their country—coming forward as gentlemen, and serving as gentlemen, with the name and title of gentlemen—and to see the stout farmers of England, the real pride and bulwark of the realm, thus linked with their best and natural friends and protectors in a common bond of honour and of arms, would be the most glorious sight that this nation would have witnessed for many a long year. It would give a new stamp to society, and would infuse a vigorous energy of mind amongst us that should go far towards counteracting the dangerous and emasculating influence of the "large town system." The heart-blood of England would begin to flow back again into its old and natural channels; and that linking of lords and tenants, which can never be loosened without the most fatal consequences, would be rendered closer and tighter than ever.

"Men drawn from such classes as these, the adult sons of respectable farmers, the sons of the country gentry, the younger gentry from the towns, the farmers and the gentry themselves, (such at least as could really be spared from their numerous avocations,) would constitute, both in their physical and mental qualifications, the very best description of volunteers that could be selected in any land, for they would be the true élite of the whole nation, the very pride and hope of the country. It would be truly an honour to belong to such a corps, whether the applicant for admission were a yeoman or a gentleman; and, if properly organised and trained, it might be made a force of paramount efficiency."

Our quotations shall end with the following, upon the conditions of nobility, and the qualifications for the two Houses of Parliament.

"An anomaly in the present constitution of noble society which requires remedying, is the frequent inadequacy of the territorial means possessed by noble families for the maintenance of their power and dignity. This has reached to such a pitch, of late days, that we have seen the ladies of two peers of the realm claiming public support in forma pauperum; and we have witnessed the breaking-up and sale of such a princely establishment as that of Stowe. Many noble families are forced to depend on public offices, and other indirect sources, for the support of their members. Many noble families of high distinction and renown are poorer than ordinary commoners. There are very few estates of nobles, (we say nothing of those of commoners,) which are not oppressed by mortgages, and which in reality confer much less power than they nominally represent. From whatever causes these circumstances may have arisen,—whether from the folly and extravagance of the nobles themselves as a main cause, or from the imprudence of the crown in making unworthy creations, as a subsidiary cause—they have produced the most injurious effects upon the order, and have even justified the boast of the first commoner who thought himself superior to the last of the nobles. By few things has the order been more injured in public opinion than by the inequality and inadequacy of its territorial resources. This, too, becomes the more painfully evident in a nation where commerce has been allowed to assume an undue preponderance in the public mind, and where the means of gaining money are so various and so many, that the rapid acquisition of handsome fortunes is a very common occurrence. It is an evil, a negation of the ends of life, and a main cause of the decline and fall of a nation, that such a state of things should exist; but, seeing that it does exist, it is doubly the duty and the interest of all who have the honour and the permanency of national prosperity at heart, to favour the establishment and the maintenance of the strongest possible antagonistic principle—the forming and preserving of large territorial possessions in favor of the order of nobles. Believing that the law of primogeniture is the basis of all political freedom, we would urge the expediency of modifying the law, so that certain great estates, like the fiefs of old, should become inalienable by any person, unattachable for any liabilities, and indivisible under any circumstances, in favor of the order of nobles; and that the holders of such estates should be nobles, and nobles only. In the same spirit we would say, that the extent of territory should determine the rank of the noble, taking, as the starting point, the estates as they might exist at any period of time; that to each title a certain territory should be inalienably attached, and that the title itself should derive its name from that territory—the holder of the territory, whoever he might be, always taking the title. It would be productive of great good if facilities were given as much as possible for massing together the properties of the nobles; and if estates widely spread over the kingdom could be exchanged for others lying close together, and forming a complete territory. The powers of the nobles are now greatly frittered away and lost by the dispersion of their properties: he who holds nearly a whole county continuously, like the Duke of Sutherland, is of much more weight in the state than another, like the Duke of Devonshire, whose estates, though of very great value, lie more widely scattered.

"It may appear an innovation, but we are persuaded that it would be only a return to the fundamental and ancient principles of the constitution, to make the possession of a real estate of a certain value, for a certain time, a legal title to claim the right to nobility. Thus the possession of an estate of £10,000 per annum clear rental, or of 5,000 acres, by the same family, in direct descent for four generations, should of itself constitute a right for its owner to be ranked in the lowest order of nobility,—that of barons,—and the barony should give its name to the possessor; while the possession of land of greater extent and value should modify the superior titles of those who held them, until the highest rank in the peerage were attained. All nobles holding not less than £100,000 per annum of clear rental, or 50,000 acres, should ipso facto and de jure become dukes, and so on in proportion between these two extremes of the peerage. Baronets should rank, in virtue of their estates, immediately after the barons; and in their turn, too, the possession of a certain income from landed property, such as £5,000 a-year clear for four generations, in the same family, should immediately entitle its owner to rank among the baronets, and to have the style and privileges of that order.

"It will be urged, on the other hand, that the crown would thereby be deprived of the power of rewarding meritorious public servants, by calling them up to the House of Peers, if the possession of a certain large amount of landed property were made a sine qua non for every creation. To this it may be replied that, though the prerogatives of the crown require extension rather than contraction, yet that a sufficient power of reward would be possessed, if men of eminence in the public service, whether great commanders or distinguished lawyers, were summoned to the Upper House for their lives only, without their titles being made hereditary; and further, that other distinctions might be given which would be fully sufficient rewards in themselves without any encroachment being made on the privileges of the order of nobles. Thus, in former times, when the honor of knighthood was not so common as it has now become, a great general and a great judge considered themselves rewarded enough if knighted: they never thought of being created peers. And the fact is, that though personal nobility—the nobility acquired by the performance of great actions—is in itself of the highest value to the state, as well as to the individual, it is not sufficiently valuable to entitle the heirs of a great man to take perpetual rank among the great landed proprietors of the realm. The duties and responsibilities of nobility depend more upon the trust reposed in each member than upon that member's personal qualifications. The noble cannot be separated from his lands nor from his tenants, nor from the multifarious heavy responsibilities thereby incurred; he is the representative of a great interest in the state; he is the representative of his land, and of all connected with it; he is the representative of a great class and gathering: his duties are not merely personal; he cannot found his right to nobility upon personal merit alone. Personal qualifications can give no valid right to hereditary privileges, whereas land is perpetual—terra manebat—and the privileges as well as the duties attached to it should be perpetual also.

"It would, therefore, be another step towards constituting the aristocracy of the state on a more solid and reasonable basis, if the orders of baronets, and of knights of various descriptions, were purified of their anomalies, and rendered attainable only under rules of a more general and fixed nature than at present prevail. Both these classes of nobles—for so they may be called—require considerable purification; the former, that of baronet, should be made the intermediate class between the nobles by personal merit, or knights, and those who are nobles by their lands, the peers. As was observed before, no baronetcy should be conferred unless a real estate of a certain value could be shown to be possessed, clear of all mortgage and debt; and the retention of such an estate for a certain number of descents, should establish a legal claim to the title of baronet; while the subsequent increase of the same estate, and a similar retention of it for a certain number of descents, should establish a further claim to the honour of the peerage. If the orders of knighthood were made more difficult of entry, and if they were specially reserved only for public personal services, they would rise again in public estimation, and would be suitable for all purposes of reward required by the sovereign.

"At the same time, and as a consequence of this, peers and baronets should not be admitted into the orders of knighthood—they should be satisfied with their own dignities. The garter, the thistle, and the shamrock should be reserved especially for the great military and naval commanders of the realm: the bath, and perhaps one or two other new orders, should be destined for men of eminence in whatever line of life they might be able to render service to their country.

"It is an opinion controverted by some, but it seems founded in reason, that the twelve judges, who are at the head of their most honourable profession, should not merely be allowed to sit on the benches of the House of Lords, but that they should have the right of voting therein, and, in fact, be summoned as peers for life upon their elevation to the bench. No order of men in the whole state would exercise power more conscientiously, and from no other source could the Upper House derive at once such an increase of deliberative strength in the framing and revision of the laws. The bench of spiritual lords, and the bench of legal lords, ought to form two of the purest ornaments in the bright galaxy of the peers of the realm."

"Members of the Lower House for counties are always called knights of the shires they represent; and so they ought to be. No person should be eligible to represent a county unless previously adorned with the honour either of knighthood or of the baronetage, or unless the younger son of a peer of the realm; and indeed the attaching of titles of nobility to the possession of estates of a certain value and fixity of tenure, and the annexing of baronetcies to similar properties, would put all the principal country gentlemen in a position suited to the duties of a knight of the shire. We should not then see the absurd and mischievous anomaly of an ambitious theorist of no landed property in his own possession, but backed by the democrats of a manufacturing district, thrust upon the legislature as the representative of a large agricultural county. We should rather find the knights of the shires forming a compact and most influential body in the imperial parliament, the real representatives of the interests of their constituents, and the main conservative element in the Lower House of the legislature."

We have now presented, in all its fair proportions, this magnificent scheme for the regeneration of England. Our readers have before them the mighty Panacea, which the political doctor of Blackwood, disclaiming "all nostrums of political economy," has devised for the cure of all evils that have afflicted, are afflicting, or may afflict, the body politic. The crowded and starving population of the manufacturing districts are to be silenced, if not relieved, by the ball practice of the Real Estate riflemen. The grievous taxes and poor rates, which oppress the small agriculturists, will be liquidated, by the gradual abolition of all the inconsiderable freeholds and fee simple estates, and the conversion of the owners thereof into tenants under the shadow of overgrown proprietors. While other statesmen are devising the relief of Ireland, by measures to promote and facilitate the alienation of property, our projector means to arrest the progress of England towards a similar state of distress by a policy exactly opposite. And, when in the fulness of time his plan shall have gone into complete operation, the wealth ignobly acquired in the practice of professions, in trade, in manufactures, and the mechanic arts, will probably undergo a salutary depletion under the swords and bayonets of the feudal militia. The purses of rich capitalists will be made to bleed as freely, as they did in the good old times of the Plantagenets. Possibly they may be made to disgorge their ill-gotten gains by tooth-drawers and ear-clippers, so much in vogue in the days of worthy King John: and we may witness the repetition of such diverting scenes, as that in which Front de Bœuf extorts from Isaac the Jew so handsome a subsidy, by the aid of threats and tortures. Such were the arts of government and police, under the rule of the feudal monarchs and nobles, so much lauded and lamented by this writer: and we might reasonably expect a return to them, if it were possible to conceive of the revival of such a system.

But no sane man can imagine such a resurrection to be possible in this age. When the tendency of events for centuries past has been to abridge more and more hereditary power and privilege—when political and civil rights have been constantly extending and diffusing themselves among the masses, once excluded from their exercise—when even Wellington, the Iron Duke himself, the embodiment of stern conservatism, has been long ago forced by necessity, to sanction the Catholic Emancipation bill—when the government has been constrained to endow a Catholic college in Ireland—when the Jews, the proscribed Jews, are knocking loudly at the doors of Parliament, and demanding (what they must soon obtain) the removal of their civil disabilities—amid such influences as these, in the broad noonday of the nineteenth century, such a rattling of the dry bones of defunct feudalism is a folly, that defies the reach of superlatives. And to whom is the appeal made? To a majority; whose wealth, influence, and numbers, steadily increasing, have wrought the very changes complained of; and who are now solicited to undo their own work, surrender what they have acquired, and submit once more to the yoke under which they groaned so long. In Æsop's fable, the enamored lion was persuaded to part with his claws and teeth, that he might not frighten the fair damsel who was to become his bride. The real purpose to knock him on the head, was not disclosed until he had become defenceless. But here, with admirable candor, the true object is avowed in the outset: and the great mass of the British nation are requested to strip themselves of their franchises, that they may once more fall under the sway of lordly taskmasters. Surely, our author's readings of English history must have stopped at the reign of Henry V., or at the latest with that of the despotic Harry the Eighth. He can know nothing of the Stuart dynasty—the eventful struggles of the 17th century—the causes which produced them, and the consequences that have followed. He cannot have heard that Cromwell's troopers, and the London trainbands, were raised from these same middle classes in town and country, to which he looks for recruits for the feudal army—that they fought, not for prerogative and privilege, but for civil liberty and equal rights—and demolished, on many a field, the squadrons of well born cavaliers, to whom this project is to raise up such illustrious successors. He has gone to sleep with the chroniclers and romancers of the middle ages, and wakes up, like Rip Van Winkle, thinking his nap has lasted but one night. He cannot comprehend the changes that have occurred in the minds of men, and the structure of governments. It is to be hoped some benevolent friend will put into his hands Macaulay or Mackintosh, Hallam or Hume, and impart to him some slight notion of what has happened in this long interval. If he does not belong to that class of people who "never learn any thing, and never forget any thing," he may possibly open his eyes to the absurdity of his speculations: or at least may diversify his labors, by endeavors as useful and promising, to stop the printing-press, prostrate the telegraphs, blow up the steamboats, and run the locomotives off the track. When he has done all this, let him dam up the waters of the Amazon and the Mississippi, and roll them backward to their springs. Then—and not till then—may he expect to divert the mighty current, whereon float the destinies of England and of the world, from that channel in which, for good or for evil, the hand of Providence has appointed it to flow.

"LETTERS AT SEA."

The sun hung low, half hidden by the range
Of Cordillera's peaks, and o'er the surf
Threw rainbow colors for its foamy caps.
The soft winds from the shore bore the sweet breath
Of the Magnolia's bloom, and in each inlet
Its snowy leaves, like fleecy clouds, reposed
Upon the waves which on the pebbly shore,
Played a low chime as gentle as the tone
Of mother's lullaby at summer eve,
Sung to her slumbering infant. Farther out
The nautilus had spread his little sail,
And eyed his own light shadow on the wave.
The dolphin's back had caught more radiant hues
From the rich light of even, as it wreathed
In many a graceful form, and lingered still Around the vessel's side. The drooping sails
Hung motionless, save when the rippling breeze
Waved the light cordage, and half-raised the curls
From the damp brow, fanning it with freshness,
And whispering of dells and leafy trees.
All was calm, and filled with stilly beauty
Which stole the sense away. It was one
Of those delicious moments when the mind,
Seeming to dwell on naught, feels o'er it come
Fair shapes of loveliness ineffable,
And on the heart the gentle dew of feeling
Doth fall unwittingly, to freshen there
The flowers of affection 'till their fragrance
Filleth our being. So felt one, who, pale
And languid, had been borne upon the deck,
That the cool air kissing his cheek, again
Might bring to it the rosy flush of health.
As murmured the light waves around, their tone
Seemed changed by magic and he heard instead
The voices of his home:—he wondered then
If those beloved ones o'er thought of him—
If midst the circle of their happy sports,
An eye grew sadder as it missed his smile,
Or marked his vacant place. Then came a fear
He was forgotten, and his full soul thrilled
With a wild, feverish wish for sympathy.
Starting, as from a trance, he gazed around,

As though he hoped to find the dearly loved
Beside him, but with sickening heart he sank
Again upon his couch and sadly gazed
Far o'er the waste of waters. Suddenly
His pulse beat quicker; he descried a boat,
Bounding across the waves, and its gay motion
Gave life to hope. It near'd the ship; and soon
A friend, the bearer of glad tidings, came
With letters from his home. He turn'd them o'er
And o'er again. He scarce could read their lines,
His vision was so dimmed with tears of joy.
And as he caught their meaning, once again
He felt the fresh breath of his native hills,
And thoughts of childhood's happy home and friends
Brought back his childhood's tenderness and tears.

L. W.

AN APOSTROPHE TO NIAGARA.

BY MARGARET JUNKIN.

Wonder of wonders! Earth hath naught in all
Her realm of beauty and magnificence,
To match thy matchless grandeur! Glorious Blanc
Retires pavilioned midst his mantling mists,
Nor dares to claim a rivalry with thee.
The Alpine cataracts that headlong leap
From heights so dizzy that they fall dispersed
In fleecy sheets of foam, are but the play
Of Nature in her frolic mood, compared
With thy vast whirl of waters. The loud roar
Of Ocean in its fury only seems
A deaden'd echo to thy ceaseless plunge.
That giant Arch whose grand proportions fill
The gazer's soul with such sublimity,
That thought withdraws dismayed, serenely stands,
A silent witness of its Builder's power;
Whilst thou, sublimer still, dost make appeal
To the amazed and awe-struck ear no less
Than to th' enraptur'd, overflowing eye!
Thou hast no rival. Earth had only need
Of one such model of stupendous skill,
To shadow forth His might and majesty,
Who gave thee all thy glory.

Feeble man,
In thine o'er mastering presence shrinks, appalled
At his own nothingness. Can his weak hand Prevent thy leap tremendous? Can he blow,
With vaunting wisdom's breath, the veil aside
That shrouds thine awful bosom, and behold
The dread abyss beneath? Or can he snatch
One jewel from the rainbow-diadem,
Wherewith the sun hath crowned thee sov'reign queen?

I tremble as I gaze:—and yet my soul
Revives again with this indwelling thought;—
That though thy stunning torrent pour itself
In undiminished volume, on and on,
For centuries unsumm'd,—there is a time,
When all that makes thee now so terrible,
(Yet in thy greatest terror, lovely still.)
Shall sink to silence quiet as the grave:
But now I stand upon thy fearful brink,
In mute, strange wonder rapt,—I, who appear
So evanescent when compared with thee,
Shall rise superior o'er this failing earth,
Whose ruins shall become thy sepulchre!

Livingston, Va.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1849, by John R. Thompson, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia.]

THE CHEVALIER MERLIN.

CHAPTER SEVENTH.

"The barber is a lank lean man, and noses
In every cupboard, like a queening dog,
To find some bone of scandal. He seems humble,
Timid, and modest; but beware him sirs,
For the keen newsmonger steals its secret
From the dumb face whereof he grasps the chin."
The Barber.

The footsteps heard by the Countess Hermione, as she conversed with Sir Ludwig of Felseck, were those of Merlin; but she was presently aware that from a different quarter other persons were approaching. In fact as the Norwegian swept aside the hangings from a more private entrance, and paused upon the threshold, a gentleman, leading by the hand a handsome boy, appeared in the ante-chamber. The countess, who had for a moment encountered her husband's glance, and smiled away the quarrel which had a little before left her in tears, turned to the new comers. She at once, upon catching a view of them, sprang to her feet, and ran to meet them, exclaiming—

"He is here, and I know not of it! Maurice—Maurice!"

Her countenance beaming with smiles and tears, she cast her arms about the boy—a pale-faced silent child with a thoughtful expression—and covered his cheeks, brow, and lips, with kisses.

"Beware, countess," said Sir Ludwig of Felseck.

"Beware? Certainly I shall not beware," the lady answered. "Good D'Imhoff, I salute you. Take my thanks for so charming a surprise."

She addressed these words to the boy's conductor, a noble looking person with an intelligent face somewhat farrrowed, and the carriage and air of a man of rank and fashion.

Sir Ludwig of Felseck then said, with a gesture toward the Norwegian:

"Countess, be conscious of the presence of this gentleman, who as master of the chateau, is doubtless entitled to an explanation which he is too courteous to ask."

The countess did not answer, but ran on in endearing talk to the boy.

"Maurice—Maurice—have you indeed come back to me? God bless you, dear child: you are bronzed like a Bohemian, and these misera-bles have shorn away your curls. Saucy boy, you are grown tall enough to be a brave page."

"This fair lady is engrossed, sir," said Sir Ludwig, "and I must speak in her place. Monsieur, I am called Sir Ludwig of Felseck. I stand in a near relation to the countess, your wife. This child is my son; this gentleman is my friend, the Chevalier D'Imhoff."

"Pardon me, my excellent husband," the countess added, "if I have been remiss. Sir Ludwig has spoken a part of the truth. He might also have informed you that from the birth of this child I have been a mother to him, and love him with quite a mother's devotion."

The eyes of the countess gleamed with a double meaning.

Merlin replied to these speeches. His confidence in their truth was not sure. He indeed saw nothing in a sure light. He had stumbled into a labyrinth, and shadows, deceptions, riddles surrounded him. Moreover his loss of self-respect had much injured his customary hearty freedom of manner. Sullen, embarrassed, and irritable, he had become a singularly different person from the frank and bold youth who had, so short a time before, left the Swedish shores with a heart full of honest love, and a spirit inflamed by gallant hopes.

"I receive your explanations," he said to Sir Ludwig. "I do not question you. It is unnecessary that I should assume the duty of giving you fair entertainment in this accursed chateau, where I am more a stranger than yourself."

"Accursed chateau! did he say accursed chateau? Mon Dieu! my husband, this is intolerable."

Merlin said with a sullen courtesy—"I withdraw the rude word, madam."

"That is well," replied the countess.

At this point in a scene embarrassing to all parties, a page brought to the Norwegian a sealed packet. Tearing it open he glanced to the bottom of a leaf, and, with a change of countenance, left the apartment, saying to the page:

"Go before, and conduct the messenger to some place of privacy; then return and let me know where you have bestowed him."

The name at the bottom of the leaf was that of Captain Piper. Enclosed were letters, several months old, from Mariana Sture and the good senator, directed to the camp of the king of Sweden. Captain Piper had written briefly as follows:

"Sir,—In passing I have learned enough to be assured that you delay in this neighbourhood. I am en route for Sweden, and send to you certain letters, the answers whereunto will be no burthen to your assiduous servant—

GUSTAVUS PIPER."

The reading of these words brought a rush of blood to the visage of the unhappy Norwegian. Shame and grief unmanned him; he feared to open the accompanying letters. When at last he overcame his nervous hesitation, and read page after page of sweet, hopeful, and confiding utterances, warm and eloquent from the pure heart of Mariana, his eyes became full of tears, and he sobbed heavily.

Then he heard a step near at hand, and a kindly voice said at the same moment:

"You seem unhappy."

He turned and saw the melancholy girl, Giselle. He remained silent.

"You suspect me, and rebuke me, sir," said the girl, interpreting his silence.

"Not so, maiden," he at length answered. "You have seemed to me dignified by sorrow, and of a spirit too grave for wanton arts. I have no confidence to give you, but also no rebuke."

"When tears are in the eyes of a child or a woman," said Giselle, "they are nothing. But when a strong man weeps, we wonder and are awed. But forgive me; I but yielded to an interest which your singular grief excited. You, naturally enough, withhold your confidence from me, and I leave you."

"Not so, girl," Merlin replied. "Tarry: you are honest, I think, where all else is deception. I have much to learn. I wander among mists. You perhaps will explain many things to me."

Giselle mused in silence. She presently said:

"I may explain a part—perhaps enough to serve you. But now, or before ample reflection, I will not trust myself to speak. Moreover we may be interrupted. After nightfall I will meet you in the Astrologer's tower—in that turret-chamber which you have at times used for your meditations. Some one approaches. A brave man may command fortune, and should not despair. Leave tears to the weak. Adieu."

As Giselle disappeared, the page, who had been sent to the bearer of the packet, returned to say that he had accomplished his errand. He then conducted the Norwegian to the same turret-chamber which the girl had selected for the promised interview. In this room, awaiting his coming with a fixed stoop in the shoulders, and looks downcast, but watchful in their humility, Merlin found the valet of Captain Piper, Eugenius Flavel.

"Master Flavel," he said with composure, "I remember a scene by lake Vettern, and recognise you without difficulty. I hold in my hand the despatches from Captain Piper. Where now is that gentleman? When came he from Sweden? Why does he return?"

The valet answered these questions. Captain

Piper had left Sweden within a month after the departure of the Norwegian himself; he had joined General Lewenhaupt, and would have followed with him on the course of King Charles, but a Polish count had run him through with a rapier at Wilna, in which town he had remained disabled by his wound. He was now returning, still disabled, to Sweden. The incidental quarrel had spoiled his Russian campaign. As for his present whereabouts, he delayed in a village three leagues distant, awaiting the return of his messenger from the Chateau d'Amour.

When this information had been extracted from Eugenius Flavel, with less difficulty than might have been expected from the taciturnity which was usual with him in the presence of his master, Merlin said in conclusion:

"Say to Captain Piper that I thank him for his civility in despatching this message to me; and that I will at another time, by another hand, make answer to certain papers which he has sent to me. Receive this reward for your pains, and return at once to your master."

Receiving with obsequious gratitude the gift of the Norwegian, the valet departed as he had come, under the guidance of the page. Let us follow him, to learn how he freighted himself with news. Conducted by the page, he stole on with the silent step of a cat, looking closely about him, and venturing upon questions to the boy. To these the latter answered with so little point that Flavel extracted nothing; the lad was evidently one of those light spirits that live unobscured, and are not reflective enough to be inquisitive or to satisfy the inquisitive. But as the two proceeded, the wise countenance of Wilhelm the steward became visible, and this apparition gave the valet better hopes. The steward coming forward spoke with a patronizing civility to the page, and, as desirous as Flavel himself of a conference which offered an opportunity of exhibiting his rhetorical skill, or at least of letting escape those floods of small talk which were distressing to him in their pent-up condition, took charge of that worthy person, and escorted him with ceremonious politeness to his own quiet sanctuary. Arrived there he made the valet welcome, and introduced him by word and example to a stoup of wine. Master Flavel drank warily, pleading the unseasonable morning hour.

"It is a popular fallacy, sir," said the steward, "which rules our appetites by the index of a clock, which is but unreflecting machinery. That hour which finds a man thirsty is the hour for his potation."

"How charmingly, Monsieur, your life must pass," said the valet looking around him.

"It has its dignities, and its enjoyments—perhaps not altogether unmerited—but also its troubles," Wilhelm responded with a sigh. Then, as the purpose of Master Flavel to get information was precisely his own, he brought the dialogue near to the subject upon which he was inquisitive.

"You had the honour," he observed, "to know the great Ritter, Prince Merlin, who is just now our master?"

"Yes," replied Flavel.

"Then," continued the steward, "you had the honour to know a very distinguished personage, a nobleman illustrious at home, in—surely those northern countries possess names with which I can never become familiar."

"Yes," replied Flavel.

"Hum,"—muttered the steward, "what was that yes for?" Then he proceeded—"A nobleman, I say, illustrious for his virtues and extensive possessions, to make no mention of a venerable ancestry. This distinguished Brightness you have had the honour to serve—eh?"

"Yes, Monsieur," said Flavel, "and I could acquaint you with some particulars concerning my lord."

"You are a polite person, and I drink to your health," said the triumphant steward whose vanity whispered that his adroitness had led the stranger to the verge of developments. "And now, my dear sir, proceed."

Flavel manifested no perception of the fact that he was expected to enter upon a narrative.

"When his Brightness left his regretting country," continued the steward, "and came, led by some vow, doubtless, riding like a private person"—

"Pardon me," interrupted Master Flavel; "it was rather with the brilliant escort of two hundred armed men, and with his banner displayed, that my lord travelled. You are certainly mistaken on that point."

"Mistaken!" retorted the steward. "Sir, that observation would alone prove you a stranger to this region. I pique myself, sir, and others have not been wanting in complimentary remark, upon the fidelity of my observation and the accuracy of my statements."

"But, Monsieur," persevered the valet, "you have been misinformed by some one disposed to practise upon your confiding disposition. My lord positively journeyed with such an escort as I have mentioned. You have been practised upon."

The steward became ruddy with passion.

"Practised upon! Holy St. Julian, saint of travellers! Am I unable to behold with my own eyes? His Brightness not only came without the escort you speak of, but when I went out to meet him, he was well-nigh in a condition of natural nakedness."

Master Flavel, with eyes and hands uplifted, expressed his amazement.

"Poor gentleman!" he murmured audibly; "to be exposed to this frosty atmosphere in such a defenceless condition!"

"You mistake," said the steward. "It was in sultry summer weather."

"My dear Monsieur," gently exclaimed Master Flavel, "now there can be no question but that you are mistaken. To within a fortnight past, my lord the illustrious Prince Merlin, has been known to be engaged in a desperate campaign against the rebels of the northern islands, who refused to supply my lord's purveyors with tribute-honey for my lord's mead. How then could my lord have appeared here in summer?"

"Sir," said the steward with a dignity becoming in such a functionary when outraged by extreme contradiction, "permit me to entertain you with a brief narrative. In the latter days of the last July my lord came to this region. It pleased him, riding alone, as I had the honour to signify to you, in his armour, ritterliche, to dismount and make his bath in a stream. Now, sir, there came to him, through the woodlands, certain facetious ladies, the excellent mistress of this chateau at their head; and, in their mirth, these ladies did bear off the clothing and other equipment of my lord. It was whilst in pursuit of his property that I beheld, with my own eyes, his approach, and that condition, near to natural nakedness, of which I spoke, and as to which you did me the respect to controvert me. To this chateau I escorted my lord. I witnessed within ten days thereafter a nuptial ceremony, a marriage of my lord to the countess my mistress—a marriage whereof I must not speak understandingly—and since that time, now three months ago, it has been my duty, as my pleasure, to attend daily upon the presence of my lord, the Ritter, his Brightness Prince Merlin—a plain tale—a plain tale, sir. I am gratified to perceive that I have been perspicuous enough to put to flight those opposite suppositions of your ignorance. I am never mistaken, sir—never."

"I believe you, Monsieur," said the valet. "You possess a genius for observation and for narrative, and your words carry conviction. Now I shall empty a cup to your health, and depart."

The steward became suddenly aware that the interview had resulted in his giving information to his guest, and receiving none in return.

"Delay, my dear sir," he said, "and partake of a slight refection which I will prepare for you."

Flavel, losing some of his civility now that he had drawn from his host such knowledge as he desired, rejected the proffered entertainment, and was in a few minutes on his return to his master,

Captain Piper, burthened with news destined to surprise that gentleman extremely.

CHAPTER EIGHTH.

"Your words, Timandra, lift me
From a dark vale of servitude, and seat me
Upon a hill of happiness."

The Bondman—Messenger.

The sun of that day was near its setting, when Merlin, who had withheld himself from the society of his countess and her guests, and passed his time in unhappy reflections, sallied from the castle on horseback. His purpose was not determinate: it was but for a greater privacy in his melancholy meditations that he rode abroad.

The letters from Sweden had brought freshly before his eyes the wretched ruin wrought by passion and folly. His heart ached; self-anger and utter misery overwhelmed him as he reined his horse in the light of the declining sun.

In his woe-begone and despairing mood, he tracked that forest through which he had passed on the day of his first approach to the Chateau d'Amour. Had he been less engrossed he might have observed several suspicious circumstances in the course of his ride. A shrill whistle sounded from an eminence in his rear, and was responded to by the same shrill notes from several points in the wood. The trampling of horses upon the sodden earth was audible. The shadows of the large trees, and the presence of copse-wood under them, did not altogether conceal the motions of numerous horsemen. If an ambuscade had been purposed, it was certainly conducted with little caution. At length these suspicious sounds and movements, which Merlin had noted as a man may note the passing to and fro of those who attend him in a fever fit, were followed by explanatory actions. A party of horse met him full in front; a similar body coming from the forest united in his rear; even the wood on either side presented under its shadows and amongst its covert, numbers of armed horsemen.

"Stand sir," said one of the cavaliers in his front.

The Norwegian, coming to a perception of the reality, said in some surprise but firmly:

"What is it that you desire?"

The first speaker answered:

"It happened, on a fair day, that Prince James Sobiesky and Prince Constantine his brother, rode into the forests near Breslaw for their divertimento. You bear in mind, sir, what befel the princes on that occasion. We have made a vow, which we are now able to fulfil, to render your majesty the victim of a similar romantic adventure. Come in peace; for, as you perceive, force will not avail you."

"I do not understand you," replied the Norwegian. "Neither do I care to oppose you. Lead on."

This apathy seemed to excite the surprise and comment of the troopers. After speaking among themselves, the company before him opened sufficiently to admit him into its midst. No force was used. The strangers seemed, indeed, to be under the influence of a sort of surly respect for their captive. In a few moments the dragoons, numbering full fifty men, were pricking on at a speedy gait, Merlin riding amongst them as careless of the result as if, like the Campeador, only his body left desolate of its spirit backed the bounding steed.

When the party had issued from the gloom of the wood into a plain, where the light of day still lingered, and indeed gathered increase from a broad moon which began to deepen in its yellow effulgence as the west faded, a sudden check occurred in its progress. This was occasioned by a communication spreading from near the person of the Norwegian to the extremities of the troop. When the halt had been accomplished, several horsemen, making their way through the now confused ranks, rode up to him.

"If it please you, sir," said one of these, "turn fully to the light."

Merlin not only complied with this request, but bared his head. His short auburn curls and his every feature were visible.

"We have fallen into an error," said the same speaker, who seemed to be a leader. "Your extraordinary stature must explain and excuse a very natural mistake. You are at liberty."

An hour after this adventure, the Norwegian, upon whom it made but a slight impression, re-entered the chateau. The promised interview with the damsel, Giselle, connecting as it did with subjects of a near interest to him, had not escaped his recollection. He proceeded at once to the turret-chamber appointed for the meeting. Giselle awaited his coming upon a bartizan, or balcony, on which the chamber opened.

"Giselle," he said, seating himself by her side, "speak to me clearly of the many mysteries which beset me in this new and most unhappy condition of my life."

"It is impossible," replied the girl firmly. "But ask, and what I am at liberty to explain, that I will."

"Tell me then," said Merlin, "who is this lady, whose miserable husband I have become? Many circumstances conspire to persuade me that the Countess Hermione of the Chateau d'Amour is but one of those feigned names, and designations, which the wit of woman is skilful to invent when she desires concealment."

"You have guessed the truth," Giselle answered. "It is not by her true name and designation, which her beauty, her power, her fortunes, and alas! her errors have made familiar to the world, that you know my mistress. But upon this point I will not, for I must not, speak more clearly."

"Now by the Gods," exclaimed the Norwegian, "you have spoken enough for my freedom. I have been wedded to a woman whose real name is not known to me, but concealed by her craft. I will break the bonds of this marriage, where there has been so vital a concealment. If they possessed the triple strength into which affection confirms them, I would yet break them, where imposture had been practised in a matter so sacred. You embolden my spirit, Giselle; for now you have given me a hope of escape from a captivity which gnaws at my heart and coarctates my very life-blood."

"And is it possible," said the girl, "that you have never suspected that escape lay open before you? That you had but to will a release to secure it?"

"Explain your meaning," said Merlin.

The girl paused. Presently she said as the result of swift reflection:

"The Countess Hermione is not your wife."

Merlin sprang to his feet.

"What is it that you say?" he cried. "The Countess Hermione is not my wife! Giselle, if you should be by my side when my soul takes its flight from my body, jest then rather than now."

"The Countess Hermione," the damsel spoke on calmly, "resorted to this miserable device to gild the grossness of an amour. She is not your wife. The priest who performed the rite on that wild and infamous evening, was Luigo Basili, my lady's Italian serving-man—a crafty wretch practised in disguises."

The Norwegian heard this speech to an end. He remained for a minute holding the girl's hand, and staring into the blue skies over which the starry wealth lay so brightly strewn. Then he said:

"It doubtless seems strange to you that I hear the story of so degrading a wrong without that natural anger which, in such a case, is not only excusable but becoming. But, truly, there is in the freedom to which I now learn my title so much to rejoice my spirit that I am forgiving of all else. My good Giselle, I left in the northern land, from which I came, a fair and nobly gifted maiden, who did not scorn to repay my devotion with a modest and constant affection. Of late I have dreamed of her as fallen angels might dream of the forfeited gardens of God. Your words now remove my despair. This, even this—great as must be the difficulty of reinstating my hopes fully, of undoing the work so madly done—is such a relief as makes, of itself, the difference between misery and happiness. I have no anger, no indignant rebuke, for the wild-hearted woman, of lawless passions and a false misleading beauty, into whose snares I fell. Giselle, I am again a man; erring indeed, but wiser from error; wounded by the adversary, repentant for a too swift surrender, but again buoyed by the uprising energies of my hope."

The girl seemed not fully to sympathise with him in his newly awakened fervour.

"In informing you of these things," she said, "my purpose has been not only to remove you from a state of dishonour, but to break a spell disgraceful to my mistress. Have you deemed her your wife, and yet possessed no love for her, no appreciation of much that is noble in her nature? Leave the chateau as speedily as may be; but, stranger, whose presence has proved a fruitful source of folly and sin, and to me of bitter regrets, do not altogether condemn my misguided mistress. She possesses high qualities to redeem her misleading ones. Bear with you a forgiving memory."

Giselle turned to depart. The Norwegian said to her:

"Stay, maiden. You will not speak to me more fully concerning the countess; but this knight of Felseck, and the chevalier his companion—who are they?"

"I am inexorably silent," the girl replied. "I have acquainted you with all that it suited my views that you should know, and perhaps with more than a proper respect for my mistress can justify."

She left the turret-chamber.

CHAPTER NINTH.

"It must be confessed that, in reflecting on the adventures of Charles of Sweden, on the personal strength of King Augustus, and the travels of the Czar Peter, one would be apt to think we lived in the days of Hercules and Theseus."—Voltaire.

The Countess Hermione, Sir Ludwig of Felseck, and the Chevalier D'Imhoff were feasting at a late hour. Some damsels in bright tunics, their bare arms glittering with bracelets as they were arched or thrown abroad in artful gestures, their taper feet flying with a free grace in spite of the high-heeled chioppines upon which they were stilted, performed a Polish dance. The natural locks of these damsels were drawn spirally, tier above tier, to a great height, and powdered until the topaz, gold, or ebony, of their hair had whitened into pearl. On this occasion, as if the freedom of the Chateau d'Amour had been restrained by the presence of her guests, the countess herself had controlled the flow of her brown hair, and wore it in a tower, on the embattled top of which a little banner drooped from a golden staff. Paikel, the Fool, with a diadem of paper, and a purple mantle, occupied the post of honour at the board, a throne-like chair, raised above the others, and coped with scarlet cloth which a metallic eagle gathered at the top into its talons. With his long peaked chin drooped to the yellow clasp of his mantle, Paikel sat sound asleep.

The Norwegian, fresh from his interview with Gtelle, joined the company. His countenance had lost its gloom. He came with a buoyant step, and even with the air of one for whom wine, women, music, and the dance have yet a charm unshadowed by the experiences of life. His arrival made a pause in the motions of the dancing girls, whom his melancholy and ill-temper had of late curbed in these exhibitions. But with some gay words he reassured them, and the nimble dance continued.

"My friend," said the countess, after a time, when the Norwegian had done honour to Sir Ludwig, and the chevalier his companion, in a goblet of that imperial wine from the hills watered by the Theias—"my friend, you again fascinate me—so happy is the change which seems to have visited you."

"And you, beautiful countess," Merlin replied in a gallant tone, "have never ceased to be fascinating."

The countess seemed surprised, then thoughtful, then troubled.

"There is then an obstacle in a course which seemed quite clear," she muttered. Then she added more audibly: "Do I indeed possess a place in your truant heart?"

Merlin evaded the question.

"Countess, tell me why it is that Paikel sits above the feast like a king."

Sir Ludwig answered in place of the lady.

"The jester has forgotten his art. It is proved that his wit is dead or in a trance; that his last merry flash preceded your arrival at this castle. He has become hopelessly stupid, and accounting him fit for nothing better, we have made a king of him, after the Polish mode, which you are aware is elective."

"Kings then are excessively stupid?"

"Otherwise, Monsieur," Sir Ludwig answered, "our jest would be pointless. But do you doubt a proposition universally sustained by facts?"

"Stanislaus," said Merlin, "the present king of this land, is reported a brave, wise, and good man."

"Stupid, Monsieur, stupid"—replied the knight of Felseck. "A virtuous country gentleman who has studied the Lives of Plutarch, but stupid."

"And Frederick Augustus," said the Norwegian, "the Elector of Saxony, the predecessor of Stanislaus on the throne of Poland—do you reckon of him also so lowly? Fame has been fond of that heroic king. His physical endowments, his deeds against the Turk, his princely munificence, his romantic adventures worthy to have been sung by a troubadour before a Court of Love in a contest for the prize of the golden violet, have indeed made him seem to his times a crowned knight of a more chivalric age."

Sir Ludwig buried his large features in a tankard of aleberry, flavoured with spices; when he had finished his draught, he replied:

"Augustus is no king, Monsieur. Possibly he might have continued to be one, had he possessed a reasonable hereditary phlegm and the staid sobriety of a Flemish coach horse. Augustus is not undeserving of your acquaintance. He has a heart for a fair woman, the thirst of a boon companion, a firm seat in his saddle, and can wind a mot on a hunting horn, or single the champion boar from a sounder of wild swine, and then spit him with his spear, with the best jager that ever spurred in the greenwood. Augustus, Monsieur, is much too engaging and excellent a person to be a king as kings are."

"What say you, sir, of Czar Peter?" Merlin asked. "He is winning renown by his policy. Do you not think nobly of this empire founder—this illuminator of barbarous races, who achieves in a few years the work of centuries?"

"A mere mechanic fellow," replied Sir Ludwig. "Peter is by no means a gentleman. His genius is pertinacity. He has done something to be sure. He has built a town amongst the nests of the sea-fowl, and he has cut off the beards of a great many of his people. The world call this founding an empire and civilizing barbarians. The Czar, Monsieur, if I had leisure to dilate, or you patience to follow me, would appear to be no exception to that proposition to which Paikel is indebted for his crown."

"You have said nothing of the king of Sweden," Merlin persevered.

Sir Ludwig growled like some monster of the forests when the hunter comes upon his lair.

"That king," he said, "is one of those damnable disturbers of the repose of better men, who worry the world with no more reason than the house dog shows when he assails the cat, chases the maids, and bites the men. You, countess, who knew him in Sweden amongst the pleasures of his court, and you, D'Imhoff, who dealt with him, at my side, at Clissau, and elsewhere, vouch what I say. Instead of able thoughts he pos-esses an aspiration, which a schoolmaster in Stockholm put into his head. He is as obstinate as Alexander the Great, whom he learned from the pedagogue that he resembled, or as the devil, or even as the Czar; consequently he follows his aspiration. He has the power of a brave nation at his back; consequently he is enabled to follow his aspiration successfully. I trust that Peter and this king of Sweden will grapple in the wilderness, like bear and dog, and never loose hold with life. I had the honour, Monsieur, to attend the person of Augustus, the Elector, of whom you are so good-natured as to speak approvingly, and for whom I must admit that I do myself entertain some indulging sentiments—I had the honour, I say, to be with him on two marked occasions: at Berzin where he met the Czar, and at Altranstad where he met the king of Sweden."

"Sir Ludwig, you delight me," cried the Countess Hermione. "Do we not walk adroitly on the verges? Do not beware—for beware is one of the miserable self-guarding words of tame persons."

"Countess," replied Sir Ludwig, who availed himself of the interruption to bury the lower portion of his bearded face in the tankard, "I admire you excessively. Beware is an odious word, which you never have been so absurd as to tolerate when disposed to an aberration. We must chase it from our vocabulary like a bat from amongst the lights of a Paphian bower. Monsieur, when the Elector, then king of Poland, met the Czar at Berzin, Europe awaited the result of their deliberations. Now it is a fact that both were drunk for the three days of their personal interview. We brought away the king of Poland, in a horse litter, in a bewildered condition. It was only after a considerable interval of time that he was able to relate, or even recal, the circumstances of the meeting. He has several times assured me that no politic discussion at all was held. The Czar, who is habituated to the use of aquafortis, is supposed to have endured the debauch better. Again at Altranstad, the king of Sweden, in that interview which politicians had with great pains brought about, and from which the peace of the world might be hoped to receive a guaranty, informed Augustus that he had not laid aside his coarse blue coat with gilt brass buttons, or his piece of black taffety which served for a cravat, or his jack-boots, for six years, except when he went to bed—and not always then."

"What charming information," said the countess. "And the unfortunate Elector, dethroned by the wearer of the boots—how did he receive the statement?"

"Of course he discussed the topic selected by the master of an invincible army, as if it was the most interesting one imaginable. When the boots and coat were sufficiently discussed, the potentates parted, and Europe breathed freely again. Kings, Monsieur, are very absurd creatures. If Augustus ever possessed those chivalric virtues and refinements of which you spoke, they have been trodden in a great degree out of him by adversity and a dull modern custom; and perhaps if restored to his crown he would prove no better than his royal brothers. We have deemed Paikel stupid enough to be entitled to a crown. And certainly he makes an unusually good king, for his stupidity is pacific. It would be better for the world if royalty slept oftener as Paikel sleeps—less mischief would go with crowns; better for kings themselves, for the slumber that disables mischief drowns sorrow." Sir Ludwig's visage wore something like a sad gravity as he ended; the expression lingered, however, but for a moment.

Merlin, to whom the public events of several months were almost wholly unknown, and who, since the developments which Giselle had made, had renewed his purpose to follow—and that at once—the king of Sweden, begged the knight of Felseck to acquaint him with the movements of the Swedish army. Sir Ludwig informed him that Charles had marched toward Smolensko, but that, although every where victorious, he had turned from the Smolensko route and gone southward to combine with Mazepa the Hetman, and was doubtless now in the Ukraine country.

"The route which the king opened," continued Sir Ludwig, "is now beset by the Muscovite forces. The wave has closed behind him, and his general, Lewenhaupt, will have to cleave it anew to come up with him. He must have a wild work of it."

"How far has this general, Lewenhaupt, gone upon the course of the king of Sweden?" Merlin asked.

"Perhaps he has passed the Berozine," answered Sir Ludwig. "And, Monsieur," the knight continued, "if it be your purpose to fly the charms of your countess, and join the banner of the king of Sweden, as has been suggested to me, you will find the wake of Lewenhaupt as thoroughly closed as that of his master. A cavalier, weakly attended, if he possessed the enterprise and prowess of Sir Roland himself, could not make his way in that direction. Your better route lies southward by the marshes of Rokitus, and by Owruetz. You should aim, pursuing this route, for Kiovja on the Boristhenes."

"My questions are not idle," said Merlin; "for I purpose, sir, with this lady's will, to depart for the Swedish camp, and that speedily—even so soon as by an early hour to-morrow."

The countess opened her bright eyes to their full extent.

"This indeed is sudden," she said. "Judith, lead the dance—let there be loud music." Then to Merlin: "Enchanter, receive my hand and lead me apart, that we may speak without reserve. The approaching wings of a sad hour darken the air of my enjoyment."

Merlin led the countess Hermione into an embayed recess of the deep wall. There, with their speech drowned to other ears, they conversed. At length they came forth. The countess seemed pensive. She said to Sir Ludwig:

"You are aware that I have practised a deception upon this gentleman. He has discovered it. Perhaps it is well that he has done so. It is his purpose to depart, as he informed you, to-morrow. You must therefore to-night bestow upon him the honour which I besought for him of your goodness."

"Besought, countess? You rather commanded!"

"Be it so then. But you will yield to me in this. Make this wronged gentleman a knight, and a member of your renowned order of the White Eagle."

"Certain observances are necessary," answered Sir Ludwig, "which require time."

"They can be put aside," the countess insisted. "It is a case of emergency. Dub him a knight, and avow him of your order, as you might do in the crisis of a battle."

"As you choose, madam," Sir Ludwig replied. "The last received members were a traitorous prince, and a Jew banker. If this stranger is not worth a thousand of them, I am not able to judge a man of worth and mettle by his exterior."

Merlin, wondering at this dialogue, said with some earnestness:

"Who are you, sir, that undertake to dispense high honours? I have already been made the butt of masquerading practices in this castle. I believe that a man of honour, as I take you to be, will not lend his aid to a renewal of such practices—practices only to be forgiven in a beautiful woman."

"You will find me in dead earnest," said Sir Ludwig. Then to an attendant: "Bring me the great sword of Duke Hildebrand."

The sword, an immensely large weapon, with a blade of dim blue steel, was brought.

"You desire, Monsieur," Sir Ludwig resumed, "to know me. I see no good cause for keeping you in ignorance, as our fellowship is presently to end, and our travel to diverge. I am that dethroned King of Poland of whom you have spoken in terms of exaggerated approbation. I am Frederick Augustus."

The Norwegian received this avowal with a profound inclination, and said with a mingled expression of surprise and veneration:

"Sir, some wandering thoughts have heretofore assailed me of your majesty's higher condition."

"Perhaps you will permit me to confer upon you," said Augustus, "those honours to which you were just now reluctant."

"I am not at all proved by action sir," Merlin answered, "and it must be a subject of complaint to the illustrious men who are enrolled in your order of the White Eagle, to bring into their ranks a stranger of no fame."

"Your modesty, brave gentleman, is good proof of worth," said Augustus. "Moreover this countess insists, and we are inferior in obstinacy to some other princes." Then he muttered to the Chevalier D'Imhoff—"I am a little unsteady. I shall find it more difficult than I supposed, to go through this matter. Take care D'Imhoff—give me the sword of Duke Hildebrand. By gallant St. George, if my legs are at fault, the potatoes have at least improved the vigour of my arms. I could cleave the fellow to the chine."

"Do not mistake so far as to do so, sire," said the chevalier."

The Norwegian, to whom a freak of fortune proffered such an honour as brave men of high rank might contend to reach as the recompense for life-long toils, perils, and self-denials, determined, whatever might be the circumstances attending the bestowal of it, to receive it. He knelt before the Elector. The Countess Hermione, folding her arms, repressed by her imperious demeanour a disposition on the part not only of the spectators, but of Augustus himself, to make a jest of the grave ceremony.

Her frown daunted the dancing girls, and put the Elector upon his guard. He performed his part with only one deviation from dignity. One of the ornaments, swinging from the ceiling above him, was a silver saint holding a demon; of baser metal, by tail and feet. This with other cressets of quaint device lighted the apartment; for from the upturned face of the suspended demon, flaring out at eyes, nostrils, and mouth, flames issued. The unnecessary vigor with which the Elector wielded the gigantic sword severed saint and devil from the ceiling, and brought them down first upon his own shoulders and then, by rebound, amongst the damsels who were grouped behind him. With this exception, Merlin Brand was dubbed a knight with suitable decorum. He was subsequently made, by a brief process, and recognised in a formula rather fantastic for the age, a member of the knightly brotherhood of the White Eagle. D'Imhoff, an officer of that order, received the Elector's command to attend to the enrolment. The ensign of the order, a white rosette with a central medallion bearing the image of an eagle, Augustus took from his own bosom, where he had worn it concealed, and suspended it by its cordon upon the breast of the Chevalier Merlin.

"We do these things hastily, and with some omissions," said the Elector, "but with none so fatal as marked a former ceremony to which you were subjected. You are more surely a knight, and a brother of our order, my dear chevalier, than you ever were a husband. And now that we have finished this business, the night is not so late but that we may return to our amusements. Is the Fool never awake with the hubbub? We have knighted a soldier, and saint and devil have been by the ears, and he still sleeps. He has drunk the draught of Iamblicus and his six brothers. Touch his crown with a torch. Perhaps he may awake mirthful after slumbers so remarkable."

As the paper circlet blazed, the countess, finding that the Norwegian was no where visible, went swiftly in pursuit of him. The unwedded pair were presently together with none near to witness their meeting. A lamp, expiring on the wall near them, struggled with the moonlight, which entered at a machicolle, or shot-window. The countenance of Lady Hermione was visible, with its many blended expressions, in this light.

"Assure me before we part," she said, with a tone not a little touching, "that you will, at times, remember me gently and forgivingly."

"I cannot fail to do so," the Norwegian answered. "In truth, but for a heart preoccupied, I could have forgotten the world in the delights of this Capua. Surely I shall have many romantic and tender thoughts of this our extraordinary union, mysterious Hermione."

"Yee—call me Hermione," said the countess with a sigh. "It possesses a pleasant sound from your lips. Chevalier Merlin, there are times, and perhaps this is one of them, when I regret that we cannot forever be Merlin and Hermione, and shut the troubled world, with its iron duties and dark passions, quite out from our castle of love."

"I have urged you hitherto," said the Norwegian, "to be frank with me, and to let me know your true name. This I may sometimes have urged from mere curiosity. I do not urge it now; but, assuredly, I do desire to know, without mystery or reservation, this bright lady who has been so near to me, and who must so frequently visit my reflections during the remainder of my life."

"Sir Merlin," replied the lady, "remember me in your love as Hermione, in your prayers as the Countess of Konigsmark."

The Norwegian heard this avowal of the identity of the countess with the most celebrated woman of her times, with scarcely a mark of surprise.

"To speak the truth madam," he said, "I have imagined as much, since I learned the true rank of the knight of Felseck. Fame has united your proud names inseparably. But still, have I not reason to be incredulous? Can you be indeed that lady whose fidelity, to an unfortunate prince, has been held to redeem a passionate error, and to give the veil of virtue to a mere union par amours? The dame of the bright wit—of the wonderful eloquence trained in the music of many tongues—the saint of adoring poets, and the chosen friend of philosophers—the sparkling creature, full of beauty, grace, and generosity beyond praise or computation—such has fame spoken the Countess of Konigsmark; and you, lady, may seem to me all this. But the Countess of Konigsmark is reported to have maintained her constancy to her lover and lord with a fervour that grew with his misfortunes. You hurried into involvement with a mere adventurous soldier—a stranger. I believe, but am full of wonder."

"If you have not penetrated the mystery of my nature," said the Countess of Konigsmark—"if you have not learned to account for its contradictions in our experience as husband and wife, a few words now cannot possibly enlighten you. Suffice it that I do retain an affection as profound as affection can be where right does not consecrate it, for another, and yet have wasted and still waste some tenderness upon yourself. Remember, my friend, that he whom I for a time seemed to desert has placed no sacred pale about my heart, but left it like a wild bird with the privilege of roaming. Would that I had been his true wife as I have been your feigned one. How staunch would I not have been in glory or sorrow! But now we must part. When we meet for a few brief moments to-morrow, we meet as the Chevalier Merlin and the Countess of Konigsmark. Have you now, at this parting moment, no kiss for the lips of Hermione?"

This gentle ceremony of love was enacted. Merlin pressed the dewy lips of the lady. In a moment after, she had flitted like a shadow from her place, and he stood alone.

ANSWER TO CANNING'S ENIGMA.

Cares is a noun of plural number,
Foe to sleep and quiet slumber;
But Sally comes and with an S,
Turns bitter cares to sweet Carres.

AFFLICTIONS.

BY SIDNEY DYER.

There are moments that come in their sombre array
 Like thoughts of the shroud and the tomb,
 When the light from the eye and the cheek fades away,
 And sets in the night of their gloom.
 Less joyous, 'tis true, for a time may appear
 These hours of affliction and pain,
 Than the "daughters of music" whose song charms the ear
 As the Syran's bewildering strain.
 But O! to the humble these moments of night
 Are dearer than all that may shine,
 For they see through the darkness the dawn of that light,
 Which glows with a radiance divine!

There's a beam still remaining when darkness is near,
 More beautiful than that of the noon,
 In glory it waits till the planets appear,
 And the billow embraces the moon;
 A melody lingers awhile in the sky,
 When the shock of the thunder is o'er,
 And the wave leaves a murmur of music on high,
 When it breaks and recedes on the shore;
 And thus each affliction, howe'er it may pain,
 Brings a joy that forbids us to pine,
 And the harp struck to sorrow awakens a strain,
 That thrills to a rapture divine!

The friendships of earth may appear for awhile
 The truest and best to the heart,
 But O! how they change with Prosperity's smile,
 As the goddess is seen to depart!
 There's a friend who remains in adversity's night
 As true as in days that are flown,
 His beams on the lowly with smiles of delight
 And makes all their sorrows his own,
 For His love which alone has the power to save,
 Beams brightly round life's sad decline,
 And o'er the disheartening gloom of the grave
 Diffuses a lustre divine!

PROVINCIALISMS.

It does not follow that because there are no provinces in the United States, no provincialisms are to be found among the people. Social peculiarities of phraseology, precisely analogous to those which in England would be denounced as provincialisms, are to be met with here in rich abundance. But there is a strong disposition on the part of our countrymen to think their own peculiarities of this kind entitled to higher respect than they would themselves accord to those of the Scotch and the Irish. Freed from the domination of the English government, they seem determined also to emancipate themselves from the shackles of the English dictionary and grammar, as if submission to even that species of constraint were a disgraceful badge of colonial vassalage, and as if American innovations upon the English Language were a suitable concomitant or necessary consequence of American reforms in the principles of government. It has recently become notorious that the Harpers of New York, the most considerable of the American publishers of books, have been for years engaged in a systematic and most impudent attempt to level all writers, whether English or American, to their own favorite Yankee standard of orthography. It is difficult to say whether efforts to Americanize the English language are more deserving of ridicule or of reprehension. That noble language has now become the heritage of the world. It is spoken not merely by the people of the British Islands and of the United States, but by those of the extensive British provinces and colonies on this continent, in the West Indies, in Asia, Africa and Australia. The common care of the Anglo-Saxon race throughout the world should be to preserve the English language in its purity, and transmit it pure to the countless millions destined to speak it in another age. But even were it desirable (as it is not) to impress upon the language the stamp of American innovations, the history of colonization in every period of the world shows that it would be impossible to accomplish such a result. Physical force and political power may shift from the mother country to the colonial settlement, and the latter may equal or surpass the former, in wealth, in luxury, and in general refinement; yet in all changes and revolutions, the standard of the common language remains immovable, and every question about the purity or legitimacy of a word or phrase is solved by an appeal to the usage of the educated and the polite in the mother country. Sicily, Grecian Italy, Macedonia and Grecian Egypt, became successively more powerful than Greece, the mother country of them all; but all of them, and all other countries colonized from old Greece, always retained and acknowledged their inferiority and dependence, so far as related to the common language. The mother country, and Athens the capital of its civilization, continued to the last to dictate the laws of the Greek language, wherever in its wide diffusion that language might be spoken. And so it must be in regard to the English language. The standard of its purity must always be found in England, and American innovations must always be contemned and rejected, by the overwhelming majority of the people who speak the language, as mere corruptions,—as mere local cant and provincialism.

I have often heard it remarked, and sometimes by northern men, that in the Southern States the English language is spoken and written by the well educated with greater purity and correctness, than by the corresponding class of persons in the Northern States. Whether the remark is upon the whole a just one, I do not know. Yet it is countenanced by several peculiarities of diction prevalent among our brethren of the North, some of which are constantly to be met with in the writings of men of literary pretension, and even of literary eminence, and seem to be employed by them with the most exemplary and undoubting faith in their legitimacy. The few that I now proceed to specify, however firmly they may be rooted in the Yankee dialect, will scarcely be considered by an educated Southron or Englishman as properly belonging to the English language.

A reverend doctor of divinity, well known in Philadelphia, in an essay on christian baptism, published a few weeks ago, (that is to say, sometime in June 1849,) in the newspaper called "The Christian Observer," says that pouring water on to the fists is the proper translation of a phrase in the Greek, usually rendered pouring water upon the hands. He thus evidently employs the particles on to as equivalent to upon; and the same use of the same particles is exceedingly common among writers of even greater reputation than the reverend essayist. That it is a mere provincialism, unworthy of an educated man, can scarcely be questioned: for though correct speech admits the same combination of the same particles, it is with a signification wholly different from that imposed by the reverend doctor and his northern brethren, whether literary or illiterate. A Southern minister of the Gospel, walking to church in company with this learned theologian of Philadelphia, might simply and naturally say, if he thought they were in danger of being too late, "Come, let us get on to the church"; and no Englishman would perceive any thing remarkable in the exhortation; he would understand it as simply meaning, "Let us get forward, or onward, to the church." Yet the reverend Philadelphian would doubtless halt in great astonishment, and stare at his clerical ally as if he deemed his reason unsettled, thinking he had proposed the unseemly exhibition of bestriding the roof of the sacred edifice. The luckless Southron might find great difficulty in making it understood that he had been speaking English, and not Yankee, and that he had no intention to indulge in irreverent or unbecoming levity. And if the same reverend doctor should chance to be subject to a failing very common among learned men, that of forgetfulness, and should unduly delay his preparations for keeping an appointment to preach at a station somewhat remote, his ears would no doubt give smooth and approving admittance to an admonition from a relative or servant, couched in terms like these:—"Sir, in view of Sabbath, it is time for you to pour some water on to your fists and face, and get on to your beast's back."

In a book called "The Wonders of the Heavens," by Alden Bradford, published about a dozen years ago, (in Boston, I think, though in that particular my recollection may be erroneous, as it is long since I saw a copy of the work) the compiler introduces a short mythological account of the signs of the zodiac, and of the constellation Gemini, or "The Twins," among the rest. These twins, he informs us, were Castor and Pollux, who, while they sojourned upon earth, were engaged in the famous Argonautic expedition, in which "they conducted with great gallantry." And nothing is more common than to see in the writings and to hear in the conversation of Northern men a similar use of the verb conduct. A Southron, who had learned at school and college that this verb is active, and that it grammatically requires an express noun substantive following, would naturally, upon hearing from a northern man that upon some occasion, John Smith the ubiquitous had conducted with great gallantry, listen in expectation of being forthwith informed what it was that John Smith had so gallantly conducted,—whether himself, or a troop of horse, or another man's wife. But he would listen in vain. Only by specific enquiry might he learn, or by mere conjecture conclude, that the thing which John Smith conducted with great gallantry, was no other than the gallant John Smith's own proper self.

I once knew a gentleman from one of the Northern States, who, on being asked at table what he would choose to eat, was in the habit of responding, "I've a notion to an egg," or "to a potato," or to anything else he might happen to approve at the time. Whether this very odd phrase is common among the better educated of the Northern people, I have never learned. The gentleman in question, like the reverend doctor already mentioned, was both theological and literary.

"In view of these facts—these circumstances—these considerations," or the like, is a form of speech that I suspect is not indigenous, but borrowed, though I have little doubt that it was first received in the Northern part of the Union, and thence diffused through the other portions. So common has it now become, that scarcely a State paper, petition, or memorial of any sort, scarcely a dissertation on any subject, whether moral, political, theological or miscellaneous, scarcely even an editorial article of half a column in a newspaper, can be concocted in these United States, without pressing this everlasting phrase into the service. Were it the very best of all possible or imaginable phrases, such incessant repetition would suffice to render it wearisome beyond endurance. But instead of being the best, it seems to me the worst, or among the worst; worthy to be expelled from our own language, even if indigenuous, rather than to be adopted and incorporated into ours by translation out of another. My chief objections to the phrase are the following. First, It is justly liable to exception for ambiguity. We know indeed that men have eyes and the faculty of viewing, and that facts have not, and therefore, when a man says that in view of certain facts he draws certain conclusions, we infer his meaning to be, that he himself is the viewer, and that the facts are merely objects to be viewed; though the reverse of that meaning would suit the words just as well. Secondly, When a man is said to be in view of a certain object, it is not clearly or necessarily imported that he is viewing or looking at the object, but only that the object is within his range or scope of view. Perhaps the latter meaning would most commonly, as it might with at least equal propriety, be attributed to those words; yet in the phrase under consideration, the other meaning must be arbitrarily imposed upon them, in order to repel the danger of flagrant nonsense. Thirdly, When it is said that a man, in view of certain facts, (that is, viewing or considering certain facts) draws a certain conclusion, we are only informed that he views those facts and draws that conclusion; not that he draws the conclusion because he views the facts. The dependence of the one act upon the other, the consequence of the one from the other, is nowise asserted; and though we assume or infer such dependence and consequence to be intended by the speaker, and do so without difficulty or hesitation, it is only because his words would of themselves import a mere absurdity. In point of logical precision and grammatical propriety, it is no better to say that a man eats his dinner in view of hunger, than to say that he does the same act in view of a church. Fourthly, I incline to believe that the phrase in question is an idiom adopted from the French language, though even there it seems to be ambiguous and worthless. Boyer in his French dictionary, under the word Vue, gives the following examples of the use of that word: "Etre à vue de terre, to be in sight of land: Etre en vue de la terre, to be seen from the land without discovering land."

We of the South have been so often and so earnestly assured by our northern brethren (who of course should know best) that they are immeasurably superior to us in industry, energy, enterprise, commerce, agriculture, manufactures, proliferation, arts, sciences, literature, theology, religion, morality, and in all the virtues, accomplishments and good gifts of human nature, that we should be worse than infidels if we entertained a single doubt of the fact. Under the humiliating sense of inferiority in matters so numerous and important, it is a comfort to discover that there are still some things, few and trivial though they may be, in which the imitation of our betters would not be for the better, but for the worse.

P.

SONNET.

No wind, not even a fluttering breath had given
 Apparent motion to that land-girt bay,
 Still as the stagnant soul the water lay,
 Sombre beneath the starless cope of Heaven,
 Save where it met the shore, or rippled 'round
 A few, worn trunks that near it stood upright,
 And there, broke into sparkling lines of light,
 Making a faint, and yet not mournful sound.
 An image, mused I, of our changeful life!
 Dark must their course be ever, who repose
 On joys of sense, dead to all active good;
 If happiness were rightly understood,
 It would be won with struggles and with blows;
 Our brightest moments are struck out in strife.

AGLAUS.

THE SELDENS OF SHERWOOD.

CHAPTER IV.

In common worldly things 'tis call'd ungrateful
 With dull unwillingness to pay a debt,
 Which, with a bounteous hand was kindly lent:
 Much more to be thus opposite to Heav'n's,
 For it requires the royal debt it lent you.

Shakespeare.

Two years had elapsed, since Mr. Selden's permission had been so reluctantly obtained for Charles' entering the ministry, if his resolution remained unchanged after a probationary term of six months. These six months had been spent by Charles, in strict accordance with his father's wish, in active employment, and more frequent intercourse with society, and as a last remedy, which Mr. Selden trusted would be particularly efficacious in his diseased state of mind, he had paid a visit of many weeks to his aunt, Mrs. Lennox.

This lady was a sister of Mr. Selden's, who had married early in life, and settled in Maryland, and though Mr. Selden and herself had seldom met since her marriage, he still remembered her with affection, and was likewise proud of her character and standing in society. She had been a widow for many years, and though, after a decent period of retirement after her husband's death, she had mixed as cheerfully and as frequently in the business and pleasures of the world as formerly, she had shown no sort of disposition to form a second matrimonial connection. Her time and attention were chiefly devoted to the management of her affairs, which were ordered with a degree of decision and good sense, that obtained for her a high degree of consideration and respect, affording one of the innumerable instances of the verification of the text, "If thou doest well to thyself, men shall praise thee." Comfort and elegance were seen and felt in all her household arrangements, and her daughters, for she had no sons, were carefully educated, that is, they were instructed not only in the ordinary, but also in the extraordinary branches of learning, for which teachers could be procured. They were highly accomplished, according to the fashion of the day, and were taught to pay the strictest regard to the most minute particulars relating to manner, dress, or personal appearance.

Louisa Lennox, the eldest daughter, was particularly admired for her beauty and accomplishments, and Mr. Selden had always wished that a marriage should take place between Charles and herself. To bring this desirable event about he thought it highly probable that nothing more would be requisite than to make the parties acquainted, and this he trusted would prove the very plan for inducing Charles voluntarily to abandon his determination to become a minister. But this scheme, like most others of the same nature, proved a complete failure, Charles returned from this visit heart whole, and in all respects the same, except that a little more polish and ease were perceptible in his manner, as the necessary consequence of constant association with ladies, who sedulously attended to all the conventional observances of good breeding, and gave the tone of fashion to their own little world. Charles Selden's commendations of Louisa Lennox's accomplishments, his praises of her dazzling beauty, made his indifference still more provoking to his father, and he was disposed to regard his insensibility as arising from the spirit of contradiction, and a determination to thwart all his plans. Even the remonstrances of Mrs. Selden failed, at first, to produce their usual effect of dispelling his vexation, but the mildness and good sense with which she represented the unreasonableness of being angry with Charles for not complying with a wish which he had purposely concealed from him, at length, nearly restored his good humor.

Mr. Selden was naturally kind, good humored, and not at all disposed to exercise unreasonable authority. Charles had complied cheerfully with his part of the bargain, and he felt himself bound both in honor and kindness to make no farther opposition to his plan of life, either by remonstrance, argument, or those sort of negative influences so well described by the common expression of throwing cold water upon any thing, which is often found, in the long run, to be the most effectual mode of opposition.

Reginald and Arthur were scarcely less opposed than their father to Charles' determination, and they tried to shake it by the united powers of ridicule, persuasion, and argument. They were surprised at the firmness, mildness, and unwearied good humor with which Charles met their attacks, and were sometimes obliged to acknowledge, that he had vanquished them with their own weapons. Mrs. Selden and Margaret were the only members of the family who encouraged Charles by their cordial approbation. Virginia did not attempt to oppose his design, but it was evident there was something in it which was not agreeable to her feelings. It seemed to her to be a great pity, that the eldest son, one to whom she had looked especially to support the honor of the family, so intellectual, so agreeable, so young, and so full of life, should sink down into a mere country parson. The day had not yet arrived when interesting young ministers could conjure up romantic associations, and when they might appear with their full, dark eyes of unearthly lustre, their lofty brows excelling the Parian marble in whiteness, and their pale cheeks with one bright pink spot, in the pages even of the most fashionable poem or novel. The only romantic idea of a minister that had ever presented itself to the imagination of Virginia was that of some venerable Catholic priest with silver hair, bending under the weight of age, pale with vigils and fastings, performing the imposing rites of his faith, in some ancient Gothic church, or chapel, ornamented with paintings of Italian or Spanish masters, while strains of solemn and unearthly music were breathing around.

Yet Virginia had been so carefully educated in religious principles, and so accustomed to regard her mother's opinions with the utmost respect and deference, that she would not have ventured a word of open disapprobation, especially as she had no reason to give for her averseness to Charles' becoming a minister, which she thought would account satisfactorily either to her mother or Margaret for her opposition. She had nothing to urge against it but feeling, and such feeling too, as she was sure they would not approve. Virginia could not hear, without pain, the lightest word of disapprobation, even from an indifferent person, but from those she loved it was insupportable, and a word or jest, which would be forgotten almost as soon as uttered, if addressed to a person of ordinary sensibility, would instantly bring tears to her eyes, and be long remembered by her with pain.

It rarely happens that any course of conduct, evidently springing from principle, and maintained with firmness and good humor, does not succeed in gaining respect and overcoming opposition. Charles Selden was so consistent in his conduct, so natural and kind in his manner, and defended his own views and opinions with so much good sense and earnest feeling, that he was given up at length, by his friends, to pursue his own way quietly, even if his father renounced all hope that he would relinquish his plans. Mr. Selden was a very affectionate father, and since he became convinced that the favorite schemes which he had cherished for his eldest son would never be accomplished, he began to think how Charles' happiness could best be promoted in his own way. It was but a few years before this period that the Act of Legislature had passed which deprived the Episcopal Church of the glebe lands, and Mr. Selden would have considered this circumstance as adding tenfold to the worldly disadvantages which his son must incur in becoming a minister, had he not fortunately possessed the means of independence, without the pecuniary aid of his parishioners. A moderate fortune had been bequeathed to Charles, while yet a child, by a bachelor uncle. Mr. Selden's idea of justice would not have permitted him to regard the law of primogeniture, in the testamentary disposition of his property, yet he did not like the idea that Sherwood and all the noble improvements about it must go down, because he was not able to give any one of his sons a sufficient portion to keep it up properly; he had, therefore, been much pleased at this additional property which had fallen to Charles, regarding it as the means of keeping up the dignity of the family; he would not have said rank, even in his heart, this would have been an unpardonably aristocratic idea, but a wish to maintain the dignity of the family was legitimate even in a republican.

Charles was well aware how entirely the course of life he had entered upon, militated against his father's views with regard to the station in society which he wished the future head of his family to maintain, and was much concerned at the disappointment which he had himself occasioned. To remedy as much as possible all the unpleasant consequences which would arise from his devoting himself to the ministry, he endeavored to persuade his father that it was natural, and more suitable that Reginald should, as it regarded all worldly distinctions, be now considered as his eldest son, and chosen as the future heir of Sherwood. Mr. Selden strenuously resisted the proposal, he could not bear the idea of depriving Charles of his birthright, as he had always considered it, and he thought such a request could only have originated from wounded feeling. He imagined Charles was hurt at his disapprobation, perhaps thought himself lowered in his affection or esteem, by his embracing a profession which he certainly should not have chosen for him, which moreover thwarted some of his favorite schemes, but which was a learned and honorable one, and one, too, which he had evidently chosen as much from principle as from inclination. Even if it were mistaken principle, still steadiness and consistency of principle must be respected, especially in so young a man as Charles.

Thoughts such as these passed rapidly through Mr. Selden's mind, when Charles conversed with him on this subject, for the first time, and he positively refused to listen to the proposal with a degree of affectionate warmth, which convinced Charles of his sincerity. Charles, however, urged his point with so much frankness and kind good humor, as to convince his father that he was not actuated in making the request by any thing like wounded feeling. He spoke so unaffectedly and kindly of Reginald's talents and acquirements, of the probability that he would make for himself a name, and of the dignity with which he would represent the family, that Mr. Selden doubted not for a moment, that these praises sprang from his heart, and he listened to him with admiration and regret, regret that he had thus persisted in renouncing a station in society which he was himself so well qualified to adorn. Charles perceiving that his father listened to him in silence, began to think that his resolution wavered, or that he perhaps hesitated, from delicacy to himself, to express the real grounds of his objection to Reginald's becoming the heir of Sherwood. He knew that Mr. Selden had always thought that the property bequeathed to him by his uncle, which had been much increased by judicious management, could alone have enabled him to keep up Sherwood properly, as a child's portion of the estate would have been insufficient for the purpose.

After a moment's pause, Charles resumed "There is one reasonable objection, I am aware, to this plan; a large house and extensive grounds are only sources of vexation and embarrassment to a man of moderate fortune. A child's portion of your estate would scarcely enable Reginald to keep up Sherwood, even with shabby gentility. I could not see the old place go down, without pain, and request you, not entirely from disinterested motives, to add the portion which you instead for me to my brother's; this is no affected or overstrained generosity, for you know the kindness of my uncle has left me more than sufficiently provided for the way of life I have chosen."

"Never, never, my dear boy: I should not believe any one but yourself to be in earnest in making such a proposition. No, I will not disinherit you because you do not happen to think as I do. Even if I were to consent that Reginald should inherit Sherwood, I could not for a moment listen to the proposal that you have just made. You must not mention it to me again, unless you wish to displease and wound me. Reginald has commenced the practice of law—let him depend on his own exertions for acquiring additional property, should Sherwood ever be his; of which I am by no means sure. I must take time to consider of it. Say no more," he added, observing Charles about to reply.

Charles was silent, but his eye plainly expressed what he wished his father's determination to be, and he felt almost certain that his wish, as far as regarded the transference of Sherwood to Reginald, would be granted. Mr. Selden was not apt to waver in his resolutions, or to adopt new plans of action at the suggestion of any one; and Charles was sure from his promise to consider of the plan, that it accorded in a great measure with views and feelings hitherto unacknowledged to himself. He did not doubt that Mr. Selden still loved him, but was not that love lessened since the pride and hope, which mingle so largely in most men's affections for their sons, had been crushed by his choice of a profession? How often had this question arisen in his heart, and how often had he checked, though never answered it!

Charles had fully weighed, and thoroughly understood, all the sacrifices which his choice of a profession involved; nor did he shrink from them, or waver for a moment in his resolution, yet he could not wholly repress the feelings of pain which sometimes awakened in his heart, when any circumstances forcibly reminded him that the strict union of pleasures, of pursuits, of interests, that once subsisted between his father, brothers, and himself, no longer existed. They were still kind as ever—perhaps as much attached to him; yet he perceived they looked upon him as one politically and civilly dead. His vocation, they thought, was to mind heavenly things, and how this was to be fulfilled in the ordinary duties and circumstances of life, they had not formed an idea. Even in Virginia the same feeling, though differently displayed, was perceptible; but in the society of Mrs. Selden and Margaret, he always found sympathy, encouragement and appreciation—these inestimable blessings of friendship which can support and invigorate the heart under the most discouraging and depressing circumstances.

As the time approached more nearly for Charles to enter upon the duties of his new vocation, he became more impressed with a sense of the magnitude and holiness of the office he had undertaken; yet the fervor of piety, the firmness of religious principle which animated him, inspired that exalted hope and courage that can conquer difficulties, which to the cold and timid appear impossibilities. The languishing, almost dying state of the Episcopal Church in Virginia operated as a stimulus to Charles' zeal, and as he had received ordination he did not wish to delay entering upon his labors. There was no difficulty in finding vacant parishes, as there were very few supplied with ministers, and many churches were falling into decay from disuse. Charles Selden had been solicited to accept a parish about forty miles from Sherwood, in which there was a well built brick church, and a parsonage house, or glebe, at a convenient distance from it, which might be rented or purchased for a very moderate sum. This locality possessed many advantages and presented a field for extensive usefulness, which determined Charles to go thither immediately. Mr. Selden insisted on making the repairs and some comfortable additions to the house at his own expense; and Mrs. Selden and Margaret were indefatigable in making up household linen and getting together all necessary articles for housekeeping. Virginia too assisted, but not very efficiently, for though sense of duty and affectionate feeling induced her to assist in the useful, but homely occupations in which her mother and sister were engaged, they accorded so little with her taste and inclinations; that she was continually falling into reveries, during which she almost forgot to move her fingers, and scarcely knew whether she was hemming or stitching.

Charles had already written to invite his aunt, Mrs. Mason, to come and reside with him, as the mistress of his establishment. This arrangement met with the entire approval of all his family, as they felt very averse to the idea of his being exposed to the discomforts and loneliness of a bachelor establishment, and they thought this plan would be alike advantageous to Mrs. Mason and himself.

Mrs. Mason, sister of Mrs. Selden, was a widow about forty years of age. She had married for love after a very long engagement, as her marriage had been deferred by Mr. Mason's pecuniary embarrassments and repeated failures and disappointments in his attempts to benefit his fortune. After a few years' union, Mr. Mason died suddenly and left her with a slender provision for herself and two little boys, who were then almost infants. For many years previous to her marriage, Mrs. Selden had resided at Sherwood, and had become almost as tenderly attached to her sister's children, as if they had been her own. All shared her love, but Charles was her especial favorite. All remembered her now with affection, and could recall a thousand kind acts and instances of affection for which they had been indebted to Aunt Charlotte; but Charles remembered her with peculiar tenderness. He knew that Mrs. Mason had long wished to remove from her present situation, as it was in many respects a disadvantageous residence, and she had lingered there from year to year, chiefly because all the happy years of her marriage had been spent at this spot, and every object was associated with the memory of her first and only love. But Mrs. Mason had too much strength of principle to sacrifice the welfare of her children to the indulgence of sentiment, and he was sure she would not hesitate to accept his offer of assisting her in the education of her boys, if she would do him the favor of presiding over and directing his establishment. The delicate and affectionate manner in which Charles expressed his wish to Mrs. Mason, touched her heart deeply, and she did not lose a moment in replying to his letter and giving an immediate and grateful assent to his proposal.

It was now only two or three days before the time Charles was to leave his father's house, and though it was only for the distance of fifty miles, the idea of the approaching separation was very painful to all. Mr. Selden's pain at parting with his son was not so poignant as his mortification and regret at Charles' choice of a profession, which became more vivid now that he was about to enter on the duties of it, as he realized it more forcibly. It required all his kindness, and all the self-command he could exert, to enable him to abstain from any expression of his feelings which might cause Charles unnecessary pain, and he could not always, when he was alone with Mrs. Selden, repress his vexation at her want of sympathy with him on this subject.

Charles' manner was so affectionate and respectful towards his father and mother, so free from all assumption of superiority towards his brothers, so cheerful and kind to his sisters, that it was impossible for Mr. Selden to find any cause for reproach; but as the endearing and noble qualities of his heart, the rare and varied powers of his mind, became daily more apparent, his father's regret at the sacrifice, as he considered it, which he was about to make, became deeper. He would often murmur to himself, as he looked at Charles, "What a pity—what a pity, and nothing can be done to help it."

It was now a May evening, and the family circle had assembled together in the parlor, all occupied with the thought, that they were soon to lose one of the group from amongst their number, and some of them engaged in picturing to themselves Charles' future fate in the most gloomy and unattractive colors.

Charles was standing at a window, regarding the fields and forests clothed with the first bright young verdure of spring, and the gay tints of the flower garden, absorbed in reverie so serious as to amount almost to sadness. The first bright period of life is past, such was the tenor of his thoughts; be it mine now to fulfil the great ends for which life itself was given, nor look back at the pleasant path which I must no longer tread, but press upward to the perilous and elevated accents, to which I am called by a Divine voice. Can I dread to tread any path sustained by Almighty love, guided by Almighty wisdom?

Mr. Selden looked around him with an air of discomfort and vexation, perhaps felt more strongly because not expressed in words; then approaching the mantel-piece said, turning to his daughters:

"I wish, girls, instead of these vases of flowers, we had a cheerful fire; roses and pinks are quite unseasonable on such an execrably damp, chilly evening. I can see no reason why I should be tortured with rheumatism, because it is the month of May and roses are in bloom."

Margaret rang the bell and ordered John, who answered the summons, to kindle a fire immediately.

"And take care you do not roast us alive," added Mr. Selden.

A cheerful fire was soon kindled on the hearth, and one cause of discontent being thus removed, Mr. Selden busied himself in finding something else of which he could complain, but nothing presenting itself to his observation, or recollection, he took refuge in moody silence, and drawing his chair to the hearth, fixed his eyes upon the embers.

"How dull we all are," said Arthur, yawning and sauntering to a window to look out; "an east wind blowing too, and clouds collecting for a long, rainy season. Mother, if you have a good, strong rope, which can be procured without much trouble, I think I'll hang myself this evening."

"We cannot spare you yet," said Margaret, laughing; "you are too useful. I need your services now to play a game of backgammon with me."

"I am quite ready for any thing that promises the faintest ray of amusement, but I thought you were too much devoted to making sheets and pillow-cases to take time for any other employment."

"Oh, but my task is done now," said Margaret, folding up her work; "so you may take your choice between backgammon and suicide."

"Then to oblige you, I will defer the act of self-immolation for the present."

He added in a low tone to his sister, as they were arranging the backgammon men, "I understand the plan—this game is not for my amusement, or yours, in reality—I am to play with my father, and you are to move the men."

"You don't object I hope?"

"Oh no—any thing to restore good humor—I am willing to make any sacrifice for that purpose."

After eyeing the game for some minutes, Mr. Selden approached the table and began, as he usually did on such occasions, to act as Margaret's adviser.

Meantime Charles had moved to the spot where Virginia was sitting with her work in her hand, though her thoughts were evidently not at all engaged in her occupation, from the slowness with which her fingers moved, and the abstracted air of her countenance.

"What are you thinking about, Virginia," he said; "not this work I am sure."

"I was thinking, what a sort of a place the Glebe is, and imagining the vines of honeysuckles and roses clustering around the porch, and the birds building their nests in the bushes; then I was furnishing it all neatly, and just as you spoke, I was adorning the mantel-piece with flowers in my beautiful old china vases, which my grandmother gave me. I mean this to be my offering to the new establishment."

"Thank you, a thousand times, Virginia; but it is a pity to waste that rare china on a bachelor brother. I am sure too, my grandmother never designed it such a fate."

"Indeed, you will mortify me cruelly, if you refuse to accept it as a memento from me. Aunt Mason, I know, will appreciate it."

"That is a very good notion of Virginia's," said Arthur, whose quick ear caught every thing passing around him. "I don't know that flower vases will be particularly useful, but then I think we should all contribute to set you up, as a new housekeeper of course wants every thing. What say you to taking my Newfoundland dog, Nero, with you, and my new fowling-piece; but I suppose," he added, in a tone of genuine compassion, "you would not think it proper to shoot."

"I don't think there is any harm in shooting, Arthur; but then I scarcely expect to have time for it; but the dog would be a real treasure—it will be like carrying a friend from home with me."

"He is a noble animal," said Arthur, gratified to find his gift duly appreciated, "and almost as fond of you Charles, as of myself. You will miss our dogs and horses sadly. I don't know how one gets through life without them."

There was a general laugh at the simple earnestness with which Arthur spoke, and Reginald now first looked up from a book which he had been for some time intently perusing.

"My contribution, Charles, has been planned long ago. I have procured some valuable historical works for the purpose of sharing them with you; they will afford interesting occupation for your intervals of leisure."

"Stop—don't thank him yet, Charles," said Arthur laughing. "Margaret has not told us yet, what she intends to do. I dare say, all the goods and chattels she possesses are already secretly packed up, to be despatched to the new establishment."

"You have given me more credit for generosity than I deserve. I have packed up nothing but my tea-china; this will match Virginia's vases: then it will have the advantage of making Charles and Aunt Mason think of me at least once a day."

"Now comes the time for my speech," said Charles, smiling.

"Not yet," said Mr. Selden, with a look of restored good humor. "I must not be outdone in generosity by these children—so I will give you one of my best riding horses. I had once intended Bayard for you, but he would perhaps be too spirited, and look too flashy, so you can take any of the others you prefer."

"Since you are so kind as to allow me to make a selection, I prefer abiding by your original intention, and taking Bayard. It would be a shame, father, to have profited so little by your lessons in horsemanship, as not to be able to manage such a noble animal, and I like him all the better for being handsome."

"That's right Charles," said Arthur with a look of approbation. "I don't see why a minister should give up all manly exercises, all pleasure in life, and pace about on an ambling pony like an old woman."

"Take care what you say of old women," said Mrs. Selden laughing.

"Oh, mamma, no one would ever think of you in connection with old women," said Virginia.

"Certainly not; if every one was like you, Virginia, I should continue to be a heroine of romance to the end of my days. You have commenced a hopeless war, my dear, against realities; it is best just to take things as they are with the best grace we can."

"As Margaret does, for instance," said Arthur.

"How? I don't understand you, Arthur," said Virginia. I only know that you always think me in the wrong, and Margaret in the right, about every thing."

Margaret observed the shade of mortification and jealous feeling that overshadowed Virginia's lovely face, and said in an open and cheerful manner—"I can explain Arthur's speech more satisfactorily than his good nature will allow him to do. I do not wage a hopeless war against realities, by pretending to be as pretty as you are, Virginia, but just take my face as it is with the best grace I can." Then laying her finger on Virginia's lips, as she saw she was about to reply, she added, "Come, do not commence the hopeless war again. I am sure you make every possible effort to endow me with imaginary graces, and I only wish you to do what is better still, see me for just what I am, and like me just as well as if I possessed the advantages you wish to ascribe to me."

All were struck with the simple dignity of Margaret's manner, and the radiant expression of kindness and good humor that beamed from her eyes.

Virginia pressed her hand fondly, and said, "I do love you from my heart, Margaret, for what you are."

"And for what I am not, too, Virginia," said Margaret, smiling; "but enough of this. We have not forgotten, papa, that you promised yesterday evening, to read us another of Shakspeare's historical plays this evening."

"Mr. Selden assented with a smile. He always said that Shakspeare was the next best book in the world to the Bible, and he read it remarkably well too, which is a very rare thing. He soon became deeply interested in reading Richard III., and the evening which had commenced so gloomily, closed in cheerfulness and good humor.

CHAPTER V.

"Naught shall prevail against us, or disturb
Our cheerful faith, that all which we behold
Is full of blessings.—Wordsworth.

The arrival of Charles Selden in his parish, occasioned a great sensation. In a quiet country place, thinly settled too, it was considered an event of no small importance; many were pleased at the idea of seeing the old church opened once more, some from early associations, some because they thought any thing which would produce a general assembling of the people desirable, others because they considered it as a suitable occasion for the display of good looks and good clothes; a considerable portion of the community hailed the prospect of relief from the intolerable tedium of Sunday, whilst a few rejoiced from better and higher motives.

Much curiosity and interest were excited as to the person, talents, qualifications and manners of the young minister; it was something so unusual for a young man, possessed too of so many worldly advantages, to become a clergyman, that it excited universal surprise, and many strange and amusing speculations were made as to the cause of such a determination. The young ladies had heard a vague report that he was handsome,—this, however, wanted confirmation,—the young gentlemen, that he possessed abilities of no common order, but they supposed he was an eccentric genius, and applied to some of the old ladies of their acquaintance, to learn if there was not a vein of madness in one side or other of the family.

Many of the lower classes connected the ideas of toryism and aristocracy with the Episcopal church, and entertained feelings of hostility towards their expected pastor, though some still retained a partiality for the old church, where in their youthful days, they had assembled to join in the worship of God.

Happily, for Charles Selden, he knew nothing of the various speculations and gossip, of which he was the subject; when he quitted the home of his youth and love, he felt that he had launched forth on a great, an awful career, from which no earthly ties, no human considerations must be allowed to retain him. The constant habit of viewing all his fellow creatures as immortal beings, made him regard all things connected with human affairs, rather in their eternal, than in their earthly relations; a deep sense of the evil, weakness, and infirmity, belonging to the nature of man, produced in his heart, not only tenderness and compassion for all, even the lowest and most depraved, but also inspired him with the most earnest and fervent desire to impart to the souls of all the healing and purifying influences of that holy religion, which is alone capable of elevating the nature of man to its glorious destination. Acting under the influence of these elevated views, these lofty yet tender feelings, all minor considerations lost their power on Charles's mind. He forgot to think what impression his manners, talents, and appearance, would make on his parishioners; whether his gesture, delivery and language would be admired in the pulpit, and various other subjects of personal interest, which generally excite much anxiety, in the minds of most persons, on such occasions. Nothing could have contributed so much to his success as an orator, as this forgetfulness of self, "from the abundance of his heart, his mouth spoke," and words of truth, wisdom, and kindness, fell from his lips. His simplicity of intention, and fervor of feeling, imparted to his manner and delivery, the natural graces of oratory, in a higher degree, than the most careful study, and laborious practice of the rules of art could have done; his flexible and melodious voice was modulated by native taste, sense and feeling, his gesture was earnest, dignified and appropriate; his language seemed but the graceful and classic drapery, meant to clothe, rather than adorn striking, luminous, and affecting ideas.

The impression produced by Charles Selden's first sermon on the minds of his hearers, was not only that of admiration and respect for the speaker, but of interest in the subject, at least, during the time they were listening to his discourse, such as many of them had never previously felt. It is true, some listened only to find occasion for cavil or criticism, others from that love of oratory which has always characterized our countrymen, but all, except a portion of the young ladies, whose minds were busily employed on other subjects, listened intently, and this, at least, was a great point gained.

Upon reaching the church door, after the conclusion of the sermon, Charles found several gentlemen, waiting to offer the most pressing invitations for him to return home with them to dinner. Each preferred some claim to prove the peculiar propriety of Charles' accepting his invitation, and it was not without difficulty, that he could resist their kindness and importunity. Some looked dissatisfied, when Charles with simple modesty excused himself, by saying, that it was so short a distance from the church to "The Rectory," he could not without a violation of principle as to Sunday visiting, spend the remainder of the day any where but at home, unless there was some particular reason for doing so. It cost Charles some effort to say this, for he understood perfectly well, that such an assertion would be attributed either to a weak scruple, or pharisaical pretension, but he was aware, in taking a new position in society, how much the first step costs, and determined to commence immediately the course he intended to pursue in future. In order to remove as much as possible, the unfavorable impression that he perceived his speech had made, he assured each one of a speedy visit.

Mr. Travers with undiminished cordiality of manner, invited Charles to spend the following day with him, saying, he considered himself as having a peculiar right to his company, since Mr. Selden and himself had been college friends; the invitation was accepted as cordially as it was given, and Mr. Travers begged him to come early to a family dinner.

Mrs. Travers and her daughters had scarcely taken their seats in the coach, before they commenced an interchange of sentiments, as to all they had seen and heard in church.

"Oh, wasn't it a sweet sermon," commenced Anna Maria, the eldest of the young ladies, "and then he is so handsome; did you observe how white his hand looked, Mamma, as he waved it towards the conclusion of his sermon, and what beautiful hazel eyes he has?"

"Dark blue," said Juliana, "not hazel at all."
"How absurd, I appeal to Mamma if they are not hazel."

"Indeed," said Mrs. Travers, "I did not observe the color of his eyes; he is certainly a handsome young man though, and very much like his mother. I remember seeing her twenty-six years ago at a ball. She was thought a great beauty then, and the instant I saw this young man, it brought her looks back as fresh to my memory, as if I had seen her yesterday."

Here Juliana burst into an uncontrollable fit of giggling, and when Mrs. Travers with some vexation demanded, whether there was any thing so laughable in what she just said, replied, as soon as she could command her voice sufficiently to speak: "Oh la, no, mamma, I was not thinking of what you said, but just then, I thought of Susan Linton, standing in front of the pulpit, with her demure looks, and her eyes half shut, and her great, red prayer book in her hand, trying to look pretty and sweet with all her might—if she could only have seen how queerly the crown of her bonnet had got bent, she would have played off a few less airs. I pinched you, Anna Maria, to make you observe her, but you would not take any notice of me."

"Pshaw," said Anna Maria, "you have no soul, Juliana, I was listening to the sermon."

"I'll lay a wager," said Juliana, "that you know no more of what was in the sermon than I do; what was the text?"

"I don't remember the words exactly, it is quite sufficient to remember their import."

"Well, what was their import?" said Juliana, mimicking her sister's manner so ludicrously, that Mrs. Travers could scarcely repress a smile.

Anna Maria's heightened color betokened no very gentle reply, when Mrs. Travers hastily interposed, by saying, "No more of this, Juliana, it is plain to see that you have not profited much by the discourse. The text was taken from the Psalms, and—"

"Oh, mamma," said Juliana, "see what a fine horse the minister is riding, he has just taken the cross road to 'The Rectory'; how well he manages it too! I had no idea of his riding such a horse as that."

"Why not?" said Mrs. Travers.

"Oh, I thought a sober old pony would be much more suitable. It is really a pity he should be a minister. What shall we talk to him about to-morrow, Anna Maria? We shall never be able to get through the day with propriety."

"Answer for yourself, if you please," said Anna Maria, with a contemptuous toss of the head. "I shall not experience the slightest difficulty."

"Then you will be the only member of the family who will not, I dare say. George will abscond, if he can get a hint of the minister's coming to-morrow."

"But he must not get a hint of it," said Mrs. Travers, with a very grave look, "I shall be seriously displeased with you, Juliana, if you mention it to him, until I have prepared him for it."

"No danger from me," said Juliana laughing, "I am entirely on your side, mamma, I want George to be caught, if it were only for the fun of the thing."

"George will at least behave like a gentleman, in his own house," said Anna Maria, "he knows what is due to a guest, to say nothing of that guest being a minister."

"That guest being a minister, is just the horrid part of the affair. If he was just a common, young gentleman, no one would be better pleased to see him than George."

"Except Juliana," said Anna Maria.

"Yes, I don't deny it; if he were a beau worth catching, I would enter the lists with you Anna Maria."

A disdainful glance was Anna Maria's only reply, nor did she deign to bestow the smallest attention on any more of Juliana's sallies, which were continued without intermission, until they arrived at home.

F**

LAMENT.

BY JAMES WYNNE, M. D.

Once I had dreams of bliss
But these have fled,
On lips that mine might kiss,
Vile worms have fed,
Soft eyes which mine have met
With beams that linger yet
In death are set.

Hopes that in memory dwell,
Like a frail flower,
Rudely were crushed and fell,
Ere summer's hour,
Nipped ere the petals blew
On the stem where they grew,
Mid tears of dew.

A DAY IN DALARNE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "GLIMPSSES AT EUROPE."

MORA, August, 1848.

My Dear M—, Many an evening have I spent, as you will no doubt but too well recollect, in attempting to describe to you the peculiar charms of Scandinavian scenery. You would not believe me; you could not understand my fancy for a cold, sterile, colorless country after having basked in the warm light of Italy and seen the burning glare of the setting sun on Mount Hymettus. Granite is gray and a Northern sky is gray, you used to say, and the lakes are dark and the pines have but one verdure; while a Southern sky is azure and crimson and ethereal green, and the fields are clothed in brilliant colors, and the waters smile and shine like burnished silver. Who can prefer sombre melancholy to glowing enthusiasm? I can, my dear friend. I love the placid quiet of these waters; I love the gentle whispering in these dark forests; I love the gray, sober, earnest granite. So I left Italy and hastened to the cold North, whence the bold Normans came to conquer the world, and where now, alone of all Europe, peace reigns amid piety and contentedness. Nor do I repent it, now that I have been here more weeks than I expected to stay days. Let me give you an account of one day's travel, my dear madam; a day spent high up in Dalarne, where no nobleman ever dared live, and where men are not ashamed to doff their hats and repeat the Lord's Prayer when they hear a church bell ring! Remember, however, I entreat, how often you have pitied me for not possessing either "sentiment" or "enthusiasm," and how utterly unfit I must therefore be to describe a country so wholly devoid of all "romance."

It was late, very late when we passed the beautiful Dalelf (Valley-river,) for the last time on one of those curious floating bridges which are peculiar to Sweden, and entered the little village of Leksand. The tower of its church seemed to soar high into the air, whilst below it the broad, silvery sheet of lake Siljan spread its quiet waters. Slowly we bent our way through the narrow street to the gaily illuminated tavern. A neat and tidy looking "Mamselle" received us the moment the horses stopped, with the pleasant news that the house was crowded and not a bed could be obtained! There we were, high up in the North of Sweden, at ten o'clock at night, in a place where we knew nobody and where there was but one tavern. The Minister—my travelling companion—made all kinds of hazardous propositions to the sympathising Mamnelle, but in vain. His imprecations had no better effect, and even Gustaf, the inimitable Gustaf was at a loss what to do. In the meantime our Skjutbonde began quietly to take his horses out of the carriage, and told us coolly, he expected we would not find it too cold during the night to sleep on our seats. A bright thought struck me; there was a church, consequently there must be a "Prost," or Dean, with his comfortable parsonage and his "guest-chamber." The proposition to honor him with a visit was carried unanimously, and as soon as the horses were put to again, we drove over to his house. Alas! the gates were closed and not a light was to be seen. Fortunately, however, our embarrassing situation and Gustaf's invariable plan to hint something about "Foreign Minister" and "Americans" had excited general sympathy and half the population of Leksand—some in very odd, others in very scanty night costume—accompanied us to the parsonage. The kind Mamselle had preceded us and was negotiating for our reception. It was intensely cold; a bottle of claret and our last two loaves of wheat bread restored us but moderately. At last, after a long hour's waiting, the gates were opened and we entered a large yard, surrounded on all sides with stately wooden houses. We were asked in a whisper to come in; one of the servants evidently not yet quite awake, led us through a large room, filled with beds, into another, where she prepared our own and bade us welcome. I could not help stealing down again, tired and chilled as I was. The moon had just emerged from some dark clouds, which obscured the lower part of the sky and shed a mellow, pale light over the beautiful landscape. Church and parsonage lay on a high promontory, reaching boldly far into the lake. Terraces with flowers and shrubbery led down to the sandy shore, where a little ripple mingled its low, musical notes with the murmur of the light breeze in the tall trees above. On the river lay a tiny steamboat, the first that had ever reached its mouth, and far to the North stretched the lake with its glassy, shining surface, bounded on all sides by high, dark mountains. The white church with its bright copper roof loomed high above the surrounding buildings, and nothing was heard save the low chant of a hymn in one of the distant houses on the margin of the lake.

Early in the morning all the inmates of the house were awake. We were hurriedly dressing, and speculating whether a fair, but thin, pale lady, who gathered flowers in the garden, under our window, could be the "Prostionna," when Gustaf entered with more amazement in his face than I thought him capable of showing or feeling. He was evidently as much distressed as surprised at something that had happened to him. We had to ask several times before he could speak. And strange enough it was. The Dean had met him in the hall, and after inquiring how we had slept and who we were, quietly asked where we thought to get our breakfast? He who has ever spent one day in Sweden, he who ever heard of Sweden, will readily conceive our surprise at this most astounding breach of hospitality. We questioned Gustaf until the poor fellow began to think that he himself had committed a crime, but we could elicit nothing to explain the extraordinary conduct of the priest. We packed up our few things and determined directly to leave the first inhospitable roof we had yet found in Sweden. In the adjoining room stood the Dean in all the pompous majesty of two hundred pounds weight and the full dress of his rank. I bowed and said a few formal words of thanks for the "night's rest." The man positively begged me not to mention it, and quoted a verse from the bible commanding the faithful to receive strangers! The Minister said nothing. I was indignant, but I knew not that the worst was yet to come; for on descending the stairs a most savory odor greeted us: the kitchen door stood open and there were half-a-dozen stout cooks at work, boiling, stewing, roasting, baking! This was too much; we hurried past the pale lady with the bouquet and shook the dust from our shoes.

The Mamselle at the tavern, where we sought refuge, was as much amazed as Gustaf; she could not comprehend our leaving the Prost without our breakfast. Was he not the great Dean of Leksand? Had he not the second best living in the whole kingdom? and was he not all over Dalarnek now as the rich Prost Schulzberg? An excellent breakfast, in every respect, even in its oatcakes, like a Scotch breakfast, soon consoled us, and the sight from our windows was such as to engage our whole attention. Right before us lay the stately church with its graveyard and huge stone wall, and the lake at its foot! The space between the house and the shore was filled with hundreds of gaily dressed men and women. Family stood by family and parish by parish. All wore a more or less picturesque costume; even the smallest children had their nicely embroidered caps, their short scarlet dresses, their white and blue stockings, and heavy square-toed shoes with the high heel in the middle of the foot. The men in their long white and blue coats with rich embroidery on the shoulders, and their broad-brimmed hats with scarlet band and tassels, looked grave and serious. A beautiful race of men they were; not one under six feet, not one badly made, or lightly built, they looked like the Dalkaris of old, who marched down upon Stockholm and seated the Wasa on his throne.

We strolled down to the church. The doors were open and a burial was going on in the graveyard. The priests in their rich, many-colored robes, the people in their gay costumes, the lovely landscape around us with its dark, solemn background of lofty mountains, the mysterious Sunday-stillness, all impressed us with an uncommon sense of the grand and the beautiful. We walked to the steep precipice where it suddenly fell down to the water's edge. How different the lake looked in broad daylight! From far and near boats, large and small, were seen approaching. They were rowed with all the precision of a man-of-war's boat, and with a swiftness perfectly surprising to us landmen. As they came nearer, we distinguished the different costumes—here scarlet prevailed, there blue; that long, narrow boat with its fifty oars has nothing but white coats; that small one with the large birch-tree in it, to serve as a sail, looks like a huge yellow-bird. Not a word is spoken, not a laugh heard. Silently they land; silently the women and maidens and children get out; silently the men draw the boat up on the fine, glittering sand, and walk to the small log-cabins along the shore, where they deposit their oars and little provisions. Boat after boat comes in, until the shore is lined for more than a mile, and the crowd stands close to the church-yard wall. The clock strikes nine and the large bell sends forth its slow, measured tones. And see, the men uncover their heads, the women fold their hands, and in a low and humble voice they repeat the Lord's Prayer. The large gate has opened and the venerable old priest in his robes appears, with his two assistants at his side. Slowly and solemnly walks he down through the files the crowd forms by falling back on both sides.

For each father has he a kind word, but with the widow and the orphan he stops and speaks words of comfort and consolation. There a tall, handsome youth blushes and stammers and begs to have his engagement with the stout, fair girl at his side proclaimed in church; here another Dalkarl in his bright crimson cravat and light green jacket wishes to be married after service—every one has a request to proffer or a favor to ask. When all have had an opportunity to see their shepherd, the bell rings again, the church-doors are opened, and, without haste or crowding, the people walk in. Two thousand five hundred persons were that day assembled in Leksand church! And yet it was not filled. It is a noble building; constructed after the manner of catholic churches, in the shape of a cross, with galleries around three of the branches, and filled with portraits and pictures of great age and some of great value. The organ is a superb instrument, and to hear it played by a master's hand, and suddenly breaking out into one of the most beautiful anthems of the old Italian school, was truly startling. And what a parterre of flowers below us! Did you ever see one of those gardens in Germany where twenty or more acres of land are filled with tulips and hyacinths forming curious devices? I could think of nothing else with which to compare the strange aspect of the various costumes in the church as seen from above. Their service, Lutheran as they call it, is not unlike that of the Episcopal church. Only one feature struck me here and in Germany, as far preferable to our custom. They do not depute a hired band of singers, to praise or thank God in their stead, but they all join in the singing for themselves, young and old, taught and untaught—and I assure you it sounded well and looked far more natural, far more solemn and elevating than our mode of singing.

We left soon after the beginning of the hymn which closed the service, found our carriage waiting for us, and hurried on to Rattvik, where there is one of the finest churches of Sweden, where we wished to see the people coming out of church and departing for home. Our road led us along the margin of the lake, and a glorious lake it is. Its waters, clear as crystal and smooth without the slightest ripple, showed the bright, silvery sand below and the deep blue sky on the surface. Tall pines came down to the very edge and rose in solemn grandeur up to the high summits of the surrounding mountains. Here and there red houses would peep out from the dark canopy and the large windows would glitter and sparkle in the bright sun. On the opposite side another promontory stood boldly forth into the lake with its fine old church and lofty steeple, with its parsonage, the very picture of rural comfort and abundance, and its row of boats drawn up on the sandy shore. To the right fertile lands stretched far out into the woods, until the hills gradually descended, and another dark, shadowy lake lay before us, surrounded on the opposite sides by high mountains, with huge granite masses almost overhanging its still waters. We reached the summit of a far-famed mountain, the so-called Bergsaengbackar, and at our feet lay another arm of the lake with its large church on an island, connected by a small bridge with the main land. It was Rattvik. Before we descended, however, we had to go a mile or more into the forest to change horses. This we thought rather troublesome and unnecessary, so we proposed to our postillion, a little boy of ten years, to go on with the same horses. Our plan was received with great indignation; did we think Olaf Olafson was a child, and knew not when his horses were tired? Must not Olaf Olafson be at home for the afternoon's service? We tried to coax the little fellow to do our will, and Gustaf in his zeal to serve us spoke rather harshly to him, when down he jumped, and, ere we suspected what he was about, coolly began to undo the traces. We had already driven faster than we ought, he said, and his horses must be brought home. There stood this boy not yet in his teens, in stature hardly reaching up to his horses' shoulders, and went stoutly, resolutely to work, defying us three grown men! Truly, they are a fine race of men, these Dalecarlians! They show it in all their manners and customs. Thus they say "thou" to every body and demand consideration from the highest. When some hundreds of them, years ago, were employed by the late king to level and plant the public park near Stockholm, it happened that the treasury was empty and they were not paid. One day the king came out and rode through the park; suddenly he finds himself surrounded by these Dalecarlians; they approach, hat in hand, and one of them walks up to him, takes his hand, and says: "Father, surely it is not thy will that we should work for thee and not be paid; if it be thy will, it is not ours!"

We yielded, the bold boy leaped on his horse and galloped off, promising to send postillion and horses from the "Gastgifvergarden," as the stations are called, to our carriage which we left on the high road, equally sure that it would not be touched, and that it would not be in the way of any traveller, for travellers there are none. We walked down to the church. And what a walk we had! Now through dark forests, the road lined with gigantic trees, now over a barren granite rock, crowning an eminence and giving us such a prospect over lake and plain and mountain as no country but Switzerland can equal. There is something very noble in those "noble" firs, as Linné used to call them. Dark and sombre is their dress, but how lofty they rise; never straying aside, never bending and twisting in fantastic forms, but tall and erect striving up towards Heaven, throwing off their lower branches as they ascend higher and higher, until they bathe their gently waving tops in the blue ether. As your eye follows the slender and yet manly stem from its moss-grown foot up to its lofty summit, your soul too seems to ascend from the earth and your thoughts follow the silent monitor and wander up to that God who is equally great in the tiny moss of yesterday, and the gigantic tree of centuries. Here and there one of the mighty ones had fallen, shivered by lightning, and I could not help thinking of Andersen's, the Danish poet's amusing tale of the bundle of matches. Do you remember, how, one pleasant evening, the kettle and the bucket, the candle and the lamp in a peasant's kitchen begin to tell stories? The matches too are not silent, and boast most loudly of their lofty descent. Had not their father been of the greatest of his kind, a tall, stately fir tree in the forest? When they were green yet, they were so happy! Every morning and evening they had diamond-tea, that was the dew, all day long glorious sunlight, and all the little birds singing to them and telling them fairy-tales. They were among the richest too, for the birches and maples had clothes only in summer, but they were wealthy enough to wear their gay, green dress throughout the year. But then came the wood-cutter,—that was the great Revolution,—and their family was cut down; the great ancestor, to be sure, now stood in the middle of a large ship and sailed around the world; the branches were sent abroad among the people to enlighten it, but they, the matches, alas! were sadly degraded and lay in the kitchen of a poor old woman!

Suddenly we came upon a "clearing" in the forest. A large, newly-built house with its moss between the logs yet golden-green, and its new red color scarcely dry, stood upon the side of a gently sloping hill; two smaller buildings, not finished yet, enclosed an open grass-plot, in the centre of which a beautiful fountain rose. A little, bustling stream fell behind the principal building from rock to rock, gaily dashing its waters into silvery spray, until just under the verandah it disappeared for a moment, brilliantly again to rise in a most beautiful jet glistening like crystal in the sun. What a lesson for a desponding, cowardly misanthrope like myself! A group of gentlemen and ladies stood before the gate, which opened upon a little garden, and gazed curiously at us. But what was our amazement, when on coming nearer, we discovered a rough sign-board over the entrance with the inscription—Water Cure Establishment! To be sure, there among the rocks, were all their mysterious sheds with their douches and wave-baths and setting-baths, and there stood the luckless company, congratulating each other upon the abundance of red spots and pleasant eruptions of skin they observed in each other's faces!

We caused them, I fear, bitter disappointment; they had evidently considered us a pleasant addition to their number, and must now see us pass by! A few minutes brought us to the church of Rattvik, a large stone building with all the traces of old age, but with gradual additions about it. It struck me, that the often-mentioned good taste of the monks of old in selecting the most beautiful sites for their convents, was by no means confined to the Catholic church. Here were large old churches in considerable numbers, built during a time when sober, puritanic Protestantism succeeded brilliant, imaginative Catholicism, and yet could grander, more beautiful, more picturesque positions be chosen than the three peninsulas before us? Boldly, abruptly jutting forth into the lake, they rose gradually, heaping rock upon rock, until at the highest point they rounded off in steep, lofty cliffs, leaving at their basis but a small, narrow edge of finest sand, as on purpose for the boats that brought the pious from North and South to the ministrations of the altar. Noble did the church of Rattvik seem, as its stately mass crowned the eminence and its golden cross soared high in the air, whilst through the open windows the solemn harmony of a thousand voices rose up to Heaven. Beneath it the dark but clear waters,—around it the green, old forests with their granite neighbors,—and right opposite, in the lake, another church rising from the very centre of the glassy sheet, and to the North still another with its lofty tower—and not a human habitation within sight! Truly God was felt here.

Behind the forest's edge we discovered the parsonage. Three stately, well-built houses for the Dean and his two Vicars; large, substantial stables with the usual cluster of smokehouses and storehouses, surrounded a large, open square with its highly-valued maple-tree in the centre. For we have left the region of orchards and flower-gardens, and maples, beech-trees and weeping-willows are planted and nursed like peach and quince-trees in our more Southern climate. A little, cheerful old woman—she was deaf and did not like to stay in church during the sermon—curtsied and begged us to enter. How "home-like" these rooms seem! the floor strewn with its fragrant fir-twigs; a garland of maple-leaves, skilfully woven like a carpet border, along the walls; mirror and printframes hung with green, sweet-scented leaves and yellow buttercups scattered here and there. How the good old woman, in her tidy white cap with its streaming ribbons, stared when I opened my basket and displayed the strawberries we had bought in Fahlén and carefully carried so far! Could we not have some milk and sugar? Certainly, and away she limped to the milk-house and came back with a wooden bowl—beautifully carved—full of the richest cream and some of the "Prostinna's" own snow-white sugar. We enjoyed both the delicious fruit and the satisfaction of the kind servant when she saw us leave half of our little treasure for her hospitable mistress.

The bell rang and I hastened to the church; the path led through a rye-field and the stalks, although bent down by the heavy ears, closed high over me. I measured some, they were nearly eight feet high! I had hardly taken my seat on the parapet of the church-yard wall when the doors opened and the congregation came out. Quietly, silently, they left the house of God; at the door they waited until all the members of the family were together, and then the father would look up into his beloved wife's eyes, and they would thank God in their hearts, and hand-in-hand, the children clustering around them, they slowly walked down to the water's edge. How sadly the poor widow with her orphan child looks around her! He is not there to offer his hand, and, a tear stealing down her blanched cheek, she follows the happy group. There too is the poor old father with his silver locks and dimmed eye: they have all gone before him—they have left him alone! The ranks open; they take off their hats, for old age is respected here; and the children crowd around him and kiss his hand, and the old minister in his surplice walks up to him and takes his arm. Black I found here the prevalent color, but it suits well the grave, serious looks and stately carriage of these proud peasants. And what a race of men they are! There are thousands here and not one misshapen, not one undersized. Tall and erect, with thoughtful eye, and independence in every movement, they slowly approach.

At the gate they separate; groups are formed and increase until village stands again by village. The variety of costumes here was neither so great nor so striking as in Leksand; one only struck me; it consisted of but two colors: canary yellow and white, and it was the least becoming of all. The people of Rattvik itself, who returned by the path I had come, were all, as I had said, dressed in black, only here and there relieved by a crimson seam or a crimson tassel. And the same black coat and hat, gown and cap, you saw on the old white-haired parents and on the child that was carried on the mother's arm.

An hour or so passed in pleasant repose under the large birch trees which overshadowed the churchyard. Refreshments were brought forth and disappeared with astonishing rapidity, but not without a prayer before and after the meal, taken on stone or logs, as it happened to be near. Then the young men—perfect giants they were—went to the large black boats, painted white inside, and pushed them into the water. The maidens yielding nothing in strength or stature, followed soon and took the outside seats.

Now they all crowd around their little fleet; children are carried in and safely stowed away; the old and the suffering are placed where they are most comfortable; then the young and the strong take their seats in the middle of the boat and seize the large, powerful oars. The girls pull off their gloves and only wait for the signal to assist the men in rowing. At last all the boats are filled, one man of each only stands on the sand, his foot on the stern of the vessel; he looks at his neighbor, the word is given and off he pushes his boat, nimbly leaping into it just as it rights in the clear water. How they pull! with one stroke the twenty oars glide smoothly into the unruffled lake and the boat quivers and rises and shoots ahead. It was a fine sight to see these hundreds and hundreds of light, swift vessels, starting from the same point, in one moment cover the placid sheet. Each boat had its full freight of young and old, and each boat had its own costume; in the bow the only sail they ever use, a large green birch tree with its snow-white bark, in the stern the strong, old man with his snow-white hair. Now they are about a mile from the shore, and here they divide; some steer straight on, others diverge to the South and the North; instead of one compact mass, you see numerous little fleets of twenty, ten, or even two only, sailing together, and now the race begins. Who will be the first home? Their strong sinewy arms pull the oars back until they bend as if they were snapping asunder; the boats bound along, lightly skimming the smooth surface, and a thin white spray falls over the bow. Soon they diminish, become little black spots in the distance, and before you have quite recovered from the novelty and the excitement of the scene, the lake as is quiet and lifeless again as if its placid waters had never been disturbed.

On our return, we found the Dean and his assistants waiting for us. Kindly and with much dignity he invited us to enter and to refresh ourselves. Might he ask if we came perhaps from Fahlcon or Upsala? From America. From North America? He was amazed. However, he recollected, and begged to tell us that he too had travelled, and, when a student at Upsala, been all the way to Stockholm. Now he thought of it, he had heard that an American Ambassador had come to Sweden. Thereupon Col. E—— is in due form introduced. He steps back; is it possible, such honor, the American Minister at his house! And the other gentleman—meaning my humble self—it cannot be; what, he also from America! Oh, Meta, Hjalmar, Brenda!—and he hurries to call his wife, and his son, and all the people about the parsonage, to look at the American Minister. And they come, wondering, staring, hardly believing. Others, who have lingered about, or rested themselves, come up, and one turns to the other and says, he is an American, from North America, far across the Atlantic Ocean! For their schools are good, although their schoolmasters wander about from house to house, and they all know where America is. But what brings us up here in the mountains? What can we desire to see in so poor a country? And they look at their mountains, and their forests, and their lake: they love them, surely; but what could we love them for? We were completely surrounded. From America? says an old, but hale-looking man; oh, then we can tell him all about his son Ifvar, who has gone there with father Jansen, to worship his God in his own way. What, we do not know father Jansen! Why, over one thousand Swedes went to America with him. We must surely be mistaken or very forgetful.

We were really sorry not to be able to accept the kind old Dean's pressing invitation to remain with him. He gave us his blessing, as if we were his children, and long after our horses had carried us over hill and mountain, we could see the little dark group still assembled near the church.

Towards night we reached the Northern end of this beautiful lake, where the mountains rise high and leave but a small dark channel, whose waters connect the Siljan with the Orsa Lake. So narrow is this gulf that we did not perceive it until our horses suddenly dashed off in full gallop and descended the steep hill in true Swedish fashion. Below, on the floating bridge which sank deep even under the light weight of our carriage—we distributed our own weight carefully on other parts—nothing was seen but the dark rushing waters and the overhanging rocks. High up, the trees left here and there a little opening through which a mellow light fell upon the sides of the narrow passage. We felt as if returning to the world, when our small but indefatigable horses brought us after half an hour's hard climbing, again to the high table land on which the village of Mora, with its proud church and lofty steeple, appeared in the full glory of the setting sun. Here, as in every village, we found large but graceful arches of evergreens, with fanciful devices and the two arrows of Dalecarlia, spanning every street; whilst high above them rose the Maypole with its garlands and gaily waving ribbons. They stand from year to year until a new May calls upon the youths of the village to plant a fresh tree. Some of the boats, returning from Rattvik, had long preceded us and brought the news of the two live Americans. So we found the streets lined with people, the Mayor of the little village in his uniform, and a band of riflemen discharging their guns in our honor. Gustaf turned round, his face radiating with joy, and begged us to look at the men. Fine fellows they certainly were, worthy descendants of the men of the valley, who assisted Gustavus Wasa when he was but a poor exile. There was no sign of servility, none of those disgusting bowings and scrapings of continental people, but silent and collected were they, with all their curiosity and their desire to honor us. One of them, a man of forty, the perfect beau ideal of a man, as far as the physique was concerned, stepped up, took off his broad, round hat, smoothed his long, rich hair, and bade us, in a few, simple, but heartfelt words, Welcome in old Dalarna. Others came near and shook hands with us, or offered us their houses for the night and "as long as it pleased us." We had, however, a letter to a gentleman, who had recently come to Mora from the South of Sweden, and occasionally received strangers at his house. Through a long, noble avenue of birch-trees we reached the summit of a lofty eminence, on which his newly-erected house stood, surrounded by the usual cluster of smaller buildings.

The prospect was really beautiful. Before us stretched the Siljan lake in its full length, closed at the lower end by the village of Leksand and its picturesque bridge across the Dalelf, with its proud church and lofty steeple towering high up to heaven. All around were dark mountains, presenting the peculiar outlines which are characteristic of granite-formation, the green forests covering their sides and reaching down until they bathed their roots in the clear water, and at our feet the village of Mora, with its famous old church and the square, oddly-carved belfry, standing like most steeples in Sweden, at some distance from the church itself. Turning back, the eye followed the gulf between the two mountains, through which the waters had broken a channel to connect the two lakes, and beheld beyond it another lake, smaller than the Siljan, but not less picturesque and grand in its solitude and imposing scenery. Far away towards the North rose still higher mountains, branches of the Kjolen, and finally this marvellous chain of snowy peaks in all their severe, Northern beauty and grandeur.

We found Mr. Per Person, the "Southerner," as his neighbors called him, a very agreeable and well informed gentleman, most anxious to receive us well. Clean rooms, snowy linen and a very inviting supper with tea, a rare luxury in these distant regions, were far more than we had been led to expect. Our village friends waited patiently, swinging up and down on their elastic benches, until we finished our supper, and surrounded us again as soon as we left the house. We must surely be anxious to see Mora and the place where the great Gustavus spoke to the Dalmen. It was now quite late, and we were most heartily tired, but we could not resist the pressing invitation of the good people around us.

There was something so touching in the love they bore a Wasa, whose last descendant was an exile in foreign lands; they took it so evidently for granted that we must be as anxious to see as they were to show, that we gave ourselves up to their guidance, and descending the hill, soon entered the village of Mora. Not without a certain solemnity they let us into one of the farm-houses and through it into the small meadow enclosed by a stone wall. Here it was that on a cold Christmas day the young, bold Wasa waited until the men of the valley came out of the church right opposite; here it was that he spoke the memorable words which, although at first rejected, took root in their hearts and won him a kingdom.

A bold man Gustavus Wasa was, and a great man thereafter. His father and his uncle had fallen in the bloody massacre of Swedish nobles at Stockholm, when he, proscribed and pursued, came into "the Valley" to raise an army and overthrow a dynasty! Fortune did not smile upon him, nor man favor him. In peasant's dress he worked with axe and flail, but treason was near and his low garb did not protect him. Three days he lay hidden under a fallen pine-tree, where friendly hands brought him food and cheering news. A collar, unchanged to the present day, concealed him soon after when closely pursued, and a woman saved his life whom death seemed to be at hand. He was working on Arendt Person's estate when his gold-embroidered collar was discovered by a jealous fellow-servant. Arendt Person thought of the great gain which the capture of such a man would bring, and came with twenty men to seize him. But Person's wife, a lovely and a gentle woman, had suspected his plan and gave the Wasa warning and a sleigh to escape. The enemies were close upon him; day and night they hunted after him. It was a wagon with straw, that concealed the great king, when horsemen came up inquiring for him, and, eyeing the load with suspicion, stuck their sharp lances into it. The Wasa was wounded, and badly wounded; but not a sound escaped him. The blood trickled down from sheaf to sheaf; but the peasant's cunning saved him once more. Slily he approached one of his horses and cut his foot, so that when the watchful eye of the pursuers saw the blood on the snow, the wound of the horse was pointed out and taken as the cause of the bloody track.

Thus, constantly threatened and even paying with his life's blood for an hour's safety, did Gustavus, towards Christmas, reach Mora, the heart of the Valley, the land of the bravest of brave Sweden. On this spot where we stood now, he waited till the men of Dalarna came out from church, and when they had gathered around the noble youth, he rose to the full height of his lofty stature, shook the brown curls from his face, and with glowing eloquence spoke to them of the wrongs of the Dane who reigned over them, a wicked foreigner, a heartless tyrant; of the bloody massacre where the flower of Sweden's nobility had been cowardly butchered; of the oppression and cruelty under which the whole land groaned, and declared that if they loved their country, if in Dalarne there were still men, Swedes to be found, he would be, under God, their captain and free their common fatherland!

But the grave men of Mora were silent as their granite rocks; they consulted and deliberated, and when they looked at their wives and children around them, they thought of the horrors of war and the danger of their beloved ones and told the bold man before them that they had sworn an oath to Christian the Dane and that he had better go from them. And the Wasa bowed his head and fled.

He busied himself in the mountains, seeking a path into Norway. But the men of Dalarne thought of his words: they had sunk deep into their hearts. News also came of recent oppression and fearful murder, of heavier taxes and more cruel injustice; and they repented. Messengers were sent, fleet as the wind, on snowshoes, and they followed the Wasa over river and lake, over mountain and peak.

And Gustavus Wasa stood once more, where we stood now. And the men of Dalarne were around him. But it was no longer the poor, friendless fugitive, who spoke to them: it was their "captain and lord, the lord of the valley and the whole Swedish land." A trusty band of valiant youths were his guard, and a small but invincible army hailed him their chief. The men of the mountains followed the example of their neighbors,—“was not Gustavus wonderfully preserved by God Almighty as the last drop of Sweden's knightly blood?” This army grew, and like an avalanche, carrying the masses away with him, he rushed down upon the Lowland and never rested, never halted, until he was seated on the throne of Sweden.

Is it a wonder that the men of Mora, proud of their forefathers, loved to see us on the spot where they first swore to free their fatherland, and to speak to us of him whom they raised so high? Eagerly they crowded around us, and eagerly they told us of every trait in his character, of every hair-breadth escape he had made. Their memory was so faithful, their eyes so bright when they related the scene of the collar and the wagon, the words he had spoken and the oath their fathers had sworn, that we forgot all this had happened full three hundred years ago. They were worthy sons of their sires. It was now late at night when we returned to our house, our minds full of thoughts and our hearts warmed both by the Past and the Present. And so closed a day in Dalarne, the "Valley."

BION. IDYLL. 4.

ΤΑΙ Μοῦσαι τὸν Ἐρωτὰ τὸν ἄγριον οὐ φοβούσαι
 Ἐκ θυμῷ δὲ φιλεῦντι, καὶ ἐκ ποδῶς ἀπ' αὐτῶ ἔπονται.
 Κ' ἦν μὲν ἄρα ψυχὰν τις ἔχων ἀνέραστον ἐπηδή,
 Τῆρον σπικαφεύγοντι, καὶ οὐκ ἴθελοντι διδάσκειν·
 Ἢν δὲ νόθον τις Ἐρωτὴ δονεῖσθαι δὲδ' ἐμελίσθη,
 Ἐς τήνον μάλα πάσαι ἐπιγόμεναι προρίοντι.
 Μάρτυς ἰγών, ἔτι μῦθος ὃς ἔπλετο πᾶσιν ἀληθής·
 Ἢν μὲν γὰρ βροτῶν ἔλλον ἢ ἀθανάτων τιτὰ μέλαινα,
 Βαρβαίνει μιν γλώσσα, καὶ ὡς κᾶρος οὐκ ἔρ' ἀσίδει·
 Ἢν δ' αὐτ' ἐς τὸν Ἐρωτὰ καὶ ἐς Δαυίδαυ τι μελίσθω, Καὶ τόκα μοι χαίρουσα διὰ στόματος ρέει ὡδῆ.

TRANSLATION BY J. J. S.

Of love the cruel, the ruthless boy,
 The Muses feel no fear;
 But with souls of fondness and feet of joy
 They follow his light steps near.

And if ever a churl of unloving heart
 Invadeth their hallowed track,
 They veil the page of their gentle art,
 And flee from his presence back.

But the love-stricken bard, who with wild notes sweet
 Outpoureth his soul in song,
 Oh! ever with eager joy they greet,
 And around him all lovingly throng.

Yes, believe it! to other of Gods or men
 In vain would I tune my lute,
 For my voice refuseth its office then,
 And my stammering tongue is mute.

But whene'er to my Lysis I change the theme,
 And to Venus' heart-conquering boy,—
 Then forth from my lips, as if touched with flame,
 Outfloweth the song of joy.

THE STREETS.

(Extract from an Unpublished Work.)

BY IK. MARVEL.

* * * * * Meantime, what is street-life doing? Whither tends now the tide, that in the morning, and yester-night rolled up rocky barricades, and glittered with sparkling arms?

The streets are comparatively quiet, but they are not deserted. Before sunset, placards headed—NO MORE OF BOURBONS!—NO MORE OF KINGS! and announcing the Provisional Government were posted at every corner throughout the city. Through the long Rue St. Antoine, groups were gathered around them, talking eagerly of the day : and black-belted workmen wiped the blood and dust from their bayonets, as they listened to the reading of the proclamations. That worst of faubourgs, St. Marceau, was all alive with bare-headed women, and bare-legged boys, climbing over the barricades, and shouting huzzas as they waved the streaming placards over their heads. Here and there, in more open streets, cabmen drove furiously along, with cockades stuck in their shining hats.

The Cafés were their usual brilliancy, and were filled to overflowing, with noisy, talking companies. Ladies and gentlemen were passing with quick, half-frightened step, along the Boulevard, looking curiously on the rude barricades, and the mangled stumps of their favorite shade-trees. Workmen, arm in arm with National Guard, and helmeted dragoon, went loitering by. Far up the broad asphalt walk, they mingle in the crowd, with bold courtesan streaming with red ribbons, and wondering cautious-stepping stranger, and fearless-shouting street boy, and push their way into the eddies that are writhing, till long past midnight, around the grim arches of St. Martin, and St. Denis.

The shops were all closed : and twice at least, you might have seen a white-lipped, staring group gathered round a corpse, guarded and billeted—Voleur.

By the Madaleine, the post of the soldiery was burning, and the white flames lit up like day, the columns and entablature of the church.

The prison of the Abbaye had no soldier guards, save the citizens, and political offenders were wandering at will around the streets that hem the Luxembourg.

The Carmagnole and Marseillaise were chanted from time to time, around the corner wine-shops, and by students of St. Cyr, walking in long file. Enthusiasm had caught hold even of cold reformists; and black-coated Bourgeois were chatting with porter and brick-layer.

As darkness drew on, the Cafés, and here and there, a tall house, were illuminated. Still, the citizen soldiers stood guard. The barricades remained untouched, and the sentinels stood upon them—their forms projected darkly against the red light of the bivouac fires below,

It was not a night without fearful anxiety.

The people had triumphed : but how were they to use their triumph ?

Mothers trembled at sight of the blood red caps. Old men, mindful of the old Republic, shuddered at those words, fresh printed, of Liberté, Egalité, Fraternité.

Royalists grew timid, and gathered up their valuables for flight. Bankers passed the night in arranging papers, and jewels. Strangers talked of early departure. The crimson flag, that since three o'clock had been floating over the Tuilleries, haunted their slumbers. There was something even in such names as DUMOULIN, and MARAIST, and CARNOT, to make that first Republican night, a night-mare.

The evening was all a wonder; the night was all a tremor. There were not a few who passed it beside stiffened corpses, or at the bed of wounded. And there were some who, drunken with enthusiasm, or by excesses in the cellars of the Tuilleries, danced fearful ergies around dead brothers.

Others, glowing with a generous zeal, at thought of the monarchy that had been put-down, and of the popular government that had been erected, and centring in the good intent of the victors, slept quietly and soundly beside their fire-locks.

Ambitious heads dreamed strange dreams. Such as BLANQUI, BARBES or LAGRANGE, so long the hunted victims of a dynasty that feared them unless chained, are awake and free, plotting, and rejoicing. They were men of fierce enthusiasm, who had perilled life, property, liberty, every thing that men held dear, for their idol scheme of a Republic; and now that it has overtaken them, half-unaware, they huzzaned like fanatics, while they trembled with apprehension.

Fierce old women in upper garrets, inflamed by poverty, and the blood of offsprings shed that day before Chateau d'Eau, still kept their light burning, and till morning cleared up the danger, were turning scraps of lead into murderous bullet.

In the old families through the faubourg St. Germain, which had begun to creep from the shadows of the July Revolution, into the sunlight of court-splendour, there was wonder and fear.

The rich merchants of Chaussée d'Antin, and Rue Laftte, grown rich under patronage of Bourgeois King, trembled for their bourgeois pride, and their bourgeois wealth.

There was now no far-seeing TALLEYRAND for the fearful nobility to beg, and to bolster themselves upon. There was no General LAFAYETTE, or popular LAFITTE, for rich Bourgeois to seek in shelter. These men, and such as these, had all passed.

There were many afoot, and astir who had witnessed, and been partakers in one Revolution, or in two—perhaps in three. But of those great names which belonged by history and association, to half a dozen Revolutions—which retained old taint of an old Royalty, and which, notwithstanding, were sustained in public favor, either by admiration for talent, or respect for lineage, only one now belonged to a living man. And he, that night, in a narrow street, heavily shaded by the tall and princely houses—the Ruo de Bac, was lying on the edge of the Grave.

But none, neither of the timid, or of the strong, of the winners or of the losers, thought it worth their while to consult now the great CHATEAUBRIAND. His day was gone.

The mind that had illumined the literary horizon for nearly half a century, had sunk almost into idiocy. Old nurses took care of the man, who had been once the care of kings.

He who had revelled in the splendor of every court in Europe, and wandered with young feet over American wild-lands; who had united reputation of Poet, Philosopher and Statesman, who had belonged to the Diplomacy of the age, whose name was attached to great treaties, and whose opinions had weighed with imperial cabinets,—now, that the chrysalis of lingering feudalism was breaking fibres, and a new political being stretching wings, was but a stammering fool, quarreling with his nurse for gruel!

Thus, the hero of letters and monarchy, the falling support of a falling cause, the last of royal poets, the lingering dreamer of regal dreams, was passing away amid the luxuries of old-time extravagance;—was listening with the irritable petulance of dotage to the guns that ushered in a Republic, was lapping his last cordials from golden spoons, and slowly dying on regal damask.

THE GRAVE OF BYRON.

It is a shrine where poets bend
In silent adoration
Of one, who living, awed the world,
Though scorning its oblation;
A world which knowing not the heart
So early tinged with sadness,
Saw not that in its bitter depths
'Twas well nigh wrought to madness.

As from the wind-harp, o'er whose chords
The stormy blast is rushing,
So from thy soul the music burst,
By passion stirred to gushing:
Yet, thou, still heeding not the gift
That unto thee was given,
Did'st wake a lyre whose murmurs knew
No echoing tone in Heaven.

And still, with saddened hearts we think
The while, on one possessing
All thy deep wealth of intellect
And yet unblest,—unblessing:
Turning from hearts that might have loved,
A home that might have kept thee,
Thine was a grave in foreign climes
Where only strangers wept thee.

And oft is breathed the heart-felt sigh
That thou, "the world forgetting,"
Hadst not then turned thy thoughts above,
There thine affection setting;
That thus, when thou believ'st thyself
By all on earth deserted,
In the pure light of Heaven thy dream
Of darkness, had departed.

But by thy grave still Hope itself
Sheddeth a tear of sorrow;
And thinking on thy yesterday
Asks "what is now its morrow?"
Then leaveth all, in trust, to Him
Who, not as man sees, seeth;
And not with man's unyieldingness
The future lot decreeth.

MATILDA F. DANA.

Boston, Mass.

* "The world forgetting, by the world forgot."

FROM OUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS, June 28, 1849.

France, calling itself republican since February, 1848, has, at length, since the date of my last, enjoyed a few days of republican government. It commenced on the 28th of May with the opening of the Legislative Assembly. On that day the Provisional ceased: the Constituant gave place to the Constituted: and the regular machinery of a free republican government, organized by the new Constitution was put in complete operation.

It worked fifteen days—only fifteen—when its insufficiency became patent: it was set aside, and the stronger, simpler machine of despotic government was necessarily resorted to for the salvation of society. On the 15th instant Paris was declared in a state of siege—the two chief cities of France and fourteen entire departments are now under the iron rule of martial-law. You know how this was brought about. The main result of the elections of last month were, as I anticipated, overwhelmingly reactionist. Five hundred of the seven hundred and fifty members composing the new Assembly were monarchists of one or other of the fallen dynasties. Two or more were of the ultra republican and socialist party, composing the mountain. The very small fraction remaining consisted of the moderate republicans, who formed perhaps the controlling element of the Constituant Assembly. I did not anticipate the almost total discomfiture which overtook this party in the last elections, and the consequent increase of power, at the expense of the moderates, which awaited the democratic socialists. These last count in the new Assembly much more numerous than in the old. Their untiring propagande, their union at the polls, their energy and discipline, won signal triumphs even in Paris, where, beyond all question, the friends of order had they evinced similar qualities, would have carried all their candidates. The Mountain in the new Assembly at once took position boldly and confidently, as the representative of a strong and growing party in the country, ere long to become dominant. Their efforts to gain the army over to the socialist doctrines had succeeded, if not to a positively very great, certainly to an alarming extent: witness the triumphant candidacy of three simple and ignorant sergeants, whose sole recommendations to the party which sent them to the Legislature, were the extreme violence of their political opinions and their contempt of wholesome discipline. The election returns showed that in all places where the army was allowed to vote freely, a large vote was given to the socialists. The Mountain exaggerated the disaffection that prevailed in the army. They believed it almost complete; at least to an extent that would neutralize the action of the army upon an appeal to force: and they showed from the very commencement of the session a confidence in their power, an intolerance and audacity which indicated clearly enough their intention to bring matters to a speedy crisis. The majority, or their side, furnished them with abundant provocation. Confident in their actual numerical force, they were as intolerant and ultra and almost as noisy as their opponents themselves. All questions were decided against the Left—its members were excluded from all offices—its presses were almost daily seized—its writers prosecuted, fined, imprisoned—reaction was evidently at work in the assembly and in the government. It was clearly visible not to the exasperated Montagnards only, but to all impartial observers. But it was the misconduct and perversion of the Roman expedition, ordered by Government and sanctioned by the Assembly, which was seized upon by the opposition and made the pretext for precipitating the appeal to force, which for several months past I have been sure was in contemplation. This Roman expedition was in its very inception of questionable expediency and legality. In its subsequent management, in the gross perversion which has taken place from its original avowed object, it has certainly become a flagrant, disgraceful and outrageous violation of the French Constitution, of the laws of nations, and of natural right. I believed, as did almost every one else prior to the appearance of the French army before Rome, that the Pope had been ejected, and the republican form of government imposed upon the Roman people by a factious and audacious minority—that so soon as the city should be relieved from the terror in which it was held, the majority would recall the Pope, and accept the mild, ameliorated and progressive government which that really liberal and excellent prince had inaugurated in Rome. I do not yet believe that the Romans are ripe for republican government: or that, if left to itself, absolutely free from Austrian, French, and all foreign intervention, it would fall soon to end in wild democracy and anarchical excess: but in view of the events of the last two months, I cannot resist the conviction that if not unanimously republican, the Romans are unanimously opposed to all foreign dictation, and are valiantly, ay, gloriously resisting it. The French Republic engages in its constitution "to respect nationalities," and not to "make war upon the liberties of any people." I believe it would be wisest to restore the Pope: but if the Romans don't think so, no other nation, nor all other nations united have the right to say they shall receive him, imposing upon the Romans liberty in any other sense than that in which they themselves understand it. The French were checked in a first attempt to enter Rome: and now they say, (the government says,) their military honor is engaged—that before this, all other considerations must yield—and in spite of French constitution, of sacred nationality, and natural rights, Gen. Oudinot is ordered to enter Rome with his army—no matter what the cost.

Rome will have to succumb. It probably has succumbed: and ere this, Gen. Oudinot dictating his terms from the Vatican or the Capitol, is complacently persuading himself that French honor has been sacred. Error! All the real honor of the day belongs to the defeated Romans! And the French have justified, if they have not prepared, another Congress of allied sovereigns in Paris, imposing upon France liberty as they understand it,—that is the bastard son of a degenerate race for legitimate monarch. It would be a just and most fitting retribution.

This iniquitous expedition was seized upon by the Montagnards, and made the pretext for a course of most violent parliamentary and popular agitation, which ended on the 13th instant in another call to arms of the people of Paris. Ledru Rollin, it is believed, thought the insurrection premature: but the other leaders, and the impatient, ardent clubs, urged him, compelled him on, in spite of himself. The Democratic leaders of Rome and Paris were in close correspondence. The crisis here was hastened with the hope of saving the Roman republic. It was too soon by at least a couple of months: and the cause of the red republic, (whose triumph would have been assured with more discretion,) if not utterly lost, is indefinitely adjourned. The repression of the insurrection was admirably prompt and energetic. Had Gen. Changarnier adopted Cavaignac's plan of last June, allowing the insurrection to fully develop itself, and then suppressing it, secundum artem, a more terrible tragedy than that of June, 1848, would have been enacted. The result itself would have been doubtful in view of the known disaffection of several legions of the National Guards, and the reasonable apprehensions with respect to the army. True the army did not exhibit any signs of faltering: but the occasion can hardly be said to have offered itself. No where did it come into serious collision with the insurgents. The barricades were no where seriously defended. They were rushed upon and demolished even before they were completed. The insurrection thus happily crushed in its inception, did not cost on both sides more than a dozen lives. Some four or five hundred arrests have been made. Some twenty members of the Mountain are included in the prosecutions. Most of them have fled from France. Ledru Rollin, Boichot, and Rattier, the two sergeants, have escaped. It is supposed the trials will take place in August at Versailles. The insurrection broke out simultaneously in Paris, and several of the departments. Had it gotten well under way in Paris, but few of the departments would have been spared, and terrible civil war would have desolated France. At Lyons the struggle of the troops with the insurgents continued for two days. Several hundred were killed on both sides and many prisoners taken. But the cause of order finally triumphed. In Paris the majority are confirming their victory by a series of measures of great severity: some of very questionable expediency, others of questionable legality, and others of unquestionable unconstitutionality. Several legions of the National Guards are dissolved and disarmed. By virtue of the state of seige, six of the radical daily papers are forbidden to appear: and five others have been formally notified that a similar order will be taken with reference to them if they continue to discuss the constitutionality of the Roman expedition. Clubs have been interdicted; and the right of union for political purposes suspended for a year at the pleasure of government. This is not by virtue of the state of seige, and is palpably in violation of the constitution. The Executive is not bound to render account of the execution of this law till after the expiration of the year; but must, before the expiration of that period, introduce a bill for the permanent introduction of clubs, and the regulation, (it was expressly refused to add "and assurance") of the right of political meeting. This is not all. A bill has been offered by ministers, and the majority are about declaring urgency, and voting it forthwith, by which the liberty of the press is almost extinguished; severer in many respects than the bill of September, 1835. Those measures, I believe with the government, are necessary. Without the state of seige and the repressive measures I speak of, Anarchy will howl triumphant throughout all the departments of France. Well, what is to be done? Will the people submit? They will not. They ought not. Professing to be republican, living under liberal institutions guaranteed by a constitution, they will not consent that the constitution should be to them a dead letter—a continual lie—worse, a bitter mockery! Without their constitutional liberties, they will conspire and rebel. With them, they will speed through license to Anarchy! Well, what is to be done? I answer—be honest! abolish the constitution—abolish the republic! Make legal a strong, almost despotic form of government: and then—why then—I won't promise that Frenchmen will be quiet; but they'll be—as quiet as they can. Que voulez-vous? It's in the nature of the beast. You may lead the donkey where you will with a simple cotton thread about the nose—but try to conduct the tiger with a simple cotton thread! France is the beautiful and terrible tiger of nations.

There are signs of important political combinations approaching, and dissensions in the cabinet,—Dufaure, Minister of the Interior, uniting with some seventy moderates to form a constitutional third party between the royalists and democrats. These new Girondists will fail as the old did. But they will save their heads I trust.

I have observed that so many of the French journals take malicious pleasure in culling from American papers every thing that will enable them to indite a paragraph of abuse and disparagement upon our institutions, or throw contempt upon American manners and society, that I must plead guilty to a little spiteful gratification, as I send to be recorded in the Messenger and amuse its readers, the following advertisements copied verbatim from several of the most respectable Paris journals. They might well afford the text for a page or two of capital retort. But I don't feel in the humor just now: so the advertisements may speak for themselves; after I have simply reminded your readers, (they might doubt as they read,) that I am writing from France, which claims for itself the exclusive worship among nations of "the Beautiful, the Just, the Unselfish, the Grand," and which never fails to taunt America with grovelling addiction to "mere material well-being."

"Insurance—On Life, against Fire, Hail, Maritime Risks, Failures in Business, Accidents in Carriages.

"MARRIAGES.—Company of Assurance of Marriages. Rue de l'Ouest 104—near the Luxembourg.

"Marriage is the most important engagement we may contract. It is that which has most influence, for our happiness or misery, during life. By a single word we contract an indissoluble engagement: and this word is often pronounced with the greatest levity. One yields to the attractions of beauty, of fascinating manners, or of fortune, without sufficiently examining whether the object possesses those principles and sterling qualities which alone can insure the happiness of a household. But this conscientious and so necessary examination is impossible for a great number of persons, who are hindered by their engrossing daily occupations and are therefore compelled to rely upon information too often entirely untrustworthy.

"It often happens that one cannot find in the circle of one's acquaintance, the person with whom he should form this alliance; and then it is that he is beset with interested reports respecting fortune, morals, character, &c. Too often also is deception practised in those alliances which are called marriages of inclination, and the late truth comes upon you at last with a bitterness proportioned to the depth of the delusion.

"A marriage negotiation should be conducted by a mind free from all prejudice and proof against seductions. One should always commence by an examination of money matters and of character; and that before the first personal interview. To this end, there are no means preferable to that of seeking from a special, honest and discreet association the information which you may desire.

"More than twenty years ago, some honorable men who had occupied themselves with affairs of this sort, so important to the existence of society, conceived that by uniting themselves for the formation of a grand centre of information of every kind, they could render immense service to persons who might please to honor them with their confidence. Extended relations as well at Paris as in the provinces, afford them the means of procuring for persons who wish to marry, the best assorted matches of every rank and position.

"The company charges itself with all the negotiations: and the most implicit confidence may be placed in its discretion and in the sincerity of the information given. In proof of its good faith in this matter, the company will guaranty to those who desire it, the exactitude and the amount of dowries. It will also by means of an insurance, to be good for three, six, or twelve months, undertake to procure within a stipulated time a marriage suitable in every particular. This is an advantage which no company has been able to offer to its clients: for, we repeat it, none of the conditions of society, from the most elevated to the most humble are without the sphere of our operations. We can put in communication persons who possess dowries from one thousand up to two millions of francs.

"All communications must be addressed, free of postage, to M. the Director of the Administration, Rue de l'Ouest 104."

Another.

"Marriages—M. de Foy, negotiator of marriages, No. 48 Rue d'Enghien. (Severe discretion.) Pay postage.

"Nota. A rich repertory offers to ladies a choice of good matches with brilliant advantages."

Another.

"Marriage.—A widow lady, a foreigner, possessed of a handsome fortune desires to unite herself with a person of good position in society: and a lady of a certain age desires to unite herself with a retired officer.

"Apply to Mme. De Saint Marc, 8 Rue des Colonne, who is charged with the marrying of several widows and rich young ladies. (Pay postage.)"

Another.

"Marriage.—Speciality, discretion, dispatch. 12 Rue de la Boule Rouge: At the corner of the passage. Mme Chatillon notifies persons who wish to marry that her honorable relations put it in her power to give information with regard to several ladies and misses who in general possess large fortunes. (Pay postage.)"

Another, appearing in a column of miscellaneous advertisements, one for a horse-thief being the first above, and one for the sale of a butcher's shop being the next below.

"A young person, 18 years of age, of agreeable personal appearance, belonging to an honorable family, but without fortune, is desirous of marrying a gentleman of easy fortune. She will be very particular upon the score of birth and social position. Address, free of postage, Mlle. Marie at Grenelle (Seine.)"

I have read lately another advertisement of this kind, but cannot at this moment lay my hand upon it—in which an uncle offers to the notice of the public a ward, his niece, setting forth in the shortest and most business-like style, her age, accomplishments and the amount of her fortune.

An American friend whose notice had been frequently attracted by these and similar advertisements, asked me the other day if I had ever visited the establishment of one of these vendors of matrimony, and if I knew how they conducted their interesting and important negotiations? But I was equally ignorant with himself upon the subject. I had long since marked upon my notebook a memorandum in relation to them: and upon one occasion had made an appointment with a friend to accompany me in a visit: but he failed to meet me. Since then, however, I have always kept it upon my list of "things to be done." It was at once agreed by both of us that we could not pass the morning more satisfactorily. We would visit M. Foy, whose advertisement in La Presse had just given rise to our conversation. P. was to personate Coelebs in search of a Wife: but not speaking French with sufficient fluency to give and ask the explanations which would be necessary, I was to accompany him in the character of friend and interpreter. We were received by a servant in plain livery, who ushered us into an elegantly furnished waiting-room, stating that M. Foy was now engaged, but would very soon be at leisure. We were allowed to wait, perhaps ten minutes: during which we had ample time to examine the engravings upon the walls, and were duly impressed with the extent of the operations of M. Foy in his honorable vocation of negociateur des mariages. At the expiration of this delay the worthy himself entered by a side-door. With French politeness he excused himself for having kept us waiting—a client had just taken his leave—and M. Foy was now entirely at our service.

We were conducted through another room and a narrow passage into the sanctum sanctorum which from the character and arrangement of the furniture, one would have doubted whether to call an office or a parlour. Having seen me seated upon a sofa, and my friend in possession of a comfortable arm-chair, M. Foy squared himself upon the morocco-covered fauteuil in front of his secretary, and turning down the collar of his loose morning-gown, intimated his readiness to be made acquainted with our business. It was soon told. My friend wanted to marry and preferred a French lady. He had seen the advertisement of M. Foy and had come to ascertain what facilities Mr. Foy could afford to him, what were the terms, and what the mode of proceeding. The worthy dealer in matrimony, as though conscious that there must be something shocking to an English or American mind in rushing without preface in medias res, as if it were question of a negotiation for the purchase of a horse or of a house and lot, commenced and was proceeding with some common place remarks upon the importance of marriage, and the consequent respectability and responsibility of his own vocation, when we interrupted him with an assurance that we knew all that, that my friend had duly meditated upon the awful nature of the matrimonial engagement, and believed himself prepared for all its responsibilities, present and prospective. In fine, here is the mode in which affairs are conducted in these matrimonial offices.

The negociateur takes particular notice of the personal appearance, manners and fortune of the applicant. He learns in what this fortune consists, where it lies and the amount of income. He asks the profession, and residence, age, habits, and character of his client. He asks proof, documentary, or by the testimony of disinterested third persons whose address is to be furnished, of the truth of the account which the applicant gives of himself. The addresses are only to be made use of when it shall become necessary to satisfy the friends of the lady as to the social and pecuniary position of the client. The strictest honor and delicacy is professed to be observed in the use made of the evidence thus obtained and in the mode of procuring it. The persons whose addresses are given, are not allowed to suspect the intention with which the information is sought. The person is then to describe generally the lady he would be willing to marry: her age, religion, personal appearance and accomplishments and the amount of fortune required. The client then takes his leave with an engagement to call again in the course of three or four days. In the mean time the negociateur examines his files, (M. Foy assured us with an air of much confidence and satisfaction, that he had upon his lists some thousands of ladies,) and selects from them those ladies whose qualities, accomplishments and fortune come up to the requirements of the applicant. Upon the second visit the gentleman in search of a wife is presented upon a fair sheet with a list of ladies, (more or less numerous, according to the "richness of the repertory,") from which he is to select the one toward whom approaches are first to be made. In this list, the names of the ladies are scrupulously concealed: but all other desirable information is given. The gentleman makes his choice. At this stage of the proceedings the negociateur requires an advance of 20 Napoleons ($30,) and a formal instrument is drawn up, signed by both parties. The negociateur agrees on his part, by all the means ordinary and extraordinary in his power, to facilitate and bring about the marriage in question. If himself personally unacquainted with the lady's family, he has relations with other agents who, by means of their particular relations, manage (without, as M. Foy solemnly assured us, giving the opposite party to suspect how and why the thing is accomplished,) to procure introduction into the family of which in due season the name has been communicated. Once introduced, the gentleman is expected to make his own: but the agents are at hand to watch, and facilitate progress by the skilful communication of favorable facts respecting the character, social position and fortune of the suitor. In due season the parties are sounded as to their disposition with regard to the match, which parental anxiety has now come to consider among the possibilities of the future. But M. Foy assured us that they are never allowed to suspect, and so skilfully are matters managed, that they never do suspect—that the suitor's introduction to the family is other than the result of pure accident, or a fortunate concurrence of circumstances. Accident now marvellously favors the parent in search of reliable information touching the character and fortune of the suitor. He does not see our worthy negociateur armed with the documents and addresses which he had the precaution to prepare in an early stage of the proceedings. Probably the information is satisfactory—it is concluded in family council that it would be a good match—the young gentleman is notified that the way is prepared for him—that his declaration would be received with favor by the parents—that the young lady does not abhor him—in short that he may marry her if he will. He proposes, is accepted, the papers are drawn up—and a happy marriage in the French acceptation of the term is effected. The family believing it a purely providential affair, (M. Foy assures us they do,) render to Providence due thanks: but the happy husband knowing the part that M. Foy, 48 Rue d'Enghien has had in bringing about the blessed consummation, bestows his thanks differently—and not his thanks only. A short time after the ceremony, the successful suitor may again be seen in the cabinet of M. Foy. He has the marriage settlement in his hand. M. Foy produces the written contract signed by them both some months ago, upon the occasion of his second visit. By virtue of that agreement he now upon proof of the fortune he has received with the lady, and exhibition of the marriage settlement, pays over to M. Foy 5 per cent. upon the amount of his wife's fortune: and thus ends his relations with M. Foy, negociateur des mariages. If it had so happened that the gentleman in search of a wife had not upon sight and introduction been pleased with the young lady first selected, the negotiator would have facilitated in the same manner, his approaches to a second and a third, until one should be found to his mind: all of the affairs to be managed by M. Foy in consideration of the 20 Napoleons prepaid as mentioned above: the client paying nothing more, except the 5 per cent. upon the wife's fortune, due in the event of marriage.

A word now upon the Cholera: not that there is in my mind any fanciful connection between the subjects, that would induce me to speak of Cholera immediately after marriage. The two subjects are accidentally in juxtaposition upon my note-book, and that is the sole reason that they are so in my letter. Yet, verily, American notions of marriage and domestic happiness having been fixed in my mind before coming to Europe, if now I found myself compelled to choose between marriage in France, and the Cholera, I should hardly know which to take.

The Cholera in Paris during the first months of its appearance, was of so mild a character and so particular in its attacks, that the public paid but very little attention to it. One of the most distinguished physicians of the city, member of the assembly, said in his place that there was no reason whatever for general alarm—that every year there existed in Paris epidemics more fatal than the Cholera had yet been, without attracting at all the public notice. Thus it continued till the latter part of May. Then it suddenly assumed a frightful extension. It attacked apparently without discrimination all classes and all quarters. For three weeks it was sweeping off, in the city alone, from six to seven hundred daily. The hospitals were crowded—and deaths in private houses more than doubled the number of those who were able to reach the hospitals. Other patients were dismissed from the public establishments in order to make room for those who had the Cholera. Stroll for half an hour in the city, in whatever direction, and one was sure to meet several funeral processions. Many a door was hung with black, indicating corpses within—in front of every church were waiting one, two or three hearses at a time, while funeral services were being performed over the dead bodies. The ordinary means of burial at the disposal of the public authorities were insufficient, and the large canvas-covered waggons used in Paris for moving furniture, sometimes covered with black, and sometimes not, were put in requisition for the transportation of the dead to the cemeteries. One of these vehicles would pass from door to door, and collecting all the dead bodies in the neighbourhood, move slowly on to the burying-ground, followed without order by a motley crowd, mostly of women, weeping aloud, friends of some one of the deceased, whose bodies were in the waggon. Frequently, in the street, men and women dropped suddenly smitten with the Cholera. They were taken up and transported to the nearest hospital: thence, almost certainly, to be borne on the morrow to the common last resting-place—for two in three, if not three in four of those who entered the hospitals were destined never to leave them alive. And in the midst of all this, the Parisians were Parisians throughout. French insouciance was, perhaps, never more strikingly illustrated. Que voulez-vous? are there not a million of Frenchmen in one city—and can any thing less than a pestilence which shall suddenly smite down half the population, taking from every man his neighbour, make the other half sad? The brilliantly lighted boulevards were thronged at night with the same gay crowds; and they danced at balls, and played domino in the Cafés, and laughed at the vaudevilles; they rushed to political banquets, and raged daily in the assembly, and conspired nightly in the clubs, while Cholera was decimating the population. Undeterred by the fearful ravages of the pestilence, insurrection on the 13th had prepared for June 1849 its days of civil war bloodier than those of June 1848. Nothing but the prompt preventive energy of Gen. Changarnier saved Paris and all France from a war worse than pestilence. The grand unarmed demonstration by which the insurrection commenced, was composed of some fifteen or twenty thousand persons. In its passage along the boulevards, the column filling the street and sidewalks with their tumultuous and noisy masses, met and stopped, till the column had passed no less than eleven hearses conveying victims of Cholera to the grave! During the last fortnight, however, the mortality has been constantly lessening: and it has now descended to a figure which presents nothing alarming even to the timid. The number of deaths per day is now less than one hundred.

Before dismissing this subject, let me allude to a letter which has lately been read in the Academy of Sciences, and has since appeared in most of the Paris papers. It relates to experiments which would seem to establish a connection between Cholera and the greater or less amount of electric fluid contained in the atmosphere.

"The Machine," says the writer, "which was used in my daily observations, is one of considerable power. Ordinarily, after two or three turns of the wheel it emits sparks to five or six centimetres. But since the commencement of the Cholera I have been unable to produce this effect even in a single instance. During the months of April and May the sparks obtained with great difficulty never exceeded two or three centimetres; and almost exactly their variations accorded with the variations of the march of the cholera." This coincidence excited his particular interest, and he watched subsequent results with increased attention. The weather had been cold and unpleasant for the season. "I awaited with impatience," continues the writer, "the arrival of fine warm weather. It came at last: but to my profound astonishment, instead of indicating, as was to have been expected, an increase of electricity in the atmosphere, my machine showed it to be less and less, till on the 4th, 5th and 6th of June I found it to be impossible to obtain from my machine any thing but slight crepitations without sparks; and on the 7th even these ceased and my machine was perfectly silent. This diminution of the electric fluid coincided exactly as we only too well know with the increased violence of the cholera. I was now convinced; and one may well conceive with what anxiety during that sad crisis I consulted my machine, the faithful interpreter of a great calamity. At last, on the morning of the 8th, feeble sparks re-appeared. They hourly increased in intensity, and I perceived with joy that the vivifying fluid was again filling the air. Toward evening a storm in Paris announced that electricity had resumed its place in the atmosphere; and I thought I saw cholera disappearing with the cause which produced it. On the morrow, the 9th, all was right again. The machine at the slightest touch, promptly, I may almost say with joy, emitted lively sparks. One would have said that it was conscious of the good news it was announcing."

The existence of this apparent connection between the electrical state of the atmosphere and cholera is not, I am told, unknown in the United States. Our philosophers have already observed it. It is to be hoped that scientific investigations will, ere long, take it from the list of merely curious phenomena and give it place among the grand beneficent facts with which Science has already illustrated the nineteenth century.

But if the extract above given communicates no new scientific fact to your readers, I shall be much surprised if the following does not make most of them open their eyes with astonishment. It is taken from a little work, lately published here, entitled "Some facts relative to the Spheroidal state of bodies—Trial by Fire—man incombustible, &c. By P. N. Boutigny, (of Evreux)."

"Upon my return home," says M. Boutigny, "I did not fail to inquire of the workmen what would happen if the finger were immersed in the incandescent mass of melted iron? Most of them laughed in my face. But that did not discourage me. After a while, being at the forge of Magny, near Lure, I repeated my question to a workman, who replied that "nothing was more simple;" and to prove it, he instantly passed his fingers into the incandescent column of ore which was just then issuing from a Wilkinson. Another workman, who stood by, performed the same experiment with equal impunity. Emboldened by what I saw, I did the same."

The fact in question was no longer doubtful, but M. Boutigny hesitated to communicate it to the Academy until he should be prepared to support it by the adduction of various other experiments. These experiments he thus describes: "I cut or divided with one hand a spout of melted ore five or six centimetres (about 2 inches) in diameter, as it issued from the furnace; and plunged the other into a vessel filled with the incandescent liquid, which it was really frightful to behold. I shuddered involuntarily. But both hands issued victorious from the trial; and now if any thing appears surprising to me, it is that similar experiments are not of every day occurrence. Certainly it will be asked what precaution should be taken to guaranty the hand from the action of the burning liquid? I answer, none! Fear not. Perform the experiment with confidence. Pass the hand rapidly, yet not too rapidly, into the molten mass. If the experiment is made timidly and with too great rapidity, you may overcome the repulsive force which exists in incandescent bodies, and thus establish contact with the skin. In that case the skin would indubitably remain there and in a condition not difficult to conceive. The experiment succeeds particularly well when the skin is moist. The involuntary terror which one experiences in presence of these masses of fire almost always puts the whole body in that condition of moisture essential to success. The following I have found to be the best preparation for the experiment. I rub my hands with soap, so as to give them a polished surface. Then at the moment of making the experiment I plunge the hand into a cold solution of sal ammoniac saturated with sulphurous acid, or simply into water containing sal ammoniac, or if you have not the latter substance convenient dip the hand merely in cold water."

M. Boutigny then gives the following philosophic explanation of this phenomenon:

"It is to my mind a positively established fact that the hand and metal do not come in contact with each other. If there be no contact, heating can only take place by means of radiation. This is enormous it must be admitted; but in our experiment no account need be taken of radiation, for in fact it is nullified by reflection. I think that I have long since proved that water in the spheroidal state possesses the remarkable property of reflecting the calorific rays, and that its temperature never reaches that of its boiling point: whence it follows that the finger or the hand, being moist, cannot attain the temperature of 100°, the experiment not being of sufficiently long duration to permit the complete evaporation of its moisture to be effected. Persons familiar with the experiment of immersing in water a body of incandescent silver or platina, will readily understand the mechanism of this. In the first case it is the water retiring from the metal which then seems to be inclosed within a crystal envelope: in the second case it is the liquid metal which retires from the moist hand. In the first, the metal is active and the water passive: in the second, the moistened hand is active and the fused metal is passive. It is the same experiment reversed; and the two form but one. In one word, the hand, inserted in metal in a state of fusion, isolates itself. The humidity which covers it, passing to the spheroidal state, reflects the radiant caloric and is not heated sufficiently to boil. It is true, therefore, as I said in the beginning, that this experiment apparently so dangerous is in fact almost absolutely without danger. I have often repeated it with lead, bronze, &c., and invariably with the same success. Thus in the course of ten years I have made ice in a furnace heated to whiteness, and have bathed with impunity in a mass of incandescent metal; and that by virtue of the laws which govern matter in the spheroidal state. It results also from these notes that a considerable number of facts reported in history and generally deemed fabulous, may well be true. Ancient philosophers probably knew much that we are now ignorant of. A little more respect for them and a little less admiration for ourselves would do us no harm."

The pretended miracle by which one of the Eastern Magi, disciples of Zoroaster, is narrated to have gained thousands of converts, is now of easy solution. He proposed that twenty pounds of molten brass should be poured hot from the furnace upon his naked body, upon condition that if he underwent the trial uninjured, unbelievers constrained by the prodigy would profess conversion to the faith. It was done and the scientific imposter witnessed the rapid acceptance of his creed.

But let those who are disposed to pity the credulity of misled Persian multitudes, and laugh at priestly artifices practised 550 years B. C., reserve their sympathy. I will afford them occasion to exercise it much nearer home. The anecdote just related reminds me of what has just been passing within the circle of my own observation, A. D., 1849, within an hour's walk of the city which calls itself the capital of civilization. To my mind the superstition of the Persians is much less surprising, the imposture of the Magi much less worthy of indignation than that of our day.

About five miles N. W. of Paris upon the right bank of the Seine is the pleasant little town of Argenteuil. It is celebrated as the seat of a convent founded by the Bernardines, to which in 1120 Eloisa retired after the misfortunes of Abelard, and remained till the Paraclete was prepared for her. But the great object of interest now in Argenteuil is the treasure which its church contains. One thousand and fifty years ago, saith the veridical chronicle, in the year 799, the Emperor Charlemagne received from the Caliph Haroun Al Raschid and from the Patriarch of Jerusalem a multitude of magnificent costly presents. Among them were several inestimable relics taken from the treasury of the holy city. One of the most precious of these relics, the veritable tunic worn by our Saviour, was selected by the Emperor, and presented to the church of Argenteuil; where it has ever since been most religiously preserved. It is periodically exposed for the veneration of the faithful, and upon these occasions crowds from the whole region round about Argenteuil flock to the church to enjoy the blessed spectacle. On Ascension-day, the 17th ult., the portable shrine containing the holy garment was borne in solemn procession through the streets of the town, surrounded with sacred chant and ceremony by numerous priests and followed by the humble, believing and adoring population. In the evening at vespers an Apostolical missionary pronounced with fervent unction a discourse suitable to the occasion.

I do not know whether the following advertisement taken, verbatim, from Le Univers, a religious paper of Paris, will strike you as funnily as it does me. It appears to me a literary curiosity well worth preservation.

"Prayers for deliverance from the Cholera:—at 1 franc the hundred."

"Cheap enough!" remarks another journal. At this rate the "Prayers" may be had at less than the fifth of a cent a-piece.

W. W. M.

SONNET.—FRIENDSHIP.

As onward, o'er life's devious paths we wend,
 Now, 'mid the blooming sweets of summer time,
 And now, through stern-browed winter's icy clime,
 How firm our tread, if one true hearted friend,
 With changeless love, our pilgrim steps attend;
 With lightsome feet, the roughest steeps we climb,
 And oft live o'er our childhood's dewy prime,
 While joys and sorrows, hopes and memories blend.
 Love may grow cold, the ties of kindred rust,
 And no remembrance thrill upon the heart,
 But friendship's bond remains, and ever must,
 Nor time, nor wrong can bid its voice depart,
 Though wounded sore by slight, or broken trust,
 Its life is shown, by the still rankling dart.

C. C. L.

Stanton, Va.

FRANCES SARGENT OSGOOD.

BY EDGAR A. POE.

Mrs. Osgood, for the last three or four years, has been rapidly attaining distinction; and this, evidently, with no effort at attaining it. She seems, in fact, to have no object in view beyond that of giving voice to the fancies or the feelings of the moment. "Necessity," says the proverb, "is the mother of Invention;" and the invention of Mrs. O., at least, springs plainly from necessity—from the necessity of invention. Not to write poetry—not to act it, think it, dream it, and be it, is entirely out of her power.

It may be questioned whether with more industry, more method, more definite purpose, more ambition, Mrs. Osgood would have made a more decided impression on the public mind. She might, upon the whole, have written better poems; but the chances are that she would have failed in conveying so vivid and so just an idea of her powers as poet. The warm abandonnement of her style—that charm which now so captivates—is but a portion and a consequence of her unworldly nature—of her disregard of mere fame; but it affords us glimpses, which we could not otherwise have obtained, of a capacity for accomplishing what she has not accomplished, and in all probability never will. In the world of poetry, however, there is already more than enough of uncongenial ambition and pretence.

Mrs. Osgood has taken no care whatever of her literary fame. A great number of her finest compositions, both in verse and prose, have been written anonymously, and are now lying perdus about the country, in out-of-the-way nooks and corners. Many a goodly reputation has been reared upon a far more unstable basis than her unclaimed and uncollected "fugitive pieces."

Her first volume, I believe, was published, seven or eight years ago, by Edward Churton, of London, during the residence of the poetess in that city. I have now lying before me a second edition of it, dated 1842—a beautifully printed book, dedicated to the Reverend Hobart Caunter. It contains a number of what the Bostonians call "juvenile" poems, written when Mrs. O., (then Miss Locke,) could not have been more than thirteen, and evincing unusual precocity. The leading piece is "Elfrida, a Dramatic Poem," but in many respects well entitled to the appellation, "drama." I allude chiefly to the passionate expression of particular portions, to delineation of character, and to occasional scenic effect:—in construction, or plot—in general conduct and plausibility, the play fails; comparatively, of course—for the hand of genius is evinced throughout.

The story is the well known one of Edgar, Elfrida, and Earl Athelwood. The king, hearing of Elfrida's extraordinary beauty, commissions his favorite, Athelwood, to visit her and ascertain if report speaks truly of her charms. The earl, becoming himself enamored, represents the lady as anything but beautiful or agreeable. The king is satisfied. Athelwood soon afterward woos and weds Elfrida—giving Edgar to understand that the heiress' wealth is the object. The true state of the case, however, is betrayed by an enemy; and the monarch resolves to visit the earl at his castle and to judge for himself. Hearing of this resolve, Athelwood, in despair, confesses to his wife his duplicity, and entreats her to render null as far as possible the effect of her charms by dressing with unusual plainness. This the wife promises to do; but, fired with ambition and resentment at the wrong done her, arrays herself in her most magnificent and becoming costume. The king is charmed, and the result is the destruction of Athelwood and the elevation of Elfrida to the throne.

These incidents are well adapted to dramatic purposes, and with more of that art which Mrs. Osgood does not possess, she might have woven them into a tragedy which the world would not willingly let die. As it is, she has merely succeeded in showing what she might, should and could have done, and yet, unhappily, did not.

The character of Elfrida is the bright point of the play. Her beauty and consciousness of it—her indignation and uncompromising ambition—are depicted with power. There is a fine blending of the poetry of passion and the passion of poetry, in the lines which follow:

—Why even now he bends

In courtly reverence to some mincing dame,
Haply the star of Edgar's festival,
While I, with this high heart and queenly form,
Pine in neglect and solitude. Shall it be?
Shall I not rend my fetters and be free?
Ay!—be the cooing turtle-dove content,
Safe in her own loved nest!—the eagle soars
On restless plumes to meet the imperial sun.
And Edgar is my day-star in whose light
This heart's proud wings shall yet be furl'd to rest.
Why wedded I with Athelwood? For this?
No!—even at the altar when I stood—
My hand in his, his gaze upon my cheek—
I did forget his presence and the scene;
A gorgeous vision rose before mine eyes
Of power and pomp and regal pageantry;
A king was at my feet and, as he knelt,
I smiled and, turning, met—a husband's kiss.
But still I smiled—for in my guilty soul
I blessed him as the being by whose means
I should be brought within my idol's sphere—
My haughty, glorious, brave, impassioned Edgar!
Well I remember when these wondering eyes
Beheld him first. I was a maiden then—
A dreaming child—but from that thrilling hour
I've been a queen in visions!

Very similar, but even more glowing, is the love-inspired eloquence of Edgar.

*Earth hath no language, love, befitting thee.
For its own children it hath pliant speech;
And mortals know to call a blossom fair,
A wavelet graceful, and a jewel rich;
But thou!—oh, teach me, sweet, the angel tongue
They talked in Heaven ere thou didst leave its bowers
To bloom below!*

To this Elfrida replies:

If Athelwood should bear thee!

And to this, Edgar:

Name not the felon knave to me, Elfrida!
My soul is flame whene'er I think of him.
Thou lovest him not!—oh, say thou dost not love him!

The answer of Elfrida at this point is profoundly true to nature, and would alone suffice to assure any critic of Mrs. Osgood's dramatic talent:

When but a child I saw thee in my dreams!

The woman's soul here shrinks from the direct avowal of want of love for her husband, and flies to poetry and appeals to fate, by way of excusing that infidelity which is at once her glory and her shame.

In general, the "situations" of "Elfrida" are improbable or ultra-romantic, and its incidents unconsequential, seldom furthering the business of the play. The dénouement is feeble, and its moral of very equivocal tendency indeed—but I have already shown that it is the especial office neither of poetry nor of the drama, to inculcate truth, unless incidentally. Mrs. Osgood, however, although she has unquestionably failed in writing a good play, has, even in failing, given indication of dramatic power. The great tragic element, passion, breathes in every line of her composition, and had she but the art, or the patience, to model or control it, she might be eminently successful as a playwright. I am justified in these opinions not only by "Elfrida," but by "Woman's Trust, a Dramatic Sketch," included, also, in the English edition.

A Masked Ball. Madelon and a Stranger in a Recess.

Mad.—Why hast thou led me here?
My friends may deem it strange—unmaidenly,
This lonely converse with an unknown mask.
Yet in thy voice there is a thrilling power
That makes me love to linger. It is like
The tone of one far distant—only his
Was gayer and more soft.

Strang. Sweet Madelon!
Say thou wilt smile upon the passionate love
That thou alone canst waken!—Let me hope!

Mad.—Hush! hush! I may not hear thee. Know'st thou not I am be-rotted?

Strang.—Alas! too well I know;
But I could tell thee such a tale of him—
Thine early love—'twould fire those timid eyes
With lightning pride and anger—curl that lip—
That gentle lip to passionate contempt
For man's light falsehood. Even now he bends—
Thy Rupert bends o'er one as fair as thou,
In fond affection. Even now his heart—

Mad.—Doth my eye flash?—doth my lip curl with scorn?
'Tis scorn of thee, thou perjured stranger, not—
Oh, not of him, the generous and the true!
Hast thou e'er seen my Rupert?—hast thou met
Those proud and fearless eyes that never quailed,
As Falsehood quails, before another's glance—
As thine even now are shrinking from mine own—
The spirit beauty of that open brow—
The noble head—the free and gallant step—
The lofty mien whose majesty is won
From inborn honor—hast thou seen all this?
And dar'st thou speak of faithlessness and him
In the same idle breath? Thou little know'st
The strong confiding of a woman's heart,
When woman loves as—I do. Speak no more!

Strang.—Deluded girl! I tell thee he is false—
False as yon fleeting cloud!

Mad. True as the sun!

Strang.—The very wind less wayward than his heart!

Mad.—The forest oak less firm! He loved me not
For the frail rose-hues and the fleeting light
Of youthful loveliness—ah, many a cheek
Of softer bloom, and many a dazzling eye
More rich than mine may win my wanderer's gaze.
He loved me for my love, the deep, the fond—
For my unflinching truth; he cannot find—
Rove where he will—a heart that beats for him
With such intense, absorbing tenderness—
Such idolizing constancy as mine.
Why should he change, then?—I am still the same.

Strang.—Sweet infidel! wilt thou have ruder proof?
Rememberest thou a little golden case
Thy Rupert wore, in which a gem was shrined?
A gem I would not barter for a world—
An angel face:—its sunny wealth of hair
In radiant ripples bathed the graceful throat
And dimpled shoulders; round the rosy curve
Of the sweet mouth a smile seemed wandering ever;
While in the depths of azure fire that gleamed
Beneath the drooping lashes, slept a world
Of eloquent meaning, passionate yet pure—
Dreamy—subdued—but oh, how beautiful!
A look of timid, pleading tenderness
That should have been a talisman to charm
His restless heart for aye. Rememberest thou?

Mad.—(impatiently) I do—I do remember—'twas my own.
He prized it as his life—I gave it him—
What of it!—speak!

Strang.—(showing a miniature) Lady, behold that gift!

Mad.—(clasping her hands) Merciful Heaven! is my Rupert dead?

(After a pause, during which she seems overwhelmed with agony)
How died he?—when?—oh, thou wast by his side
In that last hour and I was far away!
My beloved love!—give me that token!—speak!
What message sent he to his Madelon?

Strang.—(Supporting her and strongly agitated,)

He is not dead, dear lady!—grieve not thus!

Mad.—He is not false, sir stranger!

Stran. For thy sake,
Would he were worthier! One other proof
I'll give thee, loveliest! if thou lov'st him still,
I'll not believe thee woman. Listen, then!
A faithful lover breathes not of his bliss
To other ears. Wilt hear a fable, lady?

Here the stranger details some incidents of the first wooing of Madelon by Rupert, and concludes with,

Lady, my task is o'er—dost doubt me still?

Mad. Doubt thee, my Rupert! ah, I know thee now.
Fling by that hateful mask!—let me unclasp it!
No! thou wouldst not betray thy Madelon.

The "Miscellaneous Poems" of the volume—many of them written in childhood—are, of course, various in character and merit. "The Dying Rosebud's Lament," although by no means one of the best, will very well serve to show the earlier and most characteristic manner of the poetess:

Ah, me!—ah wo is me
That I should perish now,
With the dear sunlight just let in Upon my balmy brow.

My leaves, instinct with glowing life,
Were quivering to unclose:
My happy heart with love was rife—
I was almost a rose.

Nerved by a hope, warm, rich, intense,
Already I had risen
Above my cage's curving fence—
My green and graceful prison.

My pouting lips, by Zephyr pressed,
Were just prepared to part
And whisper to the wooing wind
The rapture of my heart.

In new-born fancies revelling,
My mossy cell half riven,
Each thrilling leaflet seemed a wing
To bear me into Heaven.

How oft, while yet an infant-flower,
My crimson cheek I've laid
Against the green bars of my bowser,
Impatient of the shade.

And, peering up and peeping through
Its small but precious vistas,
Sighed for the lovely light and dew
That blessed my elder sisters.

I saw the sweet breeze rippling o'er
Their leaves that loved the play,
Though the light thief stole all the store
Of dew-drop gems away.

I thought how happy I should be
Such diamond wreaths to wear,
And frolic with a rose's glee
With sunbeam, bird and air.

Ah, me!—ah, wo is me, that I,
Ere yet my leaves unclose,
With all my wealth of sweets must die
Before I am a rose!

The poetical reader will agree with me that few things have ever been written (by any poet, at any age,) more delicately fanciful than the passages italicized—and yet they are the work of a girl not more than fourteen years of age. The clearness and force of expression, and the nice appositeness of the overt and insinuated meaning, are, when we consider the youth of the writer, even more remarkable than the fancy.

I cannot speak of Mrs. Osgood's poems without a strong propensity to ring the changes upon the indefinite word "grace" and its derivatives. About every thing she writes we perceive this indescribable charm—of which, perhaps, the elements are a vivid fancy and a quick sense of the proportionate. Grace, however, may be most satisfactorily defined as "a term applied, in despair, to that class of the impressions of Beauty which admit of no analysis." It is in this irresolvable effect that Mrs. Osgood excels any poetess of her country—and it is to this easily appreciable effect that her popularity is owing. Nor is she more graceful herself than a lover of the graceful, under whatever guise it is presented to her consideration. The sentiment renders itself manifest, in innumerable instances, as well throughout her prose as her poetry. Whatever be her theme, she at once extorts from it its whole essentiality of grace. Fanny Ellsler has been often lauded; true poets have sung her praises; but we look in vain for anything written about her, which so distinctly and vividly paints her to the eye as the half-dozen quatrains which follow. They are to be found in the English volume:

She comes!—the spirit of the dance!
And but for those large, eloquent eyes,
Where Passion speaks in every glance,
She'd seem a wanderer from the skies.

So light that, gazing breathless there,
Lest the celestial dream should go,
You'd think the music in the air
Waved the fair vision so and fro,

Or think the melody's sweet flow
Within the radiant creature played,
And those soft wreathing arms of snow
And white sylph feet the music made.

Now gliding slow with dreamy grace,
Her eyes beneath their lashes lost,
Now motionless, with lifted face,
And small hands on her bosom crossed.

And now with flashing eyes she springs—
Her whole bright figure raised in air,
As if her soul had spread its wings
And poised her one wild instant there!

She spoke not—but, so richly fraught
With language are her glance and smile,
That, when the curtain fell, I thought
She had been talking all the while.

This is, indeed, poetry—and of the most unquestionable kind—poetry truthful in the proper sense—that is to say, breathing of Nature. There is here nothing forced or artificial—so hardly sustained enthusiasm. The poetess speaks because she feels, and what she feels; but then what she feels is felt only by the truly poetical. The thought in the last line of the quatrain will not be so fully appreciated by the reader as it should be; for latterly it has been imitated, plagiarized, repeated ad infinitum:—but the other passages italicized have still left them all their original effect. The idea in the two last lines is exquisitely naïve and natural; that in the two last lines of the second quatrain, beautiful beyond measure; that of the whole fifth quatrain, magnificent—unsurpassed in the entire compass of American poetry. It is instinct with the noblest poetical requisites—imagination.

Of the same trait I find, to my surprise, one of the best exemplifications among the "Juvenile Rhymes."

For Fancy is a fairy that can hear,
Ever, the melody of Nature's voice
And see all lovely visions that she will.
She drew a picture of a beauteous bird
With plumes of radiant green and gold inwoven,
Banished from its beloved resting place,
And fluttering in vain hope from tree to tree,
And bade us think how, like it, the sweet season
From one bright shelter to another fled—
First from the maple waved her emerald pinions,
But lingered still upon the oak and elm,
Till, frightened by rude breezes even from them,
With mournful sigh she moaned her sad farewell.

The little poem called "The Music Box" has been as widely circulated as any of Mrs. Osgood's compositions—but I will be pardoned for quoting it in farther exemplification of her ruling feature—grace:

Your heart is a music-box, dearest,
With exquisite tunes at command
Of melody sweetest and clearest
If tried by a delicate hand;
But its workmanship, love, is so fine,
At a single rude touch it would break;
Then oh, be the magic key mine
Its fairy-like whispers to wake!
And there's one little tune it can play
That I fancy all others above—
You learned it of Cupid one day—
It begins with and ends with "I love—" "I love"
It begins with and ends with "I love."

The melody and harmony of this jeu d'esprit are perfect, and there is in it a rich tinct of that epigrammatism for which the poetess is noted.

Some of the intentional epigrams interspersed through the works are peculiarly happy. Here is one which, while replete with the rarest "spirit of point," is yet something more than pointed.

TO AN ATHEIST POET.

Lovest thou the music of the sea?
 Callest thou the sunshine bright?
 His voice is more than melody—
 His smile is more than light.

Here, again, is something very similar:

Fanny shuts her smiling eyes,
 Then, because she cannot see,
 Thoughtless simpleton! she cries
 "Ah! you can't see me."

Fanny's like the sinner vain
 Who, with spirit shut and dim,
 Thinks, because he sees not Heaven,
 Heaven beholds not him.

Is it not a little surprising, however, that a writer capable of so much precision and finish as the author of these epigrams must be, should have failed to see how much of force is lost in the inversion of "the sinner vain?" Why not have written "Fanny's like the silly sinner?"—or, if "silly" be thought too jocose, "the blinded sinner?" The rhythm, at the same time, would thus be much improved by bringing the lines,

Fanny's like the silly sinner,
 Thinks because he sees not Heaven,

into exact equality.

In mingled epigram and epiglerie Mrs. Osgood is even more especially at home. I have seldom seen anything in this way more happily done than the song entitled "If He Can."

Let me see him once more
 For a moment or two;
 Let him tell me himself
 Of his purpose, dear, do!
 Let him gaze in these eyes
 While he lays out his plan
 To escape me and then
 He may go—if he can.

Let me see him once more!
 Let me give him one smile!
 Let me breathe but one word
 Of endearment the while!
 I ask but that moment—
 My life on the man!
 Does he think to forget me?
 He may—if he can.

"The Unexpected Declaration" is, perhaps, even a finer specimen of the same manner. It is one of that class of compositions which Mrs. Osgood has made almost exclusively her own.

Had I seen it without her name, I should have had no hesitation in ascribing it to her; for there is no other person—in America certainly—who does anything of a similar kind with anything like a similar piquancy:

"Azure-eyed Eloise! beauty is thine;
 Passion kneels to thee and calls thee divine;
 Minstrels awaken the lute with thy name;
 Poets have gladdened the world with thy fame;
 Painters half holy thy loved image keep;
 Beautiful Eloise, why do you weep?"

Still bows the lady her light tresses low,
 Fast the warm tears from her veiled eyes flow.

"Sunny-haired Eloise, wealth is thine own;
 Rich is thy silken robe; bright is thy zone;
 Proudly the jewel illumines thy way;
 Clear rubies rival thy ruddy lips' play;
 Diamonds like star-drops thy silken braids deck;
 Pearls waste their snow on thy lovelier neck;
 Luxury softens thy pillow for sleep;
 Angels watch over it;—why do you weep?"

Still bows the lady her light tresses low;
 Faster the tears from her veiled eyes flow.

"Gifted and worshipped one! genius and grace
 Play in each motion and beam in thy face.
 When from thy rosy lip rises the song
 Hearts that adore thee the echo prolong.
 Ne'er in the festival shone an eye brighter—
 Ne'er in the mazy dance fell a foot lighter—
 One only spirit thou'st failed to bring down—
 Exquisite Eloise! why do you frown?"

Swift o'er her forehead a dark shadow stole,
 Sent from the tempest of pride in her soul.

"Touched by thy sweetness, in love with thy grace,
 Charmed with the magic of mind in thy face,
 Bewitched by thy beauty, e'en his haughty strength—
 The strength of the stoic is conquered at length,
 Lo! at thy feet see him kneeling the while—Eloise! Eloise! why do you smile?"

The head was withdrawn from her happy blue eyes;
 She gazed on her lover in laughing surprise,
 While the dimple and blush, stealing soft to her cheek,
 Told the tale that her tongue was too timid to speak.

The point of all this, however, might have been sharpened, and the polish increased in lustre, by the application of the emory of brevity. From what the lover says much might well have been omitted; and I should have preferred leaving out altogether the autorial comments; for the story is fully told without them. The "Why do you weep?" "Why do you frown?" and "Why do you smile?" supply all the imagination requires; to supply more than it requires, oppresses and offends it. Nothing more deeply grieves it—or more vexes the true taste in general, than hyperism of any kind. In Germany, Wohlgeborn is a loftier title than Edelgeborn; and in Greece, the thrice-victorious at the Olympic games could claim a statue of the size of life, while he who had conquered but once was entitled only to a colossal one.

The English collection of which I speak was entitled "A Wreath of Wild Flowers from New England." It met with a really cordial reception in Great Britain—was favorably noticed by the "Literary Gazette," "Times," "Atlas," "Monthly Chronicle;" and especially by the "Court Journal," "The Court and Ladies' Magazine," "La Belle Assemblée," and other similar works. "We have long been familiar," says the high authority of the "Literary Gazette," "with the name of our fair author. . . . Our expectations have been fulfilled, and we have here a delightful gathering of the sweetest of wild flowers, all looking as fresh and beautiful as if they had grown in the richest of English pasture in place of having been 'nursed by the cataract.' True the wreath might have been improved with a little more care—a trifling attention or two paid to the formation of it. A stalk here and there that obtrudes itself between the bells of the flowers, might have become so interwoven as to have been concealed, and the whole have looked as if it had grown in that perfect and beautiful form. Though, after all, we are perhaps too chary; for in Nature every leaf is not ironed out to a form, nor propped up with a wiry precision, but blown and ruffled by the refreshing breezes, and looking as careless and easy and unaffected as a child that bounds along with its silken locks tossed to and fro just as the wind uplifts them. Page after page of this volume have we perused with a feeling of pleasure and admiration." The "Court Journal" more emphatically says:—"Her wreath is one of violets, sweet-scented, pure and modest; so lovely that the hand that wove it should not neglect additionally to enrich it by turning her love and kindness to things of larger beauty. Some of the smaller lyrics in the volume are perfectly beautiful—beautiful in their chaste and exquisite simplicity and the perfect elegance of their composition." In fact, there was that about "The Wreaths of Wild Flowers"—that inexpressible grace of thought and manner—which never fails to find ready echo in the hearts of the aristocracy and refinement of Great Britain;—and it was here especially that Mrs. Osgood found welcome. Her husband's merits as an artist had already introduced her into distinguished society, (she was petted, in especial, by Mrs. Norton and Rogers,) but the publication of her poems had at once an evidently favorable effect upon his fortunes. His pictures were placed in a most advantageous light by her poetical and conversational ability.

Messrs. Clarke and Austin, of New York, have lately issued another, but still a very incomplete collection of "Poems by Frances S. Osgood." In general, it includes by no means the best of her works. "The Daughter of Herodias"—one of her longest compositions, and a very noble poem, putting me in mind of the best efforts of Mrs. Hemans—is omitted:—it is included, however, in the last edition of Doctor Griswold's "Poets and Poetry of America." In Messrs. C. and A.'s collection there occur, too, very many of those half sentimental, half allegorical compositions of which, at one period, the authoress seemed to be particularly fond—for the reason, perhaps, that they afforded her good opportunity for the exercise of her ingenuity and epigrammatic talent:—no poet, however, can admit them to be poetry at all. Still, the volume contains some pieces which enable us to take a new view of the powers of the writer. A few additional years, with their inevitable sorrow, appear to have stirred the depths of her heart. We see less of frivolity—less of vivacity—more of tenderness—earnestness—even passion—and far more of the true imagination as distinguished from its subordinate, fancy. The one prevalent trait, grace, alone distinctly remains. "The Spirit of Poetry," "To Sybil," "The Birth of the Callitriche," and "The Child and its Angel-Playmate" would do honor to any of our poets. "She Loves Him Yet," nevertheless, will serve, better than either of these poems, to show the alteration of manner referred to:

She loves him yet!
I know by the blush that rises
Beneath the curls
That shadow her soul-lit cheek.
She loves him yet!
Through all Love's sweet disguises,
In timid girls,
A blush will be sure to speak.

But deeper signs
Than the radiant blush of beauty,
The maiden finds.
Whenever his name is heard
Her young heart thrills,
Forgetting herself—her duty—
Her dark eye fills,
And her pulse with hope is stirred.

She loves him yet!
The flower the false one gave her
When last he came
Is still with her wild tears wet.
She'll ne'er forget
However his faith may waver.
Through grief and shame,
Believe it, she loves him yet!

His favorite songs
She will sing;—she heeds no other.

With all her wrongs
Her life on his love is set.
Ah, doubt no more!
She never can wed another.
Till life be o'er
She loves—she will love him yet!

The following stanzas are in a somewhat similar tone, but are more noticeable for their terse energy of expression :

Yes! lower to the level
Of those who laud thee now!
Go, join the joyous revel
And pledge the heartless vow!
Go, dim the soul-born beauty
That lights that lofty brow!
Fill, fill the bowl!—let burning wine
Drown in thy soul Love's dream divine!

Yet, when the laugh is lightest—
When wildest flies the jest—
When gleams the goblet brightest,
And proudest heaves thy breast,
And thou art madly pledging
Each gay and jovial guest—
A ghost shall glide amid the flowers—
The shade of Love's departed hours.

And thou shalt shrink in sadness
From all the splendor there,
And curse the revel's gladness,
And hate the banquet's glare,
And pine 'mid passion's madness,
For true love's purer air,
And feel thou'dst give their wildest glee
For one unsullied sigh from me.

Yet deem not this my prayer, love!
Ah, no! if I could keep
Thy altered heart from care, love,
And charm its grief to sleep,
Mine only should despair, love,
I—I alone would weep—
I—I alone would mourn the flowers
That bloom in Love's deserted bowers.

In not presenting to the public at one view all that she has written in verse, Mrs. Osgood has incurred the risk of losing that credit to which she is entitled on the score of versatility—of variety in invention and expression. There is scarcely a form of poetical composition in which she has not made experiment; and there is none in which she has not very happily succeeded. Her defects are chiefly negative and by no means numerous. Her versification is sometimes exceedingly good, but more frequently feeble through the use of harsh consonants, and such words as "thou'dst" for "thou wouldst," with other unnecessary contractions, inversions, and obsolete expressions. Her imagery is often mixed;—indeed it is rarely otherwise. The epigrammatism of her conclusions gives to her poems, as wholes, the air of being more skilfully constructed than they really are. On the other hand, we look in vain throughout her works for an offence against the finer taste, or against decorum—for a low thought or a platitude. A happy refinement—an instinct of the pure and delicate—is one of her most noticeable excellences. She may be properly commended, too, for originality of poetic invention, whether in the conception of a theme or in the manner of treating it. Consequences of this trait, are her point and piquancy. Fancy and naïveté appear in all she writes. Regarding the loftier merits, I am forced to speak of her in more measured terms. She has occasional passages of true imagination—but scarcely the glowing, vigorous, and sustained ideality of Mrs. Maria Brooks—or even, in general, the less ethereal elevation of Mrs. Welby. In that indescribable something, however, which, for want of a more definite term, we are accustomed to call "grace"—that charm so magical, because at once so shadowy and so potent—that Will o' the Wisp which, in its supreme development, may be said to involve nearly all that is valuable in poetry—she has, unquestionably, no rival among her countrywomen.

Of pure prose—of prose proper—she has, perhaps, never written a line in her life. Her usual Magazine papers are a class by themselves. She begins with a resolute effort at being sedate—that is to say, sufficiently prosaic and matter-of-fact for the purpose of a legend or an essay; but, after a few sentences, we behold uprising the leaven of the Muse; then, with a flourish and some vain attempts at repression, a scrap of verse renders itself manifest; then comes a little poem outright; then another and another and another, with impertinent patches of prose in between—until at length the mask is thrown fairly off and far away, and the whole article—sings.

Upon the whole, I have spoken of Mrs. Osgood so much in detail, less on account of what she has actually done than on account of what I perceive in her the ability to do.

In character, she is ardent and sensitive; a worshipper of beauty; universally admired, respected, and beloved. In person, she is about the medium height and slender; complexion usually pale; hair black and glossy; eyes a clear, luminous grey, large, and with great capacity for expression. In no respect can she be called "beautiful;" but the question "is it possible she is not so?" is very frequently asked, and by none more frequently than by those who most intimately know her.

Note.—Some passages of the above article have appeared in some of our Magazines—in "Marginalia," &c.

WEYER'S CAVE.

In Augusta County, Virginia.

BY THE REV. J. NEWTON BROWN.

Our Guide leads down the shadowy way,
Around our heads the torches play;
And myriad forms of wonder glance
Upon our gaze as we advance,

With silent awe, around him, all
Survey the Statuary Hall;—
What strange colossal figures first
Here on the startled vision burst!

From every side upon us loom
Titanic shapes of power and gloom;
Shadows of those to darkness hurled,
And relics of the deluged world!

A long and narrow opening past,
Our torches now emerge at last,
Where glorious shines the lofty Throne,
Ascribed by name to Solomon.

A fine Cascade appears to fall,
In beauty down his Palace Wall;
While on the left a Pillar springs,
Worthy the most superb of Kings.

Behind, are rarer wonders yet,
In his Shell Room, or Cabinet:
Nor ocean cave, nor jewelled mine,
Could yield us riches more divine.

Turn now, and view this Pantheon,
Where all the gods appear in stone;
While calm, amid the rabble wild,
Sits the Madonna with her Child.

Into the Armory next we go;
Ajax's Shield is here to show;
Struck by the light spear of our Guide,
It rang, but no stern voice replied.

Advancing, we encounter soon
The Grand Pagoda of Rangoon;
While seated in his moveless chair,
The still Boodh rests forever there.

The Twin Room and the Balustrade,
And the rich Tapestry surveyed,
In the Cathedral now we meet
The Bishop with his Desk and Seat.

Wrecks of the Mediæval Age,
On every side our thoughts engage;
Column, and arch, and castled hill,
Magnificent in ruins still.

Hark, the deep summons of the Drum!
The Guide is there, and there we come:
How shift the scenes! A few steps more,
We stand upon the Ball-Room floor.

A hundred feet this floor expands,
Midway a Paganini stands;—
The Sounding Board, and Dressing-Room,
Our torches with their light illum.

New wonders call. Advance, advance;
Leave others here to weave the dance;
O'er Suntag's Hill our footsteps bend,
'Till Jacob's Ladder we descend.

Where are we now? These rooms they call
The Senate Room and Congress Hall;
But pause not long, for farther on
Lies the grand Hall of Washington.

Two hundred, fifty feet, and more,
We glance our eye the space before;
Like Heaven's high vault, in darkness far
This Hall extends, without a star!

Just in the centre vast and dim,
Our voices raise a patriot hymn;
For here, unwrought by mortal hands,
The Father of his Country stands!

The ancient Pyramids and Towers,
Do homage to his god-like powers;
Damocles' Sword, Achilles' Shield,
Like homage to our Hero yield.

Turn to the left, and gaze upon
This Room of Lady Washington:
What splendid folds and hangings here!
This Mirror, and that Chandelier!

Now to the Diamond Church descend,
What columns spring! What arches bend!
Its glittering spire, how white and high,
It towers towards the upper sky!

A noble Gallery stretches round;—
Hark, for yon Organ's pealing sound!
Look up, and see an Eden fair;
Lo Heaven and Earth are meeting there!

'Tis lost! That Paradise is lost!
A rugged Wilderness is crost;—
The Rising Moon reveals in light,
Napoleon on the Alpine height.

On our right hand superb and high,
What wondrous structure meets the eye!
'Tis Babel's Tower! With flutings soft,
Story on story springs aloft!

Behind, all white with hoary years,
The Frozen Cataract appears;
In front, the dazzling Hill of Snow;
The Coral Bank gleams forth below.

The Ladies' Toilet here we view,
The Theatre and Snow Bank too;
The new and brilliant Balustrade,
The Terrapin and sweet Cascade.

Oh, see this Mammoth Oyster Shell!
These Mummies in their stony cell!
Minerva with her spear and helm!—
Wonders on wonders here o'erwhelm!

Come now, your weary steps beguile,
Here at the Fountain of the Nile;
Drink from this pure and glittering spring,
Whose waters sweet refreshment bring.

Hence we return. One wondrous spot
Awaits our steps; forget it not.
Oh, let not mortal man profane
A glory Earth may seek in vain!

Irreverent men! No longer call
This, Jefferson's or Jackson's Hall;
Gaze round this Sanctuary fair;
Lo, the veiled Seraphim are there!

Breaks through the gloom a grander thing—
Behold you great Archangel's Wing!
That awful Wing! You see no more—
But bow wish him, and God adore!

June 26th, 1849.

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

ADDRESS delivered at the Dedication of the HOLLY-WOOD CEMETERY, on Monday the 25th June, 1849. By OLIVER P. BALDWIN, Esq., of Richmond, Virginia. Published at the request of the Board of Directors. Richmond. Macfarlane & Fergusson, Printers. 1849.

No exhibition of public taste of late years has been so gratifying to the sensibilities, as the decoration of the burial grounds of our country. To linger around the spot where we have deposited the remains of our dearly-loved, to deck it with the flowers of early spring, to carve upon the stone which sets it apart some simple expression of our affectionate remembrance, seems an office in unison with the best feelings of humanity. It has been too long the custom to bury the dead within the narrow limits of crowded grave-yards, amid the noise and glare of cities, where the mourning relatives cannot visit undisturbed the tomb of the departed, and where it often happens that the sanctuary of one sleeper is invaded to provide for the last resting-place of another. Far more seemly is it to select some rural retreat, upon whose breezy hill-tops and verdant declivities the mute but significant marbles may gleam out from the shade of primeval forest-trees, surrounded by the rose and the violet, affecting evidences of filial or parental love.

We know there are those who argue that when the informing spirit has left its tenement of clay, it is a matter of little moment what becomes of the inanimate mass. We do not envy the disciples of so cold and cheerless a philosophy. Speculate upon the topic as they may, there comes at length a negative to the repulsive sentiment from the inward consciousness of each of them. We feel that it is not so; we recognise the desire that we should repose, after the great change that awaits us, "in some sheltered nook," as the Address before us so beautifully expresses it, "where the voices of those we love, hastening from the broad sunlight of the world, may oft be heard in sighs and prayers, and like the nightingale, singing her sweet song in darkness, pour out the plaintive notes of affection and sorrow, amidst the consecrated shadows of the tomb."

The quiet beauty of rural cemeteries has always appeared to us in touching contrast with the rectangular walks and mournful cypresses of the city grave-yards. There is something, to us we confess, inexpressibly soothing in the green turf enamelled with blossoms, the song of birds in the interlacing branches of the trees above and the play of light and shade upon the mounds beneath, as the sun in his setting shines lovingly through the crevices of foliage. Around us is diffused a "dim religious light" more subduing than any ever shed through painted window on cathedral aisle, and we are apt to think, after lingering, for a time, among such sacred haunts, that death itself wears a less terrible aspect than before. We would represent him, at such an hour, not as the horrific skeleton with the scythe, but rather as he is imaged in the ancient genii, a fair winged boy, his weeping eyes covered with his left arm, and trailing a torch reversed in his right hand. In Holbein's Dance of Death, of all the modes in which the Destroyer is made to approach, there is none perhaps so striking as that, where he enters a group of little children seated around the fireside of a cottage, and taking one of them by the hand, leads it out of the door. "Quiet and unresisting," says the author of Hyperion, "goes the little child, and in its countenance no grief, but wonder only; while the other children are weeping and stretching forth their hands in vain towards their departing brother. It is a beautiful design, in all save the skeleton. An angel had been better, with folded wings and torch inverted."

Such images of death as these are in harmony with the feelings inspired by rural burying-grounds. We would, therefore, have our depositories of the dead made attractive places of resort for the living, that while they derive from the frequent contemplation of the grave, affecting monitions of the shortness of life, they may come to consider the last call as one to a more peaceful state of existence. We would not attract them by gaudy parterres or the vulgar pretension of monumental fripperies, but by the softening influences of the place upon the feelings and the heart, inducing to a more sober walk among the pomps and pageantries of the world.

The new Cemetery of Holly-Wood near Richmond is a spot of rare beauty, in the gentle undulations of its hills and the soft murmurs of its brooks and rustling foliage. A high mound at the farthest extremity commands a view of the city, at the distance of a mile and a half, the spires and cupolas of its churches and public buildings standing in relief against the sky. At the base of this mound flows the James over the rocks of its obstructed bed, singing a perpetual requiem to the departed who rest upon its banks. In this Cemetery will soon be deposited the forms of the young and the old—beauty bursting into womanhood, manly strength just entered upon the active duties of life, age with the silvery locks and the decrepid limbs. Here let affection rear the simple tablets of fond remembrance and plant the flower that shall typify its unavailing regrets. Let no "flattering false inscriptions" be graven upon the tombs that shall here be erected, to record of some lost brother "not what he was, but what he should have been." But let all be done "decently and in order," so that to the thousands who in after years shall thread the avenues and paths of Holly-Wood, it shall seem the resting-place of a Christian people, and the dust that moulders in its bosom be regarded by them, in the language of the German poet, Klopstock, as "seed sown by God to be ripened for the harvest."

The Address of Mr. Baldwin, delivered at the dedication of Holly-Wood Cemetery, was a most eloquent and affecting effort. Its author is one of the most graceful and accomplished writers with whom we are acquainted, and would soon reach the highest literary distinction, were his studies devoted to that walk of life rather than to the strife and excitement of politics. We should like to lay before our readers some extracts which we had marked out for quotation in the present Address, but we have not room for them. The pamphlet is very handsomely printed by our own publishers, Macfarlane & Ferguson.

THE HISTORIES OF CAIUS CORNELIUS TACITUS. With Notes for Colleges. By W. S. Tyler, Professor of Languages in Amherst College. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 200 Broadway. Philadelphia: Geo. S. Appleton: 168 Chesnut street. 1849.

We very recently noticed an edition of the Germania and Agricola by Mr. Tyler, and now we have one of the "Histories of Tacitus" from the same hand. From our examination of the latter publication, we are convinced that Mr. T. is improving, as an editor, not only by experience, but by great care and evidently enthusiastic industry.

He is certainly a man of no ordinary talents, and his essay on the characteristics of Tacitus would be an ornament to any of our best reviews. Appearing as it does in a school-book, it will of course meet the eye of few literary men whose attention is not specially turned to the classics, but we trust will inspire students, who use this edition, with that enthusiasm, tempered by sound judgment and good taste, which marks the editor himself.

We should be pleased, however, to see this admirable, although somewhat eulogistic criticism of Tacitus, published as a separate article.

The translation of Döderlein's essay on the diction of Tacitus, in which that German commentator illustrates his author's peculiarities of language by many examples from the original, gives us a clearer conception of those peculiarities, than any thing which we have before seen, and must lead all who read it to a more intelligent and habitual observation of the remarkable expedients, by which Tacitus endeavored to combine his three favorite and not easily reconciled objects—excessive brevity, rapidity and brilliant, dignified impressiveness.

These two essays swell the bulk of the volume a little, but, in our opinion, are fully worth the price of the book.

Mr. T. seems anxious to profit by all criticisms, and, from the glance which we have been enabled to give his notes, has evidently presented the scholastic public with an edition which leaves little to be desired in the way of explanation.

He says that the notes "have been made somewhat more grammatical," and that "their value has been increased by more copious references to the excellent grammar of Zumpt, in addition to that of Andrews and Stoddard. It is chiefly by way of such references, that the general principles of grammar have been illustrated. Sometimes, however, a concise statement of the principle referred to has been added."

Now we would prefer to have this method reversed, and the "concise statement" precede the reference, which may be, and often is, to a book, not within reach of the student. He will certainly read the "concise statement," when interrupted by references and quotations, and may afterwards look at a book referred to, if it be accessible; but, when he encounters a long note bristling with strange names and symbols, he will often pass it over in indolent disgust. References are principally valuable to teachers, who indeed usually make notes valuable or worthless to their pupils by their mode of examination.

This mistake, as we think it, is however common to most, if not all the commentators, and might be easily corrected in a new edition. We do not hesitate to recommend this, as the best school-edition of Tacitus which has come under our observation.

A FIRST BOOK IN GREEK, Containing a full view of the forms of Words with Vocabularies and copious exercises. On the method of constant imitation and repetition. By John McClintock, D. D., Professor of Languages, and George R. Crooks, A. M., Adjunct Professor of Languages, Dickinson College. Harper & Brothers, Publishers, 82 Cliff street. 1848.

If the students at our schools do not become good classical scholars, it certainly will not be for want of books prepared to afford them facilities. It has been well said that we are "overwhelmed" with them; we have before us a ducia comae, from which it requires no little consideration to choose the best of so many tempting viands.

The plan of teaching languages, adopted in this volume, seems now to be preferred by common consent to every other. According to this scheme, we learn other languages, as we do our own, with the additional advantage of having an intelligent friend perfectly acquainted with the language that we are acquiring constantly at our elbow, talking and writing correctly himself, pointing out all the rules and idioms as he proceeds, selecting examples to illustrate new usages, and finally requiring us to make sentences, involving the same principles and idioms, until they are indelibly stamped on the memory. The method in fine is an admirable combination of the practical and scientific, by which teacher and pupil are both kept incessantly at work, not however too difficult for the latter, who is conscious of easy progress at every moment. The two gentlemen who have prepared this book seem to understand this system becoming so deservedly popular, and to have carried out very successfully.

One excellent peculiarity in their book, is that a knowledge of quantity and accents is imparted from the very first in connexion with each lesson. This is applying the same general principle to pronunciation, and we have no doubt of its being the only method, by which good habits of pronunciation can be immediately acquired and bad ones effectually prevented.

An application of prosodial rules to poetry, after mispronunciation has from habit become incurable, is like attempting to convert a clown into a gentleman, by arraying him once a week in his Sunday finery.

We approve very highly of summing up, as is done in this book, of the rules which are at first scattered; but we cannot say as much for the written questions.

The editors promise a second book shortly, and, if they go on as they have commenced, they will be entitled to the thanks of all classical teachers in the United States, unless perhaps those who may be rival publishers.

LOYOLA AND JESUITISM IN ITS RUDIMENTS. By Isaac Taylor, Author of "The Natural History of Enthusiasm." New York: Robert Carter & Brothers, No. 285 Broadway. 1849.

This is in many respects a remarkable work. Indeed from so philosophic a writer as Isaac Taylor, we could not expect one of a different character. His manner of treating the attractive subject he had selected differs very essentially from all the recent publications with reference to the order of Jesus. Perhaps the article, written a few years ago for the Edinburgh Review, which was at first attributed to Macaulay, but afterwards known to be the production of Stephen, has been more universally read than any other treatise on Jesuitism. Mr. Taylor's book is in remarkable contrast with the antithetical sentences and highly-colored pictures of the Reviewer. His style is the highest degree spiritual and meditative, rich with the eloquence of a loftier inspiration and pure in the exercise of a more refined simplicity. The present volume will be cordially welcomed by a large class of readers, to whom Isaac Taylor's books afford constant solace and delight.

It has reached us through Messrs. Nash & Woodhouse.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE BEAUTIFUL, BY VICTOR COUSIN. New York. Daniel Bigby—1849.

So many frivolous and immoral works have been given to the American public in the form of translations, that we are slow to commend such works to their favour. Two striking exceptions claim our notice, however, in the publications of Mr. Bigby of New York. Cousin is chiefly known to English readers by his Philosophy of History. The volume named above is conceived in the same vein of comprehensive and subtle analysis. Without the elegant rhetoric of Burke, it unfolds the subject more definitely, and abounds in vigor and clearness of statement and felicity of illustration. It is well translated by Mr. Daniel of Cheshunt College, and very neatly printed. The same publisher has given us a translation of "The Village Doctor," a most pathetic, unexceptionable and interesting little story by Madame D'Arbouville.

LADY ALICE OR THE NEW UNA. A Novel. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1849.

If we were to attempt the discussion of the problem which this book unfolds, considered in the abstract, an essay would be requisite, and on a subject scarcely appropriate to our secular pages. Its scope is like that of several works of fiction that recently have become popular, such as "Hawkstone," "Father Clement," and one, the title of which we forget, by Mr. Brownson. It is, indeed, a new and interesting feature in this class of writings to develop theological, ethical and religious questions; and without expressing any opinion as to the doctrine enforced in the present work, we advise all interested in the existent controversy between the advocates of what are called high and low Church principles, to read "Lady Alice." In a literary point of view it is a peculiar work, inasmuch as, if we are not misinformed, it is an American production, first published in England. The author is said to be Mr. Huntington, a brother of the artist of that name, and the vivid descriptions of Italian scenery and manners, with which it is interspersed, confirm the report, as Mr. H. passed many years in Italy.

ITALIAN COMEDIES. Select Comedies; Translated from the Italian of Goldoni, Giraud, and Nota. New York: D. Appleton & Company. 1849.

In this volume the English reader is introduced to a new and most interesting range of dramatic literature. The Italian Comedy of the last century, so effective in its results on society, has been fully discussed by Sismondi in his Literature of Europe, but we are not aware that any English version of the plays even of Goldoni, the most famous dramatist of his country, has before appeared. The present volume, indeed, gives us but two comedies of Goldoni, and these, by no means, the most striking of his productions.

One who reads Italian comedy for the first time in these pages, after making large allowance for the unavoidable defects of translation, will be at some loss to account for the success, which attended its representations. That this success was very great is shewn in the reforms which were brought about by the Venetian stage,—how gambling was checked,—how the rage for pic-nics was in some degree mitigated, (by the way, we are sadly in want of a new Goldoni to satirize our own "Smanis per la Villeggiatura,")—how the cavalier servente was brought into disrepute. In none of the comedies here given do we recognize the brilliant fence of wit that distinguishes the dramatic compositions of Sheridan, nor can any of them sustain a comparison, for interest of dialogue, with the plays of Molière. It would require indeed a consummate hand to come up to these masters of the art, but he who falls short of them sinks into the least tolerable of all forms of mediocrity. In tragedy or in sentimental plays where the accessory of verse is admissible, positive failure may be escaped by the musical flow of the language or the finish of single passages, as in the Bianca Visconti and Tortosa of Mr. Willis, which, though not successful as dramatic compositions, are so studded with gems of imaginative beauty as to be worthy of long preservation. But in prose comedy, there is wanting the help of versification, and if the dialogue flags, the play is very certain to be damned. We say, then, considering the entire lack of piquancy in frequent passages of these plays, that it would seem remarkable to an English reader that they occupied so high a rank in the literature of their age.

It cannot be denied, however, that these comedies furnish very agreeable reading, and are remarkable for the ingenuity of their plots and the naturalness of their incidents. The book is for sale by A. Morris.

SOUTHEY'S COMMON-PLACE BOOK. Edited by his Son-in-Law, John Wood Warter, B. D. New York. Harper & Brothers, Publishers, 82 Cliff Street. 1849.

The title of this publication took us completely by surprise, as we had never imagined that Southey could have kept any other Common-Place Book than "The Doctor," that queerest of all omnis gatheras, where the whole tribe of authors, ancient and modern, from the Homerids down to Maria Del Occidente, are jumbled together like the statues of "Homer and Plutarch and Nicodamus" in the groves of Castle Blarney. This posthumous "Common-Place Book" is by no means so entertaining as "The Doctor," but it is nevertheless a very acceptable addition to the library, presenting a vast deal of curious research into old and forgotten authors. We commend it to the attention of the public, although we confess that for summer reading we should much prefer to follow the adventures of Daniel Dove, or to doze over the pages that tell us

"How happily the days Of Thalaba went by."

The very excellent paper and fair typography of the present work do great credit to the Messrs. Harper. It may be found at the book store of A. Morris.

KALOOLAH, or Journeyings to the Djebel Kumri: An Autobiography of Jonathan Romer. Edited by W. S. Mayo, M. D. New York: George P. Putnam, 155 Broadway. London: David Bogue, 86 Fleet Street, 1849.

The only fault we can find with Kaloolah is one which we venture to say nobody else but ourselves will ever express,—it is too long. We arrive at this conclusion not by reason of any impatience or fatigue experienced in reading it—for it is easy labor to cut its leaves—but by estimating it, as Macaulay once suggested of a dull biography, by avordupois; there seems to be too much of lively and graphic narrative, too much of ink and paper for the purchase-stud and on;

qu
th o.

380 money. A passing New York critic—no other than Kennedy—said when Bunyan's Essays sold for twelve and a half cents, that it was "too much paid for a shilling," and so we think of "Kabalah." Nevertheless it is the book of the month, and will furnish enjoyment to a vast number of readers, during the leisure hours of the day-days. We could wish for no more delightful task, under the reign of Sir Isaac Newton, than a dozen such volumes, in Mr. Putnam's choice style of publication, to be read expensively beneath a large shade tree in the country.

Manass. Nash and Woodhouse have it for sale.

SERMONS BY THE LATE THOS. CHANNING, D.D., LL. D.,
Illustrative of Different Stages in his Ministry. 1798-1847. New York: Harper & Brothers.

This is the sixth volume of the series of Dr. Channing's Posthumous Works simultaneously published by the editor at home and by the Harpers in this country. It comprises a period of half a century in the dates of the sermons which it contains, the concluding discourse being the last ever written by the gifted and lamented author. Apart from the doctrinal character and moral teachings of Dr. Channing's Pulpit Essays, there is a certain attraction in the style that cannot fail to win the attention of the reader. It presents a happy medium between the severe and the ornate, the stream of eloquent thought flowing on ever brilliantly and forcibly. As specimens of rhetorical beauty, the sermons of the present volume are by no means the best that might have been selected, but the design of the compilation seems to have been rather an illustration of his ministry under different aspects than a monument of his literary merit.

THE ADVENTURES OF CAPTAIN BONNEVILLE, U. S. A., in the Rocky Mountains and the Far West. By Washington Irving. Author's Revised Edition. New York: G. P. Putnam, 155 Broadway and 142 Strand, London. 1849.

Those who are familiar with Washington Irving's graphic delineations of scenery and incident (and what educated American is not?) will readily believe that the present work is a delightful one. It forms the tenth volume of the new edition of the "Complete Works" which is now nearly finished. The sale of these charming books, we learn, has been beyond the expectation of the publisher, so that those who would secure the best and only complete edition of Irving, should not delay purchasing any longer. It may soon be difficult to procure the volumes.

This book may be obtained of A. Morris.

INAUGURAL ADDRESS, delivered before the Board of Trustees of Hampden Sidney College, January 10th, 1849. By L. W. GREEN, D. D., President. Printed by Johnston and Stockton—Market Street—Pittsburgh. 1849.

We rejoice to see the efforts that the friends of Hampden Sidney College are now making to revivify that venerable institution of learning, for many years past in a declining state. The new President, Dr. Green, will doubtless effect much in this good work. He enjoys an enviable reputation as a profound scholar and accurate thinker, and the Address before us furnishes abundant and gratifying evidence that he is no unworthy successor of those great names in the annals of Virginia, which are associated with the earliest and best instructions of these halls of science.

In the exordium of this Address, Dr. Green alludes in effective language to the foundation of the college and pays a passing tribute to the memory of that great man, whose name stands first, conjoined with one scarcely less illustrious, in the title which it bears. Accustomed to regard John

Hampden as the noblest exemplar of ~~unimpaired~~ independence which history records before the days of Washington, we are sorry to observe that Dr. Green falls into the common error which supposes him to have embarked with Cromwell for America and to have been stopped in the Thames by an Order in Council,—thus representing him as ready to abandon the great principle of civil freedom for which he afterwards laid down his life. The fact has been established by Miss Aikin and fortified by Mr. Rives that such could not have been the case,—that the order in council to arrest the vessels was revoked almost as soon as it was made; so that if they had really embarked for the purpose of going to America there was nothing to prevent the execution of their design—and that the order itself was dated 43 days before the final judgment of the Court of Exchequer in the matter of the ship-money. To believe the story of the embarkation, therefore, would be to impute to Hampden an ungraceful retreat from a controversy which was still pending and undetermined—"a hypothesis," says Mr. Rives, "to which the whole tenor of his life and character stands in contradiction."*

The style of Dr. Green, as exhibited in this Address, though condensed, is neither simple nor pleasing. We are reluctant, however, to base an opinion upon a pamphlet which the author has had the bad taste to place for publication in the hands of a printer in another state, for we know not what allowances to make for blunders of the press. We have marked no less than twenty-three awkward typographical errors, which are apparent to every reader—how many mistakes may be latent, it is impossible to say. Certainly there must be something wrong in the following passage in allusion to Patrick Henry:

"Tutored in such a school, we need not wonder that the earliest efforts of his genius were directed against that clerical denomination he had witnessed only to abhor; and when in after years, he spoke amidst cries of 'Treason! Treason!' those words of fire, which caused the ears of those who heard to tingle, till all men woke up, at once, as from a trance, and catching up the sound, sent it onward, and onward still, in louder and yet louder peals of reverberating thunder."

We trust this is an error of the types, if for no other reason than to teach Virginia professors how ridiculous it is to employ Pennsylvania workmen to do what can be so much better done at home; as all will acknowledge who will compare the bold, clear typography of Mr. Rives' Discourse, printed by Shepherd & Oelin of this city, with the deformed pages of this Pittsburgh pamphlet.

* See "Discourse on the Character and Services of John Hampden, &c. By W. C. Rives, Esq."

AN APOLOGY.—We have recently discovered with unfeigned regret that a poem published as original in the March number of this magazine for the present year, entitled "Song, Translated from Jacobi," is a plagiarism from an English author. The person from whom we received it, most shamelessly stated it to be his own, and as our confidence in his integrity was unwavering, we were induced to publish it. As his design was rather to win the credit of so beautiful a translation, than to play off a trick upon ourselves, we forbear to give his name. Comment is quite unnecessary upon so discreditable a performance, but we may say, in general, with reference to borrowed articles that are imposed upon Editors as original, that the practice of such tricks argues a small mind, and has always received the reprobation of gentlemen. We are secure from such impositions, in all doubtful cases, by requiring a responsible name with the article.

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE. PROSPECTUS.

This work is conducted in the spirit of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, (which was favorably received by the public for twenty years,) but as it is twice as large, and appears so often, we not only give spirit and freshness to it by many things which were excluded by a month's delay, but while thus extending our scope and gathering a greater and more attractive variety, are able so to increase the solid and substantial part of our literary, historical, and political harvest, as fully to satisfy the wants of the American reader.

The elaborate and stately Essays of the Edinburgh, Quarterly, and other Reviews; and Blackwood's noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain Scenery; and the contributions to Literature, History, and Common Life, by the sagacious Spectator, the sparkling Examiner, the judicious Athenæum, the busy and industrious Literary Gazette, the sensible and comprehensive Britannia, the sober and respectable Christian Observer; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the United Service, and with the best articles of the Dublin University, New Monthly, Fraser's, Tait's, Ainsworth's, Hood's, and Sporting Magazines, and of Chambers' admirable Journal. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from Punch; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of The Times. We shall increase our variety by importations from the continent of Europe, and from the new growth of the British colonies.

The steamship has brought Europe, Asia and Africa, into our neighborhood; and will greatly multiply our connections, as Merchants, Travelers, and Politicians, with all parts of the world;

so that much more than ever it now becomes every intelligent American to be informed of the condition and changes of foreign countries. And this not only because of their nearer connection with ourselves, but because the nations seem to be hastening through a rapid process of change, to some new state of things, which the merely political prophet cannot compute or foresee.

Geographical Discoveries, the progress of Colonization, (which is extending over the whole world,) and Voyages and Travels, will be favorite matter for our selection: and, in general, we shall systematically and very fully acquaint our readers with the great department of Foreign affairs, without entirely neglecting our own.

While we aspire to make the Living Age desirable to all who wish to keep themselves informed of the rapid progress of the movement—to Statesmen, Divines, Lawyers, and Physicians—to men of business and men of leisure—it is still a stronger object to make it attractive and useful to their Wives and Children. We believe that we can thus do some good in our day and generation; and hope to make the work indispensable in every well-informed family. We say indispensable, because in this day of cheap literature it is not possible to guard against the influx of what is bad in taste and vicious in morals, in any other way than by furnishing a sufficient supply of a healthy character. The mental and moral appetite must be gratified.

We hope that, by "winnowing the wheat from the chaff," by providing abundantly for the imagination, and by a large collection of Biography, Voyages and Travels, History, and more solid matter, we may produce a work which shall be popular, while at the same time it will aspire to raise the standard of public taste. May, 1844.

TERMS.

The LIVING AGE is published every Saturday, by E. LITTELL & Co., Boston; Price 12½ cents a number, or six dollars a year in advance. Remittances for any period will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

Clubs, paying a year in advance, will be supplied as follows:—

| | |
|-----------------|---------|
| Four copies for | $20 00 |
| Nine " " | 40 00 |
| Twelve " " | 50 00 |

Complete sets, in nineteen volumes, to the end of 1848, handsomely bound, and packed in neat boxes, are for sale at $2 a volume.

Any volume may be had separately at two dollars, bound, or a dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents; and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

Monthly parts.—For such as prefer it in that form, the Living Age is put up in monthly parts, containing four or five weekly numbers. In this shape it shows to great advantage in comparison with other works, containing in each part double the matter of any of the quarterlies. But we recommend the weekly numbers, as fresher and fuller of life. The volumes are published quarterly, each volume containing as much matter as a quarterly review gives in eighteen months.

The following Letters on the plan and execution of the work have been received:

DEAR SIR,—I have read the prospectus of your proposed periodical, "The Living Age," with great pleasure; and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage, long enough, and large enough, and securely enough, to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give a healthy tone, not only to our literature, but to public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more: it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and extravagant sketches of life and character.

I wish it every success; and my only fear is, that it may not meet as full success with the public as it deserves. I shall be glad to be a subscriber. I am, very truly and respectfully, yours,

JOSEPH STORY.

Cambridge, April 24, 1844.

DEAR SIR,—I approve very much of the plan of your work, to be published weekly, under the title of the "Living Age:" and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit and taste that the prospectus indicates, (of which I have no reason to doubt,) it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day.

I wish it abundant success, and that my name be added to the list of subscribers. Yours, very respectfully,

JAMES KENT.

New York, 7th May, 1844.

It seems to me that a selection from the highest foreign journals, if conducted with discrimination and taste, might have a very favorable influence on our reading community, deluged as it is, with periodical and other publications, which have little to recommend them but their cheapness. I have looked occasionally into the Magazine formerly conducted by Mr. Littell, and I have little doubt, from the capacity he showed in that selection, that he would compile a magazine, from the sources indicated in his prospectus, that would furnish a healthy and most agreeable banquet to the reader.

Believe me, Dear Sir, your obedient servant,

WM. H. PRESCOTT.

Boston, May, 1844.

From the specimens that the public has seen, it cannot be doubted that Mr. Littell is able to make, from the mass of contemporary literature, instructive and interesting selections. I wish you success, with all my heart.

Yours, very truly,

GEORGE BANCROFT.

DEAR SIR,—I have never seen any similar publication of equal merit; and I heartily wish for it that wide success it deserves, as a most agreeable and useful selection from that vast mass of the current periodical literature of our time, which has grown to such importance that none are beyond the reach of its influence, and few can safely be ignorant of what it is constantly sending forth to the world. Be pleased, therefore, to consider me a regular subscriber to the Living Age from the beginning.

Very truly yours,

GEO. TICKNOR.

Boston, 5th August, 1844.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in congratulating you upon the success of the Living Age, which has been well deserved by the great cleverness shown in its management. It has been a welcome visitor to my family, always giving us a variety of instructive and pleasant reading. Indeed, the only fault I have to find with it, is that it gives too much weekly—a fault which those of more leisure than myself, will not be likely to find.

Yours, very truly,

GEO. W. BETHUNE.

Philadelphia, October 29th, 1844.

WASHINGTON, 27TH DECEMBER, 1845.

Of all the Periodical Journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe and in this country, this has appeared to me to be the most useful. It contains indeed the exposition only of the current literature of the English language, but this by its immense extent and comprehension includes a portraiture of the human mind in the utmost expansion of the present age.

J. Q. ADAMS.

To insure regularity in mailing the work, all orders should be addressed to

E. LITTELL & CO., BOSTON.

WHICH IS THE BEST?

The Salem Gazette says—"Richardson's is the most valuable Dictionary of the English Language, both for definitions and derivations."

Again: The Oneida Whig is of the opinion, that "Richardson's is the most complete Dictionary that any language can boast."

This Dictionary is styled by the London Quarterly Review, "A perfect mine of the English Language."

The Chronicle and Democrat informs its readers, that nearly every publication in England and America has spoken of Richardson's Dictionary in the most exalted terms.

We think the question is answered, so call on the agents, J. W. RANDOLPH & CO., 121 Main Street, Richmond, and get a copy of Charles Richardson's new Dictionary of the English Language—1 or 2 vols. 4to., containing 2222 printed pages, in first rate binding.

Orders for Books, Stationery or Music, will receive prompt attention if addressed to

J. W. RANDOLPH & CO.

Books Bound, or Blank Books Manufactured to order.

June, 1849

1849 Jan 2.

P 352.1

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

JNO. R. THOMPSON, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

VOL. XV., Nos. 9 & 10. SEPTEMBER & OCTOBER, 1849. Whole Number, CLXXVIII.

ORIGINAL PROSE ARTICLES.

| | PAGE. |
|---|-------|
| 1. Frémont's First and Second Expeditions. The Camp on the Prairie; Buffalo Hunting; First Sight of the Rocky Mountains—Fort Laramie: Sunrise from the Wind-River Mountains; Frémont's Peak: Valley of the Kansas River. Second Expedition sets out.—South Pass—The Great Salt Lake: The Dalles of the Columbia, Fort Vancouver; Pyramid Lake: Valley of the Sacramento and Bay of St. Francisco. Account of their return to the United States, &c., &c..... | 521 |
| 2. Lady Alice, or The New Una. A Review..... | 529 |
| 3. The Tablet of the Theban Cebes. Translated from the Greek. By Rev. J. Jones Smyth, A. M..... | 539 |
| 4. Rome: Papal and Republican..... | 547 |
| 5. Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers. A Review..... | 553 |
| 6. Moore's Anacreon..... | 563 |
| 7. Original Novel. The Chevalier Merlin. Chapters Tenth, Eleventh and Twelfth..... | 569 |
| 8. Maria Edgeworth. A Tribute to her Genius and Character. Her beauties as a writer pointed out and objections urged by critics against her works, considered and refuted. By J. B. D. of Campbell County, Va..... | 578 |
| 9. Dr. Green's Inaugural Address..... | 585 |
| 10. Manzoni. By H. T. Tuckerman. Realities of fiction, as exhibited in the reception of famous characters of the novelists as familiar acquaintances—Philosophy of novel-writing—Artistic faults counterbalanced by elevation of sentiment—Corinne—The Simple Story—Peculiar Excellences of Manzoni, I Promessi Sposi considered, &c..... | 587 |
| 11. From Our Paris Correspondent. New Discoveries in the Manufacture of Sugar—Astronomical labours of Leverrier: Session of the Academy of Science—Prizes awarded. Suit between La Presse and the heirs of Mad. Récamier: French literature of the present day; Chateaubriand and Lamartine, &c., &c..... | 593 |

ORIGINAL PROSE ARTICLES—CONTINUED.

| | PAGE. |
|--|-------|
| 12. Marginalia. By Edgar A. Poe. William Wallace. Thomas Hood..... | 600 |
| 13. A Bachelor's Reverie. In Three Parts. By Ith Marvel..... | 601 |
| 14. The Seldens of Sherwood..... | 612 |
| 15. A Plea for Art..... | 624 |
| 16. Camp Life of Hon. William Wirt. From Kennedy's Life..... | 628 |
| 17. What's in a Name?..... | 630 |
| 18. A Peep into Futurity..... | 632 |
| 19. A few Reflections on the Conquest of Mexico, by Cortez..... | 635 |

SELECTED ARTICLE.

| | |
|-----------------------|-----|
| 20. The Old Swan..... | 609 |
|-----------------------|-----|

ORIGINAL POETRY.

| | |
|--|-----|
| 21. Lines, Suggested by a Conversation with a Friend..... | 529 |
| 22. Boyhood..... | 538 |
| 23. The Instinct of Immortality..... | 547 |
| 24. The Inch Cape Bell..... | 552 |
| 25. National Lyrics. By James W. Simmons. The Battle of Bunker Hill..... | 561 |
| 26. Song..... | 609 |
| 27. Sonnet. By E. Jessup Eames..... | 611 |
| 28. The Ode of Regner Lodbrog. By Mrs. M. E. Hewitt..... | 623 |
| 29. Frederick Jerome. By Wm. (Ross) Wallace..... | 627 |
| 30. The Marseilles Hymn. A Translation. By J. E. Leigh..... | 634 |

SELECTED POETRY.

| | |
|--|-----|
| 31. To Miss Amélie Louise Rives. On her departure for France. From the Home Journal..... | 630 |
| 32. Sonnet of Moxon..... | 637 |

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS

A LIST OF ERRATA.

LOCAL AGENTS.

W. & WOODS, St. Louis, Mo.

W. C. MORGAN, New Orleans,

GEORGE P. PUTNAM, London,

E. P. NICH, Petersburg, Va.

W. R. SCRIVEN, Petersburg, N. Y.

MACFARLANE & FERGUSSON, Richmond, Va.

DEWITT & DAVENPORT, New York.

JOSEPH ROBINSON, Baltimore, Md.

C. C. CLEAVES, Memphis, Tenn.

JOHN P. WRIGHT, Lynchburg, Virginia.

THIS WORK IS PUBLISHED IN MONTHLY NUMBERS AVERAGING SIXTY-FOUR PAGES EACH, AT FIVE DOLLARS, PER ANNUM, INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

RICHMOND, VA.

MACFARLANE & FERGUSSON.

1849.

GENERAL COLLECTORS FOR THE LITERARY MESSENGER.

Wm. Gouldin, General Agent and Collector for Virginia.

Thomas L. Jones is our General Collector for the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee and Louisiana.

Israel E. James, is our General Travelling Agent, for the following States, District of Columbia, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana and Arkansas—assisted by James K. Whipple, Wm. H. Weld, O. H. P. Stem, John B. Weld, T. S. Waterman, John Collins, James Deering, Albert K. Wellington, R. S. James, and E. A. Evans.

Henry M. Lewis, is our General Agent, for Alabama and Tennessee.

C. W. James, is our General Collector, for Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois and Missouri; Wisconsin and Iowa—assisted by James R. Smith, J. T. Dent, E. Y. Jennings, T. G. Smith, and Frederick J. Hawes.

Mr. C. W. James also makes a Fall trip to the Eastern States, and the District of Columbia.

Eli M. Stevenson, General Collector for Kentucky, and specially authorised to solicit new subscriptions.

Wm. Wertenbaker of the University of Virginia is our authorised agent for the county of Albemarle, Va.

Addison A. Bell, of Ala., is authorised to procure New Subscribers.

J. F. Stanton is authorised to procure New Subscribers for the Messenger, generally.

R. Morris & Co., Jackson, Miss., are authorised to Collect and procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

J. W. B. Garrett, is authorised to procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

Baalis Davis is duly authorised to Collect Money and procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

W. Ramsay, Frankfort, Ky., is authorised to procure new subscribers for the Messenger.

B. F. Somerville, Locust Dale, Virginia, is authorised to procure New Subscribers.

NASH & WOODHOUSE,

No. 139 Main Street, Richmond, Virginia,

Deal extensively in School, Medical, Law, Theological, Classical and Miscellaneous Books; Paper, Blank Books and Stationery of every description. They are agents for the American reprints of Blackwood's Magazine, the London Quarterly, Westminster, Edinburgh and North British Reviews, and furnish, besides, nearly every respectable periodical published in the United States.

PIANO FORTES.

They are sole agents in Virginia for the sale of the Superb Piano Fortes, made by Messrs. Stodart & Dunham, New York, whose instruments have received the unqualified approbation of some of the most distinguished Composers, Professors and Amateurs in this country and Europe—and from those who have bought and tried them. They are largely engaged in this branch of trade.

They publish Charles Campbell's Introduction to the History of Virginia, in one volume, 8vo. Price $1 50.

JNO. R. THOMPSON,

ATTORNEY AT LAW.

Practices in the Superior and Inferior Courts of Richmond City and the County of Henrico.

Office, No. 73, Main Street. Up Stairs. over the Store of Lewis Ginter.

DE BOW'S COMMERCIAL REVIEW.

A Monthly Journal of Trade, Agriculture, Commerce, Commercial Polity, Manufactures, Internal Improvements, &c.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY, IN THE CITY OF NEW-ORLEANS.

Terms Five Dollars per annum, in advance.

Advocating the interests of the South and West, the Commercial Review will not be the less mindful of the great interests of Trade, Commerce and Agriculture throughout the World—Commerce in its various and multiform relations—in its History, its Laws, and its Statistics; Commercial commodities; regulations of Trade, inter-State and inter-National; Treaties; Foreign and Domestic Tariffs, Excises and Posts; Marine relations; Enterprises of Commerce, in Shipping, Canals, Railroads and Steam Navigation, etc.; Mercantile Systems, Codes, Laws and Decisions, ancient as well as modern; Banking Insurance, Exchange, Partnership, Factorage, Guaranty. Brokerage, Bankruptcy, Wreck, Salvage Freights, Privateering, Marque and Reprisal, Piracy, Quarantine and Custom House Regulations, etc., etc.; Commercial Literature and Biography.

ADDRESS WELD & CO., NEW-ORLEANS.

Bound volumes of Commercial Review, in handsome style, for sale at the office, complete viz.:

- | | |
|--|--|
| Vol. I. 543 pages. | } Papers, by Hon. Joel R. Poinsett, and a great number of other distinguished contributors. |
| " II. 442 " | |
| " III. 588 " | |
| " IV. 560 " | |
| " V. 544 " | |
| " VI. | Contains an elaborate Prize Essay upon Silk, in addition to all other American Products and Staples. |
| " VI. Contains, among other things, a republication of the great English work, by Evans, on Sugar , which ought to be in the hands of every planter. The price of the English copy is $4 50. | |

Two volumes make one year. Charge for binding at binders' prices. Complete Indexes of the work, for inspection, can be had at the office.

PROSPECTUS TO THE SEVENTH VOLUME.

This work has been regularly published nearly four years. Its success has been signal throughout the whole Southern and Western Country, and its subscription list steadily and rapidly increased there and in other sections of the Union. In this brief period it has gained a larger circulation than any other Southern work, and the strongest influence. Complimentary letters and notices have been received from every source, even the very highest, as could be shown did space permit. The Commercial Review has advocated and upheld the Commerce and Agriculture of the Southern and Western States, and exhibited from time to time their complete Statistics, in such a manner as could not but have secured the best results. The papers which have appeared upon Sugar and upon Cotton, upon Tobacco and Rice, and Manufactures, upon the Progress of our Commercial Relations with all nations, and upon Mexico, may be stated as examples. Indeed, this has been admitted from many sources. Although devoted in its aims to the development and exhibition of the Resources of the South and West, the Commercial Review neglects no view of American and European Industry and Enterprise, in every department, and must be of equal value to American Citizens wherever they are found. Is there a section of the Union, too, or an interest, which has no concern with the progress and resources of the Great West, of which the Commercial Review is the faithful exponent?

B. F. De Bow, Charleston, is the Agent for the two Carolina's, and will attend to all business for those States.

H. I. & J. D. THORNTON,
Attorneys at Law and Solicitors in Chancery,

OFFICE IN EUTAW, GREENE COUNTY, ALABAMA.

HARRY I. THORNTON.

JAMES D. THORNTON

LITTELL'S LIVING AGE. PROSPECTUS.

This work is conducted in the spirit of Littell's Museum of Foreign Literature, (which was favorably received by the public for twenty years,) but as it is twice as large, and appears so often, we not only give spirit and freshness to it by many things which were excluded by a month's delay, but while thus extending our scope and gathering a greater and more attractive variety, are able so to increase the solid and substantial part of our literary, historical, and political harvest, as fully to satisfy the wants of the American reader.

The elaborate and stately Essays of the Edinburgh Quarterly, and other Reviews; and Blackwood's noble criticisms on Poetry, his keen political Commentaries, highly wrought Tales, and vivid descriptions of rural and mountain scenery; and the contributions to Literature, History, and Common Life, by the sagacious Spectator, the sparkling Examiner, the judicious Athenæum, the busy and industrious Literary Gazette, the sensible and comprehensive Britannia, the sober and respectable Christian Observer; these are intermixed with the Military and Naval reminiscences of the United Service, and with the best articles of the Dublin University, New Monthly, Fraser's, Tait's, Ainsworth's, Hood's, and Sporting Magazines, and of Chambers' admirable Journal. We do not consider it beneath our dignity to borrow wit and wisdom from Punch; and, when we think it good enough, make use of the thunder of The Times. We shall increase our variety by importations from the continent of Europe, and from the new growth of the British colonies.

The steamship has brought Europe, Asia and Africa, into our neighborhood; and will greatly multiply our connections, as Merchants, Travelers, and Politicians, with all parts of the world;

so that much more than ever it now becomes every intelligent American to be informed of the condition and changes of foreign countries. And this not only because of their nearer connection with ourselves, but because the nations seem to be hastening through a rapid process of change, to some new state of things, which the merely political prophet cannot compute or foresee.

Geographical Discoveries, the progress of Colonization, (which is extending over the whole world,) and Voyages and Travels, will be favorite matter for our selection; and, in general, we shall systematically and very fully acquaint our readers with the great department of Foreign affairs, without entirely neglecting our own.

While we aspire to make the Living Age desirable to all who wish to keep themselves informed of the rapid progress of the movement—to Statesmen, Divines, Lawyers, and Physicians—to men of business and men of leisure—it is still a stronger object to make it attractive and useful to their Wives and Children. We believe that we can thus do some good in our day and generation; and hope to make the work indispensable in every well-informed family. We say indispensable, because in this day of cheap literature it is not possible to guard against the influx of what is bad in taste and vicious in morals, in any other way than by furnishing a sufficient supply of a healthy character. The mental and moral appetite must be gratified.

We hope that, by "winnowing the wheat from the chaff," by providing abundantly for the imagination, and by a large collection of Biography, Voyages and Travels, History, and more solid matter, we may produce a work which shall be popular, while at the same time it will aspire to raise the standard of public taste. May, 1844.

TERMS.

The LIVING AGE is published every Saturday, by E. LITTELL & Co., Boston; Price 12½ cents a number, or six dollars a year in advance. Remittances for any period will be thankfully received and promptly attended to.

Clubs, paying a year in advance, will be supplied as follows:—

| | |
|-----------------|---------|
| Four copies for | $20 00 |
| Nine " " | 40 00 |
| Twelve " " | 50 00 |

Complete sets, in nineteen volumes, to the end of 1843, handsomely bound, and packed in neat boxes, are for sale at $2 a volume.

Any volume may be had separately at two dollars, bound, or a dollar and a half in numbers.

Any number may be had for 12½ cents; and it may be worth while for subscribers or purchasers to complete any broken volumes they may have, and thus greatly enhance their value.

Monthly parts.—For such as prefer it in that form, the Living Age is put up in monthly parts, containing four or five weekly numbers. In this shape it shows to great advantage in comparison with other works, containing in each part double the matter of any of the quarterlies. But we recommend the weekly numbers, as fresher and fuller of life. The volumes are published quarterly, each volume containing as much matter as a quarterly review gives in eighteen months.

The following Letters on the plan and execution of the work have been received:

DEAR SIR,—I have read the prospectus of your proposed periodical, "The Living Age," with great pleasure; and entirely approve the plan. If it can only obtain the public patronage, long enough, and large enough, and securely enough, to attain its true ends, it will contribute in an eminent degree to give a healthy tone, not only to our literature, but in public opinion. It will enable us to possess, in a moderate compass, a select library of the best productions of the age. It will do more: it will redeem our periodical literature from the reproach of being devoted to light and

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY AT FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM—JNO. R. THOMPSON, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

VOL. XV.

RICHMOND, SEPTEMBER, 1849.

NOS. 9 & 10.

Fremont's First and Second Expeditions.*

The first exploring expedition made by Lieutenant (as he then was) Frémont, commenced June 10th, 1842, and ended towards the close of September following, having thus occupied somewhat less than four months. Frémont was accompanied by a party of twenty-one men, mostly Creole or Canadian voyageurs, men accustomed to danger, and enured to fatigue and privation. Mr. Preuss, a German, went out as topographical assistant, a man named Maxwell as hunter, and the famous Kit Carson as guide. The party started from a point near where the Kansas empties into the Missouri, in latitude 39°, about 400 miles above St. Louis.

"During our journey it was the customary practice to encamp an hour or two before sunset, when the carts were disposed so as to form a sort of barricade around a circle some eighty yards in diameter. The tents were pitched, and the horses hobbled, and turned loose to graze; and but a few minutes elapsed before the cooks of the messes, of which there were four, were busily engaged in preparing the evening meal. At nightfall the horses, mules and oxen were driven in, and picketed—that is secured by a halter, of which one end was tied to a small steel-shod picket, and driven into the ground; the halter being twenty or thirty feet long, which enabled them to obtain a little food during the night. When we had reached a part of the country, where such a precaution became necessary, the carts being regularly arranged for defending the camp, guard was mounted at eight o'clock, consisting of three men, who were relieved every two hours; the morning watch being horse-guard for the day. At day-break the camp was roused, the animals turned loose to graze, and breakfast generally over between six and seven o'clock, when we resumed our march, making regularly a halt at noon for one or two hours."

There would seem to be not a little of the spirit of chivalry, romance and poetry in an expedition of this kind. Leaving the dust and turmoil of the busy world far behind them, these voyageurs setting their faces westward, embark into a vast expanse lying beyond the pale of civilization and of law. All that is commonplace is left in the rear;—before them all is comparatively a terra incognita, novel, wild, magnificent. How many studies for the pencil must not the evening bivouac exhibit, or the rousing of the camp at dawn of day, or the line of march—how much that is grotesque, picturesque, arabesque! The march would be subject to hazards enough to give it the dignity of danger, yet not so hazardous as to render it gloomy. Liberated from the obligations of law and of opinion, nevertheless the principle of order and subordination would be secured among them by a sense of mutual dependence. The appearance of the country passed over and its productions, the elk, the antelope and the buffalo, and the various incidents of the journey, would serve to break agreeably the usual monotony, while life in the open, salubrious air, with continual exercise, would lend its exhilarating influence and banish ennui. Such is the picture which the imagination would body forth in starting upon such a journey. But for the first thousand miles, at least, the picture far exceeds the reality. The prairies, indeed, after first entering upon them, on the margin of "the plains," present vast, boundless scenes of Eden-like verdure and unrivalled beauty. And indeed such magnificent prospects occasionally re-appear during the progress of the march across "the plains," when a sea of vegetation and flowers they spread out in one vast level, or are seen swelling into superb ridges or sloping away in shadowy declivities.

* REPORT OF THE EXPLORING EXPEDITION to the Rocky Mountains in the year 1842. Printed by order of the House of Representatives." By J. C. FRÉMONT, U. S. Topographical Engineers.

Still it must be confessed in spite of all its rich and poetic effect, when first the delightful panorama is unfolded to the view, that in a few days the traveller's stock of admiration becomes sensibly impaired, and ere long perhaps quite exhausted. The prairies, like the females of the South Sea islands, are not more, but the less charming for being naked. There is an intimate connexion between beauty and utility, and the prairies exposed to the full blaze of the sun, or to the unbroken sweep of the wintry wind, are found not to wear so well as the forest-crowned scenes.

The animation of the party is greatly heightened when they encounter the buffalo, roaming in dark masses over the plains. "Indians and buffalo," says Frémont, "make the poetry and life of the prairie." As the surge of emigration sweeps on westward, the Indians and the buffalo will be gradually exterminated, and at length the prairies will be divested of their poetry and life. Frémont gives the following picture of a buffalo hunt, in which he engaged on the 1st of July :

"They were now somewhat less than half a mile distant, and we rode easily along until within about three hundred yards, when a sudden agitation and wavering in the band and a galloping to and fro of some which were scattered along the skirts, gave us the intimation that we were discovered. We started together at a hand-gallop, riding steadily abreast of each other, and here the interest of the chase became so engrossingly intense, that we were sensible to nothing else. We were now closing upon them rapidly, and the front of the mass was already in rapid motion for the hills, and in a few seconds the movement had communicated itself to the whole crowd. A crowd of bulls, as usual, brought up the rear, and every now and then some of them faced about, and then dashed on after the band a short distance and turned and looked again, as if more than half inclined to turn and fight. In a few moments, however, during which we had been quickening our pace, the rout was universal, and we were going over the ground like a hurricane. When at about thirty yards, we gave the usual shout (the hunter's pas de charge) and broke into the herd. We entered on the side, the mass giving way in every direction in their heedless course. Many of the bulls less active and less fleet than the cows, paying no attention to the ground, and occupied solely with the hunter were precipitated to the earth with great force rolling over and over, with the violence of the shock, and hardly distinguishable in the dust. We separated on entering, each singling out his game.

"My horse was a trained hunter, famous in the West, under the name of Proveau, and with his eyes flashing, and the foam flying from his mouth, sprang on after the cow like a tiger. In a few moments he brought me alongside of her, and rising in the stirrups, I fired at the distance of a yard, the ball entering at the termination of the long hair, and passing near the heart."

Upon another occasion a vast herd of buffalo was seen debouching in dark columns from the hills, towards the river, until Frémont and his party were entirely surrounded by their incalculable numbers, stretching for miles in front and in rear, and leaving around the travellers an open space of only two or three hundred yards.

Upon reaching the head of the Platte river, Frémont with a small party, including three Indians, proceeded up the valley of the South Fork, while the rest of the company went up the borders of the North Fork. On this route Frémont witnessed an instance of the wholesale slaughter of the buffalo committed by the Indians :

"The buffalo started for the hills, but were intercepted and driven back toward the river, broken and running in every direction. The clouds of dust soon covered the whole scene preventing us from having any but an occasional view. It had a very singular appearance to us at a distance, especially when looking with the glass.

We were too far off to hear the report of the guns or any sound; and at every instant through the clouds of dust, which the sun made luminous, we could see for a moment two or three buffalo dashing along, and close behind them an Indian with his long spear, or other weapon, and instantly again they disappeared. The apparent silence and the dimly seen figures flitting by with such rapidity gave it a kind of dreamy effect, and seemed more like a picture than a scene of real life. It had been a large herd when the cerne commenced—probably three or four hundred in number; but though I watched them closely I did not see one emerge from the fatal cloud where the work of destruction was going on."

On the 9th of July Frémont caught the first glimpse of the Rocky Mountains at the distance of about sixty miles. It was the snow-covered "Long's Peak." On the following day he reached St. Vrain's fort, situated on the South Fork of the Platte at the foot of the Rocky Mountains, and about seventeen miles from Long's Peak. From this post the party turning towards the North, bent their course in the direction of Fort Laramie, distant about 125 miles. Near the borders of Horse Creek was found a geological formation which the winds and rains easily mould into a variety of forms. The white herbless rock resembles masonry, and at one place it forms a half-moon of two or three hundred yards diameter with enormous bastions at either end. Along the line of parapets rise lofty domes and minarets, giving it every appearance of an old fortified town. On the banks of White river are similar curiosities of a still more extraordinary character.

Fort Laramie, a post of the American Fur Company, stands on the Laramie, (near where it empties into the Platte), on high ground, and its lofty, quadrangular, clay-built, white-washed walls and bastions give it rather an imposing appearance. "A cluster of lodges, which the language told us belonged to Sioux Indians, was pitched under the walls, and with the fine background of the Black hills and the prominent peak of Laramie mountain strongly drawn in the clear light of the western sky, where the sun had already set, the whole formed at the moment a strikingly beautiful picture." This post was established for the purpose of carrying on a trade with the Indians, they exchanging buffalo robes for the usual articles used by the savages including tobacco and ardent spirits. The American Fur Company indeed was averse to the introduction of liquors among the savage tribes, "but in the present state of things, when the country is supplied with alcohol, when a keg of it will purchase from an Indian every thing he possesses, his furs, his lodge, his horses, and even his wife and children, and when any vagabond who has money enough to purchase a mule, can go into a village and trade against them successfully, it is impossible for the Fur Company to discontinue its use." The Company as a regular trader is interested in the preservation of the Indians; but the vagabond casual dealer, indifferent to the fate of his victims, is only intent on wringing from them his immediate gains.

Lieut. Frémont attended a dog-feast, where "the women and children were sitting outside the lodge, and we took our seats on buffalo robes spread around. The dog was in a large pot over the fire in the middle of the lodge and immediately on our arrival was dished up in large wooden bowls, one of which was handed to each. The flesh appeared very glutinous with something of the flavor and appearance of mutton. Feeling something move behind me, I looked round and found that I had taken my seat among a litter of fat young puppies. Had I been nice in such matters, the prejudices of civilization might have interfered with my tranquillity; but fortunately I am not of delicate nerves, and continued quietly to enjoy my platter." Lieut. Frémont found Fort Laramie a very suitable place for a military post to keep the neighboring Indians in check, and to protect the immigrants on their route to Oregon. Accordingly some companies of United States troops have been lately ordered to establish themselves at that commanding point. From this fort Lieut. Frémont proceeded up the North Fork of the Platte, by the Red Buttes, a famous landmark, and the Hot Spring Gate. Here the mountain sheep was found in great numbers and two or three of them were killed. This animal is provided by nature with horns which are sometimes not less than three feet long and a foot and a half in circumference at the base. These horns serve to protect the animal in pitching down precipices when chased by wolves. This animal, indifferently styled the mountain sheep or goat, would seem rather to resemble the latter, being not woolly, but coated with a hair like that of the deer. July 31, the party reached the valley of the Sweet water, and on the following day they encamped at Rock Independence, another conspicuous landmark, being of granite, 650 yards long and forty high, upon the base of which are inscribed many names of travellers, &c. August 8th, they reached the SOUTH PASS. "Approaching it from the mouth of the Sweet Water, a sandy plain one hundred and twenty miles long, conducts by a gradual and regular ascent to the summit about seven thousand feet above the sea, and the traveller without being reminded of any change by toilsome ascents, suddenly finds himself on the waters which flow to the Pacific Ocean. By the route we had travelled, the distance from Fort Laramie is three hundred and twenty miles, or nine hundred and fifty from the mouth of the Kansas." Proceeding on his march Frémont found himself in an Alpine region of the Wind river mountains, where the water froze in midsummer. The magnificent effect of this bold scenery was enhanced by its sudden contrast with the previous prairie journey of a thousand miles.

Frémont thus depicts a sun-rise in this mountain region: "The sun has just shot above the wall, and makes a magical change. The whole valley is glowing and bright, and all the mountain peaks are gleaming like silver. Though these snow mountains are not the Alps they have their own character of grandeur and magnificence, and will doubtless find pens and pencils to do them justice." Doubtless some adventurous artist, possessing the enthusiasm of Catlin, would find in this region some of the finest subjects in the world, where suddenly bursting upon the explorer's eye were seen a vast succession of snow-crowned mountains, pile upon pile, Pelion upon Ossa, all glowing in the pearly light of a splendid summer day, while here and there, between frowning ridges, lay crystal green lakes and valleys carpeted in richest verdure, with cataracts pouring from rock to rock.

Continuing to ascend the mountains, the party admired the stern grandeur of the rocky summits towering above, and in striking contrast, scenes of exquisite verdure, numerous lakes, roaring water-falls, and brilliant Alpine flowers. Here at the height of ten thousand feet above the Gulf of Mexico were noticed a squirrel-like animal, a sparrow-like bird, and flocks of the mountain-goat clambering over the rocks like Alpine chamois. Fatigue, hunger and the rarity of the elevated air now affected Lieut. F. and some of his men with headache, giddiness and vomiting. At last after encountering great difficulties and much suffering, Frémont found himself on the highest point of the Wind River Mountains—being 13,570 feet above the Gulf of Mexico. On this summit a solitary humble-bee lighting on Frémont's knee, proved that the region of animated nature had not yet been surpassed. The mountains exhibited features of terrible convulsion and the prospect was immense on every side. It was observed that the report of a pistol expired almost instantaneously. Here the flag of the United States was unfurled, and Frémont congratulated himself upon having reached the loftiest peak of the Rocky Mountains; since known as "Frémont's Peak." He now returned through the valley of the Sweet Water, the North Fork of the Platte, the Platte, and the Missouri, to the mouth of the Kansas, his starting point, which he reached on the 10th of October, 1842.

The valley of the Kansas is a prairie country, the soil rich, the "bottoms" well timbered. The valley of the Great Platte is of the same character and abounds in luxuriant grasses. From the Forks of this river to the Laramie river the soil is sandy. The valley of the North Fork is destitute of timber, but produces fine grass. On his return during September, Frémont found the whole country looking like a garden. The Sweet Water valley is a sand plain included between mountains of primitive rock.

On the 29th of May, 1843, Capt. Frémont set out upon a second expedition to the far West, in compliance with the instructions of the Chief of Topographical Engineers. His party on this occasion consisted of thirty-nine men, including several who were in the former expedition. Mr. Preuss again accompanied him as topographical assistant. Thomas Fitzpatrick was employed as guide. A free young colored man of Washington city volunteered to go with the party and manfully performed his part. Two Delaware Indians, an old man and his son, went out as hunters. The party was armed with carbines and took out a 12lb. brass howitzer, managed by three men, under the charge of Louis Zindel, a Prussian, long a non-commissioned officer of artillery in the Prussian service. Twelve carts drawn each by two mules carried the camp-equipage and provisions and a light-covered wagon conveyed the instruments, telescopes, barometers, thermometers, &c. The intended route was now up the valley of the Kansas river and to the head of the Arkansas and beyond in quest of a Pass through the mountains in that direction, so that the main object of this exploration would commence where the former one ended—at the South Pass. Proceeding up the Kansas they arrived on the 8th of June at the head of that river, where it is formed by the confluence of the Smoky-hill fork and the Republican, and continued to march along the monotonous borders of the latter and so by the South Fork, St. Vrain's Fort, Medicine Bow river, and Sweet Water to the South Pass, which they reached on the 13th of August. This Pass probably destined to be of so much importance in future, is twenty miles wide and its elevation Frémont now found to be 7000 feet above the level of the Gulf of Mexico. It is about half-way between the Mississippi river and the Pacific Ocean. Its latitude is somewhat over 42°, being about the same with the city of Boston. Now if Mr. Whitney's grand rail-way project could have been carried into effect, and the road located so far North as this, would it not have encountered great obstacles from frost and snow, for a considerable portion of the year, which would be entirely avoided by running the road in a more Southern latitude, provided a Pass should be found somewhere in the vicinity of the Missouri line?

August 21, the party reached the valley of the Bear river, the principal tributary of the famous Great Salt Lake. According to the rule of "omne ignotum pro magnifico," the trappers and travellers of this remote region had invested this lake with many superstitious terrors and were accustomed to lending a pleasing horror to their conversation around the fires at night, by stories of a terrible whirlpool on the surface through which its waters found their way to the ocean by some subterraneous channel. Early in September, Frémont and his companions beheld the great inland Salt Sea, the Dead Sea of the West, spread out before them in a sheet extending far beyond the reach of vision. Large islands, some mountainous, here and there dotted the expanse of water. On the 9th, Frémont with four others embarked on the Great Salt Lake, in a precarious India-rubber boat. As they proceeded, the water assumed a beautiful sea-green color, and the saline spray falling on the hands and arms of the voyagers at once encrusted them with salt. Landing on an island, they observed a deposit of the larvæ of insects about fifteen feet wide and eight inches deep, and the cliffs and rocks were iced with an incrustation of salt. Ascending a rocky peak some 800 feet high they obtained a fine prospect of the Lake enclosed within rugged mountains. The island proved to be a rocky hill about twelve miles in circumference. A magpie and another larger bird were the only living things seen on it. At night after kindling large fires, for the purpose of "astonishing the natives," they slept secure, lulled by the roar of the ocean-like surf. They returned in the morning to the main-land. Five gallons of the Lake water, roughly evaporated over the fire, yielded fourteen pints of fine salt. Leaving the vicinity of the Salt Lake, Frémont proceeded to Fort Hall, a trading post, distant from the frontier of Missouri via Fort Laramie, and the South Pass, about 1,300 miles. It is situated in a valley, formed by the confluence of Portneuf river with Lewis's fork of the Columbia, which it enters about nine miles below the fort. Frémont recommends this as an eligible post of relief for emigrants, the country west of it along the Columbia being a sort of desert for three hundred miles. Passing by the picturesque American Falls of Lewis's fork, and the outlet of a subterraneous river through a gloomy volcanic region, they were hospitably entertained at Fort Boisé on the Lewis's fork or Snake river, by Mr. Payette of the Hudson's Bay Company. This fort is only nominal, it being simply a dwelling house, and the garrison mustering only one Canadian engagé. Some days journey beyond this the exploring party gained a view of the Grand Rond, a beautiful level basin, verdant, fertile, well-watered, and encircled by well-wooded mountains. The Grand Rond is about 60 miles in circumference, and will form a fine country in some future transalpine state. The country-seat will be in the centre, and a pleasant ride of ten miles, perhaps on a rail-way, will convey the inhabitants of this new Circleville, to the foot of the neighboring mountains, where pic-nic parties may refresh themselves by the margin of some crystal spring, under the shade of some wide-spreading beech. Beyond the Grand Rond and in the vicinity of the Blue mountains, spruces, larches and balsam-pines of great height were observed, some of them 200 feet high with a circumference of from 12 to 21 feet. The trunks of the larches were sometimes 100 feet without a limb, while the white spruces were covered with branches nearly to the ground. All these trees have their branches, particularly the lower ones, declining. October 23, Frémont came within view of the snow-capped summit of Mt. Hood, distant 180 miles, and on the same day reached the Presbyterian Missionary establishment of Dr. Whitman* on the banks of the Walahwah river. The Doctor happened to be absent on a visit to the Dalles of the Columbia. At the Nez Percé fort, belonging to the Hudson's Bay Company, the party gained the first view of the Columbia river there about 1,200 yards wide. It is formed about 9 miles above the Nez Percé post, by the confluence of Lewis' fork and the North fork, which has retained the name of Columbia—as being the main stream. The point of junction or some place near it will doubtless ere long come to be of great commercial importance. Bateaux from tide-water ascend to the point of junction and then far up the North fork or Columbia. The other fork has not yet been navigated for commercial purposes. From the mouth of the Kansas on the Missouri to this point of junction of the Columbia is about 2,000 miles, the necessary land travel in crossing from the United States to the Pacific Ocean. The Nez Percé fort is in latitude about 46 degrees north. Passing down the line of the Columbia, Frémont encamped, Nov. 3rd, within hearing of the roar of its falls. These are annually submerged by the back-water from the basin below forming a great natural lock at this place. The Dalles of the Columbia is the name given to the stream where it is confined within the walls of a chasm, in a sort of trough, the narrowest part of which is not more than 58 yards in width, while the height of the walls above the water is 25 feet. When the river is low there is no difficulty in the navigation of the Dalles; but when it is high they are impassable. The depth of water in the Dalles must be enormous, the Columbia being suddenly contracted from the width of upwards of a mile to such narrow limits. Frémont found the water deep and black and curled into many small whirlpools and counter-currents, unbroken by foam and almost without a ripple. Some miles below the Dalles, the Columbia entering the lower mountains of the Cascade range, the banks are abrupt, rocky bluffs 150 feet high, like those of the Hudson, which gradually become more mountainous as the river approaches the cascades. Frémont with a small party voyaged down the river in a canoe. The Cascade range of mountains are so called from a series of cascades by which the Columbia, 45 miles below the Dalles, breaks through the mountains, where Mt. Hood and St. Helens rear their snowy tops on either hand of the passage. Here it was found necessary to carry the canoe across a portage of two miles. Here of course a canal will be hereafter excavated to circumvent the rapids. At Fort Vancouver the officer of the Hudson's Bay Company exhibited every courtesy and hospitality to the American party. Here stores and provisions were procured, and a Mackinaw boat and canoes manned with Canadian and Indian voyageurs for the voyage up the Columbia to the Dalles. The barque Columbia lay near Fort Vancouver, about to sail for England, only awaiting the Express batteaux from the upper waters of the North fork, with the overland mail brought from Montreal and Hudson Bay via. Lake Winipeg. Re-embarking on the waters of the Columbia, Frémont and his party again reached the Dalles in about a week. They now commenced the homeward journey by a new route, making a wide circuit to the South, and South East, and through the great Basin between the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada. Setting out on the 25th of November, they reached Tlamath Lake, December 11th. This lake, however, it would seem, is covered with water only at the melting of snow on the surrounding mountains. During the remainder of the year it is probably only a verdant savannah through which winds the river Tlamath. The latitude of this lake is about 43° North. Its diameter is about 20 miles. It is picturesque and fertile, and the neighboring mountains being well timbered, is indicated as an eligible site for a military post. After journeying some days, they discovered a saline lake which was named Summer Lake, and shortly after another of the same size, which was named Lake Abert, in honor of the chief of the topographical bureau. Encamping near another lake on the 25th of December, it was named Christmas Lake. Early in January, 1844, a hot spring was discovered, several hundred feet in circumference, at one extremity of which was a space of 15 feet in diameter entirely occupied by the boiling water—saline, clear and deep. The next remarkable object met with was the Pyramid Lake, set like an emerald in the mountains and deriving its name from a remarkable rock emerging from the water, and rising to the height of 600 feet. This lake is somewhat less than a mile high, being about 700 feet higher than the Great Salt Lake, from which it lies nearly West, and distant about eight degrees of longitude. The Pyramid Lake is nearest to the Western rim, as the Great Salt Lake is to the Eastern rim of the Basin lying between the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada—a Basin which for the most part is still, in 1849, a terra incognita. The Pyramid Lake is about 35 miles in length. The streams of the other lakes in this region abound with the salmon-trout about three feet in length, and Frémont found its flavor superior to that of any other fish that he had known. The course of the party had been since leaving the Summer Lake, along the flank of the Sierra Nevada, and the lakes and rivers encountered were the draining of that range. The journey of exploration had now been in progress for about a year. Early in February, Frémont undertook to force a passage across the Sierra Nevada, covered with deep snows, and so to make his way to the beautiful and luxuriant valley of the Sacramento which lay on the other side. The establishment of Capt. Sutter was only about 70 miles distant. To enable them to cross, it was found necessary to break a road through the snow by beating it down under the feet of men and horses. The enterprise was a terrible one and to all appearance desperate. After passing up some distance the general depth of the snow was found to be 5 feet, and in some places not less than 20, and the thermometer at zero and a little above it. Added to this the party suffered extremely from scarcity of provisions. One dog had been eaten before the commencement of the ascent, and after attaining the height of about a mile and a half another little one was prepared for the table, (figuratively speaking,) after the Indian culinary method. Of that occasion, says Frémont, "we had to-night an extraordinary dinner, pea-soup, mule and dog." February 20th, 1844, the party after almost incredible endurance and labor encamped on the summit of the Pass, 1,000 miles by their route from the Dalles of the Columbia. This Pass is eleven degrees West and four degrees South of the South Pass. This range of the Sierra Nevada is loftier than the range of the Rocky Mountains. On the following morning the party enjoyed a sunrise scene, "which even here was unusually glorious and beautiful. Immediately above the Eastern mountains was repeated a cloud-formed mass of purple ranges, bordered with bright yellow gold; the peaks shot up into a narrow line of crimson cloud, above which the air was filled with a greenish orange, and over all was the singular beauty of the blue sky." February 21st, the explorers gained a distant prospect of the Sacramento and the Bay of Francisco—the Chesapeake of the Pacific coast. At this time the commissariat of the party was simply a mule for each day. Great difficulties were encountered in the steep descent. These snowy mountains, are covered with magnificent forest trees of an enormous size—cedars sometimes 130 feet high and 20 feet in circumference—the white pine, the hemlock spruce occasionally 24 feet in circumference—the white spruce and the red pine, which last attains a height of 140 feet and circumference of sometimes not less than 30 feet. One cedar was found to be 28½ feet in circumference four feet above the ground. These cedars exceed even the famous cedars of Lebanon. Frémont upon finding that the chief difficulties of the descent had been overcome, with a few companions now set out for Captain Sutter's establishment with the purpose of bringing back a supply of provisions for his suffering party. The verdant and beautiful valley of the Sacramento presented the appearance of Elysium to men just emerging from the wintry horrors of the Sierra Nevada, "when stout men lost their minds from extremity of suffering, when horses died, and when mules and horses ready to die of starvation were killed for food." Mr. Preuss, a scientific member of the expedition, being accidentally separated from the company for some days, was near perishing by starvation, being forced to subsist on a species of wild onion growing in rocky places, and which he with difficulty dug up with his knife,—and some big ants which he let run on his hand and stripped off in his mouth, which he found had an agreeable acid taste,—and some very small frogs! At length some friendly Indians, who perhaps had never before seen a white man, gave him a supply of roasted acorns. Passing down along the banks of a river that turned out to be the Rio de los Americanos, Frémont reached Capt. Sutter's fort at New Helvetia, near where the last mentioned river empties into the far-famed Sacramento. Hospitably received by Capt. Sutter, after a night's rest they started back with fresh horses and provision to rejoin the rest of the party and supply their wants. On the second day they were met—a forlorn company—feeble, emaciated, on foot, and each man leading a horse or mule as feeble and emaciated as himself. Many of their horses had been lost among the mountain precipices and with some their packs, and with a mule was lost the botanical collections made in a journey of 2,000 miles. Out of 67 horses and mules with which the passage of the mountains was commenced, 33 only reached the valley of the Sacramento. A repast of good beef, bread and salmon was the first relief from the sufferings of the Sierra. Returning they encamped at the junction of the Sacramento and Americanos, March 8th. They were here farther distant from the frontier of the United States than they had been four months before, when they started from the Dalles of the Columbia—homeward.

* Since murdered by the savages.

Capt. Sutter, formerly of the French army, after passing some time in the United States, removed in 1838-39 from the Western part of Missouri and formed the first settlement in the valley where he is established. It was not very long before he reduced the Indians under his control, and made them useful serfs.

In the absence of timber for fences, he ditched his extensive wheat-fields, he built his fort of adobe or sun-dried bricks and cultivated a large tract of land by means of Indian labor. The fort during this visit of Frémont mounted 12 guns and was garrisoned by 40 Indians in uniform. The production of wheat in this region varied from 35 to 100 fold. March 24th, Frémont and his party resumed their homeward journey with a cavalcade of 130 horses and mules, and about 30 head of cattle, including 5 milch cows. Capt. Sutter furnished them also with an Indian boy, a vaquero or cattle-driver. Their course was south easterly in the direction of the head of the river Joaquin. Early in April they reached this river, the borders of which abound in elk, antelope, and wild horses, while the pools swarm with wild-fowl, principally geese. About the middle of April the broad and elevated snowy-ridge of the Sierra was crossed by Walker's, an excellent pass in latitude about 35° North.

From the delightful valley of the San Joaquin, where nature revels in all her charms, this pass transports the traveller, by a sudden transition, to a vast desert, a sort of American Zahara, "where wilds immeasurable spread, seem lengthening as they go." The party at this time were a curious mosaic of Indians, Americans, French and Germans. The number of horses and mules were above a hundred, half of them unbroke. The line on march extended a quarter of a mile, like an oriental caravan on a pilgrimage to Mecca. Proceeding in a southerly direction, in a few days they struck the Spanish trail, and reversing their course, now moved along it directly North, having to go six degrees in that course before they could reach the latitude in which they proposed to cross the Rocky Mountains. The Indians along this part of the route are land pirates, the American Bedouins of the desert, their hand against every man's and every man's hand against them. Frémont observed that in expression of countenance they resembled beasts of prey, and all their actions were those of mere animals. They belong to the race called Diggers, whose sole occupation is to procure food sufficient to support existence. Roasted lizards are a favorite dish with these wretches. Bands of them followed in the wake of Frémont's party, as sharks pursue a ship at sea, or as wolves follow an army to pick up waifs. One of the party wandering a short distance, was murdered by these Indians. The desert journey ended, upon reaching las Vegas, [the fertile plains,] de Santa Clara, latitude about 37°, where the annual caravan from California to New Mexico, halts and recruits for some weeks. The distance travelled through the desert from Walker's Pass to las Vegas, was 550 miles, occupying 27 days, in a region parched, and desolate, and full of dangers from hostile Indian robbers. May 13th, Frémont came within sight of the Wah-satch range of mountains, covered with snow, and forming the South East part of the Great Basin. In a few days the party diverged from the Spanish trail, after having pursued it for 440 miles. Reaching the Sevier river, which was found ten or twelve feet deep, they forded it by means of boat-like rafts, made of bulrushes. The Utah Lake, which is fresh water, is connected by a river with the Great Salt Lake. The Utah Lake is almost entirely surrounded by mountains. Its chief tributaries are the Spanish Fork, and the Timpanoge or Rock river. In arriving again at the Utah Lake, in May, 1844, Frémont completed a circuit of 12 degrees diameter, North and South, and ten degrees East and West, since he had visited the same sheet of water in September, 1843. This circuit amounted to 3,500 miles of travel, and had occupied eight months. During this time the explorers had never once been out of sight of snow. The mountains on the Pacific side of the Continent are higher and more numerous than those on the Atlantic side, and what is extraordinary, the Sierra Nevada, and the coast range, although so near the coast, are much higher than the Rocky Mountains. These coast ranges rise in frequent peaks that tower to a great height, and some of them are volcanoes which vomit flames and smoke amid eternal snow. The San Joaquin and the Sacramento running in opposite directions and parallel to the coast, meet and form the great Bay of San Francisco. The Columbia is the only river that breaks through all the ranges and opens up by means of its branches a communication with the interior of the continent. The value of this great river, whether for military or commercial purposes, is inestimable.

The Pacific coast is high and iron-bound, with but few bays. The interior is guarded by the formidable barriers of the Coast Range and the Sierra Nevada, and the access to the interior is only by the Columbia and its valley—in some parts so narrow as to be easily defended. This in Frémont's opinion, will render Oregon the most impregnable country in the world. Another singular feature of this part of the continent, is the existence of the Great Basin, about a mile higher than the surface of the ocean, and not less than four or five hundred miles each way in extent, and surrounded by mountains. Of this Basin, but little is yet certainly known, but it is supposed to have a system of lakes and rivers of its own, having no outlet nor any connexion with the Columbia or the Colorado. Of this system of Lakes, the great Salt Lake is one, which has a tributary, Bear river, four or five hundred miles long. The Great Basin lies principally in Upper California. The greater part of the Basin is supposed to be desert, but this is only conjecture. Much of this vast terra incognita may prove to be fertile and picturesque, and for the adventurous explorer it affords although a hazardous, yet a most interesting field. That a full exploration of this and of all other unknown parts of newly-acquired territory, should be made by the United States government, as soon as practicable, there can be no doubt.*

Of the inhabitants of the Basin, the Diggers are in the lowest stage of humanity. Others of the natives more fortunate and less degraded subsist on fish, found in the lakes and rivers, from which they repulse the Diggers. Oregon as far as observed by Frémont, appeared inferior to the Atlantic States for production of grain. Yet many parts produce wheat excellently. As a grazing country its promise is very great. Its climate is mild and healthy.

About the middle of June, Frémont turned up the valley of the Platte, and proceeded through the New Park, a beautiful circular valley, ninety miles in circumference, environed with snowy mountains, well watered and verdant, fringed

* An expedition to the Great Salt Lake, organized by Col. J. J. Abert of the Topographical Bureau, set out from Jefferson Barracks on the 1st of June, 1849. The party is under command of Capt. Stansbury, assisted by Lieutenant Gunnison of the Topographical Engineers. The papers announce that after an exploration of the Salt Lake, and surrounding region, the party will proceed to examine a new route thence to the head-waters of the Gila, to unite with the present Southern route to California, about Santa Fe. The expedition will probably be absent eighteen months or two years.

with pine at the foot of the mountains, a paradise for grazing animals. The Indian name for this Park, is "Cow-lodge." The travellers had for some time found themselves again in a region abounding with game, and the hunters now and then brought in fat buffalo cows. June 17th, the explorers crossed the summit of the Rocky Mountains, through a beautiful pass in latitude about 41° North. This summit is about a mile and three quarters high. They now descended into what is called Old Park. Here they were harassed by a war-party of Arapahoos, who did not fail to levy the usual "black mail" from them. Shortly after, Frémont's party passed within view of a battle, in actual progress, between the Utahs and Arapahoos—there being about 500 men closely engaged, and the crack of their rifles distinctly heard, while warriors on horseback were seen galloping to and fro, and groups of people gathered around the wounded and dead, as they were brought from the field of battle. At length extricated from the difficulties and dangers of the mountains, the way-worn travellers found themselves on the borders of the Arkansas, and by the 1st of July arrived at Bent's Fort, where they were saluted with a display of the national flag, and a feu de joie from the guns of the fort, and at this hospitable post they reposed for some days. In pursuing the journey towards the Missouri frontier, by the sudden rise in a river, near which they were encamped, all the baggage was covered by water, and all the perishable collections almost entirely ruined. On the 31st of July, they reached the Missouri river, after an absence of fourteen months, during which, notwithstanding the vicissitudes of climate and weather and the exposure, privation and fatigue, which they were subjected to, not one case of sickness had occurred. Embarking on board a steam-boat, they reached St. Louis, August 6th, 1844. Since the termination of this journey of exploration, other explorations, private and national, have been made, and a large mass of additional information, relative to the vast new territories of the United States, has been collected. Col. Frémont himself has had opportunities to greatly enlarge the stores of his already extensive geographical knowledge of New Mexico, and California, and a digest of it may be found published together with the highly interesting and instructive "Military Narrative" of Lieut. Emory, also of the Topographical Engineers. Bryant's "What I saw in California," is a work full of valuable information, and his adventures and observations are charmingly described. Several other works of interest and value have appeared—and the knowledge of the newly-acquired territories is of course much more ample and more accurate now than in 1844—but the two explorations made by Frémont in 1842 and in 1843-1844, must ever be considered the basis of all precise and scientific information, relative to the countries referred to, and the name of Frémont is immortalised among the great travellers and explorers, and will doubtless survive as long as those of the Sierra Nevada, or the Sacramento.

C. C.

LINES,

Suggested by a Conversation with a Friend.

I'd have no carved elaborate stone
 Within some dim-lit stately dome,
 Which crowds infest—
 A grave—a rural grave for me
 Beneath some fragrant hawthorn tree—
 There would I rest.

Blithe birds should carol o'er my head,
 Bright dew-drops gem my verdant bed,
 And flow'rets bloom—
 And woodland breezes freshly blow,
 Mingling with the flowers below
 Their soft perfume.

Nurt'ring the turf to deeper hue,
 And imaging the sky's rich blue
 In mirror clear—
 Transparent streams should purl around
 Sweet requiems murmuring o'er the mound
 In their career.

At morn, when fair, with rays divine,
 Our glorious sun should o'er me shine
 Cheering and bright!
 And each clear night, the paler beam
 Of moon or stars, above me gleam
 With silv'ry light.

* * * *

Such be the place of my repose,
 When Death shall end Life's cares and woes!

J. M. C.

LADY ALICE, OR THE NEW UNA.*

Lady Alice, or the New Una, is written with a profound and manifest contempt for the realities of life, and for that dramatic theory which requires in a novel or poem a close adherence to human nature as it is, regarding this as the highest result of art. This contempt is not only visible in the incidents of the story and the portraits of its characters, but is openly avowed. "The moral of such a tale as this," says the author, "will hardly be comprehended by those who have the habit of going to fiction for the representations of real life. The departure from reality to gain the permanence and beauty of the ideal will probably offend them," (vol. 2, p. 159.) And in the preface we are told that it "is half an allegory," by which "the beauty of the soul of the heroine" is made to "shine forth" to greatest advantage.

Before commenting on our author's story, or its moral, we will briefly relate to our readers such an outline of that story as will enable them to judge more correctly of our criticism. Although published as "a most extraordinary book by an American clergyman," the dramatis personæ are English, and the plot is laid in "the seagirt isle," and on the continent—principally, so far as the latter is concerned, in the Eternal City.

The story opens by presenting to us Augustus, Lord Beauchamp de Glentworth, and his younger brother, Frederick Clifford—two young and romantic Romanists, dwelling at Cava in all the ardor of brotherly love, and attending mass with all the punctuality of penitents on probation. Lord Beauchamp is impetuous and impulsive; and sighs after some early love, of whom we get no hint until the close of the first volume. Mr. Frederick, on the other hand, is calm, serene, self-relying, with accomplishments which out-Crichton Crichton, and a coolness more imperturbable than the gates of Pandemonium—with a face which Antinous might envy, and a form from competition with which Apollo himself might shrink. As to years, this hero was born January 17, 1818—(see quotation from Peerage, vol. 1, p. 57)—and first figures on the stage of action in the year of grace, 1841. He has of course attained all his "marvellous accomplishments," as a soldier, sailor—in fact, as every thing at the early age of twenty-three, and may therefore be well held up to future generations of flagging school-boys, as a model well calculated to stimulate them into industry and imitation. But though thus calm and self-relying—though “too serene to feel at all, or at least to feel permanently the influence of her sex,” (vol. 2, p. 33,) Mr. Clifford’s time was at hand, and like most of the lords of creation, no matter how cool and diplomatic, he was destined to fall a victim to the all-fascinating influences of a woman. In a lucky or unlucky hour, as remains to be seen, he goes on a bathing excursion—and there contrives to save the life of a fair unknown, the very incarnation of English beauty and of that sort of piety familiarly known in theological circles as ultra High Churchism.

* LADY ALICE; OR, THE NEW UNA. A Novel. In Two Volumes. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 300 Broadway. Philadelphia: Geo. S. Appleton, 164 Chestnut street. 1849.

The lovely Puseyite is of course the New Una, the heroine of the tale, and the enchantress of the heretofore invincible Mr. Clifford.

That “education forms the common mind” is a popular dogma grown into a truism; but our book shows that it exercises a no less influence over the uncommon mind. Such was that of Lady Alice: for though “she had never disobeyed her father or her mother,” yet “with every body else she would, and she did have her own way always,” (vol. 1, p. 76,)—thus exhibiting “a character, not only ardent and susceptible, but resolute and independent.” This very original character was subjected to a course of education equally novel, which arose out of the peculiar courtship and ante-nuptial arrangements of her father and mother, the Duke and Duchess of Lennox.

The Duke was “a Scot, a widower, and a Presbyterian.” He had the audacity to fall in love with Lady Kate Courtenay, who had “made up her mind on three points”—to wit: that she would marry no one possessed of any of the three foregoing qualities. The Duke “proposed” and was “refused in the most charming manner in the world.” Shortly afterwards another conversation was held, in which the Duke’s Presbyterianism was discussed. He had contrived to obviate the other objections. It was in this fashion—

“You object on principle to marrying a member of the Church of Scotland,” said the Duke meditatively, and making his horse walk.

“It depends whether your Grace objects on principle to your children being bred members of the Established Church of England. If I became a mother,” continued the young lady with great animation and a glowing cheek, “the religious nurture of my children would be in my eyes a sacred duty that I could never abandon to another; and plainly, I could not and would not teach them the tenets of your confession.”

“Could I hope that you would ever become the mother of a child of mine, I would agree, dear Kate, to your teaching it any religion you liked.”

The conversation terminated here, but our author shrewdly comments upon it as follows:

“It is self-evident that this conversation decided two questions most materially affecting the heroine of this tale:—first, whether she should exist at all; secondly, how she should be educated after she had been brought into the world.”
Vol. 1, pp. 26, 27, 28.

In due course of nature, after this conversation between the loving Duke and the conscientious Lady Kate, the first of these questions was decided in the affirmative, by the appearance of the Lady Alice on this earthly theatre—and the second was, in due course of story-telling, pretty much settled by putting her under the care of the Hon. and Rev. Herbert Courtenay—a brother of the Duchess, and Rector of St. Valerie—a parish in the Duke’s gift, and his favorite residence. The Hon. and Rev. gentleman’s opinions or politics are no where accurately made known—but it requires no great penetration to discover them when one peruses the account of the services at the church of St. Valerie, with its “six massive candlesticks of silver, filled with huge wax candles, (vol. 1, p. 33,) ever lighted at the hour of service”—or reads the description of the chapel at Lennox House, the Duke’s town residence, with its “sumptuous sanctuary,” the bears ideal of our author’s ecclesiastical architecture—

“This wanted nothing. Here were the credence and piscina, the canopied sedilia, the lofty candelabrum for the Paschal candle—a magnificent work in silver gilt. The altar, ascended by four steps, was also of white marble, with a carved reredos of the same material. In the centre compartment of the latter, the mystery of the Incarnation was presented in its immortal type—the Virgin and her Divine Son. In the side compartments were kneeling angels, saints and shepherds.

“The altar was dressed as in Catholic chapels on the continent; wax lights and flowers; a narrow cloth of snowy linen, with a deep fall of costly lace. The crucifix and great candlesticks were of gold.”—Vol. 2, p. 39—together with numerous other details of fan-tracery—niches—decorated canopies—sculptured apostles and painted saints—golden lamps and stained glass windows—and a particular account of “an aspersorium containing holy water”—details which are no doubt very interesting to individuals of Mr. Courtenay’s persuasion, and very appropriate to the private chapel of a Presbyterian.

Under her uncle’s care the Lady Alice grew up to be, in a religious point of view, all that the most zealous High Churchman could desire, abhorring Presbyterians and other sectarians on the one hand—on the other fully sympathizing, nay, freely participating in the rites and ceremonies of the Church of Rome; but disputing its jurisdiction over the Anglo-Catholic Church.

(vol. 2, p. 184.) She had other tutors too, it would seem, for we discover in the development of the story, that she speaks at seventeen all the languages of modern Europe with perfect purity and ease—draws and paints so exquisitely, that her pictures exhibited at the Exposition create an unheard-of furor—whilst her singing equals the choral harmonies of the angels, and her waltzing is worthy of Terpsichore herself. But whilst thus acquiring those accomplishments supposed to belong more particularly to the salon, the mere outside show of society, she has not been neglectful of other attainments peculiar to less wealthy and favored females. She is learned in the science of the cuisine, in fact so learned that even the all-knowing Frederick Clifford seeks instruction of her on this point. (vol. 2, p. 120,) and so “deep in the mysteries of embroidery and worsted-work,” that the Parisian Mrs. St. Liz, is glad to learn of her “how the honey-comb stitch is done,” (vol. 2, p. 138.) But in her pursuit of arts, accomplishments and theology she has not overlooked the sciences. She is familiar with Sexicava Rugosa, (vol. 2, p. 90,) and has her own theory about the Silurian strata and the tertiary formations—all this too at seventeen, when she is dragged out of the water by Frederick Clifford and kissed by him on their first meeting until she opens her “large, soft, dark eyes,” (vol. 1, p. 15, 16,) and makes his acquaintance.

A kiss would appear to be a very good way of breaking the ice in a love-affair—especially where the parties are very romantic and pious; for we find our hero and heroine on their next meeting Alice-and-Fred-ing one another like old friends or acknowledged lovers. Our author pertinently inquires—(vol. 1, p. 52)—

“Who can declare the obligation incurred by giving and receiving the slightest caress of love, or predict its consequences?”—

a question which at our advanced stage of life, we cannot undertake to answer satisfactorily: we think though that in our earlier days, if memory serves us correctly, such things were regarded as tokens of truth and affection on one side, of loyalty and devotion on the other. We know not how it is with “the children of this generation.” We may be considered as laudator temporis acti, yet with our quondam contemporaries, it seems to us that the spirit of chivalry had not wholly departed, though its usages were neglected. Indeed, we knew one youth who could obtain no “caress of love” from his fair lady, but who wrung a reluctant permission to retain a handkerchief of which he had accidentally gained possession, yet who nevertheless regarded this with an affection somewhat akin to that which he felt for the lady herself. No pilgrim ever bent with more devotion over some hallowed relic, than did he, night and morning, contemplate “the delicate web,” and gather, as he affirmed, new strength for a life of daily struggle and arduous mental toil. But be the obligation or the consequences what they may, they are assuredly such as neither Mr. Frederick Clifford nor Lady Alice Stuart are inclined to shrink from. In fact, they seem to court such responsibility, as may be readily seen by a reference to the scene in Lennox House conservatory, (vol. 2, p. 37)—that of the sofa at St. Walerie, (vol. 2, p. 77)—or that in Lady Alice’s bedroom, (vol. 2, pp. 191, 192, 193,) at Rome. The “tender submission” of the New Una on these occasions is so glowingly depicted, that we do not wonder at Mr. Fred’s running any risk for kisses from those ripe lips and pressures from those white arms. But we do not anywhere perceive “the consequences” of these “caresses of love” stated: they are only indirectly disclosed—and in this point of “the moral of his tale,” we frankly confess we think our American clergyman has failed—inasmuch as he asks a question which he does not pertinently answer; a question too, a correct response to which might be of great service to his junior readers.

But whilst thus briefly engaged “in giving and receiving” these “caresses” in cathedrals and ballrooms—for all times and places seem alike to our hero and heroine—the course of their true love is somewhat broken in upon, and made to run less smoothly, by a certain Lord Wessex and his proposals for the hand of fair Alice. Handsome, well-dressed, and thorough man of the world—backed by the wishes of her deceased brother, the late Lord Stratherne, he has prospects of success. But like the mists of the night they disappear before the sun of the all-conquering Clifford. Lord Wessex becomes a devil through rage, jealousy and disappointment, and abducts Lady Alice,—abductions are the fashion now-a-days in the late novels—just as she is on the eve of matrimony. This abduction is managed in so clumsy a style, (we doubt very much whether our author, the American clergyman, had ever any thing to dowith a like performance,) that we are forced to smile at the distresses of a young and beautiful woman, dressed in sailor boy’s clothes, tossed in an open boat and fed on a biscuit and some water for days, her allowance being finally reduced for the last two days to water only, (vol. 2, p. 150.)

Prior, however, to making these matrimonial arrangements which were so rudely interrupted by Lord Wessex’s manœuvres, a very grave question had been discussed between Clifford and Alice, similar to that considered by the Duke and Duchess, from the latter of whom our heroine seems to have derived an hereditary right to some such talk. The conversation took place in Lennox House Chapel, in the sumptuous sanctuary," in the light of "the golden lamps," of which a description has already been furnished our readers. She has just objected to his Romanism, and the necessity of their marriage being celebrated according to the ceremonies of that communion—a point which she cannot concede, though she frankly admits that the difficulty could be got over by adjourning to France, where there could be no question of conflict of jurisdiction between the Anglican and Roman churches. But her scruples of conscience are such that she cannot well permit herself to yield them. Still they may be got over, but another difficulty lurks behind. Clifford presses to know what that is.

"Go on without fear, dear Alice. Forget that I am your lover. Forget my sex."

"You anticipate what I find it hard to express. Yes," she continued with great softness of manner, and hastily dashing away a tear, "I know, of course, dearest Frederick, that to consent to be your wife is to promise to lie, one day, in your bosom and become, almost certainly, the mother of your children."

"Beloved Alice!"

"When Mamma was married," pursued Alice, "it was agreed that all her children should be educated in the Church of England. A good and pious Presbyterian might well consent to that, but not a good and pious Romanist. Could you consent, I would not that you should be placed in so ignominious a position."—Vol. 2, page 41.

Clifford here proposes an arrangement similar to that which existed between his own parents—"a division of the spoils," or rather offspring; an arrangement which she rejects, and in such fashion as to convince him of the hopelessness of any attempt to change her resolution on the subject. He saw that this "was not a case of those ordinary prejudices against his religion which he would have combated. Alice had none. She herself was surrounded by all the external signs of his faith. She accepted its dogmas apparently nearly as himself. She did not consider the doctrine of his church as heretical, nor its worship idolatrous. The intolerance was wholly his, and was the cause that her mind, nurtured in religious sympathy, recoiled from a union with him, and not the less because he was personally dear to her."

In fact he saw pretty clearly that if he wished to marry her he must learn to look at the respective jurisdictions of the Church of England and the Church of Rome within the realms of Queen Victoria in a very different light from what he had been in the habit of doing. So after another affectionate embrace or two, he disappeared by a back stairs to a very serious consideration of this important question. Our readers, who doubtless will charitably take into consideration Clifford's youth and tantalizing position, and also the fact that Alice is a great heiress in her own right—a fact which we omitted to mention—will not be surprised to find that in the course of a few pages. (vol. 2, p. 68,) he writes the Hon. and Rev. Mr. Courtenay a letter announcing his conversion from the church of Rome to that of England; and assigning his reasons, which we confess our inability to appreciate. Upon this conversion the marriage is agreed upon, and as we before stated, is broken off by Lord Wessex's abduction of the intended bride.

We here leave our hero and heroine, whose present position we beg our readers to bear in mind for a few moments, for the purpose of relating an episode which has much to do with the story and especially with its moral. It is the history of Louise Belmont, Countess of Schönberg, whom our Lennox party meet in the Alps, and with whom Alice is speedily on the most confidential terms. It is just after the rejection of Lord Wessex, who nevertheless has joined their party on their Alpine excursion, and who avenges himself by making love to the beautiful countess, albeit that she is the wife of another—a proceeding which the virtuous Louise contrives shall be witnessed by Clarie, Lady Alice's femme de chambre. Next morning Lord Wessex disappears, and in the evening Louise exposes him to Alice, and thereupon relates her history, which occupies Book the Fourth, being one eighth of the two volumes.

Miss de Belmont turns out to be the illegitimate cousin of Lord Beauchamp and Frederick Clifford. She is adopted and recognized, however, by her father, and put by him to a school, at which she becomes acquainted with Lady Augusta Dudley, sister of our Lord Wessex, and intimately so with Lady Isabel Fitzgerald, also the cousin of the Cliffords, and, so far as family arrangements go, the intended bride of Lord Beauchamp. Lady Isabel insists upon Louise passing the vacation with her at her mother's mansion. Here Louise meets the Cliffords. With Frederick she has a most curious and Platonic flirtation. But Augustus forms an earnest attachment for her, which we suppose, for we are not so told, was reciprocated by her. At least charity would lead us to offer the excuse of violent passion for her subsequent conduct. Their first meeting takes place when Louise has just passed sixteen. Two years later they meet again, and, after a few misunderstandings, the Cliffords, father and mother, Papa de Belmont—in fact, every body consents to and approves of the match, except Lady Devereux, grandmamma of Augustus. Papa Belmont thereupon counsels delay, but Augustus urges a run-away match, to which Louise consents, and they start for Gretna Green. "It is a singular sensation—that of eloping," says Louise, and we presume she speaks the truth. An accident happens—

"We made the greater part of the distance by railway, and, descending too soon from the carriage at the last station, where we were to have resumed posting, Augustus fell. A loaded car was advancing slowly on the parallel track. He was thrown against it, striking his head, and was taken up insensible. For a week I never quitted him."—Vol. 1, p. 183.

At the end of this time he got better. Her father arrived. He was under the impression that the accident occurred on their return from Scotland. She does not undeceive him nor Augustus, who entertained a similar idea, his faculties having been somewhat confused by the collision with the rail-car. De Belmont was obliged to start for the continent unexpectedly, and believing his daughter legally married, put off the "religious ceremonies" of being married by a Roman Catholic priest until his return. His stay is greatly and unavoidably prolonged. In the mean time things happen which go to show that "the caresses of love" are not always without their "consequences." We narrate this in Louise's own words. Our readers must not forget, however, that the innocent Alice is her only listener.

"Unhappy girl that I am! Thus I exclaimed when, after a month of remorseful solitude, I discovered that I was to be a mother. An unmarried mother! Good heavens! I! Was it possible that this could be true of me? Month after month I continued alone. Pecuniary embarrassment was added to my distress. My father wrote that he was obliged to draw for the full amount of his balances; and begged that my husband would charge himself with the expenses of the establishment for a few months. Should I now summon Augustus, accept the reparation of his hand, and in six months give him an heir to the honours of the Beauchamps and of his wife's inefaceable disgrace? Never."—Vol. 1, p. 185.

Her servants not precisely understanding her desolate position grow refractory. One undertakes to rob her. She shoots him, as he is getting into the window, wounding him seriously though not mortally. This has a salutary effect in restoring discipline. Shortly after Lady Beauchamp, mother to Augustus, arrives. She inquires into matters, finds out the exact state of the case, though Louise "would not tell her anything," "treats her exactly as a daughter," "visits her daily," "supplies her with money," in short, "shows her unbounded kindness." At length her child is born, and she makes a resolution, so curious in its character, so well supported by reasons, that we give it in her own words.

"Partly influenced by my injured affection, and partly by a wish to offer an expiation to my own self-respect, I made a rash vow to live solely for my child, and never while it lived to marry even Augustus. Legitimated now it could not be, and it never should have any legitimate brothers to look down upon it with scorn."

The majority of our readers will, like ourselves, probably be at a loss rightly to understand the propriety of Mademoiselle de Belmont's conduct in this matter. Perhaps, they may doubt the principle as well as the wisdom exhibited in the deceit practised on her father, on the man who loved her and believed himself her husband, on her guiltless, helpless offspring. Perhaps too they may find it difficult to reconcile her line of conduct with their ideas of female modesty, womanly affection, and maternal devotion. But they must bear in mind that "the moral of this tale will be hardly comprehended by those who go to fiction for the representations of real life," nor must they forget that the tale itself is "a departure from reality to gain the permanence and beauty of the ideal." But to return to the narrative:

"Lady Beauchamp came in. After the first inquiries she broke to me that her son had accompanied her, and begged to see me. 'Does he know?' 'As yet nothing,' she said.

"I looked at my infant. To see it embraced and acknowledged by its father, to be myself consoled and thanked by his kiss—could I deny myself this? My resentment was gone. 'Let him come in,' I said, 'but tell him nothing.'

"She went out, and presently I heard his well known step in the dressing room. 'What, is she in her bed room? Is she ill?' he asked.

"They came in, and he stood by the bedside bewildered and pale. Unaccustomed to the darkened chamber, he could not tell if I were extremely ill or not.

"'Oh, why, Louise, have you concealed from me that you were ill?' he said in a tremulous tone, and kneeling by the bedside.

"'My illness, Augustus, is but of yesterday, though I have carried the cause of it nine months in my bosom.'

"How he started! A faint cry of the babe, awakening, explained my words. His first exclamation was of joy and tenderness. He kissed first me and then his child. Then his countenance again altered.

"'How cruel you have been! You have ruined yourself, and me, and your child. How have you dared to deceive me thus?'"

Vol. 1, p. 189.

This sort of conversation is put a stop to on the ground of exciting the invalid too much. Augustus urges marriage; a thing which seems odd in a father whose child has been so deeply wronged. But this book is "a departure from the real to gain the permanence and beauty of the ideal," and the injury seems only to act as a stimulus to his ardor, a filip to his affection. She refuses his proposals. The child, with great prudence and propriety on its part, dies. The mother is removed to Lady Beauchamp's residence, where convalescence proceeds with due rapidity. Mr. de Belmont returns from the continent as Count de Belmont, and the favorite aid-de-camp of the king of —, the name of his dominions not being mentioned. To the capital he takes Louise, where the king is introduced to her as Count Schönberg. He manifests a strong, though pure attachment for her. This gives rise to much scandal, the consequence of which is that her father is shot in a duel, and she is nominally married to the real Count Schönberg, whose title the king assumed, but in reality is only adopted by him as his daughter, he being a very old man. She passes, however, as his wife everywhere, and demeans herself accordingly. Here her story to Alice ends, but to complete her history for our readers, we will pursue it further.

Lord Beauchamp and his brother, Mr. Frederick Clifford, shortly after the period when the history of the Countess is related to Alice, are visiting Venice. Of course they pass much of their time in "gliding voluptuously about in a gondola." One evening when Beauchamp is alone, (vol. 2, pp. 10—22,) a gondolier summons him to enter one of these water-coaches and speak to a signora. He does so, of course. As the door opens he gets light enough to discover that the lady is on the left side. He seats himself beside her. The door is shut, and all is darkness. Augustus tries to draw her into conversation. His efforts are fruitless. After a somewhat long and embarrassing silence she leans her head upon his shoulder. This assures him "that the stranger was really a lady. He recognized the free masonry of bon-ton in her very familiarity. Her head reclined lightly on his shoulder, her soft hand was simply resigned in his."—Vol. 2, p. 11.

We know nothing by experience of English society, and can not say therefore whether or no, such are the tokens which English women give by way of proving to strange gentlemen that they are ladies. Certainly such has not been our experience in American society, whatever may have been that of our author, the American clergyman. Beauchamp again essays a colloquy, in vain—but various embraces take place, during the progress of which they discover to each other that they are unmarried and disengaged, and the lady assures him that she is purity itself, except her indiscretion with him. The response to this assurance is thus told:

"Augustus replied to the stranger's assertion of her integrity—pity his weakness—by a caress. It was first suffered; then timidly returned; and then the stranger hid her face in his bosom, and seemed to weep. This lasted but for a moment. She summoned the gondolier hastily. She directed him to return to the Foscari Palace. She did not speak again till they arrived; but then it was to propose a meeting for the following evening."—Vol. 2, p. 13.

Of course he made "the assignation." Next morning Frederick Clifford leaves him to visit Lucerne. Next evening he "keeps his assignation," (vol. 2, p. 14,) and off they go in a gondola again. He finds her figure, particularly her shoulders and arms, very beautiful, but her face he cannot see. She wears both a black mask and a veil. He begs for a sight of her physiognomy. She declines, assuring him that she "is called beautiful;" and on being pressed by him, gives him such a description of her face, that he is irresistibly reminded of Louise, Countess of Schönberg. Donna Maddelena, such is the name of the fair incognita, inquires into the history of his attachment for her. He tells her that even at that moment he is still attached to Louise. Maddelena replies by sinking into his arms, and Beauchamp, forgetting Louise, begs that "their love may be hallowed by marriage," (vol. 2, p. 18.) She closes with the proposition. He takes her to his house, sends for her maid, who brings a bridal dress, and for a priest, who brings Frederick Clifford. The priest confesses them, and whilst the lady is undergoing this moral purgation, Mr. Frederick subjects his brother to an examination which proves very unsatisfactory. He however contrives to see his future sister-in-law without her mask, a thing which the bridegroom cannot accomplish, and then approves of the match. The marriage is solemnized—Augustus embraces his unknown and masked bride, and they part for years. We know not how long a time elapses, but when they next meet it is in London. Maddelena and Louise are discovered to be one and the same person. Count Schönberg is put to death on the first opportunity—his horses run away with him—and the happy pair become Lord and Lady Beauchamp. (Vol. 2, p. 65.)

We may also mention as an incident in the plot, that Lord Wessex engages himself to Grace Clifford. The engagement is broken off by the manœuvres of Alice. Frederick Clifford fights a duel with Wessex; the weapons are swords, and Clifford disarms his antagonist three times; when the combat is terminated by the interference of the seconds. Wessex rushes to his room, and is about blowing out his brains when he is arrested by one Mr. Matson, an illegitimate brother of Lord Wessex, the quondam steward of the Duke of Lennox, and the creature through whose instrumentality the abduction of Lady Alice is effected. He afterwards reappears at Rome as the Baron Von Schwartzthal. Grace Clifford, after her rupture with Lord Wessex, forms an engagement with Lord Stratherne, the brother of Alice.

Our readers must now gather up all these characters—some two years after the abduction—except Lady Alice, and put them down at Rome. They must also add Captain and Lady D'Eyncourt, the brother-in-law and sister of Alice—and finally, they must set the whole party to visiting all the myriad curiosities of the Eternal City, and to Mr. Frederick Clifford's other occupations, they must add on his part a seemingly incessant attendance on mass and prayers, churches and chapels. At the Exposition a St. Cecilia attracts their attention. It is undergoing criticism. The German artists are astonished—the French delighted—and the English charmed. The artist enters. It is Mr. Alfred Fitzalan. He is English of course, though "attired in the highest style of French fashion." Clifford makes his acquaintance and buys his picture. When he goes to pay for it, he is struck with "the startling identity" of young Fitzalan with Alice Stuart. They have much talk together. Clifford has a fit of crying, after which they go to luncheon in company, on which occasion, by-the-way, Alice takes too much wine and falls ill in the street. After dinner they proceed to Lady Beauchamp's rooms, where Fitzalan figures extensively, and Grace Clifford, by putting "her hand gently on his heart," discovers "a woman's agitated and overflowing breast," (vol. 2, p. 141,) and Mr. Fitzalan and Lady Alice are known to her as one and the same. A promise of secrecy is exacted from Grace, and thereupon Alice contrives a visit to Miss Clifford's apartment and there tells her story, which consists merely in a series of improbabilities not worth relating here. Grace and she discuss the propriety of her keeping the oath of concealment which has been extorted from her by Matson and Wessex. On that score Alice is easy. But she says—

"What troubles me most is, that for man or woman to wear the garb appropriated by custom to the other sex seems to me expressly forbidden by scripture. It is a dreadful thing for me to violate such a law. I ask myself, day by day, if the promise by which I engaged to do it, was not void in itself."—Vol. 2, p. 153.

It is a subject on which any doubting mind might consult both St. Peter, (1 Peter, c. 3, v. 3,) and St. Paul, (1 Timothy, c. 2, v. 9,) to advantage. But Alice determines to keep up her costume. We rather think she has a latent liking for "the ample tube of the fancy trowsers," and the "brilliant, coral-studded linen swelling gently over the bust," (vol. 2, p. 130.) Clifford, over whom as over all the rest of the party, except Grace, a most unaccountable stupidity or blindness seems to have come to prevent her recognition of Alice, takes rooms next to Fitzalan, and lives on terms of almost hourly intimacy with this "bi-sexual," individual.

It is needless to dwell on the details of their residence at Rome. We shall hasten to the denouement. Fitzalan, Wessex and the Baron or Matson, find that the secret of her disgrace can no longer be kept. It is necessary to get rid of him. So he (or she) appears at the Carnival as Miss Fitzalan. One thing occurs in reference to this which on the score of morals we do not "readily comprehend." Fitzalan tells Clifford that he has "lost all his friends, father, mother, sisters and brothers," (vol. 2, p. 115,) and subsequently confesses to him, (vol. 2, p. 165,) that this is untrue, the falsehood attracting no attention from him, and then this sister is introduced on the stage. Fitzalan is then metamorphosed into the Princess Alexina Galitzin, and as such, has quite a career of ambition and splendor sketched out for her future. As Fitzalan, however, he (or she) reappears and takes a seat in the vettura of next morning for Naples, and is to have a parting interview with Clifford. Much to his regret he does not on his return to his room find the much loved Frederick, but looking upon this as another drop of bitterness in his cup, he retires quietly to bed. Clifford, who had grown tired of waiting for Fitzalan, and had walked out on the parapet of the house where he had fallen asleep, now "enters the chamber," which seems to him filled "with the atmosphere of chastity," (vol. 2, p. 189.) He approaches the bed where "Fitzalan lay in a position of natural slumber"—"recognizes the countenance of sweet, yet almost death-like, repose," "the watch, excessively small," "the ivory comb, with the bas-relief carving": still he does not believe Fitzalan to be Alice. He throws himself on the sofa. His movements disturb her. She jumps out of bed, walks across the room for a glass of water. He discovers from her night-dress that she is beyond doubt a woman:

"but, at this moment, the brand shot out a bright tongue of flame, which revealed both face and figure completely.

"Alice!" He threw himself at her feet with that cry of incredulous joy.

"She gave a little shriek, but immediately perceiving who it was, faltered his name. Clifford blushed almost as deeply as herself, as he folded her in a tender embrace, then drew her towards the fire, and gazed, as if he still doubted his own senses, at her face so rapidly changing. He kissed her forehead, lips, hands, in a state of delirium. She had too much sensibility herself to expect him to be calm at such a moment, but her eyes wandered around for her dressing robe, which lay on a chair. He enveloped her with it, without either having spoken, piled the fire with dry faggots from the panier, sat down, and placing her on his knee, folded his arms once more around her form."

"Indeed, it was more than human nature was capable of, to restrain at such a moment, the expression of feelings which their mutual reverence but rendered more deep. We may take it for a scene of passion as pure as natural. And as her lover calmed, Alice, in her turn, permitted herself to press her lips again and again to his burning forehead, and then she would lay her head fondly on his shoulder and slightly sob."

Vol. 2, p. 192.

The interview lasts some time. It ends in Clifford's expressing his determination to marry her in the morning, and refusing in the mean season to trust her out of his sight. Next morning he is delirious from the effects of the malarious fever, contracted by sleeping out the night before in the open air. Of course Alice determines not to leave him. All is discovered. Lord Stratherne calls out Wessex. The Baron acts as Wessex's second. Stratherne shoots Wessex, of course; but Wessex shoots the Baron—killing him on the spot, (vol. 2, p. 203.) Clifford is pronounced dying, and has an English clergyman to confess him, and give him the Sacrament. He then tells Alice of certain herbs, to be found only on the Roman Campagna, which he directs to be gathered and administered to him. This she does—and of course, in spite of the doctors and the fever, he recovers; and we come to the last scene of all in this strange eventful history—the marriage. This is done in true Anglo-Catholic style by the Rev. and Hon. Herbert Courtenay.

"The ceremony, in short, was such as has not been witnessed in England since the early and unspotted period of the sixth Edward, which exhibited the purified Church of England as she was in the beauty and love of her espousals, before an adulterous tampering with the foreign reformation had led her to prevaricate in her fidelity to her Eternal Bridegroom."—Vol. 2, p. 215.

We are then entertained with an elaborate description of "a room in which Clifford at one time found himself," and of what occurred there. Of these mysteries, not being members of the clerical profession, we know nothing, and must therefore content ourselves with an extract, concerning the merits of which, having more than once visited an upholsterer's shop, we may be permitted to say that we know something.

"But the chief object in the soft light and stillness of that bridal chamber is the ivory couch, classically formed, profusely carved, and half enveloped in clouds of lace. On the counterpane of the bed—white satin brilliantly embroidered in gold and colors, the work of Clarinelle St. Liz—reposes the same memento, (a crucifix,) of the Divine Sufferings that have purchased and sanctified all human bliss, which formerly protected the bed of the lonely Fitzalan."

As also incidental to the better understanding of the "moral" of this story, we may as well mention, that Lord Wessex, at the time of his engagement to Grace, was engaged also in a liaison with Isabel, the early friend of Louise de Belmont, now the wife of Lord Devereux—a species of domestic arrangement which passes without rebuke on the part of our "moral" and Reverend author, who however excuses it on the ground that Devereux has first "deserted" her, (vol. 2, p. 62.)

We have thus endeavored to give a faithful outline of this story, which is written to illustrate the propriety of departing from the realities of life "to obtain the permanence and beauty of the ideal," and to teach "a moral not readily comprehended by ordinary minds." The book naturally presents itself in three aspects: as a theological work, or exposition of the views held by one extreme section of the High Church Episcopalians; as a moral tale, in which "the beauty of the soul of the heroine is made to shine forth" with more than ordinary splendor; and as a work of art, which abandons the realities of life to develop by a reproduction of the author's mind, something superior to any representation, however accurate, of human nature as it is really exhibited by the discipline of actual existence.

Of the book in its theological aspect, we have nothing to say. As men and as Christians, we might perhaps pause before we rashly condemned the Church of Rome,—to whose care we are indebted under God for the preservation of the Bible through so many centuries of mental darkness and heathen persecution, and so much learned and pious exegesis of the sacred writings,—because that Church holds itself entitled to administer its rites and consolations to its children, no matter where sojourning. As men and Christians, we might too, perhaps, be cautious how we adjudged the Protestant sects,—who have so manfully fought the battle of religious belief founded on reason rather than authority,—to be beyond the covenanted mercies of God, even though their ministers do not officiate by virtue of the Apostolic descent. And as men and Christians, we might possibly be disposed to extend the mantle of charity over our Low Church brethren, who being within the fold of the true branch of the Catholic Church and receiving its sacraments at the hands of regularly ordained ministers, are nevertheless unenlightened as to the right meaning of some of the Rubrics, and are still walking in darkness as to the merits of Tract number Ninety. But we are neither men nor Christians. We are only ultra High Church Episcopalians. As such we know our duty. Like our author, we condemn the Romanists because of their unsoundness on the question of Episcopal jurisdiction: we condemn the sectarians, because they have not the Apostolical succession; and as for Low Churchmen, wolves in sheep's clothing, scoffers at the Oxford Tracts, let them be Anathema Maranatha. Romanists, Sectarians, Low Churchmen—we damn them all alike with equal unction and expedition.—Fiat justitia!

As a moral tale, we confess that we are disposed to use no ordinary language in speaking of this book, coming as it does from the pen of one who is professedly engaged in teaching the religion of our Blessed Lord. As the work of a clergyman, it may and will penetrate into houses where it would not otherwise have gone, and be perused by those to whom such scenes of vice are strange. When Ernest Maltravers and Alice or the Mysteries were given to the public, men condemned them because of the probable pernicious effects of a tale, in which a deviation from the paths of virtue was rewarded by marriage and honorable position. Here the same thing occurs to Louise de Belmont. In Bulwer's novel, the unfortunate Alice was an orphan, a mere child, without education and writhing beneath the tyranny of a father, who, if we remember rightly, perishes by the hands of the law. The name of the Creator, except as an imprecation, is unknown to her. As such she sins. But her sin brings with it the means of education. Her mind is unfolded; she learns to know the truth; and with that knowledge comes regret, remorse, and years of penitence and expiation. Then purified by suffering and prayer, she meets again the man of her early love, and he, so far as he can, repairs the wrong which he had done. But Lady Beauchamp's case is wholly different. She is wealthy and highly educated. Augustus is represented as being mentally unconscious, when she seeks his couch. She then deceives her father, and Lord Beauchamp—suffers her child,—but we will not dwell further upon the details of this disgusting, and thanks to nature, impossible story. Again, Lord Wessex engages himself to Grace Clifford at the same time that he is living in adultery with Lady Devereux. Again, for a woman "to wear the garb of the other sex" is a misdemeanor in law, punishable by imprisonment in this happy land of liberty, where it is regarded by our wise men as an offence against morals and decency; yet the beatific Lady Alice sports trowers with "an ample tube" for two years; and all for the sake of testifying her devotion to the true doctrine of Anglo-Catholic jurisdiction. Again, Lady Alice, who takes too much wine at the dinner table of a hotel, perches herself in her night-clothes on her lover's knees and spends much time in kissing his burning forehead, and indulging in other tender endearments—the scene of action being her own bed-room—her only protection being a crucifix lying on her bed; and we are told it is an exhibition of "passion as pure as natural." The naturalness of it, we do not question, but of its purity, credit Judæus. It is unnecessary however to comment further upon the moral tendency of this story. To every pure-minded woman, to every right-thinking man, to every father, husband, brother, it must seem as though the Reverend Author, "being thereunto instigated by the Devil," (to use the language of criminal indictments,) had deliberately taxed both his memory and his imagination, to produce a work which should be as licentious in its details as it is infamous in its general principles. To compare such a book with the productions of Eugene Sue is to do the Frenchman great injustice. He wrote the Mysteries of Paris for the purpose of exposing the atrocities practised under legal pretences against the poor; and he succeeded in attracting general attention to the character of the criminal code. He wrote the Wandering Jew to exhibit the iniquities of the Jesuits; with how much effect, let the newspapers answer. But this book, to all appearance, is written merely to show that adultery and seduction may be practised with impunity—nay, that they tend to develop the beauty of one's soul, provided one keeps a crucifix on one's bed, and recites the Compline Psalms of an evening. Against such uses of the symbol of salvation and of the Holy Scriptures, all honest Catholics and Protestants will alike protest.

Last of all, we must look at the book in an artistic point of view, as an illustration of the theory that it is necessary to "depart from reality to gain the permanence and beauty of the ideal." As to this, we presume that no one, however infatuated with the theory itself, will ever cite this novel as an instance of its correctness. But for ourselves, we, in part, attribute this failure of the author (in a more literary sense) to the theory which he has adopted. It is not that upon which the great masters of art have wrought out those immortal works which have been and ever will be the delight and admiration of mankind. To the earnest, sorrowful Dante, Poetry was that divine philosophy

Musical as is Apollo's lute, which every where to the attentive ear discourses of Nature and the Divine intelligence* :—with the ardent, creative Schiller, "true art is not satisfied with a show of Truth. It rears its edifice on Truth itself, on the solid and deep foundations of Nature†"—whilst the serene and thoughtful Goethe has thus recorded his ideas of art in "the golden cadences of poesy":—

As all Nature's thousand changes
But one changeless God proclaim,
So through Art's wide kingdom ranges
One sole meaning still the same.
This is Truth, eternal Reason,
Which from Beauty takes its dress,
And serene through time and season,
Stands for aye in loveliness.‡

To mention Homer and Shakspeare, is to call to mind developments of man and man's character, which, in their depth, assume at times the appearance of revelation. And yet the wondrous book of man's nature is but partially unfolded by them. What need to go beyond it? Why not pore over its pages? Is there not enough of tenderness, of excitement, of novelty, of tragedy to be found there? Now grave, now gay; thoughtful and trifling; sublime and sensual; passionately struggling with life; sadly wrestling with doubt; thirsting for knowledge as for hid treasures, yet thereby only increasing sorrow; vainly endeavoring to elucidate the eternal problem of his intellectual existence, the solution ever escaping him just as he seems about to grasp it; dimly realizing the complicated relations of his social existence, the mysterious action of mind upon mind; with passions, desires, and feelings that put him on a level with the beasts that perish; with hopes, fears and aspirations that render him but a little lower than angels; the mysterious link between the spiritual intelligences which minister round the throne of the Most High, and the creatures which are of the earth, earthy: such are some of the traits of human nature, and are there not materials enough here upon which to exercise the plastic hand of Art?

We will, however, dismiss this book by saying,

* Filosofia, mi disse, a chi l'attende,
Nota non pure in una sola parte,
Come Natura lo suo corso prende
Dal Divino Intelletto.

Inferno, Canto xi. 97-100.

+ Remarks on the use of Chorus in Tragedy.

‡ Carlyle's Translation of Wilhelm Meister.

that as a theological exposition, it is a slanderous caricature of Catholic christianity: as a moral treatise, it is licentious and corrupting in the extreme: as a work of art, professedly upholding a theory, it is a wretched failure. The Reverend Author and his friends will doubtless meet these censures by the assertion that the work has created a sensation and procured notoriety for its Author. We can only answer, that the same thing may be said of Judas Iscariot and a host of kindred spirits and their works.

Lee Town, Va., July, 1849.

BOYHOOD.

"Thou hast my better years—
Thou hast my earlier friends—the good—the kind."
Bryant.

"It was but childish ignorance,
Though now 'tis little joy
To know I'm farther off from Heaven,
Than when I was a boy."—Thomas Hood.

The bright, bright hours of boyhood!—
Of't mes their memories rise
Like clouds of a golden and purple hue,
Over Fancy's radiant skies.
The bounding pulse, and the joyous heart,
The life untouched by pain,
And the whispered tones of a glorious Hope,
All rush to mind again.

The Past! in its fairy realms I live,
Its garden is filled with flowers,
And my spirit inhaleth the incense sweet
That ascends from its roseate bowers.
As the wanderer lone on the desert sands,
Looks back to his home with tears,
So the wanderer lone on the sands of life,
Hails the light of his early years.

I remember my hosom's first warm thrill,
As a beautiful form passed by—
The glossy folds of the waving hair,
And the light of the beaming eye,—
And I deemed that woman's sweet, fair face,
In its holy thought did seem
Like the angel-features that on me shone,
Each night, in my boyhood's dream.

I remember her whose slightest tone,
Bore with it a magic power,
Whose warm glance beamed on my folded heart,
Like the sun on his favorite flower—
Till the passionate thoughts that slumbered there,
In a still sleep, deep and long,
Burst forth, like waves from a woodland shade,
To beauty and light and song.

I remember the smile of one who loved,
Her thoughtless and wayward boy,
With a love that mocked all chance or change,
And which Death could not destroy.

She blessed me then with a fervent prayer,
As her cold lips pressed my brow—
Weary seasons have vanished since—
I can feel that wild kiss now.

I remember my boyhood's early friend—
Our pledges of earnest faith—
A faith, whose spotless and golden link,
Should be bright and true till death—
Alas! alas! we are distant now,
Those pledges are little worth—
I have mourned the wrecks of my fondest hopes,
I am almost alone on earth.

I remember my boyhood's visioned gleams
Of a distant and sinless clime,
Where the panting soul of an untold bliss,
Sighed not at the knell of Time.
Where the seraph-minstrels that wandered by,
Bore lyres of such sweet tone,
That the dreamer knew their chords were wooed
By the airs of Heaven alone.

I remember my boyhood's guileless thoughts.
To the heart's still depths they gave,
A purity soft as the light of stars
On a tranquil fountain's wave;
Purity! clouds of sin and shame
Have overshadowed its image bright,
But the sun will burst through this darkness yet—
It cannot be always night.

P. H. H.

THE TABLET OF THE THEBAN CEBES.

Translated from the Greek.

BY REV. J. JONES SMYTH, A. M.

[Cebes was—as the title indicates—a native of Thebes. He was a disciple of Socrates. Xenophon in the 'Memorabilia,' B. 1, ch 2, sec. 48, makes honorable mention of him, as being one of those distinguished men who by their virtuous lives and patriotic conduct showed what was the real nature and true tendency of the instruction which the great Philosopher imparted. Plato has made him one of the interlocutors in his Phædon.

This is the only production of Cebes which has come down to us. He is said to have written two other dialogues.

The edition from the following translation is made is the small Leipzig one of Tauchnitz, 1829.

The translator has aimed at giving a version as nearly literal as the idioms of the two languages will admit. None except those who have made the trial, can form any adequate notion of the difficulty of rendering the condensed power of Greek particles and the nice and philosophical shades of meaning of Greek compounds into tolerable English without obscuring or greatly weakening the beauty and vigor of the original. Why is not this chaste and beautiful little work made to form a part of our School or even College courses? Its brevity, plain and simple style and elevated moral tone all recommend it.]

THE INTERLOCUTORS: A STRANGER AND AN OLD MAN.

1. We happened to be walking in the place sacred to Chronus, in which we saw a great variety of votive offerings. But in front of the temple a certain tablet had been presented, on which was some strange painting, containing some peculiar mysteries, which we were unable to comprehend, or find out what they could mean. The painting did not appear to us to be either a city or a camp; but there was a circle enclosing two other circles, a greater and a less. There was a gate to the first circle, close to which a large crowd appeared to be standing; within the circle a multitude of women was visible; and beside the entrance to the outer gate and circle an old man was standing, who by his gestures seemed to be enjoining something upon those that were entering.

2. After we had for a long time perplexed ourselves about the interpretation of this myth, a venerable old man standing at our side, said: "Strangers! The difficulty which you now experience about this painting is nothing unusual, for very few of the inhabitants of the place are at all acquainted with its allegorical interpretation. Indeed the offering itself was not made by a citizen of the place; but a stranger who came here a long time since,—a man of great intelligence and remarkable for his wisdom, and who both by precept and example manifested an ardent love for a kind of Pythagorean and Parmenidean mode of living, consecrated this place, and presented this painting to Chronus."

Stranger. "Did you ever see or get acquainted with this man?"

Old Man. "Yes. Being a youth at the time, I was in the habit of gazing at him long with admiration, for he used to discourse on a great variety of subjects with earnestness and power; and of this allegorical painting I have frequently heard him give a full explanation."

3. Stranger. "Then, I beseech you, if some business of importance does not happen to prevent, to explain it to us, for we have been very anxious to learn what in the world it means."

Old Man. "With great pleasure, strangers, However it is proper that I should first tell you that the explanation involves some risk."

Stranger. "Of what nature?"

Old Man. "If you attend to and understand what I am about to tell you, ye shall be both wise and happy; but if you do not, then becoming foolish, unfortunate, morose and ignorant, a life of misery awaits you. This interpretation resembles the enigma of the Sphinx, which she was wont to propose to men, for whoever was able to solve it was saved, but he who could not was destroyed by the Sphinx. So is it with the interpretation of this painting; for Folly is a Sphinx to mankind. She proposes as enigmas such questions as these, What is good, what bad, and what neither good nor bad in life? Now he that does not understand these is destroyed by her, not indeed all at once, as he perished who was devoured by the Sphinx, but like the man in the hands of the torturer, he wastes away gradually during the whole of life: but on the other hand, whoever does understand these things is saved and 'Folly' perishes, while he becomes happy and blessed all his lifetime. Therefore I beg you to listen and take heed."

4. Stranger. "Truly, you have excited our curiosity very much, if such be the case."

Old Man. "Such, indeed, is the case."

Stranger. "You need not on this account defer the explanation, as we shall attend with all diligence, seeing that the consequences are so great."

The old man thereupon picked up a rod, and pointing it towards the picture, said; "Do you see this circle?"

Stranger. "Yes."

Old Man. "You must first know that this place is called 'Life.' That large crowd standing near the gateway are they who are about to enter upon life. The old man, whom you see standing above, with a map in one hand, and pointing apparently at something with the other, is called the 'Tutelary Deity' or 'Genius,' (Demon.) He is giving directions to those that are entering as to what they must do when they commence life, and pointing out to them the path in which they must walk if they would be safe in life."

5. Stranger. "What is the way in which he bids them walk, or how are they to act?"

Old Man. "Do you see close to the gate, a seat placed at the spot where the crowd is entering; upon it is seated a woman of studied elegance of demeanor, and fascinating appearance, with a cup in her hand?"

Stranger. "I see her. Who is she?"

Old Man. "Her name is 'Deceit,' for she misleads all men."

Stranger. "How? What does she do?"

Old Man. "She drugs with her influence all who enter life."

Stranger. "What does she make them drink?"

Old Man. "'Error' and 'Ignorance.'"

Stranger. "What then?"

Old Man. "As soon as they imbibe these, they enter life."

Stranger. "Do all drink this 'Error'?"

Old Man. "All: some, however, take larger, and some smaller draughts. Again, do you see within the gate a number of women; they are associates, but differ in their forms and appearance?"

Stranger. "I observe them."

Old Man. "These are called 'Sentiments' or 'Opinions,' 'Desires' and 'Pleasures.' As soon as the crowd enters, these women seize upon and embrace every individual, and then lead them off."

Stranger. "Where do they take them?"

Old Man. "Some to safety, and others to ruin, through the agency of 'Deceit.'"

Stranger. "Alas! what a pernicious draught that was which you mentioned!"

Old Man. "And yet these all profess to be guides to the highest good,—to happiness and prosperity. But they who through ignorance and error have tasted of the cup of 'Deceit,' can never find what the true path in life is, but wander about at random; just as you see how those who have entered before these, are roaming about wherever chance may take them."

7. Stranger. "I see them. Who is that woman standing upon a round stone; she seems to be both blind and crazy?"

Old Man. "Her name is 'Fortune.' She is not only blind and crazy, but deaf also."

Stranger. "What does she do?"

Old Man. "Go about in all directions, take from some all that they possess and give it to others; she then straightway deprives the latter of the gifts which she had just presented to them, and distributes them to others without any judgment or stability of purpose. Her natural disposition is therefore admirably portrayed in the manner of her representation."

Stranger. "What manner?"

Old Man. "As standing upon a round stone."

Stranger. "What does that represent?"

Old Man. "That there is neither safety nor stability in her gifts. For great and terrible disasters befall those who put any confidence in her."

8. Stranger. "What does that great throng of people that surround her want? and what are their names?"

Old Man. "They are called 'The Thoughtless;' and each of them is begging for the things which she is scattering about."

Stranger. "Why then this difference in their appearance, some seem to be filled with joy, while others, all despondent, stand wringing their hands?"

Old Man. "Those who appear rejoicing and laughing are they who have received some favor from 'Fortune;' by them she is called 'Good Fortune.' Those who are represented as weeping and wringing their hands are they from whom she has taken the gifts previously bestowed: these, on the contrary, call her 'Bad Fortune.'"

Stranger. "What are these gifts that cause so much joy in those who receive them, and so much grief in those who do not?"

Old Man. "Such as many men consider to be blessings."

Stranger. "Pray, what are they?"

Old Man. "Wealth evidently, and fame, rank, children, power and sovereignty, and such like."

Stranger. "And are these not blessings?"

Old Man. "We will investigate that by and bye. Let us now go on with the explanation of the picture."

Stranger. "Very well, be it so."

9. Old Man. "When you have passed this gate, do you see another circle farther up, and outside of it some women standing, gaudily arrayed, like women of pleasure?"

Stranger. "Yes."

Old Man. "These are called 'Intemperance,' 'Profligacy,' 'Covetousness' and 'Flattery.'"

Stranger. "Why are they standing there?"

Old Man. "Watching for those who get any thing from 'Fortune.'"

Stranger. "What then do they do?"

Old Man. "They rush up to and embrace them, ply them with flattery and importune them to stay with them, saying that they will lead a pleasant and easy life, free from toil and hardship. But if any one is prevailed upon by them to enter upon a life of voluptuousness, he finds it to be pleasant and agreeable for a time, until the excitement wears off, and no longer. When sober reason revives, he then finds that he was not using and enjoying pleasure, but that she was devouring and wantonly ruining him. And just as soon as he has squandered all that he got from 'Fortune,' he is forced to become a slave to these women, to bear every insult with patience, to submit to vice and degradation, and for their sakes to perpetrate any villainy, as theft, sacrilege, perjury, treachery, robbery, &c. And when all is done, they then hand their victims over to 'Punishment.'"

10. Stranger. "What kind of person is she?"

Old Man. "Do you see a little behind the other women a small door-way and a narrow dark spot, where some miserable, filthy, ragged looking women appear to be congregated?"

Stranger. "Yes, distinctly."

Old Man. "Of these, the one with the whip in her hand is called 'Punishment;' the one with her head sunk on her lap, is 'Grief;' and the one tearing her hair is 'Anguish.'"

Stranger. "And who is that ill-looking, lean, naked man standing near them, and at his side a miserable meagre woman that resembles him?"

Old Man. "His name is 'Lamentation,' and the woman, who is his sister, is called 'Despair.' The man is handed over to these, and lives with them in a state of torment. He is next hurried off to the abode of 'Wretchedness,' there he lingers out the remainder of his life in all kinds of misery, unless 'Repentance' should kindly put herself in his way."

11. Stranger. "What would be the result if 'Repentance' should meet him?"

Old Man. "She rescues him from his miseries, and places at his side another 'Opinion' and another 'Desire.' The one leading him to 'True Science,' and the other, at the same time, inviting him to 'False Science.'"

Stranger. "Then what takes place?"

Old Man. "If he should attach himself to this 'Opinion,' she will bring him to 'True Science,' having been purified by her, he is saved, and becomes happy and prosperous in life. But if he reject her, he is again involved in all the mazes of 'False Sentiments.'"

12. Stranger. "Alas! what a great risk has to be run the second time! But this 'False Science,' what of her?"

Old Man. "Do you see that second circle?"

Stranger. "Very distinctly."

Old Man. "And on the outside of it, near its entrance, a woman is standing, who appears to be very neat and elegant?"

Stranger. "Yes."

Old Man. "The thoughtless and unreflecting mass of men call her Science. But she is False Science. Now, even those who are preserved, when they would go on to 'True Science,' call here first."

Stranger. "Why, is there no other road by which they could reach the True?"

Old Man. "There is."

13. Stranger. "Who are those men that are walking about within the circle?"

Old Man. "The lovers of 'False Science,' who, being deceived, fancy they are associating with the True."

Stranger. "What are they called?"

Old Man. "Poets, Rhetoricians, Dialecticians, Arithmeticians, Geometricians, Astrologers, Voluptuaries, Peripatetics, Critics, and such like."

14. Stranger. "Who are these women that seem to be running about, they resemble those in the first circle, among whom you said were 'Intemperance' and her associates?"

Old Man. "They are the same."

Stranger. "What! are they admitted here also?"

Old Man. "Yes, indeed, even here, but rarely, not as they are into the first circle."

Stranger. "And are the 'Opinions' also admitted?"

Old Man. "Yes, for the draught which 'Deceit' administered still remains in them, so also do 'Ignorance' and her associate 'Folly.' Indeed, neither the 'Opinion' nor her train of evils can be got rid of, until men, renouncing 'False Science,' get into the true path, and drink that potent medicine which will purge away the noxious train. When they have cleared away and expelled their previous ills,—Opinions, Ignorance, and all the rest,—then they will be safe. But if they remain with 'False Science,' not a single evil will be got rid of, for all their learning."

15. Stranger. "What is this path which leads to 'True Science.'"

Old Man. "Do you see up there, that place, which is quite vacant—it looks like a wilderness?"

Stranger. "Yes."

Old Man. "And do you also see a little wicket, and in front of it a path, not much frequented, for very few walk there, as it looks to be steep, rough and stony."

Stranger. "Very clearly."

Old Man. "And what seems to be a lofty eminence, the ascent to which is very narrow, and surrounded on all sides with deep precipices?"

Stranger. "Yes."

Old Man. "Then that is the way to 'True Science.'"

Stranger. "It is fearful even to look at!"

Old Man. "Again, do you see high up on the eminence a large, lofty rock, rough and steep all round?"

Stranger. "I see it."

16. Old Man. "Do you see two women standing upon the rock, graceful and elegant in person, and earnestly stretching forth their hands?"

Stranger. "I see them. What are their names?"

Old Man. "One is called 'Firmness' and the other 'Perseverance.' They are sisters."

Stranger. "Why do they stretch forth their hands so earnestly?"

Old Man. "To encourage those who have arrived at the place to keep up their spirit and not be dismayed, telling them that they have only to persevere a little while longer, and they will soon come to a pleasant path."

Stranger. "And after they have come to the rock, how do they ascend, for I see no way that leads up to it?"

Old Man. "The women come down and draw them up, and tell them to rest awhile. After a little they impart to them 'Vigour' and 'Confidence,' and promise to bring them to 'True Science.' They then show them the road, how beautiful and level and easy it is, and free from every thing that would injure them, as you perceive."

Stranger. "Yes; it is perfectly evident."

17. Old Man. "Do you see, just before that grove, a place which looks very beautiful, meadow-like, and radiant with a flow of light?"

Stranger. "Distinctly."

Old Man. "And do you observe in the middle of the meadow another circle and another gateway?"

Stranger. "Yes. What is the name of this place?"

Old Man. "The home of the 'Blessed.' There dwell 'Happiness' and all the 'Virtues.'"

Stranger. "Proceed. What a lovely spot it is!"

18. Old Man. "Do you see near the portal a very handsome lady, of a grave and dignified appearance, she is already past the meridian of life, dressed in a plain but elegant robe? She is not standing on a round stone, but on a square one, firmly fixed in the ground. At her side are two other ladies, who appear to be her daughters."

Stranger. "They are all very distinct."

Old Man. "The one in the middle is 'Science,' the others are 'Truth' and 'Persuasion.'"

Stranger. "Why does she stand upon a square stone?"

Old Man. "As a sign to those that are approaching of the safety and firmness of the road, and an emblem of the stability of the gifts which are conferred there."

Stranger. "What does she bestow?"

Old Man. "'Confidence,' and 'Fearlessness.'"

Stranger. "Whence do they arise?"

Old Man. "From the assurance of not having to endure any great evil in life."

19. Stranger. "Oh, what lovely gifts! But why does she stand on the outside of the circle?"

Old Man. "That she may kindly receive those that come, and administer to them her purifying medicine. Afterwards, as soon as they are thoroughly cleansed, she introduces them to the virtues within."

Stranger. "How so. I do not exactly comprehend you."

Old Man. "You will easily do so; for instance, if a man happened to be seriously indisposed, and calling in a physician, he would remove the cause of the disease by cathartics, so that he might restore him to convalescence and health; but if he refuse to conform to the course prescribed, then the physician very justly giving him up, he is carried off by the disease."

Stranger. "I understand that."

Old Man. "In like manner, when any one comes to 'Science,' she receives him very kindly, and administers her medicine, for the purpose of purging away and carrying off all the noxious qualities which adhered to him at his arrival."

Stranger. "Pray, what are these?"

Old Man. "The 'Ignorance' and 'Error,' which he imbibed from 'Deceit;' also 'Arrogance,' 'Lust,' 'Intemperance,' 'Anger,' 'Avarice,' &c., with which he was filled in the first circle."

20. Stranger. "When purified, where does she send him?"

Old Man. "Within, to 'Knowledge' and the other 'Virtues.'"

Stranger. "What virtues?"

Old Man. "Do you not see within the entrance a company of women, who seem to be handsome and elegant in appearance; they are also dressed with plainness and simplicity, and are totally free from that affectation and vanity which characterized the other women we saw?"

Stranger. "I see them. What are their names?"

Old Man. "The first is called 'Knowledge,' and the others—who are her sisters—are named 'Fortitude,' 'Justice,' 'Integrity,' 'Temperance,' 'Decency,' 'Liberty,' 'Self-control,' and 'Meekness.'"

Stranger. "Oh, most lovely society! How I hope and desire to join you!"

Old Man. "If you understand and habitually practise what you hear, you may."

Stranger. "We will assuredly do all in our power."

Old Man. "Then you will be kept safe."

21. Stranger. "When these women get him, where do they take him to?"

Old Man. "To their mother."

Stranger. "Who is she?"

Old Man. "Happiness."

Stranger. "Tell us about her."

Old Man. "Do you see the path which leads to that high hill—the acropolis of all the circles?"

Stranger. "I see it."

Old Man. Again, do you observe a certain dignified and graceful lady at the main entrance, seated on an elevated throne, richly but not gaudily dressed; with her head encircled by a chaplet of fresh, rare and beautiful flowers?

Stranger. "Very distinctly."

Old Man. "That is 'Happiness.'"

22. Stranger. "When the individual has come to her, what does she do?"

Old Man. "She, with the assistance of all the virtues, crowns him as if he had been victorious in some hard-fought contests."

Stranger. "What foes has he subdued?"

Old Man. "The fiercest, even those terrible monsters which ere while sought to destroy and torture and enslave him; yea, he has gained such a mastery over himself, that these are now his slaves, as he once was theirs."

23. Stranger. "What are these monsters you talk of? I am anxious to know."

Old Man. "First, there are 'Ignorance' and 'Error;' do you not consider them to be monsters?"

Stranger. "Yes, and pernicious ones too."

Old Man. Then there are 'Sorrow' and 'Anguish;' 'Arrogance,' 'Avarice' 'Intemperance,' and every other vice. He is now their master, and not they his, as formerly."

Stranger. "O glorious struggle and most glorious victory! But still you have to tell me, what is the influence of that wealth wherewith you said he was crowned?"

Old Man. "A very happy one, my young friend. He that is crowned with that influence, becomes blessed and happy. His hopes of felicity are all in himself and not in others."

24. Stranger. "What a splendid victory is this of which you speak! After his coronation, what does he do, or where does he walk?"

Old Man. "The virtues taking him under their guidance, bring him to the place from which he first came. They show him how those who remain there drag out a vicious and miserable existence—how, shipwrecked in life's ocean, they roam about or are led off thoroughly overpowered as if by enemies, some by 'Intemperance,' some by 'Pride,' some by 'Avarice,' others by 'vain-glory,' and others by other vices—how powerless they are to shake off the fetters with which these have bound them, so that they might be saved and come to this place; but on the contrary how their whole life is trouble and vexation. They explain to him how these sufferings have originated in their inability to find the path to 'True Science,' because they had forgotten the directions given by the 'Guardian Genius?'"

25. Stranger. "Your reply appears to be very good. But I am unable to see why the 'virtues' should direct his attention to the place which he had before left."

Old Man. "Because he never had a thorough knowledge or accurate perception of what is done there. He had been in a state of doubt and darkness, supposing good to be evil, and evil good, the result of the Ignorance and Error which he had imbibed. He therefore had been leading as wretched a life as the other inhabitants of the place; but now having acquired the knowledge of what is fit and proper, he is enabled to live happily himself and to perceive, the evil course which they pursue."

26. Stranger. "After he has seen all this, what still does he do, or where does he go?"

Old Man. "Wherever he pleases; for he is as safe everywhere, as one would be in the Corycian grotto; and wherever he goes, his life is in all things one of unchanging felicity, for every body is as glad to receive him, as the sick are a physician."

Stranger. "Is he entirely free also from all apprehension of injury from those females whom you called monsters?"

Old Man. "Entirely. He will never more be harassed by 'Pain,' or 'Sorrow,' or 'Intemperance,' or 'Avarice,' or 'Poverty,' or any other evil; for he is now completely master over and superior to all that formerly troubled and vexed him. Like men who are bitten by vipers, and because they possess an antidote, sustain no injury from these reptiles, which inflict even deadly wounds upon others; so because he carries an antidote against them, none of the above evils can trouble him."

27. Stranger. "Very well explained. Now tell me, who are those that appear to be coming down from the eminence; some of them having crowns on their heads give every indication of great gladness; and others, without any, looking sorrowful and sad, with their limbs and heads wounded and bruised, are beset by some women?"

Old Man. "The crowned ones are those who have been saved by 'Science,' and are rejoiced at having met her. The others without any crowns, are either those who having been rejected by 'Science,' are returning, wretched and miserable; or those who having lost all courage, and though they had gone as far as 'Perseverance,' yet turned back, and are now wandering about they know not where."

Stranger. "Who are these women that follow them?"

Old Man. "'Sorrow' and 'Anguish,' 'Despair,' 'Ignorance' and 'Infamy.'"

28. Stranger. "You tell me that every evil follows them?"

Old Man. "Yes, indeed, and that right closely too. But when these men get the length of 'Voluptuousness' and 'Intemperance,' they attach no blame to themselves, but forthwith commence upbraiding 'Science' and her disciples, saying how wretched, miserable and unhappy they are, because they forsake their course of life, and lead one of hardships, totally destitute of the good things they enjoy."

Stranger. "What do they call good things?"

Old Man. "'Debauchery' and 'Intemperance,'—to group them under two leading terms; for they consider the indulgence and gratification of the appetite and passions to be the chief good—summa bona."

29. Stranger. "What do you call those two gay and laughing ladies, who are coming thence?"

Old Man. "'Sentiments.' Having brought to Science those that have been admitted to the virtues, they are returning to escort others, and to tell them how happy those whom they just now introduced have already become."

Stranger. "Are the 'Sentiments' themselves never admitted to the virtues?"

Old Man. "No. Mere opinion is never permitted to arrive at perfect Knowledge. It is her business to hand these people over to Science; and when Science has received them, then the Sentiments return to bring up others; thus they resemble ships, which after their cargo has been discharged, sail back, and are laden with some other commodities."

30. Stranger. "Your explanation appears to be a beautiful one. There is still one thing, however, which you have not made clear, viz: what the directions are which the Guardian Genius gives to those who enter life."

Old Man. He tells them to be brave and hopeful. Be you the same, for I will explain all to you without any concealment."

Stranger. "You are very kind."

Old Man. "Do you see that blind looking woman, standing upon the round stone, who I told you before was named 'Fortune?'"

Stranger. "Yes."

31. Old Man. "He tells them to place no confidence in her, not to believe that any one can receive from her a permanent gift, or one that he is to consider as permanent, or to look upon as his own; for there is nothing to hinder her from taking it away, and giving it to others, as she is often in the habit of doing. For this reason he bids them to be perfectly unmoved as it regards her gifts, neither to rejoice when she gives, nor repine when she takes away; neither to slight or to over-value her: because she never acts from judgment or reflection, but by random and by chance as I told you before. On this account the 'Genius' tells them not to be astonished at any thing she may happen to do, and not to resemble those dishonest bankers, who when they receive money on deposit from the people, are filled with joy, and look upon it as their own. They become indignant when the money is re-demanded, and think themselves very badly treated, never reflecting that they received the deposit on condition of paying it back when demanded by the person who had made it. The 'Genius' tells them to regard 'Fortune's gifts in the same light, and remember it is her very nature to take back what she once gave, then immediately to bestow larger and richer gifts, and finally to sweep off all—not only these, but all previous ones. Hence, he bids them to take what she may give, and with them in their possession to betake themselves speedily to the firm and solid gift."

Stranger. "What is that gift?"

Old Man. "The one which they shall receive from 'Science,' if they can reach her in safety."

Stranger. "What is it?"

Old Man. "The true knowledge of every thing fit and proper, which is a safe, sure, and unchangeable gift. To this, he tells them to fly quickly. And when they come to those women, who I told you before were called 'Intemperance' and 'Voluptuousness,' he bids them hurry past them, and place no confidence in them, but to proceed until they come to 'False Science,' and to tarry awhile with her, and get from her what they may want to assist them on their journey, and then to go on by the shortest route to 'True Science.' Such are the directions which the 'Guardian Genius' gives. And whatever unfortunate creature transgresses or disobeys them, perishes miserably. (33.) Such is the interpretation of the myth contained in this painting. If you wish to enquire more particularly about any portion of it, do not hesitate to do so, for I will gladly explain it to you."

Stranger. "You are very kind. Pray, what does the 'Genius' tell to them get from 'False Science'?"

Old Man. "Any thing that may be useful."

Stranger. "What has she that would be useful?"

Old Man. "The Rudiments of learning, and as much of other branches of knowledge as may serve—to use the language of Plato—as a bridle for youth, to keep them from being drawn off to other matters."

Stranger. "Is it necessary for all who would reach 'True Science' to acquire these?"

Old Man. "Not absolutely necessary, by any means, but highly advantageous. For these things do not contribute anything to their becoming better men."

Stranger. "Do you say they contribute nothing towards making them better men?"

Old Man. "Not a whit. They can become better without them, still they are not useless. Thus, for example, although we can, by means of an interpreter, understand any thing that is said, yet it would be better, if when a conference should take place we ourselves had a tolerably accurate knowledge of the language used. So there is nothing to prevent a man from becoming better without the aid of these branches of learning."

34. Stranger. "Do those learned men, therefore, possess no advantage over others in the way of moral improvement?"

Old Man. "How can they, when it is evident that they are as much deceived as others about 'Good' and 'Evil,' and are still the slaves of all manner of vice? Indeed the knowledge of language, and the mastery of all Science and Philosophy cannot prevent a man from being a 'Drunkard,' and a 'Debauchee,' or keep him from avarice, injustice, treachery, or any act of a disordered mind."

Stranger. "'Tis true, we see many such cases."

Old Man. "What superior advantages therefore has education been to them, in the way of making them better men?"

35. Stranger. "Evidently none, on your premises. But why do they spend any time in the second circle, just as they are drawing near to 'True Science'?"

Old Man. "And what good does their delay do them? when we can frequently see people who pass these learned men and proceed at once from 'Intemperance' and the other vice we mentioned, in the first circle to the third circle to 'True Science.' Have they, then, any superior advantages? Nay, they become either more obstinate or more unteachable."

Stranger. "Pray, How?"

Old Man. "Because if nothing else, these second circle men pretend to know that of which they are profoundly ignorant. Now as long as this is the case, they must necessarily be incapable of being roused to the pursuit of True Science. Then, there is another thing, do you not see that the 'Opinions' of the first circle accompany them as well as the others? Thus they are in no respect better than they, unless 'Repentance' should come to them and convince them that they are not with 'True,' but 'False Science,' by whom they have been deceived; and that living in this manner, they never can be safe. And it behooves you, strangers, to dwell upon and practice what you have been told until these lessons become familiar and habitual to you; to this end you must frequently and unceasingly think upon them, considering all else as of secondary importance: but if you do not act thus, all you have now heard will be utterly worthless."

36. Stranger. "We will do so. But explain to us how it is that the things which men receive from Fortune are not blessings; such for instance as life, health, riches, fame, children, success, and the like? or on the contrary, how their opposites are not evils? For your language does appear to us to be paradoxical and improbable."

Old Man. "Well then, will you try to give me your opinion on the questions which I am about to ask?"

Stranger. "Certainly I will."

Old Man. "If a man is leading a life of wretchedness and misery, is existence a blessing to him?"

Stranger. "I think not, but rather a curse."

Old Man. "How then can life be a blessing in the abstract, if in this case it is a curse?"

Stranger. "It is a curse to those who live badly; but a blessing to those who live well."

Old Man. "Do you tell me, then, that life is both a blessing and a curse?"

Stranger. "I do."

37. Old Man. "Do not make such incredible statements; for it is impossible that the same thing can be both bad and good. Thus, a thing might be both profitable and injurious, right to be chosen and proper to be shunned at the same time."

Stranger. "That is impossible. Yet, if a life of misery is an evil thing to him who leads it, how is it that existence is not a curse?"

Old Man. "Is it not obvious that to live and to live miserably are not synonymous?"

Stranger. "Yes, that is evident."

Old Man. "A life of misery therefore is an evil, but life itself is not. Because if it were, then evil has befallen those who live well and happily, inasmuch as life, which according to your statement, is an evil, belongs to them."

Stranger. "Your argument seems to be a very good one."

38. Old Man. "As therefore existence is the portion both of those who live well and of those who live badly, it cannot be said to be either a blessing or a curse; for as the application of the knife or the cautery to the diseased is neither healthy nor unhealthy, so is it regarding life."

Stranger. "I grant that."

Old Man. "Then think; whether would you rather live wretchedly or die honorably and bravely?"

Stranger. "Die honorably by all means."

Old Man. "Therefore neither is death an evil, since it is often preferred to life."

Stranger. "I grant that."

Old Man. "The same mode of reasoning holds good regarding sickness and health; for it is frequently better not to be well, but the opposite, according to circumstances."

Stranger. "Your reasoning is good."

39. Old Man. "Let us go on now and examine the subject of wealth. It is easy to see—for the instances are numerous—a man in the possession of riches, living in misery and affliction."

Stranger. "Yes, truly many a one."

Old Man. "Then wealth contributes nothing to a good and happy life?"

Stranger. "So it appears; for these men are worthless."

Old Man. "It is not money, therefore, that makes a man good, but Learning or Science."

Stranger. "Yes, according to your reasoning."

Old Man. "Wherein does the good of wealth consist, if it does not assist its possessor to become a better man?"

Stranger. "I don't know."

Old Man. "So then it would better for some men not to be rich, since they do not know how to use their wealth."

Stranger. "That is my opinion."

Old Man. "How therefore can any one come to the conclusion that the very thing which it is frequently better not to possess, is a blessing?"

Stranger. "They are wrong altogether."

Old Man. "If therefore a man has knowledge enough to enable him to make a proper and prudent use of money, he can live well; but without this, he will live badly."

Stranger. "Your whole reasoning seems to be very true."

40. Old Man. "In short, the honoring of these things as blessings, or the despising and degrading of them as evils, is the cause of trouble and injury to men; when they are honored, and thought to be happy solely on their account, they, as a matter of course, do anything, even the most unrighteous act, for the sake of obtaining them. All this results from their ignorance of what is good, for they do not know that good never proceeds from evil: but it is easy to see many men who have acquired their wealth by vicious and disgraceful acts, such as treachery, robbery, murder, slander, fraud, and other many and horrible deeds."

Stranger. "This is very obvious."

41. Old Man. "If, therefore, good never can proceed from evil, as is true; and if wealth does proceed from crime; then it follows as a necessary consequence that wealth is not a blessing."

Stranger. "The conclusion is inevitable from your premises."

Old Man. "But neither wisdom nor justice can be obtained from wicked works; nor on the other hand, do folly and injustice spring from good works; nor can they subsist at the same time in the same individual. But as to wealth, and fame, and success, and the rest, there is nothing to prevent them from being joined in all kinds of vice in any one. So, therefore, these things are neither blessings nor evils; but wisdom is the only good, and folly the only evil."

Stranger. "That is sufficient. Your explanation has been full and satisfactory."

EPIGRAM.

What better reason can you guess
Why men are poor, and ladies thinner—
But thousands now for dinner dress,
Till nothing's left to dress for dinner.

THE INSTINCT OF IMMORTALITY.

In the quickening dawn of youth,
I wept my destined lot,
And murmured oft in tones of rash—
To die, and be forgot!

To perish like the things of earth,
Pass like the zephyr's sigh,
Yet feel within, the thrilling birth,
Of thoughts that cannot die.

The patriot's deed our life blood starts,
The poet's cherished name,
Enshrined within ten thousand hearts—
That were the bliss of fame.

Such yearning is to few unknown,
This instinct of our kind,
To link in common with our own,
The universal mind.

It only soars to reason's height,
When fixed beyond the tomb;
Where, bathed in streams of fadeless light,
The heart's affections bloom.

There only is immortal fame,
In blest communion found,
And there the new, the wondrous name,
Lives the eternal round.

L.

ROME: PAPAL AND REPUBLICAN.

Republicans, not less than monarchists, perceive and recognize a distinction between Revolution and Rebellion; and Americans estimate as fully as Europeans can do, the blessings of social order, and are quite as conversant with the real grounds of difference between the blind fury of a mob, and the righteous revolt of an oppressed people. In order therefore to determine what should be the conduct and sentiments of Americans, with respect to the present conflict between Rome Papal, and Rome Republican, it must first be decided whether Pius IX. has been expelled from his seat of government by the machinations of treason, or by the impulses of patriotism.

But before this question can be determined, it is obviously necessary to know by what tenure the Pope held his temporal sceptre, from whom he derived his power, and to whom he was responsible for its exercise.

In entering upon this inquiry, we shall avoid as much as possible all theological discussion, and shall confine our remarks within what may be called lay limits; believing as we do that all appeals to prejudices, whether personal or religious, tend to obscure truth and aid error.

The first inquiry that presents itself is this: What was the nature of the papal sway at Rome, and when and how did it originate?

This question fortunately is easily answered—History—papal and protestant—pours a flood of light upon it; and Machiavelli, and Sismondi, Ranke, and Du Pin, are harmonious in the statement of the most important historical facts.

It is conceded on all hands that originally the Bishop of Rome presided simply as a churchman over his diocese. Catholics themselves admit that his temporal power was an acquisition of subsequent times.

Machiavelli, in his Florentine Histories, gives the clearest and most authentic account of the temporal power of the Pope.

"About the year 578," he says, "the Pontiffs of Rome began to assume a greater degree of authority than ever before. The first successors of St. Peter had been venerated for the sanctity of their lives and the miracles they wrought; and their examples gave such credit to the Christian religion, that many princes were forced to acknowledge it to put an end to the distractions that reigned throughout the world. The Emperor of Rome having embraced the Christian faith, and established his throne at Constantinople, the Roman empire hastened to its fall, while the Church of Rome rapidly extended her dominion. But as all Italy till the invasion of the Lombards was subject to the dominion either of the Emperors or Kings, the Pontiffs assumed no other authority, than reverence for their virtue and learning won for them. In civil affairs they were still subject to those princes, who made them their ministers, and sometimes put them to death for mal-administration. The resolution of Theoderic, king of the Goths, to remove the seat of his government to Ravenna, augmented their influence in the affairs of Italy; for as Rome was thereby left destitute of a prince, the Romans were obliged for their own safety to yield obedience to the Pope."—(1 vol. Florentine Histories, p. 32.)

Sismondi, in his History of the Italian Republics, p. 17, gives substantially the same account of the origin of the papal sway. "Rome," he says, "had never made part of the monarchy of the Lombards. This ancient capital of the world, with the territory appertaining to it, had since the conquest of Alboin, formed a Dukedom, governed by a Patrician or Greek Duke, sent from Constantinople. The Bishop of Rome however had much more authority over his flock than this foreign magistrate, and when in the year 717, an Iconoclast, or breaker of images, filled the throne of Constantinople, the popes under the pretence of Heresy rejected his authority altogether."

Such was the origin of the Pope's authority in the City of Rome : not derived from any legitimate source, but taking its rise in usurpation. Let us now trace it to its full extent, and show in what manner his other acquisitions of temporal power were obtained.

The next temporality which fell into the hands of the Pope, was the Exarchate of Ravenna, and the territories appertaining to it. Machiavelli gives the following account of this transaction.

“Gregory III. being advanced to the papacy, and Adolphus to the throne of the Lombards, the latter in violation of the clearest stipulations, seized upon Ravenna, and made war upon the Pope. Gregory seeing the Emperor of Constantinople so reduced, by the above-mentioned losses, looked for no assistance from that quarter; and resolving no longer to trust the Lombards, who had so often broken faith with him, he had recourse to Pepin II., king of France. Pepin readily promised him assistance, but expressed a desire of first seeing him to pay his duty to him in person. Gregory set out for France, and passed through the quarters of his enemies, the Lombards, without any molestation,—such was the veneration men felt for religion in those times. Gregory arrived in France, was honored by that Prince, and sent back to Italy with his troops, who besieged the Lombard at Pavia. Astolphus was obliged to accept the terms granted him by the French. But Pepin’s army had no sooner returned to France than he refused to perform his engagement. The Pope made a second application to Pepin, who sent another army into Italy, overcame the Lombards, took Ravenna, and in opposition to the will of the Greek emperor, gave it to the Pope, with all the territories appertaining to the Exarchate, and the country of Urbino and Marca. No more exarchs were sent from Constantinople to Ravenna, which was afterwards governed by the will of the Pope.”—(Flo. Hist., p. 34.)

Thus, we perceive that the second territorial acquisition of His Holiness, like the first, was based upon usurpation—only with this difference, that this title was strengthened by two additional links—Conquest of the people themselves, and Donation from a barbarian king, who had no right to bestow.

Charlemagne, the son of Pepin—“the greatest man that Barbarism ever produced,”—says Sismondi,—confirmed these grants and added others to the dominion of the Pope; but by far the largest portion of the papal territory was conferred upon the Church, by the last will and testament of the Countess Matilda.

Machiavelli is very brief in his account of this affair. Being a staunch Catholic, he may have thought that the less he said about it the better.

At page 42, in his Flo. Hist., he observes :—

“After the death of Urban, Pascal II. was made Pontiff, and Henry IV. succeeded to the Empire. He went to Rome and feigning friendship for the Pope, sent him and all his clergy to prison; nor would he set him at liberty, till he had conceded to him the right of disposing of all the churches of Germany as he pleased. About this time, the Countess Matilda died, and left all her possessions to the church.”

And this is the meagre account he has left us of this most important affair. It is therefore necessary to resort elsewhere to ascertain what these territories were—who the Countess was—and what right she had to dispose of, by will, a territory embracing seventeen thousand square miles and two millions of inhabitants.

In Lardner’s “Outlines of History,” (page 236,) he informs us of what these states consisted.

“The Countess Matilda, the great friend of Gregory VII., had left the reversion of her large possessions to the holy See. These were the imperial fiefs of Tuscany, Mantua, and Modena, of which she had certainly no right to dispose.”

The Countess was the wife of Godfrey and the daughter of Beatrice, who was the sister of the Emperor Henry II. She held what is now called the Patrimony of the Church of her uncle, Henry, as imperial fiefs, and yet at her death was induced by Hildebrand (Pope Gregory VII.,) the most ambitious, arbitrary and powerful of all the Roman Pontiffs, to bequeath to the Church what never belonged to her; but which afforded a pretext for their usurpation. This was all he desired. How well he devised his schemes the history of papal rule for eight hundred and seventy-five years affords the best commentary.

Since the time of Gregory VII., (1073,) the Papacy had made but one or two insignificant acquisitions of territory—if we except the exorbitant and ridiculous claim of Alexander VI., who, it will be remembered, portioned off the wide domain lying between the North and the South poles, and West of the Azores, between Spain and Portugal. As his Holiness, however, never took absolute possession, or received livery of seisin, of any of his Western dominions, it is hardly worth while to enumerate them as coming under his sceptre.

The Romagna, which towards the end of the fifteenth century was overrun by Cæsar Borgia, and erected into a principality, after his flight and ruin, was seized upon by Pope Julius, who, it will be remembered, sword in hand, was the first to mount the breastworks of Mirandola.

Paul III. seized on Perugia; and Citta di Castello was conquered by Julius III. in 1550. Clement VIII. usurped the Duchy of Ferrara in 1595. And the Duchy of Urbino was seized in the sevanteenth century—which was the last territorial acquisition in the long series of papal usurpations.

Thus we have before us, the whole Patrimony of St. Peter: not one foot of which the Pope can claim by any legitimate title. As a temporal prince, the Roman Pontiff has always been the most despotic in Europe; for as he held his whole domain by acts of usurpation, fraud, and bloodshed, his subjects have embraced every opportunity to revolt from his government, and he has been compelled to practice all the black arts of despotism to maintain his sway.

A writer in the London Quarterly Review for January, 1848, speaking of the papal government, uses the following language: "It should be borne in mind that the Roman government has hitherto been equally despotic in form and principle; that no provincial or municipal assemblies existed to form the nucleus of a great council. No national spirit or character pervades the heterogeneous realm—made up of possessions, to hardly one of which, anything like a decent title can be shown. The donation of Constantine to St. Sylvester, though ridiculed by satirists, and dropped by the papal jurists, is the only charter that can be adduced for the possession of Rome itself, and the Patrimony of St. Peter. The Agro Romano, and the Commarca, may be said to come within the same category. The remoter provinces of the church, though claimed in right of donations and bequests, were all in fact acquired by conquest and usurpation, by the spoliation of princes, and governors, and in direct defiance of the known wishes of the people;—for no government was less popular in the middle ages than that of the church—none was exposed to more frequent rebellions, and in these repeated struggles, all popular rights were trampled on by the victors."

It need hardly be said that the London Quarterly Review is the most rabid journal in Europe in its defence of royalty, and the staunchest advocate of hereditary rights, and the corruptions springing from the Feudal System in the old world. A system of arbitrary government, then, which finds not a champion, but an assailant, in the London Quarterly Review, must indeed be rotten.

But it may be argued with some plausibility, that Pope Pius IX., is not responsible for the illegal and disgraceful acts of his predecessors—that when he was clothed in the snowy robes and crowned with the dazzling tiara,—when he was swept along the broad aisles and beneath the lofty dome of St. Peter's to the State Hall of the Vatican, that he was then constitutionally inducted into the office of arbitrary sovereign of the Roman people, and was thenceforth impera-tor, consensu, urbis et orbis, of the modern Babylon, and the Patrimony of the Church.

Now in order to test the validity of this argument, it is necessary to inquire into the form and mode of his election. For surely no one in these times, with his eyes open and his reason sound, will question this great political truth, that a government in order to be rightly founded, must be based either on the silent consent, or the expressed will of the people over whose destinies it presides. The most abject Don Cossack in the Czar's dominions would laugh in the face of the Emperor himself, were Nicholas to affirm that he ruled by divine right. The world has outgrown its swaddling-clothes, and has not yet been forced into its straight-jacket. The Roman Pontiff can exercise no prerogatives of government over the states of the Church, consonantly with right and justice, unless the people of those states, by silent acquiescence or by public approval, express their willingness to be subject to his sway.

We have seen by what gradual and stealthy progress, the tiara was extended over the territories of the Italian people; let us now trace the course of that same tiara over their rights and liberties.

From the period that Rome was deserted by her Emperors, and the seat of Empire changed to Byzantium, (which took place in the year 330, under the reign of Constantine,) down to the year 800, she was successively conquered by barbarians from almost every quarter of the world. For nearly five hundred years she was plundered and ravaged by hordes of the Heruli, Ostrogoths and Lombards; and during the same period she never once exercised the right of choosing her own ruler. It seemed as if "Fate would rigidly her dues regain," by allowing every people and tribe on whose neck her yoke had been once securely rivetted, now to oppress her with the same bondage.

In the eighth century, however, as we have already seen, a happy combination of circumstances enabled the pope, who had become a temporal prince, to assume something like independence, both of the barbarian and eastern emperors.

Shortly afterwards Rome advanced one step further towards nationality, and in the year 800 again rose triumphant from her long servitude, and exercised the right of choosing her own sovereign. Sismondi in his history of the Italian Republics, (page 11) thus describes her resurrection.

"For more than twenty years the Popes or Bishops of Rome had been in the habit of opposing the kings of France to the monarchs of Lombardy who were odious to them, first as pagans and afterwards as heretics. Chief of the clergy of the ancient capital, where the power of the Emperors of Constantinople had been nominally established but never felt, they confounded their pretensions with those of the Empire, and the Lombards having recently conquered the exarchate of Ravenna and the Pentapolis, they demanded that these provinces should be restored to Rome. The Frank kings made themselves the champions of this quarrel, which gave them an opportunity of conquering the Lombard monarchy. But Charles, the king who accomplished this conquest, and who was the greatest man that Barbarism ever produced in treating with Rome, in subjugating Italy, comprehended all the beauty of a civilization which his predecessors had seen only to destroy. He conceived the lofty idea of profiting by the Barbarian force at his disposal, to put himself at the head of the civilization which he labored to restore. In concert with Pope Leo III, he reestablished the monarchy of the conquered as a Western Roman Empire. He received from the same pope and from the same Roman people, on Christmas day in the year 800, the title of Roman Emperor and the name of Charlemagne, or Charles the great, which no one before him had so well deserved." * * * "From that period Rome became once more the capital of the Empire. At Rome the chiefs of the Empire were henceforth to receive the golden crown from the hands of the Pope, after having received the silver one of the kingdom of Germany at Aix-la-Chapalle, and the iron crown of Lombardy at Milan."

Such was Rome at the commencement of the ninth century, restored to her imperial rank, victorious over all her enemies, and most of all triumphant in having redeemed from barbarism and elevated to a throne so brave a warrior and so wise a man as the Emperor Charlemagne.

According to Lardner (page 187) when the Pope first became a temporal prince, his election was entirely republican. He says:

"The Pope exercised at Rome the power possessed by the Dukes in the other cities. He was chosen by the clergy and the people, and the choice confirmed by the Emperor."

The first step towards absolute despotism which the Roman Pontiff could take was evidently to throw off the right of confirmation which was still vested in the Emperor even after the separation of the Eastern and Western Empires. Accordingly we find that Hildebrand, whilst he was Archdeacon of Rome, effected a slight change in the election of the Pope. Originally the entire clergy were allowed to vote.

"In the pontificate of Nicholas II.," says Lardner, "it was established in a synod that the Popes were to be chosen by the Cardinal Bishops, those whose sees were near Rome, and approved of by the Cardinal priests and deacons (ministers of the parish churches at Rome) and the people, and then presented for confirmation to the Emperor. Hildebrand, archdeacon of Rome, was the author of this plan, the object of which was gradually to free the papacy from imperial control. On the death of Nicholas he had Alexander II. chosen and consecrated without waiting for the imperial sanction, and on the death of Alexander, he was himself raised to the Pontificate, under the title of Gregory VII."

How this ambitious and arbitrary Pontiff exercised his power the world has not yet forgotten—for it still feels and suffers from its effects.

In the language of Sismondi—"In the universe he saw but God, the priest, his sole minister, and mankind obedient. Finally concentrating all the power of the church in the Pope, he taught the priests to consider him as an unerring being, who became holy by his election—who could alone name and depose bishops—assemble, preside over, and dissolve councils. He was, he said, in short, a God upon earth—absolute master of all princes who were bound to kiss his feet, and whom he could depose at will, by releasing their subjects from their oaths of fidelity. Hildebrand accomplished, at least for a time, the immense revolution he had undertaken. He compelled Henry V. to do penance before him in the open court of Canosa, whilst the ground was covered with snow; he obliged him to remain three days and three nights in the habit of a penitent, barefooted and fasting before he would grant him absolution."

Having in this manner freed the papacy from the confirmation of the Emperors the next step of the Pontiff was gradually to deprive the people themselves of all power in the election. Before doing this, however, it was thought advisable first to deprive them of the right of choosing their Emperors: a right which had been exercised ever since the time of Charlemagne.

We are told by Machiavelli (page 37) that "under the Emperor Otho III. Pope Gregory V. was driven out by the Romans, but Otho entered Italy (just as Francis Joseph is now doing) and reinstated him in Rome; and the Pope to revenge himself upon the Romans took from them the power of nominating emperors and vested it in six princes of Germany—three bishops, of Munster, Treves and Cologne, and three mere temporal princes—of Brandenburg, the Palatine and Saxony. This happened in the year 1002."

There was but one step now wanting to enslave the Roman people as effectually as they had been, under the reigns of Nero or Heliogabalus.

This was to deprive them of the right of confirming the Popes, after they had been elected by the Roman clergy, and this was effected a few years afterwards. Machiavelli thus records it:

"While the Pontiffs were making all the West tremble with their censures they could not keep their own subjects from rebellion. Accordingly when Nicholas II. was raised to the Pontificate like Gregory V. who had taken from the Romans the power of choosing their Emperors, he deprived them of their right of confirming the Popes and confined their election to the Cardinals. Not content with this he entered into a treaty with the princes who governed Puglia and Calabria, and for reasons to be presently explained, obliged all the magistrates, sent by the Romans into places under their jurisdiction, to render obedience to the Pope, and some be deprived of their places."

We have now reached that point in the history of papal supremacy at Rome where we might with confidence lay down the pen, and with reason ask, why have not the Roman people the right to escape from a thralldom so debasing as that of papal rule? But there is still another depth in their abyss of degradation. The Pontiffs not satisfied with rendering them subservient to themselves have made them the slaves of the whole world.

Not the priesthood of Rome alone govern Rome, but Austria, France, Spain and Portugal have each the right to veto one nomination of the holy conclave, and by the mouths of their ambassadors to decide who shall sit astride the necks of Romans, oppress them with tyrannical laws and rob them by a burdensome taxation of the hard earned fruits of their labors.

It has been owing entirely to the misconduct of the Pontiffs, that these foreigners have more privileges in Rome than her own citizens.

"Thus it will appear," indignantly exclaims Machiavelli, "that all the wars foreigners afterwards made upon Italy were caused principally by the Roman Pontiffs. Most of the Barbarians that poured themselves into the peninsula came at their instigation: and what is still more lamentable, is practised in our own times—the Popes, first by their ecclesiastical censures, then by the union of temporal and spiritual power, and lastly by indulgences contrived to excite the veneration and terror of mankind: but by making an ill use of that terror and reverence they have entirely lost the one, and lie at the discretion of the world for the other."

It is not the design of this essay to pursue this subject any further. Indeed the notoriety of the late occurrences at Rome renders it unnecessary. The whole scope of our investigations was bounded by the single question, announced at the outset, whence did the Pope derive his power, and to whom was he responsible for its exercise? For upon this, at last, must rest the defence of the Roman people. That question has now been answered, and answered in such a manner that Roman Catholics themselves must admit the truth of the reply or deny the authority of their own historians.

There have been of late inflammatory appeals made to the religious prejudices of a portion of our population. They have been told that it was a part of their religious duty to succor, in as far as their means would permit, the cause of the Roman Pontiff and the necessities of the first bishops of their church. Many have even affirmed that it would be justifiable for them to embark in a crusade to restore the Pope to his dominions and reërect his throne upon an unwilling people; and upon the specious ground that temporal power is absolutely necessary to maintain his spiritual authority and independence.

Unfortunately the History of the Church does not bear them out in this assertion. On the contrary every good christian, Catholic or Protestant, must look back to the early ages as the period when christianity was most prosperous and pure. Peter held no sceptre, and his successors for seven hundred years after him wore no glittering tiara. Yet was the Roman church perfectly independent, and what is more, it rose in glory amid the ruins, and shone in splendor amid the gloom of the darkest ages of the world.

Let Pius IX. accede to the propositions of the Roman Republic; let him return to the city he desired to free from many of the oppressions of his predecessors, and acquiesce in, if he cannot lead and direct, the reforms imperatively demanded by the misrule of a thousand years; let him cast aside forever the empty sheen of earth's baubles and devote every energy of his nature to the purification and regeneration of the Catholic world,—and though no imperial purple wrap his form and no triple crown adorn his brows, though no subject millions look up to him as their prince and chief magistrate, and no hungry officials fawn upon and flatter him as the source of their misused power, still when he shall lie down in his last sleep, with the great and the good who have gone before him, in the opinions of millions who now distrust him, he will rest,

"Pure as the holiest in the long array,
Of hooded, mitred, or tiaræd clay."

W. H. R.

THE INCH CAPE BELL.

This bell was placed by some monks on a dangerous coast of Scotland. It was rung by the dashing of the waves.

I.

The black and sullen heavens looked low,
The ocean heaved in pain,
And stark between, swung to and fro
The strong ship of the Dane.

II.

"God bless the monks," the Captain cried,
Above the gathering roar,
"The bell will warn, or we might ride, Straight on the Inch-Cape shore."

III.

"God bless the monks," the seamen ten,
Cried out in voice of cheer,
"No Jonah here—we are true men—
What then have we to fear!

IV.

"The bell will warn, no Jonah here,"
A trembling greybeard cried,
"No Jonah here, why should we fear"—
A groan his lips belied—

V.

Thus spake the only passenger,
A man of giant mould,
A gaunt and grim old Hollander,
Embarked with hoards of gold.

VI.

"What aileth thee, thou poor old man?"
The youngest seaman said,
"Come, keep good cheer, for while I can,
I'll shield thine aged head.

VII.

"And helmsman, list the Inch-Cape bell,
For though I fear not fate,
Far in our native woody dell,
My orphan sisters wait.

VIII.

"The heavens are black, the sea is white,
And loud the billows roar,
The storm is raging at its height—
Is that the Inch-Cape shore?"

IX.

Thus cried the native of the dell,
And strained his practised eye,
"I hear no bell!"—"It rings in hell;"
The greybeard made reply.

X.

"I hear the bell, its awful knell
For aye shall curse mine ear,
Mingled with groans and dying moans,
Of sailors shipwrecked here."

XI.

"What meanest thou, O troubled soul,
I charge thee quickly tell;"
The words burst forth beyond control—
"I stole the Inch-Cape bell."

XII.

He dashed the old man by in scorn,
He seized the helm amain,
And quickly half-way round was borne,
The strong ship of the Dane.

XIII.

The clouds were rent, the sunshine fell,
Where, like skeleton entombed,
Was seen the frame where erst the bell,
Far o'er the waters boomed.

XIV.

The old man gasped, he vainly grasped
At every passer by,
They shrunk away in dire dismay,
Scared by his ghastly eye.

XV.

"My mother taught me how to pray,
But gold I loved too well,
Would I another prayer might say—
I stole the Inch-Cape bell."

XVI.

The billows wild, his hungry grave,
High o'er the vessel swell,
One burdened wave the spot will lave,
Where should have swung the bell.

XVII.

The storm is o'er, the crew is safe,
All but that wretched man,
He lies where waves the Inch-Cape chase—
O pity him who can!

Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers.*

The extent and bearing of the Jacobite feeling that pervaded Scotland during the last century, can be appreciated only with extreme difficulty on this side of the Atlantic. The very nature of our institutions renders to us absurd the notion of a whole people almost worshipping, in the intensity of their loyalty, a child whom perhaps they had never seen, of whose natural temper and talents they had no certain gauge, and whose sole claim to their affection consisted in the fortune of his birth. Children of the soil, we accord to our mother earth that loyalty which other nations content themselves in expending upon idols of their own creation. But the feeling of patriotism and that of loyalty spring from the same source, though diverted oftentimes into widely diverging channels: their origin and infancy are the same, however much their after lives may vary. And though we may be unable to sympathize with, or rightly measure the purity and constancy of their enthusiasm for the line of their ancient kings, we can at least form some estimate of the extent to which the Scotch carried their generous self-devotion. When, in 1689, the Convention of the Estates of the Kingdom of Scotland, by command or request of the Prince of Orange, was held in Edinburgh, in order that some action might be taken on the respective claims of himself and King James VII. to the throne, there is little doubt but that the supporters of the Stuart dynasty were in a decided preponderance in the realm, whether as regards numbers, quality, influence, or fortune. In the west alone, the Whigs and Conventiclers—who were more akin to the fierce Republicans of Cromwell's iron days than any other party—were capable of seriously embarrassing the royal party in sustaining the constituted authorities, and Bothwell-brig had taught them such a lesson, that a firm and undaunted front would perhaps have cowed them for a season at least. But fortunately for William, the Tory party of that day was chiefly composed of the worst of all enemies—lukewarm friends to James VII. The best commentary on the foreign and domestic policy of that king, is the trite quotation—often used, but rarely rightly—Quem Deus vult perdere, prius dementat.

At all events, it will not be now denied by any one, that of all courses of conduct in the world, James adopted the one, that, in the admonitory language of Charles II., was best calculated "to send him on his travels again." Accordingly, the Convention met as above mentioned under circumstances extremely unfavorable to his cause. Many of the warmest Cavaliers refused to attend; some denying the authority of the Prince of Orange to convoke the Estates—others apprehensive of the safety of their persons in an assembly that was, to their eyes, in its very nature illegal and treasonable, comprising so many committed to the extremest courses of hostility towards their party; while, perhaps, in the breasts of the greater portion there existed a decided feeling of discontent and dissatisfaction at the conduct of their royal leader, and of no great reluctance to permit him to taste the fruits of his own pertinacious folly. He has sown the wind, they argued, let him reap the whirlwind. When such were the sentiments of so many of the Tories, it is not strange that the partisans of William constituted a decided though wavering majority of the Convention.

* LAYS OF THE SCOTTISH CAVALIERS AND OTHER POEMS, BY WILLIAM EDMONDSTOUNE AYTOUN, Professor of Rhetoric and Belles Lettres in the University of Edinburgh. Edinburgh and London, William Blackwood and Sons, 1849. One vol., 8vo., pp. 282.

It must not be supposed, however, that James was entirely abandoned in that body. A numerous and bitter minority supported his cause with a desperation worthy of better success. Headed by one of the most remarkable characters that the world has ever seen, John Grahame of Claverhouse, Viscount Dundee, they would undoubtedly have prevailed, had sufficient time been allowed them to recruit their ranks from that sluggish body of friends who as yet held aloof from the Parliament House. But finding that matters were coming rapidly to a crisis, and wishing to lose none of the moral force of such a movement, Dundee denounced their further proceedings as illegal, and at the head of his men, left the city in arms for King James.

To the Lords of Convention 'twas Claver'se who spoke,
 "Ere the King's crown go down, there are crowns to be broke,
 So let each Cavalier who loves honor and me,
 Come follow the bonnet of bonny Dundee."

The result of the struggle we will not dwell upon; as for its actors, many of them sleep well beneath the heather, where "honour" comes "to deck the turf that wraps their clay." But the feeling their deeds and cause awakened died not with them; and the course of the succeeding sovereigns—William and Mary—and even of Anne to a considerable extent, and above all, of the two first Georges, effectually prevented anything like a cordial acquiescence of the Scottish nation in their governments. The massacre of Glencoe—the Darien affair—the act of Union—each strongly operated to confirm the affections of a great portion of the people for the Stuart line, and while they were never sparing of their blood and treasure in that cause. they omitted no occasion of giving their zeal vent in the most inspiring series of poetical effusions ever called forth by any political occasion. Lingered in the hearts of the veterans of the Fifteen and the Forty-five, these sentiments were readily caught up by their children; and the strains martially chaunted by the quivering lips of a grandsire, in whose memory the glories of Killiecrankie and of Preston, and the youthful form of fair-haired "bonnie Prince Charlie" still shone with a lustre the more precious because only seen in the far-away vista of the past, through eyes dimmed with the teardrops of regret, found an enthusiastic response from the lips of childhood. With what a magic thrill must not her youthful auditors have listened to an aged Highland widow, when, beside the flickering light of a dying flame, she should croon out some such accents as these—

I ance had sons, I now hae nane,
I bred them toiling sairly;
And I wad bear them a' again,
And lose them a' for Charlie!

Nor were these the empty and unmeaning words of a courtly rhymster. They breathed the genuine spirit of a great, a gallant and a chivalrous nation. Well and truly says Lord Mahon, of the Chevalier's farewell to the land of his heart: "He went, but not with him departed his remembrance from the Highlanders. For years and years did his name continue enshrined in their hearts and familiar to their tongues, their plaintive ditties resounding with his exploits and inviting his return. Again, in these strains, do they declare themselves ready to risk life and fortune for his cause; and even maternal fondness—the strongest, perhaps, of all human feelings—yields to the passionate devotion to Prince Charlie."

With this historical episode, we introduce the volume before us to our readers. Mr. Aytoun, the author, is as yet comparatively unknown to the world, although thousands are familiar with his sportive effusions in Fraser's Magazine, over the nom de plume of Bon Gaultier. With these lyrics we have at present nothing to do, save to regret that so much talent should be wasted on such trivial objects. In the pages of Blackwood, over the initials of W. E. A., his muse has frequently essayed a loftier flight, and to its efforts we now call attention. It is in such lays as these before us, that we are reminded of the spirit that impelled the souls of the Highland Chiefs and Minstrels in their palmy days of glory; and it is only by an allusion to those days that we can account for the enthusiastic ardor that fires the imagination of our author, and causes every word to impart to us earnest conviction of his feeling its truth. We turn now to the volume itself.

In one of the old French romances of Anthony Hamilton, may be found a wise word of advice very applicable to our present occupation. Moulinot the Giant, to Belier the Great Ram—"Belier, mon amy, si tu voudroy me fayre ung grande playsir, commencez, je vous prie, par le commencement." Let us begin then at the beginning, and open our pack with a glance at the dedication—"to Archibald William Hamilton Montgomerie, Earl of Eglinton and Winton." There is something very appropriate in this inscription. To the humble strain of an Ayrshire ploughman, a former lord of Eglinton owes more celebrity than to all his own achievements, or those of the whole series of belted earls and barons bold through whom he traces his descent. So long as the face of nature shall remain unchanged; so long as shall continue to gladden the eye, so long, like a fly in amber, will the name of that castle's lord exist. It can never die while the name of Highland Mary lives in the heart, or lingers on the tongue—while the sweetest and most impassioned of Burns's lays charms the willing ear. The memory of all the throats cut—the villages harried—the broad acres, won by the sword or lost by the dicebox—the lofty towers that pierced the skies and seem to laugh to scorn the grasp of Time himself—may soon perish—while the fact that one of the old lords was lucky enough to have engaged as a domestic servant in his household, the world-renowned Mary Campbell, will suffice to give his whole race an immortality that she, poor soul! never dreamed of.

The banks and braes and streams around
The Castle o' Montgomerie

The opening poem of the volume entitled "Edinburgh after Flodden," is one of the most thrilling ballads that we have seen for years. It exhibits the state of the city on the first reception of the news of that fatal day,

When broken was fair Scotia's spear,
And shivered was her shield—

when ten thousand of her best and noblest sons lay stretched cold upon the earth around the body of her king—when, in the expressive language of the maidens of Ettrick—

"The flowers o' the Forest were a' wede awae."

It represents the citizens ignorant of the result of a battle that they knew to have been fought—on which the fate of their sovereign, the salvation of the realm, the destiny of the nation were pending—eagerly and most intensely excited as to its event. Crowds of anxious burghers, he-ping all things, fearing all things, throng the streets. The altars are blocked up with mothers praying for their sons, wives wailing for their husbands, maidens whispering vows to Mary Mother for their lovers. The town council is met in gloomy state, waiting in dread suspense the presence of the messenger from the camp whom the sentries on the walls announce as near at hand. With clamorous shouts the mob without gaze anxiously at the gates, eager for the entrance of the messenger within the city walls. Suddenly, —the gates are opened.

Then a murmur long and loud,
And a cry of fear and wonder
Bursts from out the bending crowd.
For they see in battered harness
Only one hard-stricken man,
And his weary steed is wounded,
And his cheek is pale and wan.
Spearless hangs a bloody banner
In his weak and drooping hand—
God! can that be Randolph Murray,
Captain of the city band?

Round him crush the people, crying
"Tell us all—oh, tell us true!
Where are they who went to battle,
Randolph Murray, sworn to you?
Where are they, our brothers—children?
Have they met the English foe?
Why art thou alone, unfollowed?
Is it weal, or is it woe?"
Like a corpse the grisly warrior
Looks from out his helm of steel;
But no word he speaks in answer,
Only with his armèd heel
Chides his weary steed, and onward
Up the city streets they ride;
Fathers, sisters, mothers, children,
Shrieking, praying by his side.
"By the God that made thee, Randolph!
Tell us what mischance hath come;"
Then he lifts his riven banner,
And the asker's voice is dumb.

He is brought before the City Council—

Then in came Randolph Murray,—
And his step was slow and weak,
And, as he doffed his dinted helm,
The tears ran down his cheek:
They fell upon his corslet,
And on his mailed hand,
As he gazed around him wistfully,
Leaning solely on his brand.
And none who then beheld him
But straight were smote with fear,
For a bolder and a sterner man
Had never couched a spear.
They knew so sad a messenger
Some ghastly news must bring:
And all of them were fathers,
And their sons were with the King.

The old Provest, whose last surviving son had been Randolph's standard-bearer in the fray, at length bids him speak his tidings—

Right bitter was the agony

That wrung that soldier proud:
Thrice did he strive to answer,
And thrice he groaned aloud.
Then he gave the riven banner
To the old man's shaking hand,
Saying—"That is all I bring ye
From the bravest of the land!
Ay! ye may look upon it—
It was guarded well and long,
By your brothers and your children,
By the valiant and the strong.
One by one they fell around it,
As the archers laid them low,
Grimly dying, still unconquered,
With their faces to the foe.
Ay! ye well may look upon it—
There is more than honour there,
Else, be sure, I had not brought it
From the field of dark despair.
Never yet was royal banner
Steeped in such a costly die;
It hath lain upon a bosom
Where no other abroad shall lie.
Sirs! I charge you, keep it holy,
Keep it as a sacred thing,
For the stain ye see 'upon it
Was the life-blood of your King."

* * * * *

"No one failed him! He is keeping
Royal state and semblance still;
Knight and noble lie around him,
Cold on Flodden's fatal hill.
Of the brave and gallant hearted,
Whom ye sent with prayers away,
Not a single man departed
From his monarch yesterday.
Had you seen them, O my masters!
When the night began to fall,
And the English spearmen gathered
Round a grim and ghastly wall!
As the wolves in winter circle
Round the leaguer on the hearth,
So the greedy foe glared upward,
Panting still for blood and death.
But a rampart rose before them,
Which the boldest dared not scale;
Every stone a Scottish body,
Every step a corpse in mail!
And behind it lay our monarch
Clenching still his shivered sword:
By his side Montrose and Athol,
At his feet a southern lord!

We could give many other extracts of equal spirit and of greater length from this beautiful poem, but our limits are prescribed; and as it is, we apprehend too great temptations to substitute the "thoughts that breathe and words that burn" of the pages before us, in the place of our own text.

"The Execution of Montrose" is the next poem in order; a composition that, in the columns of Blackwood's Magazine, a few years since, was widely read and very much admired.

At the hands of a foreign reviewer, it has lately met with great and well-merited praise. It would be difficult indeed for the dullest mind to write without fire on such an occasion. The bare mention of the history of James Graham, "the Great Marquis" of Montrose, is scarcely inferior in heroic interest to the most glowing romances of the ancient Chroniclers. What gem of English poetry is more perfect than his famous love song,

Oh, tell me how to woo thee, love ;
Oh, tell me how to woo thee !
For thy dear sake, nae care I'll take
Though ne'er another trow me.

His successes in the field, his conduct at the council-board, his enthusiastic courage, his generous and unflagging loyalty, his moderation in victory, his heroism on the scaffold—all conspire to win our admiration and command our respect. His chivalrous comment upon his barbarous sentence of drawing and quartering, etc., is finely told below, but not less touching and interesting are the verses inscribed by his own diamond on his dungeon's pane, after the last sun which was ever to set before his mortal ken, had sank below the horizon,

" Let them bestow on every airth a limb,
Then open all my veins, that I may swim
To thee, my Maker! in that crimson lake ;
Then place my parboiled head upon a stake—
Scatter my ashes—strew them in the air :
Lord! since thou know'st where all these atoms are,
I'm hopeful thou'lt recover once my dust,
And confident thou'lt raise me with the just."

No more fitting subject for the eulogium of Bors de Ganes upon Sir Lancelot du Lac, (in the last chapter of the Morte D'Arthur), can be found in all the realms of history or romance. "And now, I dare to say, Sir Lancelot," said Sir Bors, "there as thou liest, thou were never matched of none earthly knight's hands; and thou were the curtiest knight that ever bare shield; and thou were the truest friend to thy lover that ever bestrode horse; and thou were the truest lover, of a sinful man, that ever loved woman; and thou were the kindest man that ever stroke with sword; and thou were the goodliest person that ever came among prece (press) of knights; and thou were the meekest man, and the gentlest, that ever ate in hall among ladies; and thou wert the sternest knight to thy mortal foe that ever put spear in rest."

"The ballad," says Mr. Aytoun, "may be considered as a narrative of the transactions, narrated by an aged Highlander, who had followed Montrose throughout his campaigns, to his grandsons, shortly before the battle of Killiecrankie." After telling of his betrayal and capture, it represents the ominous procession passing slowly onward to the Hall of Judgment, with the Marquis in their centre. his hands "hard bound with hempen span," where his sentence is read to him. The prisoner rises and speaks.

" Now by my faith as belted knight,
And by the name I bear,
And by the bright Saint Andrew's cross
That waves above us there—
Yea, by a greater, mightier oath—
And oh, that such should be!—
By that dark stream of royal blood
That lies 'twixt you and me—
I have not sought in battle field
A wreath of such renown,
Nor dared I hope on my dying day,
To win the martyr's crown!

" There is a chamber far away
Where sleep the good and brave.
But a better place ye have named for me
Than by my father's grave.
For truth and right, 'gainst treason's might.
This hand has always striven,
And ye raise it up for a witness still
In the eye of earth and heaven.
Then nail my head on yonder tower—
Give every town a limb—
And God who made shall gather them :
I go from you to him!"

The whole of the remainder of this poem maintains an equally exalted flight, but the Review we have already alluded to, has probably made it so familiar to many of our readers that we may exercise a more discriminating spirit in selecting the next passage for extraction. Concerning the "Heart of the Bruce,"—decidedly in our opinion the flower of the volume—we should like to say something. At present, however, we must pass it over, as well as the "Burial March of Dundee," reserving what we would gladly say now, to a period perhaps more consonant with the taste of our readers. "The Widow of Glencoe" is another ballad of considerable merit. The plot is very simple; it being the coronach or lamentation of the widow and orphans of Mac Iau of Glencoe, one of the Clanranald, whose whole village was destroyed, in defiance of the most sacred laws of hospitality, honour and religion, on the night of February 12th, 1692, "att 5 o'clock in the morning precisely," according to the strict orders given on that awful occasion. The hour and season were selected by the Earl of Stair, (then Sir John Dalrymple,) because "now," says he, "the human constitution cannot endure to be long out of houses. This is the proper season to maule them in the cold long nights." "The winter is the only season in which we are sure the Highlanders cannot escape us, nor carry their wives, bairns and cattle to the mountains." From the mass of documentary evidence that the indignant incredulity of posterity brought to light against their fathers, we will select one bearing a particular relation to the text—albeit it brings no conspicuously bright additional ray of glory, in our eyes, to “the great, good, and glorious memory of the immortal King William III., who delivered us from brass money, popery and wooden shoes.” It is as follows; being dated 16th January, 1692.

“William R—As for Mac Ian of Glencoe and that tribe, if they can be well distinguished from the rest of the Highlanders, it will be proper for public justice to extirpate that set of theirs.

W. R.”

And that this mandate was not foreign or repugnant to the spirit of his counsellors, we read in a letter of Secretary Dalrymple's, on the fact of its application, that he greatly rejoices thereat—“It is a great work of charity to be exact in rooting out that damnable sect.” Charity did he say? Such charity as honest old Izaak perhaps entertained towards his frog, which he put tenderly upon his hook, “as though he loved it!” But why multiply words? The subsequent history of that dreadful night is, alas! matter of history—it is but too well known; a history which, as a modern writer well observes, is scarcely paralleled in atrocity, in all the annals of Indian warfare. The late inhuman ravages of the Camanches in Texas would appear in a favorable light when placed side by side with the revolting details of the deeds of a civilized army under the orders of “a Great Protestant deliverer” towards their fellow Christians and fellow countrymen and even kinsmen. ‘Tis in these strains a widow mourns her fallen lord, foully slain in a moment of profound peace, by the hands of those who had tasted of his salt and had been sheltered at his fireside, which even among the wild Bedouins of the Desert would have been armed in his defence;—and promises vengeance for his manes. There is something very stern and majestic in the conclusion.

I had wept thee, hadst thou fallen,
Like our fathers, on thy shield,
When a host of English foemen
Camped upon a Scottish field—
I had mourned thee, hadst thou perished
With the foremost of his name,
When the valiant and the noble
Died around the dauntless Græme!
But I will not wrong thee, husband!
With my unavailing cries,
Whilset thy cold and mangled body,
Stricken by the traitor, lies;
Whilset he counts the gold and glory
That this hideous night has won,
And his heart is big with triumph
At the murder he has done.
Other eyes than mine shall glisten;
Other hearts be rent in twain,
Ere the heathbells on thy hillock
Wither in the autumn rain.
Then I'll seek thee where thou sleepest,
And I'll veil my weary head,

Praying for a place beside thee,
Dearer than my bridal bed;
And I'll give thee tears, my husband!
If the tears remain to me,
When the widows of the foemen
Cry the Coronach for thee!

It will have been noticed that although the preceding poems are styled Ballads, they are not exactly couched in the simple and concise phraseology of the more ancient English ballads, as Chevy Chase, for instance. Despite the fact of the present measure having been chosen by Mr. Macaulay for some of his noble “lays of Ancient Rome,” we prefer decidedly the less ornate and labored style in which Tickell, Goldsmith and Percy have shown themselves such proficient. Perhaps, however, this style is better adapted to the loftier rehearsal of grand deeds of martial fame. Of a similar tenor to its predecessors, and, of all, most to our taste, is the “Island of the Scots”—the next poem in the book. It must be premised that after William was firmly seated on the throne, the exiled adherents of James saw all present hopes of his restoration at an end, and resolved no longer to be a useless burthen on the purse of a Master whose little all was chiefly composed of the voluntary remittances of his secret supporters in Britain. Accordingly, after a stubborn opposition on the part of James to their self-devotedness, they formed themselves into a company of soldiers, and enlisted under the banners of Louis XIV. Previously to departing for the wars, they assembled for the purpose of bidding adieu for the last time to him whom they persisted in viewing as their rightful sovereign. The scene that morning in the Gardens of Saint-Germain's must have been a touching one indeed. Well might James burst into tears at the sight of such a number of the best, the bravest, the most nobly born of his realm—men into whose laps Fortune had seemed to pour her choicest gifts of Wealth and Rank—voluntarily forfeiting home, friends, fortune, even their ancestral name itself, rather than abandon their principles. What noble sentiments are these—what examples worthy of all imitation! Such was the spirit that cheered the Apostles at the Stake—such was the flame that guided the way of our Fathers, when faint and weary, they were to be tracked across the winter's snow and ice by the bloody prints of their bare feet, while fighting Freedom's battles. Justly says the bard,

Perish wealth, and power, and pride!
Mortal boons, by mortals given;
But let Constancy abide,
Constancy's the gift of Heaven!

In bidding farewell to this glorious little band, James said—“Gentlemen, my own misfortunes are not so nigh my heart as yours. It grieves me beyond what I can express, to see so many brave and worthy gentlemen, who had once the prospect of being the chief officers in my army, reduced to the station of private sentinels. Nothing but your loyalty, and that of a few of my subjects in Britain, who are forced from their allegiance by the Prince of Orange, and who, I know, will be ready on all occasions to serve me and my distressed family, could make me willing to live. The sense of what all of you have done and undergone for your loyalty, hath made so deep an impression upon my heart, that, if it ever please God to restore me, it is impossible I can be forgetful of your services and sufferings. Neither can there be any posts in the armies of my dominions but what you have just pretensions to. As for my son, your Prince, he is of your own blood, a child capable of any impression, and, as his education will be from you, it is not supposable that he can forget your merits. At your own desires you are now going a long march far distant from me. Fear God and love one another. Write your wants particularly to me, and depend upon it always to find me your parent and King.”*

Under the Marshal de Noailles, and other leaders, this company of heroes saw such effectual service, that in 1714, but sixteen of their number were living. The ballad before us tells of one of their feats, when, under General Stirk, 16,000 Germans attempted to pass the Rhine. The Marquis de Sell, at the head of 4000 French, guarded the opposite shore. A small island, in the middle of the river, was in spite of all his exertions, seized by the Germans, and united immediately by a bridge to their main camp. Of course, this position caused the greatest uneasiness to the French, but it seemed impossible to dislodge them. In this juncture, “a swarthy man,” Captain John Foster, the leader of the Scots, volunteers his company as a forlorn hope to storm the isle, on which the enemy had now thrown up heavy batteries.

“I’ve seen a wilder stream ere now
Than that which rushes there ;
I’ve stemmed a heavier torrent yet
And never thought to dare.
If German steel be sharp and keen,
Is ours not strong and true ?
There may be danger in the deed,
But there is honor too !”

The old Marquis de Sell gives a joyful assent, upon condition that his men are ready to follow

* This scene is certainly in very striking contrast with the flight of James a short time before from his palace at Whitehall, his throwing the Great Seal into the Thames, and his subsequent vacillation on the approach of William.

[Ed. Mass.

him. The Scotch Captain addresses them, concluding with these words—

“Come, brothers ! let me name a spell
Shall rouse your souls again,
And send the old blood bounding free
Through pulse, and heart, and vein !
Call back the days of bygone years—
Be young and strong once more !
Think yonder stream, so stark and red,
Is one we’ve crossed before.

Rise, hill and glen ! rise, crag and wood !
Rise up on either hand—
Again upon the Garry’s banks,
On Scottish soil we stand !
Again I see the tartans wave,
I hear the trumpets ring ;
Again I hear our leader’s call—
“Upon them, for the King ?
Stayed we behind that glorious day
For roaring flood or linn ?
The soul of Grame is with us still—
Now, brothers, will ye in !”

No stay—no pause. With one accord
They grasped each other’s hand,
And plunged into that angry flood
That bold and dauntless band.
High flew the spray above their heads,
Yet onward still they bore,
Midst cheer, and shout, and answering yell
Aud shot and cannon roar.
“Now, by the Holy Cross ! I swear
Since earth and sea began
Was never such a daring deed
Essayed by mortal man !”

• • • • •
“The current’s strong—the way is long—
They’ll never reach the shore !
See, see ! they stagger in the midst,
They waver in the line !
Fire on the madmen ! break their ranks,
And whelm them in the Rhine !”

Have you seen the tall trees swaying
When the blast is piping a-brill,
And the whirlwind reels in fury
Down the gorges of the hill ?
How they toss their mighty branches,
Striving with the tempest’s shock ;
How they keep their place of vantage
Cleaving firmly to the rock !
Even so the Scottish warriors
Held their men against the river—

• • • • •
One word was spoke among them,
And through the ranks it spread—
“Remember our dead Claverhouse !”
Was all the Captain said.
Then, sternly bending forward,
They struggled on awhile,
Until they cleared the heavy stream
And rushed toward the isle.

The German heart is stout and true,
The German arm is strong ;
The German foot goes seldom back
Where armed for men throng.

But never had they faced in field
 So stern a charge before,
 And never had they felt the sweep
 Of Scotland's broad claymore.
 Not fiercer pours the avalanche
 Adown the steep incline,
 That rises o'er the parent-springs
 Of rough and rapid Rhine—
 Scarce swifter shoots the bolt from heaven
 Than came the Scottish band,
 Right up against the guarded trench
 And o'er it, sword in hand.
 In vain their leaders forward press—
 They meet the deadly brand!
 O lovely island of the Rhine,
 Where seed was never sown,
 What harvest lay upon thy sands,
 By those strong reapers thrown?
 What saw the winter moon that night,
 As, struggling through the rain,
 She poured a wan and fitful light
 On marsh, and stream, and plain?
 A dreary spot with corpses strown,
 And bayonets glittering round;
 A broken bridge, a stranded boat,
 A bare and battered mound;
 And one huge watchfire's kindled pile,
 That sent its quivering glare
 To tell the leaders of the host
 The conquering Scots were there!

And did they twine the laurel-wreath
 For those who fought so well?
 And did they honor those who lived,
 And weep for those who fell?
 What needs of thanks was given to them
 Let aged annals tell.
 Why should they twine the laurel-wreath—
 Why crown the cup with wine?
 It was not Frenchmen's blood that flowed
 So freely on the Rhine—
 A stranger hand of beggared men
 Had done the venturous deed:
 The glory was to France alone,
 The danger was their meed.
 And what cared they for idle thanks
 From foreign prince or peer?
 What virtue had such honied words
 The exile's hearts to cheer?
 What mattered it, that men should vaunt
 And loud and fondly swear,
 That higher feat of chivalry
 Was never wrought elsewhere?
 They bore within their breasts the grief
 That fame can never heal—
 The deep, unutterable woe
 Which none save exiles feel.
 Their hearts were yearning for the land
 They ne'er might see again—
 For Scotland's high and heathered hills,
 For mountain, loch, and glen—
 For those who haply lay at rest
 Beyond the distant sea,
 Beneath the green and daisied turf
 Where they would gladly be!

There—if our readers do not thank us for this long extract, we are much deceived. Perhaps it is but the stirring dregs of the "perfervidum ingenium Scotorum," as old Buchanan has it—in our system—that makes us warm so in favor of aught that relates to "the land of the mountain and the flood," but certes, the preceding lines make us to prick up our ears like a warhorse at the braying of "a silver trumpet with a martial sound."

"Of "Charles Edward at Versailles," we have little to say. It is inferior to much of its kindred versification. There is something rather bald in the very first line—but the next ballad, "the Old Scottish Cavalier," is magnificent—sufficient in itself to redeem a whole volume of balderdash. It came out some years ago in Blackwood, and well do we remember the effect it produced upon the mind of one from whose lips we have often since heard it sung—in sooth, it is a gem of the first water; such a strain as this must have been the famous war-song of Roland, chaunting which Roger de Taille-fer charged the host on the field of Hastings, and died with its murmurs on his lips.

If we give this song entire, it is the last offence of the kind we shall commit in this paper, and, certainly, the sin will be no heinous one. Although the air is a parody, the subject of the song is matter of real life. Lord Pitsligo is well understood to have been the hero; although the denouement is more akin to the fate of Viscount Strathallan, than of Lord Pitsligo, who was a nobleman the most conspicuous of the Low Country, for his virtue, learning, and social influence.

THE OLD SCOTTISH CAVALIER.

I.

Come, listen to another song,
 Should make your heart beat high,
 Bring crimson to your forehead,
 And the lustre to your eye;—
 It is a song of olden time,
 Of days long since gone by.
 And of a Baron stout and bold
 As e'er wore sword on thigh!
 Like a brave old Scottish Cavalier,
 All of the olden time!

II.

He kept his castle in the North,
 Hard by the thundering spey;
 And a thousand vassals dwelt around,
 All of his kindred they.
 And not a man of all that clan
 Had ever ceased to pray
 For the Royal race they loved so well,
 Though exiled far away
 From the steadfast Scottish Cavaliers,
 All of the olden time!

III.

His father drew the righteous sword
 For Scotland and her claims,
 Among the loyal gentlemen
 And chiefs of ancient names.

Who swore to fight or fall beneath
 The standard of King James,
 And died at Killiecrankie Pass
 With the glory of the Grames;
 Like a true old Scottish Cavalier,
 All of the olden time!

IV.

He never owned the foreign rule,
 No master he obeyed,
 But kept his clan in peace at home,
 From foray and from raid;
 And when they asked him for his oath,
 He touching his glittering blade,
 And pointed to his bonnet blue,
 That bore the white cockade:
 Like a leal old Scottish Cavalier,
 All of the olden time!

V.

At length the news ran through the land—
 THE PRINCE had come again!
 That night the fiery cross was sped
 O'er mountain and through glen;
 And our old Baron rose in might,
 Like a lion from his den,
 And rode away across the hills
 To Charlie and his men,
 With the valiant Scottish Cavaliers,
 All of the olden time!

VI.

He was the first that bent the knee
 When the STANDARD waved abroad,
 He was the first that charged the foe
 On Preston's bloody sod;
 And ever, in the van of fight,
 The foremost still he trod,
 Until, on bleak Culloden's heath,
 He gave his soul to God,
 Like a good old Scottish Cavalier,
 All of the olden time!

VII.

Oh! never shall we know again
 A heart so stout and true—
 The olden times have passed away,
 And weary are the new!
 The fair White Rose has faded
 From the garden where it grew,
 And no fond tears, save those of heaven,
 The glorious bed bedew
 Of the last old Scottish Cavalier
 All of the olden time!

This closes the political series that has given a name to the volume; the Miscellaneous Poems, however, demand a short notice at our hands. The one entitled "Blind Old Milton," is of considerable merit, and is sufficient to show how much the Author is inspired by poetic sympathy, and how little by the baser feelings of party politics. It paints the after life of him, of whom Gray has sang,

The living throne, the sapphire blaze,
 Where Angels tremble while they gaze,
 He saw; but, blinded with excess of light,
 Closed his eyes in endless night,

The calm and placid resignation put into the mouth of the author of the "Defensio Populi Anglicani," will remind the reader of some lines written by a contemporary of Milton's, one Francis Lord Lovelace, in 1649, while lying in the dungeon where he had been immured by the Parliament which also confiscated his estates, on account of his adherence to the King.

Stone walls do not a prison make,
 Nor iron bars a cage;
 Minds, that are unconfin'd, take
 These for an hermitage.
 While I am constant in my love,
 And in me, soul am free,
 Angels alone, that soar above,
 Enjoy such liberty!

"Hermitimus" is the tale of a husband of Clazomene, whose soul had acquired an inconvenient habit of quitting its earthly vesture, and visiting parts unknown. One day, during the temporary absence of the spirit, his wife burned the body, and thus effectually put a stop to such unconnubial conduct. On its return, of course his soul had no place to go to, and though matters are afterwards very ingeniously accommodated in the poem, yet, as our Author notes, his memory must "nevertheless remain as a terrible example and warning to all husbands who carry their scientific and spiritual pursuits so far as to neglect their duty to their wives." The return of the Soul to the wife's mourning chamber is well told, and in an admirably suitable metre, that falls on the ear like the regular chime of a funeral knell.

Night again was come; but oh, how lonely
 To the mourner did that night appear!
 Peace nor rest it brought, but sorrow only,
 Vain repinings and unwonted fear.
 Dimly burned the lamp—
 Chill the air and damp—
 And the winds without were moaning drear.

Hush! a voice in solemn whispers speaking,
 Breaks within the silence of the room;
 And LONG, loud and wildly shrieking,
 Starts and gazes through the ghastly gloom.
 Nothing sees she there—
 All is empty air,
 All is empty as a rifled tomb.

Once again the voice beside her sounded,
 Low, and faint, and solemn was its tone—
 Nor by form nor shade am I surrounded,
 Fleshly home and dwelling have I none.
 They are passed away—

Woe is me I to-day
Hath robbed me of myself, and made me lone.

“Cenone,” a clever little production, very much in Tennyson’s vein—a brother poet, whom Mr. Aytoun delighteth not to honor; and the “Buried Flower” that reminds us of Longfellow’s manner of thinking—come next in order. The latter contains many charming gems, elaborately polished and strung together by a rather weak thread, although as a whole it may not possess any very great merit of poetic originality. The following is not particularly modern, but is a prettily told conceit—

Like the wanderer of the desert,
When across the dreary sand,
Breathes the perfume from the thickets
Bordering on the promised land;

When afar he sees the palm-trees
Creating o’er the lonely well,
When he hears the pleasant tinkle
Of the distant Camel’s bell—etc.

And these lines are very musical—in the tone of the whole effusion, however.

Early wert thou taken, Mary!
In thy fair and glorious prime,
Ere the bees had ceased to murmur
Through the umbrage of the lime.

Buds were blowing, waters flowing,
Birds were singing on the tree,
Everything was bright and glowing,
When the angels came for thee.

“The Old Camp”—“Danube and the Euxine” and “Charon’s Refusal” are capital, and will be favorites wherever they are read. But the “Scheik of Sinai” and the “Epitaph of Constantine Kanaris” are worthless trash, insipid and peurile to a degree. It is astonishing to us that any man could confess himself the parent of such lamentable weaknesses—flatter by far than the smallest of small table beer. A schoolboy of the fourth form who brought forward such rhymes as these would richly deserve to be birched. But in the quantity of wheat garnered in the volume we have just laid down, why murmur at the presence of a little chaff? Rarely have we risen from the perusal of a work that has afforded us a greater intellectual treat than this, and we hope that those of our readers who may not have the London edition within their reach, may soon be gratified by seeing it issue from an American press.

NATIONAL LYRICS.

BY JAMES W. SIMMONS.

BATTLE OF BUNKER HILL.*

In Boston lay the British host,
His banners wrapped in sleep;
Whilst far and near that iron coast
Was guarded from the deep;
But ere went up the morrow’s sun,
Lighting the foe to his grave!
The sudden roar of distant gun
Was heard along the wave.†

For sternly over Bunker’s height
Rose, rear’d by hands as stout,
The labor of a single night,
Th’ American redoubt!
There Freedom sat upon her hills,
And mark’d the foe afar;
His heavy numbers, haughty drills,
His pride and pomp of war!

Now rose, alike from sea and shore,
The flash of opening guns!
That shook the city to its core,
A light that dimmed the sun’s!
And rock’d beneath that iron hail
The steep where Warren stood;
No sound return’d upon the gale—
Th’ avengers work’d in blood!

Slowly a long, dark line uprose,
Frowning above the foe!
A light it seem’d to eyes of those
Who watch’d it from below!
For there the hush’d heart’s thousand ties
In listening terror lay,
As Freedom’s ranks beneath those skies,
Like lions stood at bay!

* Bunker Hill and Fort Moultrie are remote topics. I am not aware, however, of any attempt to do justice to them in numbers. My own attention was accidentally drawn to the subject by the perusal, a short time since, of Headley’s two volumes, “Washington and his Generals.”

† At four o’clock in the morning the people of Boston and the British officers were waked up by a heavy cannonading from an English ship of war, whose commander first perceived the position which the Americans had taken up during the night.

The haughty foe was gath'ring fast,
While far along that shore,
Was heard the stirring bugle blast,
As slept the cannon's roar!
And glancing banner, nodding plume,
Commingled far and near;
While, o'er that mass of fearful gloom,
The bayonet gleam'd in air!

Said Warren—"Mine where honor calls,
Where the battle heaviest lowers;
For, worthy of these hills and halls,
We'll prove the blood that's ours!"
"Now steady, hearts!" bold Putnam cries,
And wait th' approaching foe;
Mark the light of th' invaders' eyes,
Lay each invader low!

On came the Briton's firm array,
Then stood a moment still;
While his guns lit up another day
Around that silent hill!
Along its steel-clad summit ran
A gleam of hurrying light,
Beneath whose flash the British van
Went down in sudden night!

Successive numbers o'er the slain
Still struggled up the steep,
Its volleys swept their ranks again
Like whirlwind from the deep!
Their numbers rallied, reel'd, stood still—
Then, as rock by lightning riven,
That mighty mass went down the hill,
In fierce confusion driven!

"Now club your guns!" stout Prescott cried,
"Our bayonets are few;
For mark! the foe in stubborn pride,
Brings up his ranks anew!"
With sabre flashing to the sun,
The gallant Warren led;
But, ere that stormy day was done,
He slumbered with the dead!

The brave provincials with the night
Slow withdrew them from the hill;
But, from that long-contested height
Tho' driven, were Victors still!
And loud the shout of triumph rose
O'er city, hill, and plain,
Whose echoes, while one freeman glows,
Shall never sleep again!

MOORE'S ANACREON.

A very inadequate estimate has often been made of the ability requisite to make a good translation from a great author. It has been supposed that all that is necessary is to manufacture something in another language which should contain the words and phases of the original as nearly as possible in their identical order and disposition. To this we owe that barbarous jargon of bad Latin which is found in the "translation" columns of some old editions of Greek authors, translations which are incalculably more obscure than the difficult passages they pretend to elucidate. The earliest English translations of classical authors are founded upon this idea and the consequence is, that most of them are stiff, harsh and pedantic to an uncommon degree. The language forced out of its natural shape, inverted and distorted, produces the same unpleasant effect upon our minds that arises from viewing those grotesque absurdities into which gardeners of the last century tortured the picturesque luxuriance of shrubbery.

Nor did this exhibit itself solely in their prose translations. Those scraps of antiquity that had the misfortune to be "done into verse," fared very little better. Old Sternhold and Hopkins, version of the Psalms, is a lamentable illustration of the fact. True it is that there were glorious exceptions to this common practice; of these, the most admirable is the authorized translation of the Bible. That remarkable work is alike wonderful for its almost literal faithfulness and for its free and unconstrained style, two qualities, it is hardly necessary to say, scarcely ever found together. It is almost impossible for the reader to persuade himself that he is not perusing an original work, there is such a freshness and vigor in it. The various styles of the different authors are admirably preserved. The lyric fervor of David and Isaiah, the elegiac pathos of Jeremiah, the glowing eloquence and eager argumentation of St. Paul, the calm earnestness of John, the steady narrative of the historians, the epic majesty of the book of Job, and the tragic gorgeousness of that sublime and wonderful vision, the Apocalypse,—are all as vivid and distinct as though they had been originally written in the language in which we read them. With all these merits is combined a sober richness and majesty of diction so admirably befitting the solemn truths it conveys that we cannot avoid acknowledging this the masterpiece of all the translations in our language.

Nearly at the same time with this appeared those other celebrated works, Fairfax's Tasso, and Chapman's Homer. Of these the former was a task far more easy of accomplishment than the latter. There is not that rigorous individuality about the Italian. He wants the Homeric impetuosity and fire, the condensation in sublime passages, the majestic calm of the more delicate parts of the first great poem of Greece. He has none of those vivid pictures painted by a single word which have stambled all the translators of Homer except Chapman. These peculiarities have rendered him more easily translatable than the blind old Greek. Besides, at that time, English literature was strongly tinctured with an Italian hue. The great master, Spenser, had constructed his exquisite poems on the Italian model, and had given a direction to the English mind. This comparative assimilation smoothed the way to the translator of Tasso. But Chapman had great difficulties in his way. The ornate style of the day, though natural, differed from the severe simplicity of the antique as widely as did the rich and magnificent Gothic architecture from the chaste models of the Grecian temples. He has nevertheless produced a translation far more acceptable to the readers of the original than Pope's, which is, as a cotemporary poet justly said of it, "a very pretty poem, but not Homer."

The truth is that a good translation is a very difficult literary task to accomplish, and requires talents of a high and peculiar order. These are not of the same character as those that are requisite to produce a great original work, for it is notorious that excellent translators have succeeded indifferently in their original efforts, and that nervous original writers have signally failed in their attempts to translate. Still, though we are compelled to rank translation far below creation, we most confidently assert that it is no more possible for a man of merely moderate abilities to produce a really good translation from a first-class author, than it is for a common-place painter to make a successful copy of a master-piece from the hands of Raphael or Rubens. Any laborious draughtsman may, indeed, transfer to his own canvass, the lines and the proportions of the master's work, may superficially imitate his coloring, but the depth and transparency of the tints, the freedom of the touch, the feeling, to use an expressive technical phrase, will be absent. So a laborious scholar, by dint of turning over pages of lexicons and grammars, and diving into learned annotations, may produce for us a sort of copy of his author, but it will convey no better idea of the original than the dead, leaden stare of the early Daguerrotypes of the sprightly faces they pretended to represent. The meaning of an author may be as thoroughly distorted by an unexpert translator as by a clumsy, ill-taught actor. Indeed, the mental qualifications requisite for eminence in the pursuits of both are very much of the same nature. A translator must assume the character of his author, as an actor does that of his part, must feel his sentiments, must think his thoughts, must adopt his temperament. Then and only then, can he hope to give to the world something like a translation. Otherwise, he will accomplish nothing better than a paraphrase, an imitation, or perhaps a travestie. The same reason that accounts for the world's having seen but one Garrick, one Roscius, and one Siddons, will also explain the rarity of such men as Chapman.

Even to a man of such rare talents as to be mentally qualified for such a task, many difficulties will occur. The very structure of language is in his way. There are characteristic and expressive idioms which are untranslatable, the meaning of which can only be conveyed by a wide circumlocution which often destroys their entire force. Then there are shades of meaning in words which cannot be retained in a translation. Thus, to use two very familiar examples, the French cannot express our comfort, nor we their convi; or, to take an illustration of our meaning from the very language of the poet whose name heads our article, what a most inadequate idea do our English translations convey of the minute beauties of that fine passage of Homer's Iliad describing the descent of Apollo, and the sending of the pestilence into the Grecian camp.

Ως ἔφατ' εὐχομένης—του δ' ἔκλυε Φοῖβος Ἀπόλλων. κ. τ. λ.

Pope's translation, the only one we have, reads thus:

"Thus Chryses pray'd: the favoring power attends,
And from Olympus' lofty top descends;
Bent was his bow, the Grecian hearts to wound,
Fierce as he moved, his silver shafts resound.
Breathing revenge, a sudden night he spread,
And gloomy darkness roll'd around his head.
The fleet in view, he twang'd his deadly bow,
And hissing fly the feathered fates below.
On mules and dogs the infection first began,
And last the vengeful arrows fix'd on man.
For nine long nights through all the dusky air,
The pyres thick-flaming, shot a dismal glare, &c.

Now, independently of the general inadequacy of this version, it fails (where indeed failure is unavoidable) in conveying the peculiar force of the different words used to express the arrows of the God. These are so admirably suited to the position in which each is made to stand that we have often wondered how such rare beauty of adaptation could ever have escaped the keen eyes of so many commentators. No one who has directed his attention to them can fail to be delighted by their exact propriety. It will be observed that Pope alludes to them thrice, and that though he uses three different words in feeble and remote imitation of the great original, there is no peculiar propriety in this change of words on his part. Homer, on the other hand, uses four, and these four substantives are so picturesque that they almost tell the story of themselves. For example, while the arrows are shut up in the quiver on the God's shoulder, they receive a name which etymologically denotes things carried.^{*} When Apollo has reached the neighborhood of the camp, he sends forth a dart to ascertain whether he be within striking distance, and this is designated by a term denoting something sent.[†] This point being settled, he commences operations in real earnest, and hurls among the devoted Greeks his "feathered fates," which then receive a new appellation signifying missiles thrown with force.[‡] After they have been raging nine days through the invaders' camp, the unhappy sufferers have had an opportunity to examine them, and our poet therefore gives them a new name indicating that their points have been hardened by burning.^{||} a well known ancient substitute for metallic heads. It would have been manifestly impossible to transfer these beauties to a metrical translation without a tediousness and prolixity wholly inadmissible; yet difficulties of this kind are perpetually occurring to perplex him who attempts to copy in one language the glowing thoughts of great masters who have written in another.

"Is it, then," it may be asked, "impossible that a correct translation of any eminent author can be obtained?" Not precisely impossible, we answer; but all scholars know that such things are exceedingly rare. An exact version, one which shall convey the precise ideas of the author in the style in which he has written them, is a work of great difficulty; but if to this be superadded the task of imitating his imitations of nature, of being full and sonorous, or thin and whispering, rapid or slow in unison with him, the accomplishment of a translation becomes so nearly an impossibility, that to call it such would be sufficiently accurate for the purposes of ordinary conversation. Cowper, for example, is the only one of the numerous English translators of Homer who has attempted to imitate the sonorous melody of that magnificent line which has been the admiration of so many centuries.

"Ἐν δ' αὖτε παραθίνα πολυφλοισβοῖο θαλάσσης."

But letting this pass, as a perfection not to be expected—what are the requisites for a just translation of a foreign author? Not a paraphrase on one hand, nor a violent distortion of English to suit the Procrustean bed of a foreign sentence on the other, not an imitation like some of the coarse pot-house translations of Anacreon which appeared at the same time with Moore's, but a fair and just rendering of his work as it stands. The one must be, as nearly as possible, an equivalent for the other. If the translator fall short of the original, if he fail, for very weakness, to convey an adequate idea of the thoughts and language of the author, he has manifestly not given the world a translation. If, on the other hand, he has attempted to improve upon his author, even though he may have succeeded, he is guilty of quite as palpable a failure. In either case, he is quite as liable to censure as a portrait painter, who, having before him a fine characteristic old head, powerful and intellectual, should copy only the general outlines of the features, and giving us either the drivelling imbecility of dotage, or the sprightly vivacity of youth, should endeavor to persuade people that his picture was a true portrait of his sitter.

We have tried to be explicit as to the requisites of a good translation. Hoping our readers understand our views, we shall now proceed to examine by these tests, the celebrated translation of Anacreon by Thomas Moore. The work has been so universally praised, and the translation has justly attained so high a position among the song-writers of the day, that we can hardly expect our opinions of this performance to meet with general approbation. From this remark, our readers will already have inferred that we are not disposed to pronounce a favorable judgment upon this much admired work. We certainly cannot accede to the general opinion of the excellence of this translation; and yet, we are by no means disposed, indiscriminately to condemn it. We hope to give sufficient reasons for the views we entertain in this matter, to satisfy our readers that they are at least not wholly without foundation.

Moore has been, by many, supposed the very man of all others, adapted by constitution, taste, and habit, to be a translator of the "Toian bard of pleasure." We regard this notion as a mistaken one. Moore is indeed a man of pleasure. He loves, (or perhaps it would be more proper to say he loved) wine and its kindred gratifications. His early poetry paints him an eager votary of pleasure, utterly regardless of the immortality of his enjoyments. But over all such unblushing acknowledgments he throws such a bewitching halo, such a beautiful play of the rainbow glories of an exhaustless fancy, that many are tempted to forget the moral deformity of these seducing writings. He presents to us a false and foul Duessea, tricked off in borrowed bravery, but never hints at the cheat that is played upon us. His wit reminds us of the deluding meteor that hovers over grave-yards and fens, brilliant indeed, and nimble in its motions, but born of corruption and associated with impurity. He is most emphatically a writer purissimæ impuritatis. In his most immodest poems, though the very words seem to swoon with voluptuous exhaustion, there is a grace and elegance of diction, a glow of poetry, a fictitious refinement of sentiment, that beguile the thoughtless reader while the poison is stealing into his soul. He never frightens the timid and fastidious by an explosion of coarse vulgarity. He is always elegant, always self-possessed, always alive to the beautiful. He takes care to exhibit the bright side to the view of his reader. He lingers and hovers round an impure thought like a bee round a poison flower, sucking its honey and singing as though it contained nothing but sweets. These traits fully qualify him to celebrate the retired and courtly joys of an oriental harem. His dreamy, luscious poetry suits well an opium-eater's fancies of the Mohammedan heaven. But this grace and gallantry is by no means a characteristic of the ancient classics. Their voluptuousness is coarse and material. If they have any thing gross to say, they say it in the plainest and most unmistakable manner. They love wine because they like to be drunk, and they make no scruple of avowing their partiality. Their Epicureans are emphatically sensual writers, and their sensuality is unredeemed and undisguised by any tinge of sentiment or gallantry.

Anacreon, the preface to the translation would have us believe, is an exception to this general rule. He, we are told, possesses more refinement, more gallantry than his compeers. We have looked in vain for any indications of this refined sentiment in the Greek. He is, indeed, by no means so gross as Horace or Catullus. He has written of pleasure, and scruples not to avow himself its votary, but he is equally removed from the disgusting plainness of the Latins, and the voluptuous lusciousness of his English translator. Still, he is an ancient, a thorough ancient. He speaks of love, the ancient love, often and plainly, and presents to us the lamentable picture of an old man nursing the memory of by-gone sins, and fanning the dying embers of those desires which disgraced his youth by their untamed excesses. He seems to be immeasurably thankful to the Gods, that they have at least left him in his old age, the privilege and the power of getting drunk. Wine and love are the great themes of his muse, but now and then, in the midst of his revelling, the form of death throws its cold shadow over the flowers that lie sprinkled about him. He pauses one awe-struck moment, and then dashes on in his reckless round of pleasure. That he is old, that his feeble feet are tottering along the crumbling margin of the open grave, he occasionally admits, but he braves it out with the swaggering τῷ γέροντι μάλλον

Πρέπει τὰ τερπνὰ καίσειν,
Ὅσσιν κίχλας τὰ μοίρης.

He is then no sentimentalist, but a plain-spoken debauchee, whose poetry depends, for the interest it excites in the reader's mind, more upon the attendant circumstances of his revels than upon the revels themselves. The spring-time with its flowers and breezes, the cup-bearer Cupid, the groves shadowing the temple, the doves, the dancing graces, the distant view of the calm ocean, the garlands of flowers that crown his fevered brow, the carved work of his goblet—these, and such as these, are the images which linger in our memory. It is the innocent portion of the Anacreontics which gives them their peculiar charm. How different from the translator's own voluptuous poetry, in which every thing is made subordinate to an exquisite sensuality which forms at once the ground-work and entire interest of every poem.

To leave these generalities, let us see how Moore has discharged the duties of a translator in particulars. The first fault we find with him is, that he has made no attempt to distinguish the genuine from the spurious odes of Anacreon. That the first ode in the translation is not the production of the Teian is manifest from its own internal evidence, as any one may see who reads it with the slightest attention. Yet the translator gives it to us as genuine, and finds fault with others who, on his own favorite authority, the Vatican MS., attribute it with much show of reason, to Basilus. The same negligence is apparent throughout this work. He takes the MS. alluded to, as paramount authority, and receives as genuine all the odes which it contains. He seems to dread only the clumsy ecclesiastical versifiers of the early days of the church, but to have no apprehension of those infinitely more pestilent tribes, the grammarians and the emanuenses. The awkward emendations and interpolations of these self-sufficient people, have defaced some of the most beautiful passages in the Greek and Latin classics. They have been at their work with the author before us. The consequence is, that but few of the poems usually attributed to Anacreon are the genuine productions of that exquisite poet. De Pauw, a skeptical and phlegmatic Dutchman, who has given to the world a laborious edition, has gone so far as to declare, that he does not believe any of the odes except a few fragments, to be Anacreon's. "Ambigo maximopere," says he, "an inter hæc Anacreontica vel unum sit hodiè quod pro genuino Anacreontis factu haberi queat." He assigns several reasons for his incredulity, the principal of which is, that, according to the ancients, Anacreon wrote wholly in the Ionic dialect, whereas, in the odes attributed to him, there are scarcely any specimens of this dialect.

If our translator has failed in the critical part of his work, he has come no less short of his duty in rendering the language. One of the most striking characteristics of Anacreon is his simplicity of diction. He is sparing in the use of similes and very parsimonious in epithets. He rarely uses an adjective, and never a compound word, unless it is very material to the idea he wishes to convey. He uses his language to express his thoughts, not merely to embellish his pages. There is very little tendency to diffuseness about him, much less than in Horace. His language in the unadulterated odes is like a transparent stream which permits all it contains to be clearly seen, and gives a lustre to every thing it covers. Moore, on the other hand, is delighted to hear himself sing. His language is copious in adjectives and rich in epithets, usually well placed and picturesque, but sometimes most shockingly malapropos. These all, however, remind us of varnishes of various brilliant tints spread over a fine picture. However beautiful their colors may be, they do but conceal the sober harmony of the original coloring. As a necessary consequence of all this, he is very diffuse, spreading out his meaning in broad, thin, beautiful washes, where he should have concentrated it in strong, spirited touches. A few extracts will fully exemplify our meaning. We shall not take the well-known ode ὄδω λέγειν Ἀρετίδας, for he, himself, admits that it is rendered "rather paraphrastically." The version has in truth, scarcely one recognizable feature of the original. Let us quote from its neighbor the 24th of that translation, the 2d of the common editions. ἕβεις κίπαρα ταύροις κ. τ. λ. The literal rendering is as follows:

Nature gave horns to bulls,
And hoofs to horses ;
Swiftness of foot to hares,
To lions a chasm of teeth ;
To fish the power of swimming,
To birds the power of flying, &c.

Now let us have what Moore calls a translation.

To all that breathe the airs of heaven,
Some boon of strength has nature given.
When the majestic bull was born,
She fenced his brow with wreathed horn,
She arm'd the courser's foot of air,
And winged with speed the panting hare.
She gave the lion fangs of terror,
And on the ocean's crystal mirror
Taught the wasp's scaly throng
To trace their liquid path along ;
While for the umbrage of the grove,
She plumed the warbling world of love."

Here is not only a dilution almost Homœopathic of the meaning, but a total sacrifice of all the character and strength of the original. What a tame, common-place substitute for the striking figure "chasm of teeth," is the "fangs of terror" in the English translation. The first two lines are interpolated. The words in italics are unauthorized by the text. We are willing to allow some latitude of expression to a writer who translates a foreign poem into English verse, but so wide a range as this, is, to our notion, utterly inadmissible. Nothing can excuse such slovenly Hibernicisms, as first swimming on the ocean, and a foot of air being armed. These are by no means isolated instances. We are constantly meeting with wholly unauthorized conceits, to wit :

"She gave thee beauty, shaft of eyes,
That every shaft of war outflies !
She gave thee beauty, blush of fern,
That bids the flames of war retire !
Woman ! be fair, we must adore thee,
Smile, and a world is weak before thee !"

Now, what is the authority for all this ? The original says simply :

"What gave she them ? Beauty,
Stronger than any sabre,
Stronger than any spear,—
She conquers fire and iron,
That woman who has beauty."

Such a version as this, is not sufficiently close to the original to be called even an imitation. It is not a paraphrase, because it does not expand the ideas of the Greek, but substitutes new ones wholly foreign to the subject.

In the twenty-sixth ode we have these words :

"'Twas not the crested warrior's dart,
Which drank the current of my heart,
Nor naval arms, nor mailed steed,
Have made this vanquished bosom bleed :
No—from an eye of liquid blue,
A host of quivered Cupids flew,
And now my heart all bleeding lies
Beneath this army of the eyes."

How pressed down and running over with sweets of language is this ode. Adjectives spring up over it and through it, in the greatest abundance. Nor do we deny that they have their beauty ; but we must contend that that beauty is by no means Anacreontic. What says the ode ? the following is a bold translation.

A horse did not destroy me,
Nor infantry, nor ships :
But another new army,
Wounding me from eyes.

One adjective, new, in the whole passage. The 17th ode of the common edition, the 4th of Moore's translation, begins as follows, rendered literally—

"Carving the silver,
O Vulcan! make me
Not a panoply,
(For what are wars to me?)
But a hollow goblet,
As deep as possible,
And carve upon it
Neither the stars* nor the main,
Nor sad Orion, &c."

Moore's version runs:

"Vulcan hear your glorious task;
I do not from your labors ask
In gorgeous panoply to shine,
For war was ne'er a sport of mine.
No—let me have a silver bowl
Where I may cradle all my soul;
But let not o'er its simple frame
Your mimic constellations flame
Nor grave upon the swelling side
Orion scowling o'er the tide, &c."

The sixth line is a conceit as unwarrantable as any in the worst passages of Pope's Iliad.

We should not be disposed to censure our poet so strongly for his use of adjectives if they aided the sense at all. But this they rarely do. They usually but display the fancy of the translator and his command of language without shedding one additional ray upon the meaning of the passage. Sometimes they seem designed to add some touches which the author forgot, to put in some scenery which the Greek left out. If so, the design is in as bad taste as though a painter should copy the figure of the Greek Slave, color the flesh and the trinkets about her, and then fill up the spare canvass with the slave-bazaar and the crowds of higgling dealers. Often these expletives are supremely absurd. We ask our readers if any admirer of Anacreon, (for such we profess ourselves) is not fully authorized to grumble at a translator who makes the old Greek ask Vulcan to carve him a "rose-lipped maid" in silver, as Moore does in the ode just cited?

A graver fault than these is one which we have already hinted at in our remarks on the general character of the translator's poetry. There is, in this version, a disposition to linger round voluptuous thoughts, and, as it were, to fondle on them, which we do not find in the original. The Greek says what he has to say, plainly but neither grossly nor glowingly. The Irishman helps him out, and gives a new spice and flavor to his verse, e. g.—

* By the stars, the Greeks particularly understood the constellations of Canis Major and Canis Minor. The wain, as our readers are aware, is the cluster of large stars in Ursa Major.

Καλὸς τε καὶ φιλῶνος.

"Beauty sparkled in his eye;
Sparkled in his eye of fire
Through the mist of soft desire." Moore.

Μεθύων ἕως χορῆσῶ

Literally,

So that becoming drunk I may dance

"And when the cluster's mellowing dews
Their warm, enchanting balm infuse,
Our feet shall catch the elastic bound,
And reel as through the dance's round, &c. Moore.

Ὅπου καλαὶ γυναῖκες.

Literally,

Where are pretty women—

"Where the glowing wantons rove." Moore.

Σύρους—The Syrians.

—"The amorous Syrian dames." Moore.

Χαρίττεσσι συγχορῆσῶ

Literally,

Dancing with the Graces

"When, with the blushing naked Graces,
The wanton winding dance he traces." Moore.

Παρὰ σθῆς, Διόνυσσ, σκεδῆς, κ. τ. λ.

Literally,

Near thy temples, O Bacchus,
With a deep-bosomed damsel,
Crowned with rosy garlands
I will dance.

"Great Bacchus! in thy hallowed shade,
With some celestial, glowing maid,
While gales of roses round me rise,
In perfume sweetened by her sighs,
I'll bill and twine in early dance,
Commingling soul with every glance.—Moore.

We might multiply examples like these indefinitely. They are scattered over the whole book. We will not, however, condemn universally. Though we cannot admit the translation, as a whole, to be good, it contains some fine phrases in which the original is beautifully and truthfully expanded. Thus what an admirable copy of Μεῖ δίδωκε μὲτε μίγει in Moore's line,

"Just commingling, just dividing."

It is impossible also to withhold our admiration from the expansion of Anacreon's thoughts in the following lines from the same ode, though they certainly far outran the sober limits of a translation, and abound in the faults we have elsewhere commented upon :

"Then her lip, so rich in blisses!
Sweet petitioner for kisses!
Pouting nest of bland persuasion
Ripely suing love's invasion."

We would not be understood as being disposed to underrate our poet's lyrical abilities. Far from it. As an original writer of brilliant and touching scraps of song, we consider him above any recent poet. Few have written so much and so well. His longer poems have always appeared too diffuse, and altogether too cloying. The richness and sweetness of language which is charming in a song becomes wearisome in a longer poem. A drop of otto of roses on a pocket handkerchief is delicious, but a gallon of it, spilt in a parlor, suffocates us.

But, to return to Anacreon. We have ventured to translate into a short blank verse one of the most beautiful odes—one which drew from the saturnine De Pauw himself the exclamation, "Odarium mellitum et vere elegans!" and to present it to our readers in company with Mr. Moore's version, which is one of the closest he has made. In doing this, we are fully sensible of the awkward position in which we place ourselves, but we think the edge of ridicule may be turned by assuring our readers that we do not pretend to a spark of the mens diviniæ—that we have attempted nothing but the closest possible copy of the original, and the nearest approach we were able to make to the Greek measure, in order that those who do not read the classics might have the opportunity of estimating for themselves the merits of the version under consideration. Fidelity then being the only merit we claim for our piece, we make no more modest speeches, but present at once our humble effort.

Once about the hour of midnight,
When the Bear was slowly turning,
By Boötes' hand directed;
And the many tribes of mortals
Lay, with weariness o'erpowered ;—
Then the god of love, approaching,
At my doors commenced a-knocking.
"Who," said I, "my door is pounding!
All my dreams thus interrupting."
Then Love answered, "Open, prithee!
I'm a child, you need not fear me!
And I'm wet, for I have wandered
All this night of moonless darkness."
Hearing this, the child I pitied,
And at once a lamp I lighted,
Oped the door, and saw an infant.
In his hand a bow he carried,
Wings behind him and a quiver.
Close beside the hearth I placed him,

In my palms his little fingers
Warm'd I, and from out his ringlets
Softly pressed the dripping water.
But, when we had thoroughly warmed him—
"Come," said he, "let's make a trial
Of this bow, how far 'tis injured
By its string's unlucky wetting!"
And he draws it—sharp he smites me,
Like a gad-fly, through the liver.
Up he leapeth, loudly laughing—
"Hoist!" said he, "congratulate me,
For, indeed, my bow 's uninjured,
But your heart!—ah, it shall sicken."

This is almost exactly literal, line for line, word for word, phrase for phrase. Moore's translation follows :

'Twas noon of night, when round the pole
The sullen Bear is seen to roll;
And mortals, wearied with the day,
Are slumbering all their cares away:
An infant, at that dreary hour,
Came weeping to my silent bower,
And waked me with a piteous prayer,
To save him from the midnight air!
"And who art thou," I waking cry,
"That bid'st my blissful visions fly?"
"O gentle sire!" the infant said,
"In pity take me to thy shed;
Nor fear deceit: a lonely child
I wander o'er the gloomy wild.
Chill drops the rain and not a ray
Illumes the drear and misty way!"
I hear the baby's tale of woe;
I hear the bitter night winds blow;
And, sighing for his piteous fate,
I trimmed my lamp and oped the gate.
'Twas Love! the little wandering sprite,
His pinion sparkled through the night!
I knew him by his bow and dart;
I knew him by my fluttering heart!
I take him in, and fondly raise
The dying embers' cheering blaze;
Press from his dank and clinging hair
The crystals of the freezing air,
And in my hand and bosom hold
His little fingers thrilling cold.
And now the embers' genial ray
Hath warmed his anxious fears away;
"I pray thee," said the wanton child,
(My bosom trembled as he smiled,)
"I pray thee let me try my bow,
For through the rain I've wandered so,
That much I fear the ceaseless shower
Has injured its elastic power."
The fatal bow the urchin drew;
Swift from the string the arrow flew;
Oh! swift it flew as glancing flame,
And to my very soul it came!
"Fare thee well!" I heard him say,
As laughing wild he winged away;
"Fare thee well, for now I know
The rain has not relaxed my bow;
It still can send a maddening dart,
As thou shalt own with all thy heart!"

Baltimore, 1849.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1849, by John R. Thompson, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia.]

THE CHEVALIER MERLIN.

CHAPTER TENTH.

"Sir Belthazar did shake the silver bells of his bridle reins, and waft back from the tips of his gauntlet an adieu to that bright and now tearful beauty, whereof he had been the prisoner. Saying, in confirmation of these motions significant of the parting, 'Beautiful princess farewell! Love hath for too long a season subjected Belthazar the adventurous knight. But his ornaments shall now be arms, and not the silken robes, his pastime war and not the dance; instead of thy two lamps of love which are going out in the stream of thy tears, the stars which shine down on the world shall light him to his rightly rest.'"

The Monkish romance of Sir Belthazar.

The Norwegian passed the night which had begun with developments so important to his happiness, and which had brought to him honors so unexpected, in the solitude of his chamber, in the astrologer's tower. His reflections upon the recent scene with the elector were not without a tinge of that distrust, which had for some time aided to render his life at the chateau miserable. It might be that the good prince had made a butt of him. The romance of Cervantes had not escaped his reading, and there were points in that inimitable narrative which seemed to bear a suspicious resemblance to his own recent promotion to chivalric dignities. But he dismissed this suspicion after a time, and gave himself to grave and pure thoughts.

Whilst the revel of the elector continued, he prayed in the privacy of his turret chamber. The strong man, humbled before God, confessed his offences, and besought aid in the task of self-purification.

The morning star blazed like a beacon before his devotions were ended. Then he sought sleep, to prepare himself for the toilsome journey which by a swift determination he had fixed upon that day to begin.

A morning bright and beautiful, and strangely gorgeous in its early hues, followed the night so spent. The very fires of the sun were of dull effect compared with the floating splendours of that atmosphere which had promised his advent. The undulating country, plain and wooded, wearing the motley of autumn, and covered with the jewelry of the frost-rime, lay like some region of enchantment, as the early hours advanced above it.

At the third hour after dawn, the inmates of the chateau were astir with some unusual preparation. The elector Augustus was, in fact, preparing to take the field, to hunt the wild cattle which were then to be found in that and the neighboring palatinates of Poland. The revels of the preceding night had belated him, and lost him the dews which all good huntsmen delight to brush away when they go upon the chase. He was about to mount his horse, when Merlin came into the court and interrupted his departure with an account of the adventure with the strange cavaliers on the day before. He had been enabled to recal, and now mentioned, the obscure language of one of the strangers concerning the Sobieskis—the fact that the royal title was used in addressing him—and the declaration made, at his release, that he had been mistaken for another.

"It is clear," said the Norwegian, "that these strangers mistook me for your majesty. Many things disquieted and engrossed me upon my return last night, and it is only this morning that I have reverted to the subject, and perceived your majesty's probable danger."

"Thanks, chevalier," said Augustus; "you have done me a real and valuable service."

He interchanged some thoughtful glances with D'Imhoff, and then promptly dismissed his attendants who were in the bustle of mounting.

"I am reminded," he added to the Norwegian, "that it was your purpose to set off, to-day, upon a journey to the camp of the king of Sweden. Do you still adhere to that purpose?"

"I still adhere to it, sire."

"You spoke last night," continued Augustus, "of my munificence. The hands of my generosity are somewhat empty at present. Your God-fearing Swedes do not rob, but in an upright and lawful manner they do drain princes and nations quite effectually. But I still retain some means of manifesting my favour to a brave gentleman."

"Your majesty's kind and courteous language," said the Norwegian, "would alone be an ample and honourable reward for the most valuable services."

The Elector received this speech with a smile of pleasure.

"Nevertheless," he said, "we must find some more solid means of showing a royal regard—which, for the dignity of princes, if for no other reason, should dispense bounty as its proof. The knight, my dear chevalier, whom you likened to the Paladins, possesses in spite of his poverty a good sword and a strong charger to bestow upon a comrade."

"Sire," said Merlin, with some embarrassment, "I came to the castle a poor soldier. Permit me to leave it a poor soldier. I have honest motives for so ungracious a request to your majesty."

This honest motive, which the Norwegian scarcely defined to himself, was but the desire, in leaving the scene of those voluptuous sins which had for a time controlled him, to regain in every respect his former sober simplicity.

Augustus replied to his request indirectly.—“Chevalier, permit me to wield your sword. If the weapon prove trustworthy, continue to use it in helping out your fortunes, and defending your life.”

Merlin unsheathed his huge sword, which had formerly elicited those criticisms of Captain Piper, and grasping the blade presented the hilt to the Elector. The latter ordered a casque, and the sword of Duke Hildebrand, which he had used in bestowing knighthood upon the Norwegian, to be brought.

The casque was placed upon the flags of the court. The Elector, swaying Merlin's sword about his head, gathered his full strength, and dealt a tremendous blow upon the burnished head-piece. The blade, deficient in the temper requisite for so rude a trial, broke. Then with the sword of Duke Hildebrand, he dealt a similar blow. That better weapon, glittering and trenchant, penetrated to the hollow of the casque without loss of edge. Then Augustus, presenting the trusty weapon to the Norwegian, said :

“By destroying your sword I make your acceptance of a substitute for it necessary. Chevalier, remember that the gifts of kings carry no degradation with them; also that a king uncrowned will detect, in the refusal to accept his bounty, certain unpleasant reflections upon his fallen fortunes.”

To this Merlin answered :

“After what your majesty has just said, I cannot persevere in rejecting your bounty, which, nevertheless, sire, I have in no manner earned.”

“This, my dear chevalier, is as it should be,” said the Elector; then to one of his attendants—“Bring forth Galba, the young Hungarian charger.”

Presently a noble war-horse—a gigantic black-dun, mottled and glossy, with wide thin nostrils, bright and fierce eyes, a grandly arched crest, and vast strength and vast speed evident in his form and carriage—plunged into the court, dragging his grooms and greeting the spectators with a neigh like the clangour of trumpets.

“This steed is of the best blood of Hungary,” said Augustus. “He has never snuffed the airs of a battle. Receive the good horse, Chevalier. He would swim the Styx if you exacted such a feat of him, and charge the hosts of Tartarus with furious nostrils and a spirit as infernal as any that he pursued. He is imperial; his name also is imperial. It is Galba. He is quite too noble for any chace except of men.”

The gallant horse was equipped in sumptuous housings. The Elector vaulted to his back, and coursed him to and fro, in the extensive courtyard, exhibiting him as the Cid with flying mini-ver did the renowned Baveca to king Alphonso. Among the lookers-on were two persons in a balcony above—the Countess of Konigsmark, and Maurice, the youth whom she met with carresses, in a former scene. The Countess waved a scarf, and seemed much animated by the spectacle. The boy looked on in silence, but with flushed cheeks, a quiver of the nostrils, and a light in his eyes which betokened a spirit of kindred with that of the young war horse in the court below. This boy was indeed of the heroic temper. Like the untried charger he as yet but snuffed the battle from afar; but in after times he became first and truest, amidst the thunder of the captains and the shouting. When the king of Sweden, Peter the Czar, the English Marlborough, Eugene, Augustus who reined the wild horse, were gone from the stage, this boy Maurice succeeded them as the first soldier of Europe. The reader, doubtless, from what I say, recognises in this youth that gallant bastard, the son of Frederick Augustus and his mistress the Countess of Konigsmark, Maurice, Count de Saxe, hero of Fontenoy, marshal, and saviour, of France.

“Chevalier,” said the Elector when he had dismounted, “the sword and charger will both stand you in good stead. Accept them both, and remember the giver as one upon whom you have made an excellent impression.” He presently added, “The grand chancellor of the order of the White Eagle will issue your patent of knighthood. In the delay which must attend its issue and transmission, so stout a soldier will doubtless have earned it with high actions. Drive Galba and the steel of Duke Hildebrand as deeply as you please into the ranks of our old ally, Peter—of whom, however, not the whole of some recent descriptive remarks, which you may recal, should be taken for unexaggerated truth. There is good assurance, Chevalier, in your frank and gallant demeanour, that the honours which have been bestowed upon you have not been conferred unwisely.”

Merlin received the steed and sword and complimentary speech of the Elector with a manly courtesy, which retained nothing of his original reluctance.

Soon afterward D'Imhoff sought and found an opportunity for private conversation with him.

“Sir,” said the grave courtier, “you have doubtless wondered that the Elector of Saxony should have singled you out as the mark of his peculiar favour.”

Merlin answered :

“I have not wondered at it. Perhaps because other reflections have occupied me. Perhaps because I have not been sufficiently impressed with my own unworthiness."

The gravity of the courtier acquired a tinge of displeasure. "I will nevertheless," he said, "venture to suggest the motives to a favour, which you seem disposed to attribute wholly to your own worth. First, then, the wishes of the Countess of Konigsmark have had an influence. Secondly, you have perhaps saved the Elector from seizure and captivity by your disclosure of a recent adventure. Thirdly, you were so fortunate as to speak in terms of compliment of the good prince whilst ignorant of his quality. But finally, sir, and I pray your particular attention to this, the Elector of Saxony desires to bind you to him by an exalted regard which will render it impossible that as a man of feeling, and of a nice honour, you can speak freely and commonly of your sojourn in this place—or at least of some of its more delicate circumstances."

"I comprehend you fully," Merlin replied, "and be assured that I shall be most tender of the reputation of the Countess of Konigsmark. I must not suspect, Monsieur, that the Elector designs to buy my silence."

"I do believe," said the Chevalier D'Imhoff, calmly and briefly, "that I have given the true interpretation when I said the Elector of Saxony aimed to secure your silence, not with a price but by binding you to him with the bonds of an honorable and exalted regard."

Here the soldier and courtier parted. Some hours later, Merlin, reining the horse Galba, and wearing at his side the sword of Duke Hildebrand, passed the drawbridge of the Chateau d'Amour, and rode southward. The island of Circe was left behind. A sea whose dangers were not few lay before, but its dangers were such as may destroy without ignominy—such as the brave and wise prefer to the softer perils which waylay fame rather than life. His spirits, as a fresh autumnal wind smote his cheeks, became buoyant. In his escape, from what he had deemed a fatal and irrevocable false step, to freedom he triumphed prospectively over all obstacles. His career lay once more open to him. Its meed was the same which he had proposed to himself before he came within the charmed circle of the Chateau d'Amour. The last few months were after all but a dream. The reality lay before and after them. What effect the dream might have upon his future, how unforgiving might be those in whom the best happiness of his future rested, he was too new to freedom to tame himself to the task of conjecturing.

But he was not yet wholly escaped from the inmates of the castle. He had placed a rolling tract of country, whose crisp grass, and the serene foliage of whose occasional clumps of trees, marked the advance of the seasons to the verge of winter, between himself and the walls which he had recently left. The swelling upland concealed all save the battlements of the castle, and they were becoming vague in the distance. Over the crest of this elevated tract, on his path, came two women on galloping palfreys. He was presently aware of their approach, and stopped on his course.

She who rode foremost was the Countess of Konigsmark. The gallop had brightened her complexion, and increased her voluptuous beauty; her scarlet lip just moved with a slight pant, and her deep bosom rose and fell quickly. Her companion was Judith, one of her damsels, a black-eyed girl with oriental features. The palfreys, slender creatures, limbed like wild deer, were reined up, impatient and scarcely restrainable after their race, at the Norwegian's side. The robes of both riders were in pretty disorder, and the Countess laughed as they were coyly rearranged.

"Ah! Sir Merlin," she exclaimed, "I repented of that stupid state which has to-day been observed between us. I desired, moreover, to make you my messenger, in important affairs, to the King of Sweden. Therefore I am here to arrest you for a moment."

"Your honour me highly, madam," Merlin answered. "I will deliver your missive to the king."

"You speak like some man made of wood," said the Countess petulantly. "You are forbidding enough in your looks to enrage me, but upon reflection I will not be enraged. Monsieur, do not fear that I will annoy you with the least sentiment. I cannot be so cold as yourself, but I can be quite decorous."

"Forgive me, madam"—Merlin began, and would have continued, but the Countess interrupted him:—

"You say 'forgive me,' in a manner which of itself I could not forgive, if I had time to punish you. Sir Merlin, you are without that passion which animates and produces fervour of demeanour. It is an unpleasant reflection to me that you are so. My spell has failed with you. You are unscathed, and the knowledge of the fact wounds my self-love. But it is better for both that, in destroying ties, you have to tear away no profound passion rooted in the heart. If you spurred away from me a broken-hearted knight, the consciousness of your pangs would seriously affect my spirits for some time. Giant, is there no smile in your magazine of graces? My dear Judith, hast thou ever encountered such a bear?"

The Norwegian, pelted with words rough and gentle, sad and gay, compelled a smile to his face, and replied :

"I am not mirthful, noble lady ; but you will find me always, in all things, a faithful if not an entertaining servant, and willing to imperil life in your cause."

"My friend, I know it," said the Countess kindly, "you are gallant; and you have something not wholly unlike a tender regard for poor Hermione, who, for a time, made you a dutiful wife—did she not? But enough of this. You consent to be my messenger to the king."

She placed in his hands a roll strongly bound with threads of silk, sealed, and addressed to the King of Sweden.

"Farewell gentleman," she resumed. "Soon I will repossess the borders of Saxony; you are to wander hereafter with the will of Charles to conduct you; perhaps you will journey to Cathay—St. George and St. Julian best know whither your travel leads. But it may be that again in this world we shall meet. I will not forget you. I do not ask an enforced remembrance from yourself. Farewell."

Her ungloved hand, whiter than marble and softer than velvet was surrendered to his lips. The tone of her final words had touched him, and he responded to them with much feeling. The Countess, assuming a gay air, wheeled her palfrey, made a pretty gesture with the white hand, and followed by Judith rode away with flying robes in the direction of the chateau. As the beautiful riders passed the crest of the uplands, the Chevalier Merlin, pursuing his route, entered a forest whose leaves of many hues, detached by the breath of the autumnal wind, were rustling in their slow descent to the earth.

CHAPTER ELEVENTH.

"And from the bellowing east,
In this dire season, oft the whirlwind's wing
Sweeps up the burden of whole wintry plains
At one wide waft, * * * * *
* * * * * till upward urged,
The valley to a shining mountain swells
Tipt with a wreath high curling in the sky.
As thus the snows arise; and foul and fierce
All winter drives along the darkened air;
The traveller sees other hills ascend
Of unknown joyless brows; and other scenes,
Of horrid prospect, shag the trackless plain:
Nor finds the river, nor the forest, hid
Beneath the formless wild; but wanders on
From hill to dales, still more and more astray."

Thomson's Winter.

We must lose sight of our adventurer at his entrance into a forest of Poland, and join him again in a different land. But before we rejoin him, something must be recalled of those events which attended the King of Sweden in his daring enterprise, and prepared the way for the disasters of Pultowa.

When Charles passed the Boristhenes, early in September of the year 1708, he led the finest army on earth. This noble army had never sustained defeat. Its equipments were perfect. Extraordinary means had been adopted to secure its subsistence in the hostile country to which its banners were pointed. Two victories since the passage of the Beresina, that river of blood in the later memories of the world, had been added to the catalogue of its gallant achievements—those of Borislow and Hollostin. Driving the Czar before him, Charles passed the Boristhenes, came near Smolensko, and there on a bloody field won a third important battle. Then the step fatal to his fortunes was taken. His supplies were beginning to be exhausted; Moscow lay a hundred French leagues distant; his army had been thinned by its victories. His generals, and Count Piper, his minister, counselled that he should await where he was the arrival of General Lewenhaupt, who followed him with fifteen thousand Swedes, and abundant supplies of ammunition and provisions. This counsel was volunteered—not asked. It was a peculiarity of Charles never to ask counsel: and, if it came unsought, to reject it coldly as in some sort reflecting upon his ability to think for himself. The young conqueror was, in fact, self-willed, perverse, and of indomitable obstinacy; above all he likewise possessed a prodigious vanity, a vanity too profound and too wide to be ruffled into trifling displays by trifling causes, and which therefore escaped the scrutiny of many of his cotemporaries. Against the counsel of his generals and minister he formed a plan of his own; it was to march to the Ukraine, the country of the Cossacks.

This country lying southward, on the Boristhenes, its nearest border a hundred leagues from Smolensko, was a subject province of the Czar. The General of the Ukraine, an officer appointed by the court of Moscow, was at that time the celebrated Mazeppa. Mazeppa sat one day at the Czar's table, at Moscow. The emperor proposed to him the task of introducing amongst the Cossacks the common forms of European discipline, as a means of rendering them more docile and controllable. Mazeppa replied that the situation of the Ukraine, and the genius of the nation were insuperable obstacles to such a scheme. The Czar, not always master of his passions when sober, was at the time over-heated with wine: he called the Prince of the Ukraine a traitor, and threatened to impale him. Mazeppa rode back to Bathurin, his capitol, meditating upon the insult and his danger. His Polish fire, and love of liberty, matured his meditations into a scheme of revolt. Charles XII. came upon the frontier of Muscovy opportunely for his purposes. Brave, enterprising and indefatigable, he entered secretly into a league with the victorious monarch. Charles appointed a rendezvous near the river Desna. Mazeppa engaged to meet him there with thirty thousand men, with ammunition and other supplies, also with his treasures which were immense. The winter would be passed by the united princes in the Ukraine; with the opening of spring their joint forces would penetrate to Moscow, and strike the heart of the Czar's power. It was to the banks of the Desna then, that the king of Sweden, refusing to await Lewenhaupt, determined to take his way from Smolensko.

He began his southward march. All former obstructions were trifling in comparison with those encountered in this new route. The army crossed a marshy forest fifty leagues in breadth, was misled in its course, and lost nearly the whole of its artillery and wagons in the mud of the morasses.

At length the Swedes, exhausted with hunger and fatigue, arrived on the banks of the Desna, at the spot marked out by Mazeppa for the meeting. The Hetman with his thirty thousand Cossacks was not there. An army of the Czar was. And, what was worse, these gathering enemies were the stormy petrels of one of those terrific winters which have seemed to spring up, at the direct need, to guard the land of the Russian against invasion.

Over the Desna, driving the enemy before him, passed the King of Sweden, and wandered with his hungry army into the plains, scanning the horizon constantly to discover the coming force of Mazeppa the Hetman.

With so much of prelude let us rejoin the Chevalier Merlin.

The sun was rising over a waste region of the Ukraine. A little stream, the banks of which were lined with marsh-oaks, broke the sameness of a scene otherwise treeless, and now barren with winter. On the yellow grass which covered the narrow low-ground of this stream, a large and noble looking horse fed. He was without saddle or bridle, and secured with thongs at the pasterns. Not far from the horse in a spot somewhat sheltered by the swelling bank, lay a mass of armour and furred garments near a spent fire. The mass was quite motionless. The rays of the morning sun had not reached it. Even in the wilderness, and in winter when not a bird sings his matins from tree or cloud, nature seems to mark the beginning of day with fresh sounds. Winds lose the melancholy moan of night and voice themselves more cheerfully, as if in echo to some jubilant ringing out of clarions from the heralds of the morning. Waters, as if night, like a mantle, had muffled them, and impeded their speed, seem to run with a blither freedom, and throw from their currents a sharper music, when the growing light of day begins to mottle their silver with vagrant gleams, red and tremulous. But with such more cheerful sounds, which day awakened in that winter waste of the Ukraine, very soon came others of a less mysterious kind. A troop of wild horses, scudding across the plain, drew onward to the stream, their hoofs ringing against the frosty ground. They were shaggy, thin-limbed and full of the grace of freedom. The charger feeding on the flats, challenged them with a shrill neigh. The pile of armour and furred garments, which had remained motionless to that moment, suddenly stirred, and, getting upon a pair of iron legs, took the form of a gigantic soldier, erect, and watchful of danger. The giant was the Chevalier Merlin, advanced so far to the Swedish camp, and now nearly frozen from his long sleep on the grass. He saw the troop of wild horses. As he watched their motions their rear-guard wheeled and came to a stand, staring, with high heads and pointed ears, toward the part of the plain from which they had come. The front ranks of the troop continued their course, plunging, jerking their heels, and dashing their long manes in stormy disorder, until they were separated by a considerable space from the arrested rear. Then, however, as if at a signal from those behind, they also wheeled and, one by one, with the same elevation of the head and forward pointing of the ears, returned to join the group which stared back into the plain. Merlin was soon in the saddle, and prepared to avoid or encounter any danger which the wild horses might have detected in the distance. He rode to a point from which he could better survey the waste. From this point he saw five horsemen riding at great speed. They were coming in a line which would bring them quite near to him. He determined to await their coming. He had been alone long enough to crave fellowship with man; moreover he desired to gain information of the Swedish army; finally he did not shrink from a hostile encounter with five enemies, if these should prove to be enemies. Whilst he stood his ground resolutely the strangers drew near enough to be observed with tolerable clearness. They were Cossacks, and rode small couriers of rare fleetness. Their attention seemed to be fixed by the wild horses—these were scampering away, neighing, bounding high, and shaking the plain with their flight. Merlin, when the strangers were within reach of his voice called to them. They drew rein and looked towards him. He made signals of peace; these were presently returned, and one of the five came forward, the others following at a short distance. He who thus came forward was an old man with a long and thick beard, as white as snow, but with none of the feebleness of age visible in either person or countenance. His face was stony-hard, and swarthy, and lighted with small black eyes as penetrative and unquailing as a falcon's. He sat erect on his shaggy Tartar; he was low of stature, but with Herculean shoulders, and his frame seemed to present angles of iron to the jacket of dyed wool and the short heavy cloak which he wore loosely belted. A tall conical cap, made entirely of white furs, rose like a sugar loaf from his head. Wide pantaloons of a thick elastic cloth looking like close net-work, laid down at the seams with gold lace, and boots of yellow leather completed his costume. His arms were a sabre glittering with precious stones, and a light lance with a silken pennon near its steel point. As this gallant looking old man came on, Merlin advanced to meet him. It was in tolerably pure Latin—which venerable language is to a great extent in use among the inhabitants of portions of the country adjacent to the Ukraine—that the Cossack addressed the Norwegian.

"Peace and good-will abide with us and between us," he said.

Merlin drew upon the stores of the metropolitan Bishop of Aggerhuus, and answered:

"It is peace that I also, not dreading war, desire. Truly let amity prevail between us."

"It shall be so," said the wearer of the white beard, who then stroked that natural ornament, and was silent, like a man whose words are valuable.

Merlin broke the silence which followed, by saying:

"Where there is amity there should be confidence."

"It is true," replied the Cossack.

"Therefore tell me," Merlin continued, "with which of the hostile powers you hold—the Swede or the Muscovite."

"We are five men," the Cossack answered. "You are one man. Confidence should begin with the strong, and not with the weaker. Therefore I speak first, and with a straight tongue. We are friends of the King of Sweden, and now ride to his camp."

"Then we are well met," said Merlin. "That camp is also my destination. If you do not reject my companionship we will ride together. Truly these pathless plains bewilder the mind of the traveller. Your better knowledge will conduct me on a straight course."

The Cossack chief, for such his equipment, and the submissive demeanour of his party bespoke him, looked to the sun which by this was midway of its morning quarter in the heavens, and presently said:

"Thirty leagues are to be overcome. Yonder circle about the sun gives promise of stormy weather. If you travel with us, your spurs must be keen. Come, brother: we are even now dropping precious moments, like pearls from a string."

The Cossacks were presently in swift motion, bending forward in the saddle as if devouring the air. The journey seemed to become a race. Merlin held his position with the foremost, and sitting erect with the immense Hungarian charger bounding under him with haughty neck curved and mane and tail streaming, made a strong contrast to the white-bearded Cossack and his slight courser, whose gait seemed as equal and as swift as the flight of a bird.

The route of the party led in a direction a little north of east. The sun shone in their faces. The stormy circle grew less defined about it. At last it quite faded in a growing haze which dimmed the lustre of the orb itself—dimmed it more and more as the day advanced. The wind which had blown freshly from the north-east, lulled as the sun became veiled. The air grew warmer. The haze of the horizon before them had gradually thickened until it became a bank of white cloud. White—white—nothing but the whiteness of death garments! The very plain, the skeletons of the few trees, seemed to have been touched with a ghastly white.

"What does this betoken?" said Merlin, waving his hand from the sky to the plain.

"A storm of snow," answered the Cossack chief.

Without change of pace, the party pressed on, passing the homes of peasants who watched them as they swept by and until they were out of view, passing at times through desolate woods of chestnuts, pines and low-growing oaks, passing once a village where women and children ran to the doors to mark for a moment their scudding dash, and to hear the music of the smiting hoofs.

At last the wind became once more audible. It sobbed and moaned. Soon after a few flakes of snow fell.

"The storm will be upon us," said the Cossack pointing to the north-east.

Merlin looked to observe its approach. A white wall seemed to be advancing upon them, a wall of immeasurable height, and hiding in its length one half of the whole circle of the horizon. This advancing wall at length struck their front; they were in the midst of a snow storm so dense in its descent that the very breathing was obstructed. The Cossack chief arrested the party, his long white conical cap, and flowing beard, looming vaguely with their clinging flakes.

"We must find a shelter," he said, "or we will be overwhelmed. The dreadful blasts of the Ural ranges are at work to-day."

One of his followers addressed him, in a language which Merlin did not understand.

"If it be so, lead the way," the old man replied, and the Cossack who had spoken, took the lead of the party, which resumed its progress, but by no means at the former rate of speed.

Wandering over the snow-covered levels, in the midst of the descending storm, the travellers lost their direction. The chief questioned his guide, and, receiving an answer, said:

"Mehillim is at fault. He is making circles like a blind bison on a midnight heath."

"It is twice," said Merlin, "that we have passed under this pine tree. I recognise its cone, toppling with the weight of the snow."

"We must ride apart, shouting at times one to another, that we may stray not too far asunder," said the chief. "The place of safety to which Mehillim would guide us is the dwelling of a husbandman. It stands near a noisy stream. He who hears the sound of running water, or the baying of dogs, will call to the others."

These directions were followed by Mehillim the guide and his three companions. The chief and Merlin did not separate. Groping their way, shouting through the snow-fall, which did not abate, but which an icy wind began to drive furiously before it, the party continued for hours to wander without success. The voice of the Cossack chief sounded more feebly in the ears of the Northman.

"Be of good cheer," said the latter. "The tempest cannot master my northern veins, or my strong horse, if it poured upon us that furious breath which makes the icy spars of the rocks of Nordland. If your Tartar fails, my charger will bear us both; if your own strength becomes spent I will keep you alive under my cloak."

"Thanks," said the chief with a strong and hearty utterance. "But a whiff of snow on the plains does not daunt me. My Tartar is fleet and strong under his old master, who verily learned his horsemanship in a school where life depended upon the power of endurance. Do not fear for me, comrade, but hearken as we go for the sounds for running water."

Presently Merlin said:

"Either the tones of the mad wind are mocking, or I hear such sounds now."

The chief listened with head inclined.

"It is in truth the flow of the stream," he said. "Call with your stronger voice to Mehillim and the rest."

Merlin shouted. His call struggled over the waste, dull and drowned, like a cry from a newly filled grave. It however reached the ears of the nearest of the Cossacks, who repeated it to his fellows, and the party had soon reunited. Advancing together they won the bank of the brook. Mehillim scanned the trees which grew there, and which the blast had shaken free of their white burthen, and then turned up the stream. All followed. At length some dimly seen objects began to take definite shape before them, and then houses were discernible. The baying of house-dogs, directly after, gave cheering assurance to the weather-beaten travellers. They were in fact close upon a circle of huts, such as in the somewhat patriarchal society of the Ukraine a family, continuing united for several generations, builds—spreading as its swarm increases.

CHAPTER TWELFTH.

"Drawing the reid blude frae their steeds
They reached a rying height
Whair braid encampit on the dale
A brow host lay in sight."

Hardyknute.

The Cossack chief, coming to the door of one of the principal buildings—a large low hut—struck upon it with his lance. Two tawny dogs, gaunt and broad-chested, plunged around him, barking furiously. From a crevice in the hut a voice questioned the travellers. Mehillim answered. The door was immediately opened, and several men came out, making gestures of friendship and welcome, and a prodigious clatter with their tongues. At a call from these, other men collected from the neighboring huts.

Merlin and the Cossack chief were presently in a large apartment, the rough walls and smoked ceiling of which were ruddy with the light of a blazing hearth. Near the fire had been seated an old man of venerable appearance; he stood up to receive his guests. As the Cossack chief approached, the patriarch addressed him in a long speech, and having ended it, wept, embraced him, and led him to a seat by the hearth, with marks of extraordinary respect. A slim, straight girl, with fine nostrils, piercing eyes, and the step of an untamed doe, went swiftly about her duties of preparation for the comfort of the guests. The voices of children came in a subdued din from adjoining apartments.

When Merlin had melted the winter from his benumbed limbs, he said to his friend the chief:

"A traveller should not neglect his horse; and my Hungarian is deserving of tender usage."

"You speak wisely," answered the chief; "but be satisfied now. These sons of the Ukraine love a good steed, and the noble charger will fare as well as if your own hands stocked his manger. Besides, these peasants are my children, and you are my comrade."

The paternal chieftainship which the Cossack made claim to in this speech, was fully recognised in the deportment of those who soon after gathered into the hut. All made obeisance to him. The travellers at length broke their fast upon the roasted breast of an ox, eating like famished men. When the meal was ended, and a circle had been made about the roaring fire, and the darkening day, with its whirling snow-fall and howling winds, but rendered the hearth-side scene the more cheerful, the chief conversed with the patriarch. He seemed to speak without constraint, and occasionally with a lapse into moodiness. The earnest looks of his hosts changed with the shifting shades which came and went over his own weather-beaten visage. They were evidently engrossed by some important topic. Merlin who knew nothing of the language used in this conversation, began to expand his great frame and stretch his limbs, like a drowsy man. The chief, observing this, addressed him in Latin.

"We have spoken," he said, "of the King of Sweden. His camp is now upon the slopes of Brulah. We have accomplished to-day but twenty leagues. Ten leagues more we must to-morrow achieve—when our journey will be ended. The bravest monarch of the earth is in straits, and great peril; and alas—alas! the valour of the Ukraine, which was to aid him, where is it? The voice of the Hetman which beguiled the brave king to this land—should it not be choked with sorrow?"

Merlin who had heard only of the intended coalition against the Czar, and not of its defeat in the complete overthrow of Mazeppa singly, before he could unite with the King of Sweden, said:

"Why should the voice of Mazeppa be choked with sorrow?"

The chief answered:

"The Hetman mustered at Bathurin, thirty thousand brave men. They gathered in, day after day, proclaiming their approach with the clashing of spear-heads, the bray of horns and the din of numerous hoofs. It was a gallant array. Mazeppa dreamed that his people would become free; that the collar of subjection would be torn from their necks. Comrade, the sun of this day rose like a fire kindled on the eastern hills; look now to earth and air and mark the dread change. Even so swiftly the morning promise which gleamed from the arms of his children, at Bathurin, failed in the eyes of the Hetman. His force met with sudden overthrow. Many died—the fortunate in arms on a bloody field—others under the lash of the cruel enemy—some were impaled—some broken on the wheel. Those who survived the day of disaster wander, without concert, or a leader, seeking safety in desert places."

"The storm has only seemed to drown the fires of the sun," Merlin replied. "They still burn beyond the driving clouds."

"Yea. It is so," said the chief, "and the spirit of this people is also burning and constant: of that be sure. But a fair promise and great hope have, nevertheless, been defeated, and the impenetrable cloud hangs for a time over the children of the Ukraine."

"The King of Sweden is invincible," said Merlin. "He will drive the Czar from Mazeppa's borders, to the gates of Moscow, or if necessary, to the frozen coasts of the arctic. Then this people, friends and allies of the invincible king, will be free."

The chief, thoughtful and even gloomy, replied:

"The ruin of the strong array of Bathuria smites the pride and breaks the power of the Hetman. The slaughter of thousands of his gallant children makes a cavern of his heart, which is filled with the incessant tongues of melancholy echoes. But to Mazeppa there is a final grief. His ally, the victorious king, calls to him for men; he has none to give.—Calls to him for food; he has empty garner.—Calls to him for treasures; the Muscovite has robbed his treasure chamber. Men, food, and treasure, the Hetman did covenant to furnish. With what countenance can Mazeppa meet the king his ally, who, beguiled by that covenant, has been misled to the verge of ruin?"

"The Hetman," Merlin answered, "if his conscience acquits him in the case, should meet the King of Sweden with the firm countenance of an upright prince, whom a greater power, after manly resistance, has overthrown."

"You speak well, comrade," said the chief. "Doubtless with such firmness will Mazeppa meet his disappointed ally. The storm without seems to abate. To-morrow we resume our journey with the rising of the sun. The way has been long to us—wearied and full of trials. Let us sleep."

With sunrise of the next morning the party left the huts of the hospitable peasants, who poured upon the chief volleys of what, from their visages and gestures, Merlin guessed to be benedictions, and resumed the route to the Swedish camp. The skies had been cleared in the night. The snow, drifted by the high wind, lay in mounds and winding banks. Avoiding these mounds, plunging through the banks where it became necessary, at times pricking forward upon the sod from which the snow had been quite swept, the travellers pressed boldly on. Merlin looked to the sun, and recalling the figurative language of the chief his companion, pointed to it, and said:

"The storm of yesterday has left no shadow upon the flaming disk. So the time will speedily come when the star of your country will escape as fully from adverse clouds."

"Age is not hopeful, but yet loves hopeful youth," replied the chief serenely. "Your words, which my reason more than questions, are, nevertheless, cheering and pleasant to hear."

By the hour of noon, the travellers became aware that they were near the Swedish camp. The chief led the way to some heights, in which the country about them abounded—hills of inconsiderable elevation, but relieving with a marked effect the landscape, as clustering islets relieve the dulness of a flat and calm sea. The party reached the top of one of these low hills; the wind and sun-rays had removed the snow from it. From this spot a striking scene was presented to their view. A camp, extending for a great distance along the eastern slope of a range of the low hills, the summits of which were dusky with a pine forest, whilst a stream edged their base with a line of silver, reflected the sunshine from its tents and floating banners. Of these latter, one, rising high above the flags of the regiments, denoted that division of the encampment occupied by Charles himself, with his staff, chancery and household. Men were moving about the tents in various occupations;—some removing the snow—some bearing logs to the fires, which the axe, sounding from the heights, constantly replenished,—some leading horses to the water's side: at one point a troop were driving in cattle, whilst at another a similar troop were setting off from the camp. The country, far and wide around the town of tents, was houseless and wintry, but, flashing in the sunshine, wore yet a bold and desolate sort of beauty.

On a hillock in the direction of the camp, and about midway of the distance to it, a number of horsemen, equipped in some respects like the Cossacks themselves, caught the attention of our travellers, as they looked down from the greater height. The Cossack chief, after scanning them closely, said:

"These are Tartars of Budziack. I know the lappers of blood well. They have been hungry wolves on our Ukraine borders, as they now are on the skirts of your king's camp."

As the chief made these comments, the objects of them suddenly wheeled upon their position. It was clear that they had just caught a view of the party on the height. A desultory movement and some wild cries followed the discovery. Merlin could not guess whether their uncertain motions were the tremors of the quarry or the ruffling of the falcon.

"They are fifty, and we are six," said the chief, "therefore they will attempt to charge upon us. But a resolute front will drive them back."

As he spoke, the wild riders, spreading themselves over the lower hillocks so as to block the way to the camp, came skirring up the slopes with spears in rest.

"Let us meet them in full career," said Merlin.

"As well charge a flock of swallows," replied the chief. "Be steady, comrades."

The Tartars came on with fury, but finding an unquailing front opposed to their onset, avoided the contact, as the chief had foretold, and, parting into two loose divisions, galloped with shrill cries to the right and to the left. One of their number, Merlin and his companions now discovered, carried behind him a boy. The lad wore a common camp jacket; it was easy to conjecture that he was a prize picked up, on the skirts of the neighboring encampment, by the prowling enemy. As the Tartars dashed by, the Cossack chief pointed to one of their number with a contemptuous gesture. The man so pointed out rode a small fleet horse, covered with fantastic trappings, and ornamented along his slim and pliant crest with little streamers.

"The fellow in the finery," said the chief, "is Osbeck, a leader of renown among the tribes of the Budziack. He has harried our borders for twenty years. I once followed him with five hundred spears. He escaped in the wilderness. To slay him would be to extinguish the fires of a thousand burning houses, and to bring security to a thousand pastures."

This leader, as the Cossack spoke, uttered a sharp signal, and his scattered force began to concentrate. They were presently collected at a point within gunshot. Merlin unslung his petronel, masking the action as well as he could.

"I will endeavour," he said, "to extinguish the fires of a thousand burning houses, and to bring security to a thousand pastures."

Then he levelled the short carbine at the Tartar leader, and, with a quick aim, fired. The Tartar became aware of his danger too late. As he threw himself half out of the saddle, to make the body of his horse a shield, the shot took effect, and he fell to the ground. His followers raised a howling outcry, and were instantly in great confusion.

"Now let us charge upon them," said Merlin.

He drew his sword as he spoke. The Cossack chief only uttered, "It is good," and, giving the signal to his followers, the whole made a sharp dash at the enemy; who in a moment, as the chief had promised, darted asunder like swallows. The Tartar leader lay upon the ground.

His horse refused to desert him. The chief of the Cossacks pricked the prostrate man with his lance, and said :

"Osbeck—art thou then overtaken in the end?"

The Tartar gave signs of life.

"Deal with the wolf, Mehillim," said the chief, turning aside coldly. Before Merlin could become aware of his purpose, Mehillim had driven his spear through the body of his fallen enemy.

"The coursers of Osbeck are as swift as the wind; as we, who have so often pursued him, have learned," said the chief. "Secure the steed, Mehillim, for the Northman, whose good shot has won him. Now let us advance. The wolves will howl about us, but not molest us after this rough usage."

"These Tartars are an enemy to be despised," said Merlin.

"They are terrible to the weak, the wounded, or the flying, and make the rear of a vanquished army bloody enough," said the chief. "But the front of a resolute foe, these devils of the Budziack will not approach."

"The boy," said Merlin, "whom we saw bound to the back of one of them—is it impossible to rescue him?"

"The chase would last through this winter day," replied the chief. "At night a swarm of enemies would be around us. Moreover, comrade, my affairs with the King of Sweden are urgent."

"But look, comrade," continued the chief—"the brave child is dealing manfully with his enemy."

The boy, again visible, in a renewed gallop of the fugitives, for Merlin and the Cossacks had advanced during the recent dialogue, and driven them once more into flight, seemed in fact to be taking care of himself. He was striking with a long knife into the side of the Tartar at whose back he was bound, and from whose belt he had stolen the weapon.

Merlin drove the spurs into his charger and dashed after the fugitives. The Cossacks followed. The result of the boy's work began to display itself; the Tartar whom he had stabbed failed in his saddle and dropped the reins from his hands. But the desert steed still strained after his comrades.

Presently the boy began to plunge the knife into the body of the horse. He renewed the stroke several times. The animal, with a savage scream, increased the length of his leap at each stroke. Then he showed signs of failing. Finally in one of his bounds, he fell headlong, hurling his double burthen from his back. The pursuers came up. The horse and his master were dead. The boy, who had cut his bonds, had gained his feet free and unhurt.

"Gallantly done," said the Cossack chief; who presently added to Mehillim :

"Let the youth mount the steed of Osbeck."

In a short time the Norwegian and his companions—the boy riding amongst them on the Tartar horse—entered the limits of the Swedish camp, and were under those banners which had swept over so many lands without a reverse.

MARIA EDGEWORTH.

At the close of the first edition of his celebrated letters, the unknown author of Junius expresses the following beautiful sentiment: "Grateful, as I am, to the Good Being, whose bounty has imparted to me this reasoning intellect, whatever it is, I hold myself proportionably indebted to him, from whose enlightened understanding another ray of knowledge communicates to mine." This is, indeed, a strong and eloquent acknowledgment of the obligations conferred upon mankind by those nobles of nature, who have contributed to the moral and intellectual culture of our race. Next to the Supreme Being, these benefactors of our species have the largest claims on our gratitude, and, as a feeble tribute to their worth, it behoves us to honour them while living, and to perpetuate through all time the memory of their services. For we should never forget, that but for the light shed from their luminous minds on a benighted world, man would still have remained a naked and roving savage, grovelling in ignorance, superstition and sensuality—the sport of vindictive and ferocious passions—a stranger to all the comforts and social enjoyments of civilized life. That he has been raised from this miserable and degraded condition, must be ascribed to the influence of those commanding intellects, whose native energy first rent asunder the fetters of barbarism and extracted from the great book of nature the fundamental principles of philosophy. In the primitive history of the world, every age has been adorned by some such self-taught genius, who has become the instructor and lawgiver of his race, and taught those great moral and scientific truths, which imparted the earliest impulse to the progress of civilization. In the lapse of time, each revolving period has been fruitful of worthy successors in this noble mission of enlightening and reforming mankind, and the torch of knowledge, whose faint and flickering light, when first kindled at that remote era, scarcely sufficed "to make the darkness visible," has been transmitted from age to age, burning in its progress with increasing brightness and splendour until its vivifying rays have penetrated into almost every quarter of the globe. Had the discoveries and improvements of these pioneers of civilization been confined to their own age and country, their effects might have been partial and temporary; but happily the points of contact and sympathy between the various tribes of the human family are so numerous, that every accession to the mass of knowledge, though operating with intenser force where it originated, has, gradually, yet surely, diffused its salutary influences over neighboring nations, and through succeeding times. Thus modern science traces back its lineage to the learning of the Chaldees and Egyptians, and the philosopher of the nineteenth century claims kindred with Zoroaster and Pythagoras. The achievements of mind are, therefore, the common property of the human race, and the writer, whose works impart valuable truths, is emphatically a cosmopolite, no matter what country has given him birth, or at what period he may have flourished. If intellectual contributions, from whatever quarter they emanate, may be justly claimed as the joint inheritance of our race, the principle applies with peculiar propriety to nations of kindred blood, and whose language and literature are identical. The American may, therefore, without presumption take pride in the productions of the great minds of Britain, and lament the extinction of one of those luminaries as a common calamity. As he has participated in the amusement and instruction afforded by their writings, he may justly deem it his right, no less than his duty, to mingle in the plaudits of their admiring countrymen and to deposit on their tombs the spontaneous tribute of his grief and gratitude.

These reflections have been suggested by the recent death of Maria Edgeworth, a lady who, for more than half a century, has filled a deservedly large space in the literature of England. Among the distinguished females who have shed so great a lustre on the present age, none has held a more conspicuous station than this gifted woman, or has ministered more abundantly to the delight and edification of her cotemporaries. Death, it is said, canonizes great characters and puts the final seal on their reputation. Envy, which, like the old man of the sea forever haunts the steps of genius, is buried with its mortal remains; but the memory of its greatness still lives, and the public mind, touched by this affecting proof of the uncertain tenure of human things, becomes doubly solicitous to render ample justice to its merits. Hence the practice of delivering obituary eulogies over the illustrious dead, and the splendid mausoleums in which the gratitude of their fellow-men inurns their perishable relics. According to this immemorial usage on such occasions, some tribute is due from the American press to the memory of a writer so celebrated as Miss Edgeworth, and we shall, therefore, present a brief notice of this remarkable woman in the pages of the Messenger.

The elevated position assumed by the softer sex in the various departments of elegant literature, and even in the more rugged field of science, during the last hundred years, has been justly deemed an unerring token of the rapid advance of knowledge and refinement. In this enlightened age woman has, at length, asserted her true dignity, and occupied that station in society from which, in ruder periods, she was excluded by the selfishness and tyranny of uncultivated man. She is no longer regarded by the sterner sex as the mere toy and plaything of an idle hour, nor degraded into the obsequious slave of her male task-masters. Released from the debasing and stultifying drudgery of savage life, her dormant faculties have awakened, and she has vindicated her title to be received as the equal and companion of man by an aptitude in the acquisition of knowledge, and an intellectual developement, rivalling the highest efforts of masculine genius. Among the many indications of our future progress, none are more cheering and unequivocal than this recognition of the rights, and cultivation of the capacities of woman, whether we consider the immense amount of mental force, heretofore torpid and useless, thus brought to cooperate in the extension of knowledge, or the important agency, exercised by females, in our early training and improvement. Indeed from their nice observation and the almost intuitive keenness of their perceptions—from the warmth and tenderness of their affections, women seem to be peculiarly fitted for the task of education, particularly in that seed-time of the human mind when the infant idea first begins to shoot, and to give promise of the coming harvest—when the heart is moulded to generous sentiments by the plastic hand of instruction—when principles and propensities are implanted, which must determine the colour of our future character. Miss Edgeworth is herself a striking example of this feminine aptitude for youthful instruction; for her writings furnish abundant evidence that she took a lively interest in the subject of education, and had meditated deeply on the best methods of imparting knowledge, and cultivating the moral affections. Her works are replete with profound observations and judicious hints on this interesting subject, nor are they the less valuable because these grave and weighty precepts are embellished with the hues of a glowing imagination, and the artifices of a polished diction. We will not maintain that her theory of education is, in all respects, defensible, though from the history of her life we know that her speculations were founded on a long course of practice and experience. Perhaps she relies with rather too great confidence on the ability of the mere human teacher to eradicate evil dispositions by careful training; yet though her ideas in this respect may be somewhat Utopian, it cannot be denied that instruction and discipline may do much towards reforming the native depravity of the human heart. Though complete success may be unattainable, we should not be deterred from trying the experiment; for if human skill cannot wholly extirpate the roots of vice, it may, by constant attention, limit its growth, and prune its most noxious branches. But whatever difference of opinion may exist on this question, it must still be conceded that Miss Edgeworth's views are plausible and ingenious, and that she has contributed some useful suggestions on a subject, in which, in spite of all the researches of philosophy, our conclusions fall far short of demonstration.

We would gladly indulge ourselves in an extended review of Miss Edgeworth's writings. The labour of such an examination would bring its own reward in the exhaustless fund of instruction and entertainment to be found in her charming pages; but our space forbids the attempt, and when we remember that this task has been repeatedly performed by some of the ablest critics in Britain, we have not the presumption to suppose, that our humble observations would be worthy of acceptance. The award of a tribunal, whose decisions the professed critic dare not impeach, has planted her reputation as an author on an imperishable basis, and it would seem, therefore, an act of supererogation to offer any thing in confirmation of that irreversible decree. We shall content ourselves, therefore, with pointing out some of her most prominent characteristics as a writer, and with noticing briefly some objections, alleged by critics against her works, which, in our view, are frivolous and groundless.

The ruling qualities in Miss Edgeworth's mind were acute observation, discriminating judgment, and sterling common sense. She was not destitute of imagination, and her wit is often brilliant and sparkling, but she kept these showy faculties in strict subordination to her reason, and never suffered them to usurp the place of more solid endowments. Though, certainly, not indifferent to fame, she never wrote, solely, for the purpose of literary display. Her efforts were actuated and sustained by higher and nobler objects—by the wish to benefit her species by promoting the great cause of moral and intellectual improvement. She was essentially an utilitarian, practical in all her plans and purposes—aiming at the happiness and advancement of mankind by means, which she had already subjected to the test of experiment. No cynical contempt for her species betrayed her into satire—no literary vanity into an empty, unprofitable exhibition of wit and eloquence. The scintillations of fancy—the beauties of style—the vivid sketches of life and character—the brilliant panorama of figures and incidents, which sparkle in every page of her writings, are the mere adventitious ornaments of a more solid structure—are the vehicles of a profound and practical philosophy replete with maxims and principles of the greatest utility in the conduct of life. In the highest flights of her imagination—in the most wanton play of her wit, she never loses sight of her main design. Accordingly few writers have illustrated so forcibly the true principles of education, or have shown, by more striking examples, or a more refined analysis of human nature, the most practicable scheme for the early cultivation of the mind and affections. The child, the youth, the critic and the philosopher are alike captivated by her enchanting fictions; yet while the taste is gratified by the ease and elegance of the style, and the attention absorbed by the interest of the tale, she never fails to insinuate, under this dazzling display of genius, some valuable truth, or important principle.

Next to Sir Walter Scott, Miss Edgeworth has been most instrumental, among modern writers, in imparting a loftier character to English romance. Under the influence of their example, it has ceased to be a disgusting medley of sickly sentimentalism, overcharged characters, improbable incidents, and false views of life, equally debasing to the literary taste, and contaminating to the morals of society. It no longer startles us with supernatural horrors, or offends by grossness and buffoonery. Purified and exalted under the auspices of these gifted writers, it now breathes a higher strain, and assumes a moral dignity heretofore unknown to that species of composition. The success of these masters of English fiction has attracted to this department a vast amount of talent, and it is here especially that female genius seems to have found its most congenial element. The press now teems with romances, distinguished by vigorous sketches of life and manners, varied learning, refined taste, and profound philosophy, and it cannot be doubted that the improvement wrought in this popular description of writing, will produce a corresponding change in the moral sentiments and literary habits of that numerous class, who have neither leisure, nor inclination for graver and more solid studies.

In the midst of this busy competition and intellectual ferment, Miss Edgeworth still maintains her preëminence, and her productions are new read and admired with as much eagerness as in the first heat of public curiosity. Novels, perhaps, may be pointed out, which display greater dramatic power,—more artistic skill in the developement of the plot—a deeper insight into the mysteries of human nature; yet, except Fielding and Scott, we cannot remember any writers in the field of English romance, who have surpassed her in these qualities. Indeed her portraits of Irish manners and character, may challenge a comparison with the chef-d'œuvres of the greatest masters in this department. In those spirited sketches, she has presented a most vivid and life-like conception of the lower classes of her countrymen. She has delineated with unequalled graphic power their whole moral and intellectual anatomy—their constitutional ardour and impetuosity—their warm affections—their gratitude and fidelity—their generous sympathies—their sly humour—their keen sagacity—their carelessness and improvidence—their amusing blunders, arising, rather from the quickness, than the confusion of their ideas. No finer specimen of pathos and simplicity can be produced than the Irishman's letter describing the return of the owld lord to his estate in the Absentee, and, in the admirable tale of Ormond, frank, generous, hearty King Conry exhibits one of the happiest creations of genius. It must be confessed, however, that she has drawn the portrait of her countrymen with a partial, and flattering pencil. Without departing from nature, she has omitted the darker shades, and fiercer traits imprinted on the living Celt by a long struggle with the oppressions and contumelies of a foreign domination. Her patriotism shrinks from exposing the lawless ferocity, the treacherous cruelty of her half-savage countrymen; and dwells, with an amiable preference, on the milder, and more engaging aspects of their character. She makes no allusion to the vindictive passions, the frequent perjuries, the defiance of all lawful authority, the midnight butcheries, the anarchy and turbulence, which deface that miserable land, and palliates, with excusable partiality, the brutal intemperance, and perpetual riots, to which the Irish peasant is notoriously addicted. Ireland has been fruitful in great names, but to none does she owe a greater debt of gratitude than to this talented woman. Her charming descriptions of Irish life and character have enlisted a general sympathy on behalf of that much-injured and unfortunate people, and, in her private capacity, she has laboured for years, if we mistake not, in the arduous and disheartening effort to mitigate the sufferings—to ameliorate the physical condition, and to elevate the moral standing of her countrymen. Such persevering benevolence—such gratuitous patriotism merit far higher praise from Ireland, than the factious intrigues of those political agitators, whose delusive promises of reform have lured their inconsiderate followers into the abyss of anarchy, and who have found their own profit in the commotions they have excited. If they are not wholly besotted by the base arts of demagogues—if their native impulses are not debased and corrupted by the sting of oppression, the canker of pauperism, and the rage of party dissension, the Irish people will, surely, erect some enduring monument to the memory of their illustrious countrywoman—a tribute much more worthily bestowed, than the plaudits lavished by them with such blind enthusiasm on the idols of their political worship.

The style of Miss Edgeworth is uniformly easy and unaffected, but at the same time spirited, vigorous, and racy. It seldom rises into eloquence, or pathos, and never sinks into tameness and insipidity. It is rapid, sketchy, graphic, perspicuous, sparkling with wit, replete with sound sense and acute observation. It evinces a most exquisite taste, and a familiar acquaintance with the finest models of English composition. The follies and frivolities of fashionable life, the brilliant play of gay and polite conversation, she delineates with inimitable grace and delicacy. She possesses the art, which is the peculiar prerogative of genius, of developing the moral features of her interlocutors by the lights and shadows of animated dialogue, and she sustains their distinctive characters with admirable skill and discrimination through all the vicissitudes of her story. Her moral sentiments, as becomes her sex, are formed upon the purest and most elevated standard. No word or allusion stains her pages, which could offend the most fastidious, or the sternest moralist, or suffuse the cheek of female innocence with the blush of outraged modesty. When she speaks of generous, or heroic deeds, her language glows with the warmth of sympathetic enthusiasm, and she inculcates, on all occasions, the exercise of an active and practical benevolence. In no respect does she evince more good sense and knowledge of the human heart, than in her view of the attachment between the sexes, which, according to modern usage, constitutes the main instrument in determining the catastrophe of a romance. While she treats with due reverence this highest and holiest of our earthly affections, she does not, like most female writers, invest it with the illusive hues of the imagination, or represent it as a blind, uncalculating passion, rushing madly to fruition heedless of all the warnings of prudence and reflection. She does not dignify with the name of love that casual predilection, the offspring of caprice, or the senses, which rejoices the hearts of amorous youths and silly maidens, and fills their minds with ridiculous fantasies. The impressions derived from mere personal beauty are fleeting and uncertain, and though external comeliness may infuse additional ardour into the sentiment of admiration, she feels, with the just pride of a high-minded woman, that a preference, resting on so precarious a foundation, is a paltry and inadequate tribute to the real worth of her amiable sex. To be firm and constant it must take its source in higher motives and impulses—must be grounded on the solid basis of mutual esteem—must grow up gradually in the genial sunshine of social intercourse. This is the doctrine, which Miss Edgeworth enforces with all the powers of her understanding, and, at the same time, exposes the absurdity of expecting domestic happiness from the union of persons of uncongenial notions and habits, and who hurry into an indissoluble connexion in utter ignorance of their mutual dispositions. But it is in tracing the gradual evolution of some original fault or vice of character by the action of circumstances, that she displays the most consummate ability. In this process she shows a precision and metaphysical subtlety that have never been surpassed. With the most minute observation she follows the progress of some pernicious propensity from its first germ in childhood to its overshadowing growth in more mature age—depicts its natural development in the ordinary course of events—and, what is of more importance, demonstrates how easily the hand of judicious culture might have eradicated the infant vice in its first feeble beginnings. The romance of Vivyan, and that delightful little tale, called Tomorrow, are admirable specimens of her talents in this kind of writing.

Some eminent critics have charged it as a defect in Miss Edgeworth's novels, that their design is made too apparent—their moral too studiously thrust upon the notice of the reader; but this objection is futile, unless it can be shown, that she has sacrificed truth and probability to the illustration of some favorite theory or arbitrary principle. That for the purpose of enforcing an important truth she may have, occasionally, overcharged her pictures, might, to some extent, be admitted; but it may be urged in her defence, that all fiction has a tendency to caricature, and that her writings are not more obnoxious to this criticism, than the productions of many distinguished authors in the same department. The interest and admiration excited by her fictions, afford, however, the best evidence, that she has not greatly overstepped the modesty of nature—that, if she has erred in exaggerating the features of her dramatis personæ, the resemblance to actual human beings is, still, sufficiently accurate to produce that illusion, which identifies the shadowy creations of the novelist with the world of realities.

But let us enquire whether, in truth, there is any substance in this objection. What is the argument, which condemns the use of caricature in fiction? It is alleged, that the novelist should copy nature, and that when he departs from this model, he loses his hold on our sympathies, and his work becomes utterly worthless as a vehicle of moral instruction. Now this would undoubtedly be true, where fiction runs riot in the wantonness of imagination, presenting only unceasing and distorted figures—monsters having no prototype in reality—the mere figments of a preposterous idealism; but does it hold when the resemblance remains in spite of the exaggeration—when the lines are deepened, and the features magnified, that the defects of the original may be made more conspicuous? Do not such caricatures as these teach a valuable moral lesson? We recognize our image in a concave mirror, though swelled to gigantic dimensions, and this very enlargement enables us to detect blemishes in our natural physiognomy, which would otherwise elude the closest and most vigilant inspection. Why may not fiction perform the office of a concave mirror to our moral visage, and bring out in striking relief defects imperceptible to ordinary observation? And this is all that Miss Edgeworth has done. If she ever deviates from the models of nature, it is for the purpose of exposing some hidden deformity, nor even in pursuit of this object does she ever violate the true principles of imitation.

This rule, that fiction should always copy nature, must, obviously, be adopted with some little restriction. To represent man as he is with perfect fidelity would not, in many cases, be desirable. Where the imitation is so exact, the canvass would often reflect forms, loathsome, hideous, and repulsive. Would the interest or utility of fiction be increased by such grotesque portraits? When the statuary undertakes to reproduce in marble the naked human figure, he does not choose for his models the deformed, the halt, the lame, and the blind. He imitates the most beautiful forms—those whose limbs and muscles have been developed into the most perfect symmetry. He places before his mind an image of ideal loveliness, “compounded of every creature's best,” and endeavours to improve on his originals by realizing this abstract conception. He knows, that, were he to adopt inferior models, the more consummate his skill, the more certainly would the productions of his art become the objects of disgust and aversion. Is not the same principle applicable, in some degree, to the creations of the novelist? It is, generally, conceded, that romances, whose leading characters exhibit a conjunction of great qualities with the vilest dispositions, have a pernicious tendency, because they imbue the youthful mind with the false and mischievous idea, that there exists a necessary connexion in our nature between good and evil, and that the possession of some great virtues atones for any amount of moral guilt. But if fiction were to reflect the exact image of real life, all its characters would be of this hybrid description, blending, oftentimes, the grossest vices with the noblest qualities; for we frequently witness among mankind these strange and incongruous combinations. Indeed such is the infirmity of human nature, that were we to pourtray in all its lineaments the character of the best of men, many faults and imperfections would be exposed, which, with my uncle Toby's oath, the recording angel would strive to blot out forever with the tear of commiseration. In such instances as these, the canons of criticism would not forbid some departure from the natural model, and the exception is sufficiently broad to cover the greatest delinquencies alleged against Miss Edgeworth. Her transgressions in this respect are always designed to promote the interests of morality; and, if this be a sin against good taste, or good sense, it can only be, as we have already remarked, because she distorts her fictitious characters to suit some preconceived hypothesis—some foregone conclusion. But the most unfriendly critic must admit, that, if she is occasionally betrayed into an error so trivial, it is never to an extent injurious to the moral influence of her stories, and that this slight blemish, if it be one, is infinitely counterbalanced by her other merits as a writer.

Were we to consult, only, our own impression of Miss Edgeworth's works, we should never have dreamed, that the most captious objector would discover any thing exceptionable in their moral tendencies; yet strange as it appears, the Zeiluses of the day have taken occasion to assail her on this point. where, to our simple apprehension, she appeared to be invulnerable. We had, indeed, supposed, that her writings contained emphatically "no line, which, dying, she would wish to blot"—that they breathe throughout sentiments becoming the purity and delicacy of her sex—that they are uniformly characterized by an enlarged philanthropy—and that their evident scope and design is to inculcate the principles of a rigid morality. When, therefore, some very pious and worthy people have preferred against them the very serious accusation, that they are anti-religious in their spirit and tendency, we are filled with unfeigned astonishment. We will not be so illiberal as to brand the authors of this imputation with the charge of over-rightness; for we are aware that it is the offspring of a sincere, though misguided zeal, which deems nothing good, or laudable, or profitable, that is not directly and avowedly subservient to the advancement of religion. Such, indeed, is the nature of man. He condemns as useless, or mischievous whatever conflicts with his cherished opinions, or which has no immediate reference to his darling pursuit—his ruling passion. Thus the man of business regards the cultivation of elegant letters as an idle and frivolous occupation. The soldier despises the toils of the merchant as sordid and grovelling. The politician contemns the simple life and honest labors of the husbandman as trivial and degrading. The religious zealot, engrossed by the contemplation of eternal things, views with indifference the evanescent interests of time, and proscribes, as sinful, and worthless, all human thought and action, in which religion is not the avowed, as well as the predominating principle. To some such narrow and overstrained views must we attribute the singular idea, that the writings of Miss Edgeworth are unfriendly to religion. The only proof of her offence, that we have ever heard adduced, is, that she has not, in so many words, made the inculcation of religious truth and duty the theme of her writings. Because she offers other motives and incentives to virtue, she is presumed, by a singular perversion of her meaning, to discredit and deny the efficacy of those arguments, which Christianity addresses to the conscience of mankind. This, we believe, comprises the whole force and essence of the reasoning in support of this refined, and far-fetched accusation. And what at last does it establish? It proves too much, indeed; for if it possess any truth, or cogency, it demonstrates that, unless we have religion forever on our lips, we must be held up to the detestation of a Christian community as scoffers, and infidels—that, unless we make broad our phylacteries, and parade our devotion before the eyes of men, we shall be numbered with the enemies of the faith. What, indeed, would these objectors have? Would they desecrate the most awful subjects of human contemplation by dragging them before the public eye whether in season, or out of season? We had thought that the sacred name of religion should never be invoked except on suitable occasions. Nec deus interit nisi dignus vindice nodus. We had imagined that the spirit of that divine faith might dwell in the secret chambers of the heart, when the tongue was silent—that it might pervade our life and conversation without a clamorous proclamation of our allegiance to its paramount authority. If Miss Edgeworth's writings are to be condemned upon such rigid principles as these, then the researches of philosophy, and the pursuits of elegant literature should, for a like reason, be prohibited as sinful and anti-religious, and, indeed, it would be difficult to decide what class of our innocent enjoyments would not be liable to a similar interdict.

But what, in effect, is the "head and front" of Miss Edgeworth's offence? It is not pretended, that she has, on any occasion, expressed a sentiment hostile to religion—that its principles, or professors are treated with levity, or disrespect in any part of her writings. Her crime, then, is not positive, but negative—a matter of inference, and construction, not of direct proof. Is she to be written down a sceptic, because, not denying the efficacy of religious instruction, she has endeavored to excite the weak and wavering resolution of man by other motives to the practice of virtue? Because she urges considerations of worldly advantage and utility as an inducement to upright conduct, must we presume that religion is excluded from her scheme of moral reform—that she deems its sublime promises and precepts a delusion unfit to regulate the actions of a rational being? Is it anti-christian to demonstrate how essential moral purity is to our temporal happiness? Is it an attack on religion to insist on the advantages of virtue even in this imperfect state? Then it must follow, that to represent pain, and misery, and privation in this life as the necessary concomitants of well-doing, is the most effectual mode of advancing the interests of religion. But this is evidently absurd. On the contrary it is palpable to our humble apprehension, that to hold up to mankind an elevated standard of morality—to show that even here a strict compliance with its principles conduces to our well-being—that the joys of vicious indulgence are fleeting in their duration, and bitter in their consequences, is eminently calculated to prepare the mind for the reception of religious truth—to incline men to embrace it as the source of their comfort and consolation in this life, not less than the instrument of their eternal salvation. This is what Miss Edgeworth has laboured to accomplish in the series of delightful tales, with which she has favoured the world, and she may be truly said to have been, so far as she has succeeded, a potent and faithful auxiliary to the cause of Christianity. With what propriety, then, can she be denounced as its enemy? The business of a religious teacher should not be lightly undertaken. It should be left to those whose qualifications, character, vocation, and the sanction of the church have designated for the exercise of that sacred function. That Miss Edgeworth has modestly declined the responsible task, and has been content to labour in an inferior, though not adverse, sphere, ought, surely, not to be charged against her as an unpardonable offence.

To suffer from the shafts of detraction is the common fate of genius, nor has this talented woman been so fortunate as to escape the destiny of her tribe. When the merit of her writings had been acknowledged by the universal suffrage of the literary world, the malignant spirit of envy, finding no abettors in the odious task of depreciation, has sought to rob her of the glory of their authorship by ascribing all that they contained of original, or admirable, to the assistance of her father. To substantiate this assumption, (for it is nothing more,) it is alleged that the works, published under her name in her father's lifetime, are greatly superior to those written by her since his death. Now the existence of this disparity may well be questioned, and, certainly, it is not so marked and obvious as to warrant the uncharitable inference, that this distinguished lady had stooped to the meanness of foisting herself on public admiration in borrowed plumes. The novels of Helen, and Belinda, though perhaps slightly inferior to some of her former works, are yet marked by the same peculiar traits of style and execution, nor can any unbiased reader fail to recognize in them the vestiges of that masterly genius, whose Tales of Fashionable Life placed her, at once, on the summit of literary fame. That her father may have, occasionally, supplied her with hints, and materials—that her writings may have been essentially polished and improved by his friendly corrections, is extremely probable; and, indeed, in her sequel to his auto-biography she acknowledged her literary obligations to him with a candour and filial gratitude, that do honour to her heart. But this is a very different thing from being the mere amanuensis of her father, the channel through which his thoughts and inventions were communicated to the world, which is the import of the charge in question. In availing herself of parental criticism, Miss Edgeworth did nothing but what was natural, and commendable, nor have the greatest men in English literature disdained to profit by the assistance of their friends without incurring thereby any impeachment of their originality. Indeed so prone are all authors to be blinded by paternal partiality to the defects of their literary progeny, that there is not one, who would not be benefitted by the strictures and suggestions of a friendly adviser of even inferior endowments. And this, we doubt not, is the extent of Mr. Edgeworth's agency in his daughter's productions. Except his auto-biography we know of no acknowledged offspring of his pen, and that work, though sprightly, spirited, and entertaining, certainly affords no indication of the extraordinary powers displayed in the writings of his illustrious descendant. Let her not, then, be deprived of her just share of fame by gratuitous surmises. Let her enjoy an undisputed title to the ownership of those works, claimed by her, and her alone, as the legitimate fruit of her genius. Let her have the undivided glory of having enriched modern literature with a series of vigorous, instructive, and ingenious moral fictions, which have established a new era in the annals of romance.

The tranquil current of Miss Edgeworth's useful life was diversified by no remarkable events. It was spent under the paternal roof in the midst of a numerous circle of kindred and friends, where she devoted herself to the fulfilment of every social and domestic duty, and to the composition of her immortal works. The materials for interesting biography are, therefore, scanty; but we gather enough from her writings to be assured, that, in her personal character, she was eminently benevolent, amiable and affectionate. The reverence and devotion, which she manifests towards the memory of her father—the kind dispositions, and liberal sentiments that pervade her works, betoken a heart attuned to the finest and most generous feelings of our nature. She resided with her father's family until her death, living, if rumour is to be credited, in perfect harmony with three successive step-mothers, loved by her kindred, idolized by the poorer classes in her neighbourhood, and admired by her numerous acquaintance. A career so calm, prosperous and happy under circumstances usually so fruitful of domestic discord, argues a mind and temper most admirably constituted. It is painful to reflect, that the history of genius is, too often, a melancholy record of weaknesses, and infirmities, of irregular passions, and distressing embarrassments. It is, therefore, quite refreshing to dwell on the character of such a writer as Miss Edgeworth, and to perceive that, in one instance, at least, the dignity of the author is sustained, and elevated by the moral worth of the individual. Upon the whole, we may safely pronounce, that in the long list of celebrated women who have flourished in the last hundred years, few have equalled Miss Edgeworth in the estimable qualities of the heart, and none have surpassed her in genius and accomplishments.

J. B. D.

Campbell Co., Va., Aug., 1849.

DR. GREEN'S INAUGURAL ADDRESS.*

Dr. Green is the recently appointed President of Hampden Sydney College, in the county of Prince Edward. And we congratulate the Institution and its friends, on the accession to that Presidential Chair of a gentleman of such talents as are exhibited in this Address—if there is any probability, that is, of his being permanently seated in his chair. It seems to have been the cue of that institution in modern times, to keep its presidency rather perambulatory, whether from an inward restlessness in the constituency, or from the former depressed circumstances of the institution, for which it would be ungenerous to reflect on them, we do not now inquire. If we do not mistake, the Rev. D. L. Carroll, D. D., was inaugurated to that Presidency in the year 1835. Since that time, the Presidency of the United States has been more than usually changeable. Van Buren came in the next year. Then Harrison. Then Tyler. Then Polk. Then Taylor. The Presidency of Hampden Sydney has been almost, if not quite, as changeable. Carroll—Maxwell—Sparrow—a Commission—and Green. Nor is this by any means said in hostility to the institution itself; but only to the evil that has been—if such there has been, in its management. Under its new auspices, introduced by the sale of a considerable number of scholarships, the friends of sound education may hope for greater stability in the councils of Hampden Sydney.

There is fervid, copious, glowing eloquence in this Inaugural Address. Using the expression in no invidious sense—it seems to be one of the finest specimens of declamation with which we have recently met. Declamation, indeed, which is not mere declamation—but which wreathes itself in constant exuberance around a half-latent thread of argument, keeping the mere framework of method out of sight, and yet leaving on the mind of the reader an impression—to use one of Dr. Green's own phrases—of “large, round-about Anglo-Saxon sense:” To the thrilling histories connected with the origin and the name of Hampden Sydney College, very graceful and spirited allusions are made in the exordium, which must have been of exceedingly happy effect in conciliating the attention of an audience, who did not as yet know whether or not they were to be fed with the drought of metaphysics and dry abstraction, which sometimes appear in such addresses. We remember to have read no happier exordium any where. The charter of Poggio, the Florentine, found the work of Quintilian under a heap of rubbish in a decayed coffer, in a tower belonging to the monastery of St. Gallo.

* INAUGURAL ADDRESS, delivered before the Board of Trustees of Hampden Sydney College, January 10, 1849, by L. W. Green, D. D., President.

the Institution was granted "amidst the closing struggles of the revolution." "The names of Patrick Henry and James Madison, stand conspicuous among the first Trustees," and in the charter are these words: "In order to preserve in the minds of the students, that sacred love and attachment which they should ever bear to the principles of the present glorious revolution, no professor shall be elected, unless the uniform tenor of his conduct manifests to the world his sincere affection for the Liberty and Independence of the United States of America."—p. 7. By the way, how does Dr. Green, in the first sentence of his Address, call that King Charles, against whom the great civil war was waged, "the first Stuart that mounted the English throne?" was not James I. a Stuart? and did not he mount the English throne? One word more of the interesting matters of history referred to. Dr. Green seems fully to credit the story of Hampden's intended embarkation for America in May, 1637;—and although there is the authority of Lord Nugent, Hallam and Macaulay for the story, who seem to have given it a rather loose unquestioning reception; yet there seems to us a positive certainty that it must be a mistake. That date—as will be seen in a very conclusive note to the Discourse of the Hon. W. C. Rives, on the character and services of John Hampden, delivered at Hampden Sydney College, November 1845—was in the very midst of the king's legal proceedings against Hampden, in the case of the ship-money, and the final judgment was not rendered in that case until June, 1638. Hampden could hardly have been intending—but for a prohibitory order in council—to prove recreant to his country and her cause, at such an hour. We find no fault with those who, following the authorities, do believe it. With the date of the order in council, prohibiting the departure of the vessels, (1st May, 1638,) and the character of John Hampden before us, we do not. A man who could do the masterly thinking which is to be found in this Address, will not, we are sure, be displeased at these criticisms on small points, or think any apology for them requisite. Nor do we mean to say that we exactly concur with every thing else with which we meet on these splendid pages. The ideas which they contain, indeed, are so fervidly expressed, and, in themselves, often so grand and imposing as to produce a feeling of extreme smallness about the idea of criticising them; and in the main points of the system of education which the speaker develops, every well-wisher to the coming generation must so cordially concur, that further criticism cannot be very imperiously demanded.

The following passage seems to have been intended as the program of the scheme of education, which Dr. Green advocates, and this scheme he very pleasingly unfolds in the succeeding pages:

"The great design of education, is to exercise, to discipline, to invigorate, and thus to develop the man, the whole man, intellectual, moral, social; the faculties of the understanding, the affections of the heart, the purposes of the will, the impulses that lead to action, and that mysterious and sovereign power, the balance-wheel of this strange and complicated machinery within us, which is neither reason, nor imagination, nor passion, nor will, nor sense, nor all combined; but different from them all, and superior to them all, better than them all, and above them all; the appointed arbiter and guide of human life; God's high vicegerent within us, to control, direct, to subordinate, and thus to harmonize them all. We wish to rear no intellectual monsters with prodigious protuberances and bulky bumps, the forced and forward growth of hot-bed culture, concentrating and absorbing all the vital energies into some favorite faculty, and dwarfing all the rest; no sickly sentimentalists; no visionary dreamers; no logical machines to grind out syllogisms wherewithal; no misty transcendentalists, with subtle metaphysic, skilful in splitting hairs twixt north and north-west side; no pedantic Rabbis, 'learned, pious and dull,' circling in everlasting gyrations around the circumference of a sheva; no men of one idea, (whatever that may be,) impenetrable to all beside, hermetically sealed against the air that is breathed by the men of their generation, the vitrefaction of a man, through whom the great stream of the world's living electricity can never flow. This is not to educate the faculties, but to pervert, to distort, to mutilate. It is felony; felony at the common law and by the statutes at large of the great commonwealth of letters. We want men, with large round-about Anglo-Saxon sense, healthy, well-proportioned men, adapted to all the emergencies, all the relations, duties and offices of common life, with all the faculties expanded, in harmonious exercise and symmetrical proportion, and conscience enthroned high above them all, in undisputed and imperishable supremacy."—p. 12.

That strain is surely of a high mood. If the new President of Hampden Sydney, can succeed in storing the minds of his pupils with "Anglo-Saxon sense," as richly as he has piled up meaning in this deep, many-sided sentence of his program, his retrospect of his official career, when it is ended, will be as satisfactory as his prospect is bright and hopeful.

The parts of this scheme are unfolded more definitely in the sequel of the Address—each study being spoken of as it is an instrumentality for this development of nature: Language, Natural Science—Mathematics—Philosophy, Intellectual and Moral—the evidences of Revealed Religion; for particular remarks upon each of which, we must refer our readers to the Address itself. The appropriateness to our times and wants, of a single other extract will, it is hoped, justify its admission here :

“ Superficial education is an education to daily and deliberate falsehood. It is all pretence, and no reality, on the part of teacher and taught; each professing loudly to do, what each is conscious he is not accomplishing; so that the whole of the student's life, from year to year, is an habitual falsehood, a living lie; till truth and honor, religion, friendship, all that is most sacred in the relations and sensibilities of human life, degenerate into a sham. Hence an age of superficial knowledge, is necessarily an age of pretenders, quacks, hollow insincerity, frivolous scepticism, heartless formality; without depth, intensity, earnestness, heroism, faith. * * * Perhaps the briefest and surest recipe to make a sorry villain, at once a showy impostor and a shallow dupe, is to give him a superficial college education. Better learn to make shoes, well and truly, better for the intellect and the heart, better for himself and for others, than to mis-learn the whole circle of knowledge, classical, mathematical, philosophical.”—p. 25.

This Address seems richer than is usual with such performances, in fresh native thought. There are several other parts of it which it would be pleasant to exhibit and remark upon—especially that idea which seems to be the key-note, so to speak, of the author's system; the tendency of one thing well and truly learned, to spread its power, like leaven, through the mind, when in turn it comes to learn other things. But we must forbear. The pamphlet itself, of twenty-nine pages, will richly repay the labor, or rather add profit to the pleasure of perusal.

MANZONI.

BY H. T. TUCKERMAN.

As I stood by the taffrail of the little steamer that plies up and down Lake Como, a good-natured fellow-passenger, whose costume and bearing denoted the experienced gentleman, indicated the various points of interest along the beautiful shores. It was a clear warm day of that enchanting season, in those climates, when spring is just verging into summer. The atmosphere was transparent and every indentation of the beach had a well-defined relief; the sails of the fishing-boats were reflected, in the water, as distinctly as if it were a mirror; and the cloudless sky wore the densely azure hue peculiar to that region. My companion urbanely pointed out every object worthy of note, which the shifting landscape afforded; here was the site of Pliny's country-seat, there the former residence of Queen

Caroline of England, and now we are directly opposite the villa of Pasta; but there was a more genial animation in his look and voice, as a low promontory loomed in sight neither remarkable for the cultivation at its base, nor the picturesque beauty of its treeless slope; “just behind that ridge,” said he, “is the road which Don Abbondio followed until he encountered the bravi who forbade him to marry the Promessi Sposi.” The perfectly natural manner in which the locality of an imaginary scene was thus designated, as if quite as real and more interesting than the abodes of actual persons, struck me as the very best evidence of Manzoni's genius and fame. All genuine creations assert and maintain a distinct personality; and this is, perhaps, the readiest and most faithful test whereby the legitimate characters of fiction may be distinguished from the counterfeit. The most universal triumph of this kind is that of Shakespeare, of whose personages we habitually speak not only as actual, but world-familiar celebrities. It is probable that if the origin of those characters in fiction, which are recognised by the general feeling of mankind as living originals, could be analyzed, it would appear that their essential features were drawn carefully from life. The chief attraction of the novels of the reign of George the Third, is said to have been that the individuals depicted were well-known at that period, and this fact gave a relish to the infirmities of character thus revealed. But a more recent instance occurs in regard to several of the best delineations of Dickens, whose Pecksniff, Squeers, brothers Cheerbyle and others are confidently identified; so that, even if there is an error in the designation, it only shows how nearly the author followed nature. Another convincing proof of the substantial relation to our experience, such daguerreotypes from life, bear, is the habit so prevalent of naming our acquaintances from the well-drawn characters of able novelists. To realize the variety of fanciful beings who have been added by modern genius to the world's vast gallery of memorable portraits, it is only requisite to summon before our minds, the long array of Scott's familiar creations. Charles Swain has done this in a poem entitled Dryburgh Abbey; and the obsequies of no human being were ever graced by so glorious an array of the representatives of human nature, acknowledged as such by the verdict of mankind, as this procession of his own “beings of the mind and not of clay,” which are described as following Sir Walter to the tomb.

An avidity for fabulous narrative seems to have characterized the oriental races. The indolent life of that dreamy clime naturally induced a necessity of being amused. Professed story-tellers were patronized by those in authority; and doubtless listened to with as earnest an attention, as the lazzaroni on the Mole at Naples now bestows upon a reader of Tasso. Pastorals were probably the first improvised tales of rural districts. The more exacting imaginations of eastern potentates called forth "Arabian Nights;" and subsequently, when the western world was alive with the lays of troubadors and the thirst for gallant emprise, came the tales of chivalry destined chiefly to be remembered through the genial satire of Cervantes. The supremacy of the church brought saintly legends in vogue; the spirit of maritime adventure led to the production of countless "voyages imaginaires;" civic revolutions, of a later period, gave birth to political romance, of which Utopia is the English type; and the more complicated interests and varied drama of modern society, finds its most welcome and perhaps faithful portraiture in one or another of the diversified species of the Novel. Thus it is evident that from the Song of Solomon and the fables of mythology, to the last hot-pressed emanation from Albermarlett, fiction has served as a mirror to successive ages, reflecting, with more or less truth, events and manners, in hues not so emphatic as the drama, but with greater detail and more elaborate exactitude.

There are few more interesting literary processes than the composition of a novel, artistically wrought and genially inspired. If we analyze the method, it seems to be very like that by which a fine picture is executed. First there are historical materials to collect,—the costume, manners and spirit of the time chosen, to be studied, and reproduced; then the dramatic incidents or plot to be arranged—corresponding to the action of the subject in pictorial art; the impressive back-ground of history, the just perspective of time, so as to render the illusion complete; with the light and shade of cheerful and solemn feeling. These may all be derived from study and observation and effectively arranged by skill and taste; but another, and the most vital element—the sentiment, or if the work be too prosaic to admit of such a definition, the sensation of the whole—that vague yet magnetic quality which in nature, in painting, and even in social life, we call atmosphere, must be derived from individual consciousness. This it is which brings us into relation with the story; which essentially attracts or repels; its presence gives life and its absence makes entirely objective the most patiently finished conception. The other traits of a romance are more or less mechanical, or, at least originate in the active intelligence of the writer; but this last and crowning principle emanates from the individual soul; it is that which makes the statue appear to breathe and the picture to be a conscious reality; which carries the words of the poet into the universal heart of mankind, and causes the characters and scenery of a romance to assimilate themselves, in the imagination, with the actual and the endeared.

The gravest artistic faults, or deficiencies, may be counterbalanced, in a novel, by the truth, elevation, or delicacy of the sentiment; exactly as warmth and sincerity of character atone for a thousand foibles and even distasteful qualities in a friend. Thus Mackenzie's Man of Feeling and Forcolo's Jacopo Ortis, considered as tales, are barren of striking events, wonderful coincidences, or elaborately drawn characters; yet the one from its gentle and resigned, and the other from its thoughtful and impassioned sentiment, apparently warm from a living heart, win and impress us with an indefinite but entrancing interest. Mrs. Radcliffe's novels abound in local mistakes; Southey demonstrates that her description of Skiddard is entirely untrue; and in "The Sicilian," she makes her heroine look from the towers of Palermo upon Mount Etna—a geographical impossibility; yet the scenes she depicts, are so invested with the sentiment of wonder, so largely developed in her nature, that the wizard charm of superstition haunts the reader, with its gloomy fascination, notwithstanding the improbabilities of her narrative, the tame solution of her mysteries, and the inexcusable incorrectness of her topography. No one can read Corinne without impatience at the inconsistent character of Oswald; and the unsatisfactory reasons assigned for the unhappy course of events; but Madame de Staël has so deeply impregnated the imperfect drama, with earnest, acute, and philosophical sentiment, with the sentiment at once of love, of genius and of Italy, that we pause not to examine and object to the story, in our profound sympathy with the intense feeling and reflection, which it sustains, like an unsymmetrical and ill-jointed trellis holding up to the air and sunshine, clusters of purple fruit and masses of autumn-tinted leaves. Some of Anderson's Stories, professedly written for children, and quite fantastic in conception, are so sweetly invented and so imbued with genuine humanity, that they charm all who have not outlived heart and imagination. It is, therefore, the idiosyncrasy of the novelist that imparts the zest to his writings; it is the point where his nature overflows, that yields the peculiar charm to his inventions; and it is thus that our real sympathies are awakened. The biographers of Richardson and Mrs. Inchbald, let us into the secret of that winsome tenderness that once caused us to hang fondly over Pamela and the Simple Story; it was their own prevailing characteristic. Godwin, on the same principle, excites metaphysical curiosity, Goldsmith the sense of domestic enjoyment, Scott chivalrous and patriotic emotion, Cooper the zest of adventure, Dickens convivial, pitiful and humorous feeling; Irving agreeable reverie; Beckford an epicurean delight of the senses; Miss Porter and Maturin, the luxury of heroic self-devotion and the rich but consuming excitement of ardent passion; Paul de Kock the vagrant but spirited moods of Parisian adventure; and Balzac the philosophical and sympathetic interest which anatomizes the inmost life of the heart.

Truth to nature rather than dramatic effect, was the aim of Manzoni, and, as is ever the case, when realized, it secured for his romance a permanent interest and celebrity. There is no attempt at brilliancy in the dialogue, no accumulation of incredible events in the plot, and scarcely a trait of improbability in the characters. Fidelity is the charm upon which the author relies both to enlist the sympathies of the reader and disarm the opposition of the critic. It is as if a well-skilled artist were to roam, during an exciting epoch, over the fertile plains of Lombardy, and transfer scrupulously to his sketch-book, the most characteristic figures of peasant and prelate, here a picturesque bit of landscape and there an animated group, now a monastery and again some by-way cottage, vineyard or shrine—thus giving us authentic hints whereby we can reproduce in imagination, especially if seconded by memory, a satisfactory conception of all the prevailing features of the scene. The author's manner, to borrow a term so often applied to the old masters in painting, is more that of Murillo and the Flemish school than of Raphael or Correggio; except that the literary execution of Manzoni has a somewhat classical and even pedantic character. Essentially, however, the same artistic principle is relied upon. There is something of Garrisborough and Moreland in the tone of his graphic pictures; he seldom idealizes, but conscientiously represents the actual. His Promessi Sposi is attractive to Italians on the same ground that the Vicar of Wakefield is a favorite with English readers. We are interested in his characters, not because they are perfect, but because they are natural. Renzo, indeed, can scarcely be called a hero or Lucia a heroine, in the sense that term is employed by fanatical novel readers. Neither exhibit any poetic sentimentalism. Their love is as unromantic as it is honest. He is but a skilful and industrious silk weaver, and she,—as the disappointed Bergamini was expected to see a wonderful beauty, discovered—is only "una contadina come tant'altre;"—a peasant girl like so many others. But, then, the winsome simplicity of nature, the affectionate dispositions, the child-like faith and rustic truth of these lovers, and especially their excellence as types of a local peasantry, render them, in contrast with the remarkable vicissitudes through which they pass, objects of real and sometimes intense sympathy. There is a kind of elemental human nature about Lucia that is irresistibly charming; the very weakness and ignorance, as well as the faithful attachment and irascible temper of Renzo are eminently illustrative of the rural population of Lombardy. It is, too, exceedingly characteristic of somewhat advanced women of the middle class of Italians, to affect the wisdom of experience, and nourish their self-esteem by a kind of pretension to knowledge of the world—which is the more diverting from the actual narrowness of their ideas and their obvious superficial knowledge and lack of real confidence. The sage counsels, and desire to have her say, ascribed to poor Agnese, peculiarly belong to her sphere and age. The ecclesiastic portraits are the most carefully laboured of all; and even allowing for the author's strong Catholic partialities, they must be admitted to be most consistent, each with itself, and all with probability and truth. The church that can boast a Fenelon and a Cheverna, doubtless has, from time to time, included priests as exalted in their views, as Federigo Borromeo, as true to an expiatory vow as padre Cristoforo, and as timid, and time-serving as poor Don Abbondio. Nay, at this very time, whoever has been on familiar terms, with the Italian clergy, must have encountered exceptions to the general corruption, in the form of a martyr-like asceticism or a life-devoted benevolence. In some, perhaps isolated regions, there are members of the monastic fraternities that are idolized by the common people for their charity; preachers who fill a cathedral by their eloquence, and men of saintly lives whose benediction is received with awe and gratitude. In short, traces of the three prominent ecclesiastics of Manzoni's romance, may be easily detected at the present day; and to many pious minds, yet excite the sentiments of love and reverence, which at the period described united the peasant to the church. It was doubtless the author's main object to vindicate the religious sentiment; to show how the essential principles of Christianity were knit into the well-being of society; and to bring into strong relief, for the advantage of a sceptical and revolutionary era, the consoling, purifying and happy influences of the church, whose superstitions had become a by-word and whose sovereignty already yielded to military power. We can, indeed, imagine no greater contrast than that which exists between the whole spirit and atmosphere of Manzoni's story and the times in which it appeared. The star of Europe's modern conqueror was rapidly culminating; all that was prescriptive and venerable in usage, form, law, manners and faith, had either yielded to inexorable reform or was in a transition state; and the primal sentiments of our common nature, without whose prevailing sanction and tender intervention, we can scarcely hope for the stability of any human institution,—were so violently assailed, that a kind of social chaos seemed inevitable. The triumphs of Napoleon had opened the way for an apparently limitless series of experiments in government; and a fearless challenge of all authority, especially that of religion. The mental activity and civic revolutions incident to this state of things, kept Europe in a continual ferment. Old associations had no power to hedge in thought; and new combinations of events gave scope to every kind of speculative hardihood. It was the age of sudden political vicissitudes, splendid military achievements, constant social alternations and fearless inquiry. It was an experimental, irreverent, and unbelieving age; and even at such a time, Manzoni sent forth his calm pictures of rustic life; he revived the primitive in human nature; exhibited the graces of simplicity, the moral value of faith, the charm of spotless integrity;—the need of a vista through which, amid the darkness and tumult of life, glimpses could be afforded of heaven;—the blessedness of forgiveness, the tranquil joy of expiation, the glory of repentance and the beauty of holiness. It was like the low warbling of a lute amid the braying of trumpets; or one of the soft sunsets of Claude reflected on a thunder-cloud. It was an enterprise in its very hopelessness and beauty, worthy of the heart of genius; and the peaceful and sweet manner in which it was achieved, is honorable to the dignity of scholarship and the self-possession of faith. It has, indeed, been objected to the Promessi Sposi, that it is circumstantial even to tediousness; that it lacks vivacity of tone and variety of interest. Perhaps these and similar faults are inseparable from the author's plan; his first object being truth to nature and history, in order to render his work locally authentic, and give it a national interest; and his second to inculcate certain great principles of life and action which he saw were lost sight of, in an age of preternatural and spasmodic excitement. The polished correctness of the style, too, while on the one hand it has given the novel a classical rank and caused it to be one of the most approved text-books in the acquisition of the Italian tongue; on the other, by a certain stiffness, and the use of uncommon words, occasioned by the classic fastidiousness of the author,—has induced pedantry of style, the very reverse of that colloquial ease, which is so great a requisite in the popular novel. These and other incidental defects, do not, however, at all invalidate the well-founded claims of Promessi Sposi, as a true picture of Italian life, felicitously conceived, and artistically developed.

As the artistic representative of truth and the pleasing stimulant of benign emotions, Fiction thus redeems itself from the serious objections to which it was once far more liable than at present. "It is necessary to our rank as spiritual beings," says a judicious writer, "that we should be able to invent and to behold what is not; and to our rank as moral creatures that we should know and confess that it is not." Hence the unsatisfactory blending of fact and fiction, by the excessive development of any of the elements we have designated, the exaggerations of professedly veritable travellers, the fanciful narratives of historians, as well as grossly illusive pictures of life and nature even in a romance. Such errors offend the integrity of the novelist's art exactly as mean expedients and grotesque combinations in architecture, or untrue drawing and extravagant color in painting, or want of proportion in statuary; because such blemishes destroy the sentiment and mar the completeness of invention in writing, as well as in form or design. Legitimately produced, however, and truly inspired, fiction interprets humanity, informs the understanding and quickens the affections. It reflects ourselves, warns us against prevailing social follies, adds rich specimens to our cabinets of character, dramatises life for the unimaginative, daguerreotypes it for the unobservant, multiplies experience for the isolated or inactive, and cheers age, retirement and invalidism, with an available and harmless solace. A distinguished modern statesman decided a question that arose in a social circle, by very gravely quoting a passage from Robinson Crusoe. His friends expressed their surprise that one whose pursuits were so complicated and absorbing should remember the very words of that nursery tale; he assured them he had read it once every year since he was a boy, as a mental refreshment. Humboldt pauses in his description of tropical vegetation, to mention with gratitude the fact that it is associated in his mind with the correctly delineated scenery of Paul and Virginia. The philosophic Mackintosh advocates fiction because "it creates and nourishes sympathy;" and the poet Gray declared that it was heaven to pass a rainy day in reading new novels. Thus resorted to as a pastime in the intervals of more exacting studies and at periods of convalescence or retirement, it is one of the most ready and useful amusements; but no more to be relied upon altogether as intellectual food, than champagne, spices, or beautiful fruit for animal-nourishment. It is therefore only the abuse of fiction which deadens the zest of truth, for its right office is to heighten its effect. "Matter of fact," says Hunt, "is our perception of the grosser and more external shapes of truth; fiction represents the residuum of the mystery. To love matter of fact is to have a lively sense of the visible and the immediate; to love fiction is to have as lively a sense of the possible and the remote."

The word novel has now a much higher signification than formerly. It once conveyed the idea of vapid sentimentalism or irrational romance only adapted to very weak and morbidly fanciful tastes. It furnished pabulum to imaginary woes and yielded unhealthy excitement to undisciplined minds. Hence the very justifiable prejudice so long cherished against this kind of reading by vigorous intellects. A half century has effected a complete revolution in this department of literature. Perhaps the first example which led to this auspicious change is the Caleb Williams of Godwin. That remarkable work proved that a story may be deeply interesting without being mainly occupied with the tender passion; and it suggested that human nature and human life afforded a boundless and most instructive field for true genius to represent. The English have excelled in fiction, perhaps, in part, from the judgment which they, of all people, know best how to bring to the arrangement of passionate and poetic materials, and thus render them harmonious and effective. If we glance at the number and variety of standard English novels that still maintain their place in select libraries, we cannot but acknowledge that our vernacular is the most prolific source of excellent fiction, in modern times. Consider, also, the important subjects these works illustrate; and how ably they have been made the exponents of grave opinion, social questions, history, philanthropy, art and morals. The most vivid pictures of London society in the days of Johnson are yet to be found in the novels of Miss Burney; and its present absurdities have been most effectually satirized by the novels of Hook. If we desire to realize the life of the East, the Anastasius of Hope is the most available camera obscura into which to enter and view its reflection. We are confidently referred to the novels of Smollett for an authentic character of the English navy fifty years ago. The low life of Great Britain is sketched in enduring colors by Dickens. The philosophy of common sense—that trait of national character which chiefly distinguished the Anglo-Saxon from the southern European, is permanently elaborated in the novels of Maria Edgeworth and Miss Austin. All salient eras of human history and social life have been reproduced by modern novelists. Scottish annals and scenery may be said to have been revealed to the world by the author of Waverley; and Macaulay sustains his description of the condition of the clergy in the reign of Charles the Second, by the parsons Fielding has bequeathed. Miss Ferrier's novels have immortalized the most humorous and characteristic traits of Scotch society. The life of the north of Europe is now familiar to us through the charming tales of Miss Bremer and Hans Anderson. Lockhart and our own Waverley have given adequate pictures whereby the unlearned may be initiated into that memorable epoch when the advent of Christianity introduced a new element into the life of the Roman Empire. Systems of political economy, the questions that divide the Episcopal Church, the social problems involved in the manufacturing enterprise of England, the racy and pathetic aspects of Irish life, the biography of illustrious men, the arts of diplomacy, principles of taste, government, religion, and science, now, almost daily, find accredited and fascinating interpreters in the guise of popular novelists.

These conditions, we have indicated, are happily fulfilled in the Romance of Manzoni. Every one at all familiar with the public events of the time, which are made in the novel to lend the dignity of great social phenomena to the humble experiences of the hero and heroine,—will trace a scrupulous authenticity in the narrative; and not less faithful are the incidental glimpses afforded of the laws, customs and social economy of the period. We seem, as we read, to breathe the atmosphere of that epoch when the feudal spirit yet lingered in Italy, although its practical influence was essentially modified; when haughty lords still kept their armed retainers; and could with certain precautions, violently outrage individual rights with impunity; when the sanctions of the church yet exercised an unquestioned authority;—the age of local warfare, of Latin edicts, of gross popular delusions, of scholastic pedantry, and fanciful philosophy. These phases of life in that day and country, are brought out with remarkable tact in the course of the story. The war to settle the succession of the ducal states of Gonzaga, and the occurrence of a famine and the plague at Milan, by arousing all the latent elements of society, give ample occasion to indicate the degree of knowledge, the tone of public opinion, and the standard of civilization then and there attained. We are admitted freely to the banquet of the lordly castle, the discussions of the piazza, the domestic life of the palace, the secrets of conventual discipline, the gossip of the osteria, the interviews of the archbishop and the humble colloquies of the village hearth. Attentively regarded, they yield the most clear and reliable impressions; and the amount of positive information thus gleaned from the story, is not less remarkable than the facility with which it is suggested.

The more elaborate pictures thus vividly reproduced from the dusty archives of municipal history, will bear a very thoughtful perusal. The description of the broad riots and the various scenes enacted at Milan during the ravages of the plague, have scarcely been equalled for graphic delineation and true pathos, by any of the many brilliant sketches, in the same vein, subsequently attempted by the most eloquent writers. Their beautiful diction in some cases enhances the effect; the minute circumstances and affecting points of view chosen, are such as an actual spectator would naturally have selected; while the light and shade, the impressive fact and the affecting sentiment, are blended with that inimitable skill which is only an intuition of genius. Indeed, the chastened tone of these parts of the romance,—often affording not only room, but temptation to exaggerate, is one of its prominent merits. We do not, for a moment, lose sight of the dreadful reality on account of the melodramatic representation. On the contrary, the dangling hair of virgin-bodies piled on the dead-carts. The horrid buffoonery of the monatti, the maternal tenderness and care lavished so calmly on an infant's corse, in the midst of the licentious misery around, the remorseful terrors of the selfish noble, and the heartless cupidity of the base servant, the devotion of the benevolent, and the callous indifference of the hardened;—each individual demonstration of character and every special incident that stand out from the general record of pestilence and famine, are usually so true to the great and authenticated occurrences, that we not only confess that they might have been, but feel that they were. So much for the unity of these ghastly, yet memorable pictures. The author is equally felicitous in minor limning;—the forms of salutation, the classic oaths, the religious adjurations, the proverbs, gestures, and casual provincialisms that occur have not only authority, but significance. Passed over, by the ordinary reader, without interest, to those familiar with the region and the classes depicted, they have a peculiar meaning and an intrinsic charm.

Manzoni has, also, a concise way of sketching a whole genus in one of the species, of exhibiting what is characteristic of a domain, or a class, by a single effective specimen. Thus in the portrait of Federigo Borromeo, we have not only an historical personage, but the ideal of the scholar, saint and gentleman combined,—of that age. Perpetua's counterparts may be seen by every traveller who sojourns awhile with an Italian family of the middle class. The plants enumerated as having overgrown Renzo's garden, during his banishment, might be classified in a botanical nomenclature of Lombardy. Don Fer-rante's philosophical creed illustrates the scientific quixotism there indulged by speculative minds; and a very adequate idea of the scenery of northern Italy may be derived from the account given of the different journeys of the fugitives between Milan, Morosa and Bergamo.

In the unpretending, but significant tales of Dana and Hawthorne, we often discover the essence of romance—the most pure and subtle elements of original fiction. Remorse has found no more refined and touching interpreter than the former; and it is rarely that what is adjacent and immediate has been so delicately and suggestively delineated as by the latter. Professional life has revealed some of its most thrilling secrets by the pen of Warren; and popular art is most vividly illustrated in Wilhelm Meister. Many of the profound laws of love and music may be learned in Consuelo; the luxuries and the psychological workings of sentiment glow and melt along the pages of Rousseau; fantasy in its wildest, most sublime and most exquisite play, emanates from the German novelists—now shadowy with the weird genius of Hoffman, and now aerial with the crystal grace of Undine. The iris-hues of the Midsummer Night's Dream reappear in the fairy tale; and all the virtues and the comfort of modern civilization are embodied in English stories of domestic life. But the field embraced by this endeared form of literature is too vast for specific comment. The fertility of its resources may be imagined by considering what rich elements are included in the exuberant life of the primitive fiction, the truthful consistency of the standard narrative, and the insight into men and things, of the modern fashionable novel: take, for instance, the tone of Boccaccio—the verisimilitude of De Foe, and the knowledge of the world of Thackeray;—how much of human life, both inward and outward, how many of the elemental and the manifest principles of our common nature and of universal experience, are therein combined!

Personal familiarity with the country and people described in Manzoni's novel, is almost essential to its complete enjoyment and appreciation. To have seen one of the religious processions, in Tuscany, for instance, bearing the relics of a saint for the purpose of checking a freshet or a drought, and to have watched the hopeful countenances of the rustic throng, renders far more vivid the ceremonial of escorting the gorgeously-decked remains of St. Carlo, through the streets of Milan, to stay that awful pestilence. The sight of one of the popular tumults which agitated Sicily when the cholera prevailed there, a few years since, and the ocular proof of the fanaticism of the ignorant wretches in sacrificing so many innocent victims to the suspicion of having poisoned the wells, and thus induced the disease,—brings home to the most imaginative the frantic delusion of the Milanese, in ascribing the pestilence, whose course is so graphically described by the novelist, to the same cause. The scribes who yet sit in the squares of Palermo and Naples to indite letters for the common people, make the difficulties of Renzo in corresponding with his betrothed, appear very natural. An habitué of a trattoria in Italy will recognise the viands, the language and bearing of the innkeepers as identical with those of our own day; and a certain extraordinary blending of acuteness and candor, of almost childish simplicity in matters of faith and feeling, and dexterity or evasion in cases involving personal safety or interest, which might appear inconsistent elsewhere, are perfectly true Italian characters. In fact, in many particulars, Hogarth and Crabbe are not more thoroughly literal interpreters of nature than Manzoni.

The monotony of provincial life in Italy, the family dictatorship, which virtually force superfluous children to enter the cloister, and the more benign aspects of Catholicism, to those who have been in contact with the domestic life of the country, are reproduced in this story with singular truth. It was doubtless no small part of the author's plan to touch the patriotic sensibilities of his countrymen by the nationality of his work; and this, perhaps, accounts for the fear he seems to have entertained of the slightest extravagance; and the somewhat tiresome historical interludes scattered through the romance. The sentiments unfolded are those of the author himself. He was thoroughly sincere both in his patriotism and his piety; and this is the more honorable to him inasmuch as his origin is noble, his associations of the highest kind, and his education superior; but the scholar and the man of rank were not suffered to overlay the Christian and the philanthropist. While other authors of the period scarcely professed any faith whatever, and followed their own vagrant impulses, Manzoni looked to God in meekness and around upon his country with love. His nature was essentially contemplative; he believed rather in the victories of thought than those of the sword; and relied on the primitive and indestructible sentiments of humanity far more than external violence for the advancement of truth. His first work, Conte di Carmagnola, which appeared in 1820, a tragedy embodying the noblest self-devotion and patriotism, excited a deep interest throughout the continent. Other dramas, his famous Ode, entitled Il Cinque di Maggio, on the death of Napoleon, a volume of hymns,—then a rare species of writing in Italy, increased his literary renown.

But his popularity is derived from his novel—

I Promessi Sposi. He adopted this form of literature as that which gave him the surest and most extensive access to the minds of his countrymen. Scott's unparalleled success in the same department was already the literary phenomenon of the day; and to Manzoni belongs the credit of first effectively introducing the modern novel into Italy. By patient elaboration of authentic facts, by careful limning from original elements of character within his observation, by infusing the genuine sentiments of his own heart into the beings he portrayed, and by a scholar-like finish of style, he laboured to produce an unexceptionable, graphic, interesting, and standard national romance; and, however humble the sphere he chose to illustrate, he accomplished his purpose. It is a curious fact that almost the only trace of his ideal tendencies, in this work, is discoverable in some of his comparisons, which by their fancifulness, betray the poet. Otherwise the design is mainly Flemish, both in subjects and exactitude. The atmosphere, however, of the whole picture, to the view of one whose associations are enlisted, is as soft, attractive and mellow as that of spring in Italy. The gentle and tranquil excitements of rural life and primitive manners, touch the heart of the sympathetic reader. The resignation of Lucia, the conversion of the wicked incrominato, the sublime patience of padre Cristoforo, the diverting cowardice of Don Abbondio, the shrewishness of Perpetua, the enlarged benevolence of Federigo, with the episodes of extreme human misery and the final happy fortunes of the humble lovers, gradually win upon our calm attention, and become at last endeared to our remembrance.

FROM OUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS, August, 1849.

A scientific Belgian, M. Melsens, pupil of the celebrated chemist, Dumas, of Paris, has lately made a discovery which, during the last month, has excited the lively attention not merely of savans and statesmen in France, but of all interested directly or indirectly in the production of that very important article of commerce and consumption, sugar. The anticipated importance of the discovery, may be judged of from the fact that it has been made the subject of a special report from M. Lanjuinais, minister of commerce and agriculture, to the President, in which he advises the nomination of a committee, composed jointly of scientific and practical men, charged to fully test the value of the discovery, and report to government the result of their experiments. If the result prove favorable, the minister recommends that the French government, by contract with M. Melsens, purchase his newly discovered process, to be delivered gratuitously to the public. The minister's report says, "The mode just discovered of treating the beet root, and the sugar-cane, effects the extraction from these vegetables of the whole amount of sugar which they contain, and gives an article of superior quality, dispensing with the complicated and costly apparatus used in the manufacture of beet root sugar, and in the refining processes. If this discovery, loudly announced by men of science, whose testimony seems of a nature to carry conviction, should realize the marvellous hopes to which it has given rise, the product of the beet root will be increased one-third, and that of the cane one half. In presence of this imminent revolution, all industrial operations connected with the sugar trade, and with its production are arrested; and the natural movement cannot be restored until public opinion shall be enlightened as to the merit of the new processes." The minister's recommendation was promptly acted upon, and the committee appointed. Experiments are being made, first of a purely scientific character, in the laboratory of M. Dumas; to be followed by more practical essays upon an extensive scale in the establishments of several large sugar-manufacturers. Perfectly satisfactory experiments, however, as to the practical value of this discovery, cannot take place for some months yet. The beet root of France will not be ready for the manufacture till late next month; nor the sugar-cane of the colonies till December next. The process of Melsens is of wonderful simplicity and of perfectly easy application. The rasps, presses, and clarifying boilers heretofore used are retained in the new process. It is to the juice obtained in the ordinary methods that the discovery is applied. By the aid of a very small quantity of the marvellous substance which he has discovered or invented, M. Melsens effects in a few instants the clearing and crystallization of the saccharine particles. One hour and three quarters suffice to obtain a loaf of the purest white sugar. It is expected to produce a very prompt fall in the price of sugars all the world over. An article of luxury here, and in all parts of Europe, it is with us, in the United States, one of necessity for all classes. Several of our Southern States also are largely concerned in its production. I shall therefore watch with much interest the progress of the experiments now making here and communicate the result to the Messenger.

Allons! from the sugar plantations of Louisiana, let us take a short flight with Leverrier into the boundless regions of space.

The smallest quantities, the slightest variations, from the moment that they are perceived to be constant and to obey an invariable rule, become to the astronomer objects of the highest interest, leaving him no rest day or night, till he discovers the secret. In most astronomical calculations the results are only almost exact. It was by endeavoring to push approximation to its last degree—by seeking the cause of the appearance and disappearance of the satellites of Jupiter at slightly different intervals, that the natural philosopher has ascertained and measured the speed of light. It was by the analytical discussion of the slight irregularities observed in the movements of Uranus, that Leverrier himself accomplished the sublimest achievement of science, the discovery of the planet Neptune. From Mercury, which, close to the sun, rushes whirling through the ardent sea of solar light to distant Neptune, slowly pursuing its course in its cold and dismal solitudes, all the planets deviate more or less from the path assigned to them in their respective tables. Concurrent observations, unconnected, originating in different quarters of the globe, establish these deviations, which it is impossible, therefore, to put down to the account of errors of calculation. If the earth moved alone round the sun, its course, exactly elliptical, would long since have been exactly traced, defined in all its elements, and the tables describing it would not need revision. But within and without the orbit of the earth, are found revolving numerous other planets, which of various sizes and at immense and varying distances, mutually attract each other and disturb their movements: so that the appreciation of the disturbing forces involves the most difficult, tedious and complicated calculations on the part of the philosophers who devote themselves to the study of the mechanism of the Heavens. Leverrier, though to his scientific labors he has recently added those of the legislator, being now a member of the French National Assembly, has, with the ardor of youth and the enthusiasm of the savant, undertaken a twelve years' labor which will confirm his title, now hardly to be disputed, as the first astronomer of the age. He is engaged in a series of dry, wearisome, intricate calculations, for the composition of tables destined to aid astronomers in the appreciation of these disturbing forces. I cannot doubt but the following extract from a late address upon this subject, of Leverrier himself, before the five Academies united, will be of interest to most of the readers of the Messenger. Making allusion to the progress of astronomical science, he says:

"It is now generally admitted that light is propagated through space by the vibrations of a fluid called ether. The reality of the material existence of this fluid is, nevertheless, far from being demonstrated. Perhaps it may be demonstrated one of these days by observation of the stars. If ether actually opposes a resistance to the movements of the planets and comets, its presence will be detected by the acceleration of their average velocity, by a continual diminution of their average distance from the sun—a diminution of which, let me say in passing, the result should be the overthrow of our planetary system. Comets will be the first to perish, because of the extreme tenuity of the matter composing them. Already it is thought signs are perceived of the action of ether upon the periodical revolutions of the comet Encke. Unfortunately the certitude of this conclusion is impaired by another phenomenon in relation to which we have hardly commenced to collect certain data. Comets do not seem to have reached a permanent state. Not only is the matter composing them, subject to complete derangement and revolution; but there is reason to believe that it is gradually lost in space. We have seen lately the body of a comet dividing itself into two distinct parts, which pursued subsequently different paths. Among the planets, Mercury pursues, in the variations of its average movement, an inverse march, and is moving farther and farther from the sun. This is precisely the contrary of what we should expect from the resistance of ether. Perhaps there will be found in one of the most curious of the heavenly phenomena an explanation of this fact. About the middle of March, after sun-set, and near the point from which the sun has just disappeared, there may be perceived in the heavens a sort of luminous pyramid. Of considerable breadth at its base upon the horizon, it diminishes both in size and brilliancy as it ascends till its point is finally lost in the sky. This is the Zodiacal light, a subtle atmosphere which seems to surround the sun, which Cassini studied a century and a half ago, and of which the extent embraces the orbits of Mercury, Venus and Earth. Now an atmosphere like this, whether it touches the sun with its base, or whether it is completely detached from the sun, may, under certain circumstances, move with greater velocity than Mercury, and pushing it forward, produce an effect the opposite of that which should follow from the resistance of ether, that is to say, an increase of distance from the sun to the planet.”*

* Sir John Herschell remarks touching the Zodiacal light:

“It may be conjectured to be no other than the denser part of that medium which, as we have reason to believe, resists the motion of comets: loaded, perhaps, with the actual materials of the tails of millions of those bodies of which they have been stripped in their successive perihelion passages, and which may be slowly subsiding into the sun.”

“We are discovering every day new asteroids between Mars and Jupiter. To the group composed of Ceres, Pallas, Juno, Vesta, have been recently added Astero, Hebe, Iris, Flora, Metis; and it is hardly to be doubted that the number of these small planets will be yet increased: and if instead of confining the search to those of the tenth and eleventh magnitudes, it was extended to bodies of still less brilliancy, without doubt a multitude of others would be discovered forming a girdle about the sun. The greater portion of these small bodies will, however, be missed by the telescope: and direct observation compelled to seize separately each one of them, will, with difficulty, effect their general classification. But while the collection of their light in one single focus will be impossible, their united attraction exercised upon a single star, may produce a sensible effect and aid us in our inquiries into the quantity and arrangement of the matter contained in this planetary zone.

“The flood of shooting stars which exists in the heavens, may also have some influence upon the motion of the earth which traverses them at certain periods of the year.

“Comets generally come to us from the most remote depths of space, and return to those depths. If some have established themselves in our regions, it is because they have been thrown out of their paths, by too near approach to the planets. It is thus that the comets of Faye and of Vico have been thrown, by the powerful action of Jupiter, into the limited orbits which they now pursue. But the cause which has given them to us may one day take them away. This is perhaps what has already occurred in relation to the comet of Lexell which, according to the orbit in which it was moving in 1770, should have returned every five and a half years. In 1779, it passed quite close to Jupiter and since then it has not been seen. Now comets cannot be thus troubled in their own movements without reacting upon the planets. Hitherto the neglect of taking account of their influence has been excused only by supposing them to be bodies of exceedingly small dimension. Grant, for it cannot be doubted, that the comets are composed of extremely small masses—still it is nevertheless true, that in the course of ages the aggregate of their influence upon the revolution of the planets becomes perceptible: and, seeing as we do, that all the theories present deflections yet unaccounted for, it is imprudent to maintain that no account need be taken of the influence of comets. Let us stop in this enumeration. Not to speak of the action of the stellar masses upon our system—not to speak of the planets beyond Neptune, and for which assuredly there is room in space—we see how numerous and important are the points of physical astronomy upon which light may be thrown by a careful comparison of theory with observation. But let one not deceive himself, this comparison is an undertaking of immense labour."

This labour, which it is presumed will require for its completion from twelve to fifteen years, has been commenced by Leverrier. He is to report from time to time to the Academy of Sciences, presenting in a form fit for preservation and use, the results to which he shall arrive, so that if he should be arrested in his career of glory and usefulness before its completion, a more fortunate successor may carry it on. He hopes so to perfect the theory, that it shall be in complete harmony with observation, or to widen the breach between them, and prove reconciliation to be impossible. In either case it will be a triumph of science.

Since the date of my last, "The French Academy" has held its annual public session. Villemain, perpetual Secretary, opened the setting by an admirable address, which would perhaps be well placed, and would certainly be not without interest in the columns of the Messenger. But it is rather long for translation. He twice alludes by name to our Franklin, paying him high and well deserved compliments. The First Prize, established by Baron Gobert, to be annually awarded by the Academy for the most eloquent work on French History, is again given to Augustin Thierry's "Considerations on French History." M. Villemain made particular allusion to Lamartine's historical labours, but with the express declaration that "no comparison has been possible." Nor has any competitor this year been able to take the Second Prize awarded to the "work of the greatest moral utility" from the Reign of Louis XIII. by Bazin.

A young writer, Amédée Pommier, has been distinguished by carrying off, under the award of the Academy, two prizes—one for his "Eulogy of Amyot"—the other for his "poem on the death of the archbishop of Paris." Among the prizes offered for the coming year, is one for the best Eulogy on Madame de Stael, and one (a medal of the value of one thousand dollars) for the best translation of Pindar.

The literary and social circles of Paris, have been watching with much interest during the last month the progress of a law-suit pending between the journal La Presse and the heirs of Madame Récamier. Madame Récamier, the most beautiful, fascinating and amiable woman of her day, the intimate friend of Madame de Stael, of Mdme. de Genlis, of Chateaubriand, of Benjamin Constant—whose saloon was frequented by all the distinguished statesmen, literary men and savans from the early days of the first republic—who won the esteem, the admiration, the adoration of more illustrious men than any woman who ever lived—who was beloved even by the ladies around her whom she constantly eclipsed—whose amiability silenced malevolence—whose modesty disarmed envy, whose virtue confounded slander; who never lost a friend save by death. This remarkable lady died in Paris last May, among the earlier victims of Cholera, in the 73rd year of her age. Her name will not be found on the page of history. Nearly all the hearts on which she impressed her image, are now dust: yet will Madame Récamier be immortal with the immortality which is conferred by the pencil of Gerard, the chisel of Canova, the pens of Chateaubriand and de Stael, who knew, admired, and loved her. Among the warmest friends and most devoted admirers of Mdme. Récamier, was Benjamin Constant. At first he was her lover, and strove for a long time, always however in vain, to obtain from her a reciprocity of affection. Finally despairing of success, he schooled his love to friendship. In this he was more fortunate. Mdme. R. accorded to him a friendship as sincere, warm and devoted as his own. It lasted to the end of life. They were constant correspondents: and at his death, which took place in 1831, Mdme. R. found herself in possession of a numerous collection of intimate private letters, written by one of the most distinguished men, one of the most able and popular political writers of his day. Biographers were of course quickly busy with his name. They appreciated with more or less justice, according to the political bias under which they severally wrote his public character and ability: but they all concurred in ascribing to him want of heart and sentiment, a cold intellectual impassibility of mind and feature, which caused him to live in a different sphere apart from, perhaps above that in which lived and moved the rest of his fellow men. Madame Récamier knew better than that. She had in her possession hundreds of proofs that Constant had a heart, and a warm one. It is pretended that indignant at the injustice done by biographers to the memory of her friend, she very soon after his death determined that after her own, his letters to her should be published. "What!" methinks I hear you exclaim, "this lovely, admirable, amiable, perfect woman consents thus to violate the delicacy of her sex! to betray the secret that womanhood holds sacred all the world over! to lift the veil of privacy with which honor covers them, and deliver letters of this peculiarly private character to the peering curiosity and ribald jest of the world, to the derision of critics, to the malevolence of enemies!" Mais, Mon Dieu! if this outrage is not perpetrated, wout the world continue to suspect that

Benjamin Constant could not love? And what sacrifice ought not surviving friendship to make in order to rescue him from the calumny! Madame Récamier, therefore, heroically consents to prove, not only that Constant did have a heart, but that that heart was most devotedly all her own. Now pass we on quickly, friend Thompson! Be as gentle as you can in judging the motives of Mme. Récamier. For myself, I feel that if I tarry longer here, I shall be tempted to say something severe upon Mme. R. in particular and perhaps upon the sex in general; whereas Mme. R., as has been proved above, and as all the world knows, was a most amiable and excellent person. The fact is, that in this religious intention of honoring the memory of her dead friend and vindicating his heart, she caused two copies to be made of Constant's letters. Determined to put the proof that Constant loved her—I mean that he was a man of feeling—beyond the possibility of loss, she placed the originals in a safe to be delivered to her niece and heir upon her death: one of the copies she kept in constant circulation among her intimate friends, (her very intimate friends only,) but with special injunctions not to breathe their contents to a living soul: the other she committed to a female literary friend, with instructions relative to its publication after her death in the feuilleton of the Presse or the Debats. Mme. Récamier died, as I have said, in May last. The public vindication of her friend Constant's heart soon followed. On the 30th June appeared first on the first column of the first page of the Presse, the following advertisement: "Unpublished Letters of Benjamin Constant to Madame Récamier. These Letters, which the Presse has just acquired the right of publishing in its feuilleton, are seventy-three in number. They have been written at four different epochs—from 1814 to 1815—during the Hundred Days—after the Hundred Days—and from 1816 to 1830. These Letters have been communicated to us by Madame Louise Colet, to whom they were given by Madame Récamier, and who accompanies them with a preface and conclusion written by herself." Madame Lenormand, the niece and adopted daughter of Madame Récamier, immediately protested against the publication. A counter advertisement appeared notifying the public that Madame R. could not have authorised the selling of these Letters, and that the Presse had inconsiderately promised a publication which would not take place.

Nous verrons cela! said the Presse and incontinently the publication, which from the first it had been intended to adjourn for a month or two, commences in the feuilleton of the 3rd July. On the 4th, a second number appears. At this point (the introduction and some half dozen letters having now appeared) the publication is arrested by legal proceedings, commenced on the part of the heirs. The commencement of the suit is marked by some very pretty specimens of epistolary spite passing between the lady combatants; but these would not amuse your readers so much as they do the Parisian public. The brother of Benjamin Constant joins his protest, with that of Madame Lenormand, against the publication. The trial commenced before the tribunal de première instance on the 25th ult. The argument of M. Chaix-d'Est-Ange counsel for the heirs, was a masterly effort, able, ingenious, and terribly severe. According to him the publication of these letters was, on the part of Madame Colet, a flagrant violation of delicacy, honor, and common honesty. Madame Récamier could never have authorised it—her well known delicacy of feeling and nicety of honor, her modesty that ever shrunk from the public gaze, even upon the most legitimate occasions, her whole life, in fine, compelled us indignantly to reject the idea that she could be privy to their unheard of outrage. Madame Colet had occupied in relation to Madame Récamier a very equivocal position. She had, by dint of perseverance, obtruded herself upon Madame R., who admitted her, it is true, into her salon in the character of reader, but never honored her with an intimate and confidential friendship. Madame R. had upon one occasion, and after much hesitation, permitted Madame Colet to have possession, during a few days, for the purpose of perusal of the Letters of Benjamin Constant—Madame C. had taken advantage of this permission to procure a surreptitious copy—it was this copy, thus fraudulently obtained and concealed during the life of Madame R., that had been sold to the Presse and was now in process of publication—in fine, these Letters had been "stolen," and the pretended written donation, bearing the signature of Madame R., and exhibited by defendants in proof of their right to publish and of the wishes of Madame R. herself, had been "forged" for the occasion. The advocate concluded and the case was adjourned over to that day week, when the reply of the counsel of the Presse was to be heard. In the mean time the argument of M. Chaix-d'Est-Ange was published in full in all the principal journals, except the Presse. It produced a powerful effect. Decidedly this was a bad case for Madame Colet—as for Girardin of the Presse, whatever might be the real truth of the case, every body believed him capable of complicity in an affair of this sort. Presumptions are always against him. Allons! said I to myself—"Patience for a week! Audi alteram partem." On the 1st instant, M. Langlais counsel for the Presse and Madame C., pronounced his defence:

and truth to say, at the close of his argument, the tables were completely turned. It was clearly shown that Madame Récamier intended and desired the publication of these Letters, that she had delivered a copy of them to Madame C. expressly for this purpose, Madame C. being an authoress and poet of considerable distinction in France. The amanuensis who, under the supervision of Madame R. herself, drew off the copy of the Constant Letters, intended for and actually possessed by Madame C. testified to these facts. The other amanuensis who, under the dictation of Madame R. wrote the donation, testified to that fact. It was shown that Madame Lenormand was aware of her aunt's intentions touching these Letters, and strove in vain to dissuade her from the publication of them. It was shown that throughout the whole affair Madame Colet had acted with remarkable delicacy and good faith in respect to Madame R.: and, furthermore, that her relations with the illustrious deceased were of a much more intimate and honorable character, both in their incipency and in their progress, than the opposite party had given to understand. M. Craix-d'Est-Ange replied. M. Sallé, counsel for the Republic, concluded. He admitted that the will of Madame Récamier was not uncertain—that she had given the manuscript to Madame Colet, and desired its publication. The Court remitted to a future day the rendition of its judgment. In the mean time it would examine the Letters to see if the manuscript of the Presse included any actually unfit for publication. The publication will, doubtless, soon be resumed.

French literature during the last year has presented a curious, and, to my mind, a far from honorable spectacle. First are published the "Memoires" of Chateaubriand, the intimate history of himself, written by himself, to be sold, and actually sold at so much per line, paid in advance, to be published in the feuilleton of a daily paper immediately after his death. There is something unworthy, melancholy, shocking in this spectacle of a distinguished public man thus carefully dissecting himself and pocketing the price of a public exposition to take place the moment breath has left the body. The world had to do with the public man—it had a right to know the public man—and the public man had a right to protect his reputation by the exposition of all facts of a nature to elucidate his public acts and their motives. But every public man has a double being. There is his private life, which is as sacred and inviolable, as is that of his humblest undistinguished neighbor. This private life is of interest to the public, is a matter of curiosity, and its history possesses a marketable money value, simply because it belongs to a distinguished public man. What an outcry would be raised against the false friend who would attempt to realize for his own benefit this marketable money value! And how certainly would the barbarous revealer of secrets, to which the world had no right—and of which nature itself, by a strong and universal instinct, forbids the disclosure—be crushed by indignant public opinion! What, then, are we to think of the public man who deliberately puts into market this article of fictitious value, his private life, and sells it to the highest bidder for so many francs? It might be less profitable, but would it be less disreputable, if, being in want of money, and knowing that having belonged to himself they would bring many times their intrinsic value, Chateaubriand had put up at auction articles of old-fashioned furniture that he had used, old books that he had thumbed, or if sorely pressed for a little of the needful, half-worn articles of clothing? In my opinion it would not. But this is not all. Chateaubriand in his "Memoires d'outre Tombe," has revealed secrets, of which, to be sure, he was the lawful possessor, but of which he was not even half owner. For instance—if vanity exacted that he should amuse the unfeeling world with the very interesting and sad story of Charlotte Ives, recounted in the third volume, did not delicacy and honor peremptorily require that he should conceal names? The telling of that little love story, which has doubtless wounded the feelings and shocked the delicacy of many now living in England, probably put into the pockets of M. de Chateaubriand some seventy-five or a hundred francs.

"Parbleu!" exclaims a Frenchman at my elbow. "He wanted money! He had to have money! What else could he do but write for it?"

Walter Scott wanted money too! and he had to have money!—and he wrote for it—he killed himself writing for it! But you can't lay faults like this to his charge. Honor to Walter Scott! and honor to the British public, which would have despised him had he acted like Chateaubriand and Lamartine!

Yes, there is Lamartine—the great Lamartine—whetting the public appetite for his new poems, Raphael and Les Confidences, by the shameful announcement, thrust into every one's face, from every advertising sheet in France, proclaiming urbi acorbi that these works contain the veracious private story—the heart history—of the illustrious poet, historian, and orator—of the great unappreciated, uncomprehended statesman who had given the Republic to France. In these last new works he was now giving himself—his most intimate self! What could he more? I notice with much pleasure the flagellation which the author of Raphael and Les Confidences receives at your hands in the June number of the Messenger. It is well deserved and well served. In the number for May, 1848, at the close of a short biographical sketch of Lamartine, I remarked upon, and gave an anecdote in illustration of his morbid self-estimation. His daily history since that date, shows that the disease is growing upon him. His speeches, his writings, his electioneering letters, his famous Conseiller du Peuple, all prove the enormous developement which the idea, ego, has taken with him: It amusingly exhibits itself in his every act.

There is but one God—Lamartine: and Lamartine is his prophet!

There is at least one Frenchman—perhaps there is only one—who adopts the above for his creed. Lamartine succeeded, after great effort, in being returned to the National Assembly at the partial elections of last month. He has not yet taken his seat, pleading indisposition. But vanity was a little solaced by a double election: and ego-worship is now taking another direction. Miffed that his old constituents refused to re-elect him in May, Lamartine has now gone to Macon, to sell his patrimonial estate, and quit his native department, shaking the dust from off his feet. The poet means to be most cruel in his punishment. Fortunately, his own estimation is not the true measure of its severity. When Lamartine's Confidences are exhausted—if he should still want money—you may expect to hear that he is offering his autographs for sale; and advertising locks of his hair to be sold at public outcry. There is, I understand, an American brother poet who already rejoices in a lock of hair, the generous gift of the illustrious author of Raphael.

But Madame Récamier, say you, did not sell Constant's Letters. True, it was not for money that she has violated the delicacy of her sex—that she has revealed secrets which were only half hers and which honor required her sacredly to keep and to allow to perish with herself. It was not for money; but for the gratification of vanity that she committed this fault. What if the world did suspect that the intellectual and able Benjamin Constant was of a cold nature and never loved? That suspicion did not affect his reputation—he was not esteemed the less. But Madame R. wished to connect her name indissolubly with that of a man who she knew would live in history. She wished the world to know that he whom every body thought could not love, was as mere a man in presence of her charms as hundreds of others—that he did love Madame Récamier! If this excuse is deemed a justification, she is welcome to it: but I believe there are hundreds of ladies in the United States, who on reading this little notice will promptly agree with me that her defence is yet to be commenced.

Several interesting letters from distinguished characters were read during the trial. The following short one from the Duke of Wellington to Madame Récamier will amuse you, as it did the court, and has all Paris.

“Paris, the 13th January.—I declare, Madame, I am not very sorry that business prevents my calling on you after dinner: for I never see you without leaving more impressed with your charms, and less disposed than before to attend to politics. But if you will be at home to-morrow I will, in spite of the effect produced upon me by these dangerous visits, call at your house on my return from the abbe Sicard's.

WELLINGTON.”

The old veteran himself will smile when he sees this gallant billet-doux so unexpectedly brought to light.

W. W. M.

P. S.—9th August. Upon the point of mailing my letter, I remark in to-day's papers that the court has pronounced its decision with respect to the Constant Letters. The publication is forbidden. The court recognizes the good faith of all the parties. Madame Colet came lawfully, by virtue of the donation presented in court, in possession of the Letters. She and M. de Girardin in good faith contracted for their publication—but they mistake the intentions of Madame Récamier. She never contemplated,—in the opinion of the court, she was formally opposed to a publication like that intended by defendants. Madame C. was authorized to make such use of the Letters as would be honorable to the memory of Benjamin Constant; and no other use: but publication in the manner proposed was a violation of the sacred rights of private life, injurious to the memory of the deceased and wounding to the feelings of surviving friends. There is as yet no ground to award damages to the complainants; but the continued publication is forbidden and the defendants are to pay the costs of suit.

In justification of the critical remarks in which I have indulged above, I must, in face of this unexpected decision, translate the short act of donation by which Madame R. confided these Letters to Madame Colet.

“I have given to Madame Louise Colet the copy of the Letters of Benjamin Constant: trusting to her to make such use of them as she shall deem most honorable to his memory: upon the condition, however, that these Letters shall not be communicated or published till after my death. This proof of confidence being entirely personal, if, contrary to all probability, I should survive Madame Colet, the copy of the Letters of Benjamin Constant is to be restored to me, and will again become my property." "The writing approved 17th July, 1840.

(Signed,)

J. RECAMIER."

I have attentively read the long published reports of this trial, and have not now, after reading the decision of the court, any thing to retract. Such letters should not be made public; but I believe that Madame R. intended their publication, and that Girardin has the right to publish them, if he chooses to exercise it. He is not a man to let the affair drop where it is.

W. W. M.

MARGINALIA.

BY EDGAR A. POE.

Among our men of genius whom, because they are men of genius, we neglect, let me not fail to mention William Wallace, of Kentucky. Had Mr. W. been born under the wings of that ineffable buzzard, "The North American Review," his unusual merits would long ago have been blazoned to the world—as the far inferior merits of Sprague, Dana, and others of like calibre, have already been blazoned. Neither of these gentlemen has written a poem worthy to be compared with "The Chant of a Soul," published in "The Union Magazine" for November, 1848. It is a noble composition throughout—imaginative, eloquent, full of dignity, and well sustained. It abounds in detached images of high merit—for example:

Your early splendor's gone
Like stars into a cloud withdrawn—
Like music laid asleep
In dried up fountains.

Enough, I am, and shall not choose to die.
No matter what our future Fate may be,
To live, is in itself a majesty.

And Truth, arising from yon deep,
Is plain as a white statue on a tall, dark steep.

Then
The Earth and Heaven were fair,
While only less than Gods seemed all my fellow men.
Oh, the delight—the gladness—
The sense, yet love, of madness—
The glorious choral exultations—
The far-off sounding of the banded nations—

The wings of angels in melodious sweeps
Upon the mountain's hazy steep—
The very dead astir within their coffin'd deep—
The dreamy veil that wrapt the star and sod—
A swathe of purple, gold, and amethyst—
And, hemious behind the billowy mist,
Something that looked to my young eyes like God.

I admit that the defect charged, by an envious critic, upon Bayard Taylor—the sin of excessive rhetoricianism—is, in some measure, chargeable to Wallace. He, now and then, permits enthusiasm to hurry him into bombast; but at this point he is rapidly improving; and, if not disheartened by the cowardly neglect of those who dare not praise a poetical aspirant with genius and without influence, will soon rank as one of the very noblest of American poets. In fact, he is so now.

"Frequently since his recent death," says the American Editor of Hood, "he has been called a great author—a phrase used not inconsiderately or in vain." Yet, if we adopt the conventional idea of "a great author," there has lived, perhaps, no writer of the last half century who, with equal notoriety, was less entitled than Hood to be so called. In fact, he was a literary merchant, whose main stock in trade was littleness; for, during the larger portion of his life, he seemed to breathe only for the purpose of perpetrating puns—things of so despicable a platitude that the man who is capable of habitually committing them, is seldom found capable of anything else. Whatever merit may be discovered in a pun, arises altogether from unexpectedness. This is the pun's element and is two-fold. First, we demand that the combination of the pun be unexpected; and, secondly, we require the most entire unexpectedness in the pun per se. A rare pun, rarely appearing, is, to a certain extent, a pleasurable effect; but to no mind, however debased in taste, is a continuous effort at punning otherwise than unendurable. The man who maintains that he derives gratification from any such chapters of punnage as Hood was in the daily practice of committing to paper, should not be credited upon oath.

The puns of the author of "Fair Inez," however, are to be regarded as the weak points of the man. Independently of their ill effect, in a literary view, as mere puns, they leave upon us a painful impression; for too evidently they are the hypochondriac's struggles at mirth—the grinnings of the death's head. No one can read his "Literary Reminiscences" without being convinced of his habitual despondency:—and the species of false wit in question is precisely of that character which would be adopted by an author of Hood's temperament and cast of intellect, when compelled to write at an emergency. That his heart had no interest in these *niaiserie*s, is clear. I allude, of course, to his mere puns for the pun's sake—a class of letters by which he attained his widest renown. That he did more in this way than in any other, is but a corollary from what I have already said, for, generally, he was unhappy, and almost continually he wrote invitè Minerva. But his true province was a very rare and ethereal humor, in which the mere pun was left out of sight, or took the character of the richest grotesquerie; impressing the imaginative reader with remarkable force, as if by a new phase of the ideal. It is in this species of brilliant, or, rather, glowing grotesquerie, uttered with a rushing abandon vastly heightening its effect, that Hood's marked originality mainly consisted:—and it is this which entitles him, at times, to the epithet “great:”—for that undeniably may be considered great (of whatever seeming littleness in itself) which is capable of inducing intense emotion in the minds, or hearts, of those who are themselves undeniably great.

The field in which Hood is distinctive is a border-land between Fancy and Fantasy. In this region he reigns supreme. Nevertheless, he has made successful and frequent incursions, although vacillatingly, into the domain of the true Imagination. I mean to say that he is never truly or purely imaginative for more than a paragraph at a time. In a word, his peculiar genius was the result of vivid Fancy impelled by Hypochondriasis.

A BACHELOR'S REVERIE.

IN THREE PARTS.

I. Smoke—Signifying Doubt. II. Blaze—Signifying Cheer. III. Ashes—Signifying Desolation.

BY IK. MARVEL.

I have got a quiet farmhouse in the country, a very humble place to be sure, tenanted by a worthy enough man, of the old New-England stamp, where I sometimes go for a day or two in the winter, to look over the farm-accounts, and to see how the stock is thriving on the winter's keep.

One side the door, as you enter from the porch, is a little parlor, scarce twelve feet by ten, with a cozy looking fire place—a heavy oak floor—a couple of arm chairs—a brown table with carved lions' feet. Out of this room opens a little cabinet, only big enough for a broad bachelor bedstead, where I sleep upon feathers, and wake in the morning, with my eye upon a saucy colored, lithographic print of some fancy “Bessy.”

It happens to be the only house in the world, of which I am bona-fide owner; and I take a vast deal of comfort in treating it just as I choose. I manage to break some article of furniture, almost every time I pay it a visit; and if I cannot open the window readily of a morning, to breathe the fresh air, I knock out a pane or two of glass with my boot. I lean against the wall in a very old arm-chair there is on the premises, and scarce ever fail to worry such a hole in the plastering, as would set me down for a round charge for damages in town, or make a prim housewife fret herself into a raging fever. I laugh out loud with myself, in my big arm-chair, when I think that I am neither afraid of one, nor the other.

As for the fire, I keep the little hearth so hot, as to warm half the cellar below, and the whole space between the jams, roars for hours together, with white flame. To be sure, the windows are not very tight, between broken panes, and bad joints, so that the fire, large as it is, is by no means an extravagant comfort.

As night approaches, I have a huge pile of oak and hickory, placed beside the hearth; I put out the tallow candle on the mantel, (using the family snuffers, with one leg broke,)—then, drawing my chair directly in front of the blazing wood, and setting one foot on each of the old iron fire-dogs, (until they grow too warm,) I diapase myself for an evening of such sober, and thoughtful quietude, as I believe, on my soul, that very few of my fellow-men have the good fortune to enjoy.

My tenant meantime, in the other room, I can hear now and then, though there is a thick stone chimney, and broad entry between, multiplying contrivances with his wife, to put two babies to sleep. This occupies them, I should say, usually an hour; though my only measure of time, (for I never carry a watch into the country,) is the blaze of my fire. By ten, or thereabouts, my stock of wood is nearly exhausted; I pile upon the hot coals what remains, and sit watching how it kindles, and blazes, and goes out—even like our joys!—and then, slip by the light of the embers into my bed, where I luxuriate in such sound, and healthful slumber, as only such rattling window frames, and country air, can supply.

But to return: the other evening—it happened to be on my last visit to my farm-house—when I had exhausted all the ordinary rural topics of thought, had formed all sorts of conjectures as to the income of the year, had planned a new wall around one lot, and the clearing up of another, now covered with patriarchal wood; and wondered if the little rickety house would not be after all, a snug enough box, to live and to die in—I fell on a sudden, into such an unprecedented line of thought, which took such deep hold of my sympathies—sometimes even starting tears—that I determined, the next day, to set as much of it as I could recal, on paper.

Something—it may have been the home-looking blaze, (I am a bachelor, of—say, six and twenty,) or possibly a plaintive cry of the baby in my tenant's room, had suggested to me the thought of—marriage.

I piled upon the heated fire-dogs, the last armful of my wood; and now, said I, bracing myself courageously between the arms of my chair,—“I'll not flinch;—I'll pursue the thought wherever it leads, though it lead me to the — (I am apt to be hasty,) at least,” continued I, softening, “until my fire is out.”

The wood was green, and at first showed no disposition to blaze. It smoked furiously. Smoke, thought I, always goes before blaze; and so does doubt go before decision: and my Reverie, from that very starting point, slipped into this shape:—

I.

SMOKE—SIGNIFYING DOUBT.

—Hum,—a wife! A wife?—hum!

Why? And pray, my dear sir, why not—why? Why not doubt? Why not hesitate? Why not tremble?

Does a man buy a ticket in a lottery—a poor man, whose whole earnings go in to secure the ticket,—without trembling, hesitating, doubting?

Can a man stake his bachelor respectability, independence, comfort, upon the die of absorbing, unchanging, relentless marriage, without trembling at the venture?

Shall a man who has been free to chase his fancies over the wide-world, without lett or hindrance, shut himself up to marriage-ship, within four walls called Home, that are to claim him, his time, his trouble, his tears, thenceforward forevermore, without doubts thick, and thick-coming as Smoke?

Shall he who has been hitherto a mere observer of other men's cares, and business—moving off where they made him sick of heart, approaching whenever and wherever they made him gleeful—shall he now undertake administration of just such cares and business, without qualms? Shall he, whose whole life has been but a nimble succession of escapes from trifling difficulties, now broach without doubtings—that matrimony, where if difficulty beset him, there is no escape? Shall this brain of mine, careless-working, never tired with idleness, feeding on long vagaries, and high, gigantic castles, dreaming out beatitudes hour by hour—turn itself at length to such dull task-work as thinking out a livelihood for wife and children?

Where thenceforward, will be those sunny dreams, in which I have warmed my fancies, and my heart, and lighted my eye with crystal? This very marriage, which a brilliant working imagination has invested time and again with brightness, and delight, can serve no longer as a mine for teeming fancy: all, alas, will be gone—reduced to the dull standard of the actual! No more room for intrepid forays of imagination—no more gorgeous realm-making—all is over!

Why not, I thought, go on dreaming? Can any wife be prettier than an after dinner fancy, idle and yet vivid, can paint for you? Can any children make less noise, than the little rosy-cheeked ones who have no existence, except in the omnium gatherum of your own brain? Can any housewife be more unexceptionable, than she who goes sweeping daintily the cobwebs that gather in your dreams? Can any domestic larder be better stocked, than the private larder of your head dozing on a cushioned chair-back at Delmonico's? Can any family purse be better filled than the exceeding plump one, you dream of, after reading such pleasant books as Munchausen, or Typee?

But if, after all, it must be—duty, or what-not, making provocation—what then? And I clapped my feet hard against the fire-dogs, and leaped back, and turned my face to the ceiling, as much as to say;—And where on earth, then, shall a poor devil look for a wife?

Somebody says, Lyttleton or Shaftesbury I think, that “marriages would be happier if they were all arranged by the Lord Chancellor.” Unfortunately, we have no Lord Chancellor to make this commutation of our misery.

Shall a man then scour the country on a mule's back, like Honest Gil Blas of Santillane; or shall he make application to some such intervening providence as Madame St. Marc, who, as I see by the Presse, manages these matters to one's hand, for some 5 per cent on the fortunes of the parties?

I have trouted, when the brook was so low, and the sky so hot, that I might as well have thrown my fly upon the turnpike; and I have hunted hare at noon, and wood-cock in snow-time, never despairing, scarce doubting; but for a poor hunter of his kind, without traps or snares, or any aid of police or constabulary, to traverse the world, where are swarming, on a moderate computation, some three hundred and odd millions of unmarried women, for a single capture—irremediable, unchangeable—and yet a capture which by strange metonymy, not laid down in the books, is very apt to turn captor into captive, and make game of hunter—all this, surely, surely may make a man shrug in doubt!

Then—again,—there are the plaguey wife's relations. Who knows how many third, fourth, or fifth cousins, will appear at careless complimentary intervals long after you had settled into the placid belief that all congratulatory visits were at end? How many twisted headed brothers will be putting in their advice, as a friend to Peggy?

How many maiden aunts will come to spend a month or two with their "dear Peggy," and want to know every tea-time, "if she isn't a dear love of a wife?" Then, dear father-in-law, will beg, (taking dear Peggy's hand in his,) to give a little wholesome counsel, and will be very sure to advise just the contrary of what you had determined to undertake. And dear mamma-in-law, must set her nose into Peggy's cupboard, and insist upon having the key to your own private locker in the wainscot.

Then, perhaps, there is a little bevy of dirty-nosed nephews who come to spend the holidays, and eat up your East India sweetmeats, and who are forever tramping over your head, or raising the Old Harry below, while you are busy with your clients. Last, and worst, is some fidgety old uncle, forever too cold or too hot, who vexes you with his patronizing airs, and impudently kisses his little Peggy!

—That could be borne, however: for perhaps he has promised his fortune to Peggy. Peggy, then, will be rich:—(and the thought made me rub my shins, which were now getting comfortably warm upon the fire-dogs.) Then, she will be forever talking of her fortune; and pleasantly reminding you on occasion of a favorite purchase,—how lucky she had the means; and dropping hints about economy, and buying very extravagant Paisleys.

She will annoy you by looking over the stock-list at breakfast time; and mention quite carelessly to your clients, that she is interested in such or such a speculation.

She will be provokingly silent when you hint to a tradesman that you have not the money by you, for his small bill;—in short, she will tear the life out of you, making you pay in righteous retribution of annoyance, grief, vexation, shame, and sickness of heart, for the superlative folly of "marrying rich."

—But if not rich, then poor. Bah! the thought made me stir the coals, but there was still no blaze. The paltry earnings you are able to wring out of clients by the sweat of your brow, will now be all our income; you will be pestered for pin-money, and pestered with poor wife's relations. Ten to one she will stickle about taste—"Sir Vitos"—and want to make this so pretty, and that so charming, if she only had the means, and is sure Paul (a kiss) can't deny his little Peggy such a trifling sum, and all for the common benefit!

Then she, for one, means that her children shan't go a begging for clothes,—and another pull at the purse. Trust a poor mother to dress her children in finery!

Perhaps she is ugly;—not noticeable at first; but growing on her, and (what is worse) growing faster on you. You wonder why you didn't see that vulgar nose long ago: and that lip—it is very strange, you think, that you ever thought it pretty. And, then, to come to breakfast, with her hair looking as it does, and you, not so much as daring to say—"Peggy, do brush your hair!" Her foot too—not very bad when decently chaussée—but now since she's married, she does wear such infernal slippers! And yet for all this, to be priggish up for an hour, when any of my old chums come to dine with me!

"Bless your kind hearts! my dear fellows," said I, thrusting the tongs into the coals, and speaking out loud, as if my voice could reach from Virginia to Paris—"not married yet!"

Perhaps Peggy is pretty enough—only shrewish.

No matter for cold coffee;—you should have been up before.

What sad, thin, poorly cooked chops, to eat with your rolls!

—She thinks they are very good and wonders how you can set such an example to your children.

The butter is nauseating.

—She has no other, and hopes you'll not raise a storm about butter a little turned. I think I see myself—ruminated I—sitting meekly at table, scarce daring to lift up my eyes, utterly fagged out with some quarrel of yesterday, choking down detestably sour muffins, that my wife thinks are "delicious"—slipping in dried mouthfuls of burnt ham off the side of my fork tines,—slipping off my chair side-ways at the end, and slipping out with my hat between my knees, to business, and never feeling myself a competent, sound-minded man, till the oak door is between me, and Peggy!

—"Ha, ha,—not yet!" said I; and in so earnest a tone, that my dog started to his feet—cocked his eye to have a good look into my face—met my smile of triumph with an amiable wag of the tail, and curled up again in the corner.

Again, Peggy is rich enough, well enough, mild enough, only she doesn't care a fig for you. She has married you because father, or grandfather thought the match eligible, and because she didn't wish to disoblige them. Besides, she didn't positively hate you, and thought you were a respectable enough person—she has told you so repeatedly at dinner. She wonders you like to read poetry; she wishes you would buy her a good cook-book; and insists upon your making your will at the birth of the first baby.

She thinks Captain So and So a splendid looking fellow, and wishes you would trim up a little were it only for appearance' sake.

You need not hurry up from the office so early at night:—she, bless her dear heart!—does not feel lonely. You read to her a love tale; she interrupts the pathetic parts with directions to her seamstress. You read of marriages: she sighs, and asks if Captain So and So has left town? She hates to be mewed up in a cottage, or between brick walls; she does so love the Springs!

But, again, Peggy loves you;—at least she swears it, with her hand on the Sorrows of Werter. She has pin-money which she spends for the Literary World and the Friends in Council. She is not bad-looking, saving a bit too much of forehead; nor is she slutish, unless a negligé till 3 o'clock, and an ink stain on the fore finger be slutish;—but then she is such a sad blue!

You never fancied when you saw her buried in a three volume novel, that it was anything more than a girlish vagary; and when she quoted Latin, you thought innocently, that she had a capital memory for her samplers.

But to be bored eternally about Divine Danté and funny Goldoni, is too bad. Your copy of Tasso, a treasure print of 1680, is all bethumbed and dog's-eared, and spotted with baby gruel. Even your Seneca—an Elzevir—is all sweaty with handling. She adores La Fontaine, reads Balzac with a kind of artist-scowl, and will not let Greek alone.

You hint at broken rest and an aching head at breakfast, and she will fling you a scrap of Anthology—in lieu of camphor bottle—or chant the ae! ae! of tragic chorus.

—The nurse is getting dinner; you are holding the baby; Peggy is reading Bruyère.

The fire smoked thick as pitch, and puffed out little clouds over the chimney piece. I gave the fore-stick a kick, at thought of Peggy, baby, and Bruyère.

—Suddenly the flame flickered bluely athwart the smoke—caught at a twig below—rolled round the mossy oak-stick—twined among the crackling tree-limbs—mounted—lit up the whole body of smoke, and blazed out cheerily and bright. Doubt vanished with Smoke, and Hope began with Flame.

II.

BLAZE—SIGNIFYING CHEER.

I pushed my chair back; drew up another; stretched out my feet cozily upon it, rested my elbows on the chair arms, leaned my head on one hand, and looked straight into the leaping, and dancing flame.

—Love is a flame—ruminated I; and (glancing round the room) how a flame brightens up a man's habitation.

"Carlo," said I, calling up my dog into the light, "good fellow, Carlo:" and I patted him kindly, and he wagged his tail, and laid his nose across my knee, and looked wistfully up in my face, then strode away,—turned to look again, and lay down to sleep.

"Pho, the brute!" said I, "it is not enough after all to like a dog."

—If now in that chair yonder, not the one your feet lie upon, but the other, beside you—closer yet—were seated a sweet-faced girl, with a pretty little foot lying out upon the hearth—a bit of lace running round the swelling throat—the hair parted to a charm over a forehead fair as any of your dreams,—and if you could reach an arm around that chair back, without fear of giving offence, and suffer your fingers to play idly with those curls that escape down the neck, and if you could clasp with your other hand those little white, taper fingers of hers, which lie so temptingly within reach,—and so, talk softly and low in presence of the blaze, while the hours slip without knowledge, and the winter winds whistle uncared for;—if, in short, you were no bachelor, but the husband of some such sweet image—(dream, call it, rather,) would it not be far pleasanter than this cold single night-sitting—counting the sticks—reckoning the length of the blaze, and the height of the falling snow?

And if, some or all of those wild vagaries that grow on your fancy at such an hour, you could whisper into listening, because loving ears—ears not tired with listening, because it is you who whisper—ears ever indulgent because eager to praise;—and if your darkest fancies were lit up, not merely with bright wood fire, but with ringing laugh of that sweet face turned up in fond rebuke—how far better, than to be waxing black, and sour, over pestilential humours—alone—your very dog asleep!

And if when a glowing thought comes into your brain, quick and sudden, you could tell it over as to a second self, to that sweet creature, who is not away, because she loves to be there; and if you could watch the thought catching that girlish mind, illuming that fair brow, sparkling in those pleasanter of eyes—how far better than to feel it alumbering, and going out, heavy, lifeless, and dead, in your own selfish fancy. And if a generous emotion steals over you—coming, you know not whither, would there not be a richer charm in lavishing it in caress, or endearing word, upon that fondest, and most dear one, than in patting your glossy coated dog, or sinking lonely to smiling slumbers?

How would not benevolence ripen with such monitor to task it! How would not selfishness grow faint and dull, leaning ever to that second self, which is the loved one! How would not guile shiver, and grow weak, before that girl-brow, and eye of innocence! How would not all that boyhood prized of enthusiasm, and quick blood, and life, renew itself in such presence!

The fire was getting hotter, and I moved into the middle of the room. The shadows the flames made, were playing like fairy forms over floor, and wall, and ceiling.

My fancy would surely quicken, thought I, if such being were in attendance. Surely imagination would be stronger, and purer, if it could have the playful fancies of dawning womanhood to delight it. All toil would be torn from mind-labor, if but another heart grow into this present soul, quickening it, warming it, cheering it, bidding it ever, God speed!

Her face would make a halo, rich as rainbow, atop of all such noisome things, as we lonely souls, call trouble. Her smile would illumine the blackest of crowding cares; and darkness that now seats you despondent, in your solitary chair for days together, weaving bitter fancies, dreaming bitter dreams, would grow light and thin, and spread, and float away,—chased by that beloved smile.

Your friend—poor fellow!—dies:—never mind, that gentle clasp of her fingers, as she steals behind you, telling you not to weep—it is worth all friends!

Your sister, sweet one, is dead—buried. The worms are busy with all her fairness. How it makes you think earth nothing but a spot to dig graves upon!

—It is more: she, she says, will be a sister; and the waving curls as she leans upon your shoulder, touch your cheek, and your wet eye turns to meet those other eyes—God has sent his angel, surely!

Your mother, alas for it, she is gone! Is there any bitterness to a youth, alone, and homeless, like this?

But you are not homeless; you are not alone: she is there;—her tears softening yours, her smile lighting yours, her grief killing yours; and you live again, to assuage that kind sorrow of hers.

Then—those children, rosy, fair-haired; no, they do not disturb you with prattle now—they are yours. Toss away there on the green-sward—never mind the hyacinths, the snow-drops, the violets, if so be any are there; the perfume of their healthful lips is worth all the flowers of the world. No need now to gather wild bouquets to love, and cherish:—flower, tree, sunlight, are all dead things; things livelier hold your soul.

And she, the mother, sweetest and fairest of all, watching, tending, caressing, loving, till your own heart grows pained with tenderest jealousy, and cures itself with loving.

You have no need now of cold lecture to teach thankfulness: your heart is full of it. No need now, as once, of bursting blossoms, of trees taking leaf, and greenness, to turn thought kindly, and thankfully; for ever, beside you, there is bloom, and ever beside you there is fruit, for which eye, heart, and soul are full of unknown, and unspoken, because unspeakable, thank-offering.

And if sickness catches you, binds you, lays you down—no lonely moanings, and wicked curses at careless stepping nurses. The step is noiseless, and yet distinct beside you. The white curtains are drawn, or withdrawn by the magic of that other presence; and the soft, cool hand is upon your brow.

No cold comfortings of friend-watchers, merely come in to steal a word away from that outer world which is pulling at their skirts, but, ever, the sad, shaded brow of her, whose lightest sorrow for your sake is your greatest grief,—if it were not a greater joy.

The blaze was leaping high and high, and the wood falling under the growing heat. —So, continued I, this heart would be at length itself;—striving with every thing gross, even now as it clings to grossness. Love would make its strength native and progressive. Earth's cares would fly. Joys would double. Susceptibilities be quickened; Love master self; and having made the mastery, stretch onward, and upward toward Infinitude.

And, if the end came, and sickness brought that follower—Great Follower—which sooner or later is sure to come after, then the heart, and the hand of Love, ever near, are giving to your tired soul, daily and hourly, lessons of that love which consoles, which triumphs, which circlet all, and centereth in all—Love Infinite, and Divine!

Kind hands—none but hers—will smooth the hair upon your brow as the chill grows damp, and heavy on it; and her fingers—none but hers—will lie in yours as the wasted flesh stiffens, and hardens for the ground. Her tears,—you could feel no others, if oceans fell—will warm your drooping features once more to life;—once more your eye lighted in joyous triumph, kindle in her smile, and then—

The fire fell upon the hearth; the blaze gave a last leap—a flicker—then another—caught a little remaining twig—blazed up—wavered—went out.

There was nothing but a bed of glowing embers, over which the white ashes gathered fast. I was alone, with only my dog for company.

III.

ASHES—SIGNIFYING DESOLATION.

After all, thought I, ashes follow blaze, inevitably as Death follows Life. Misery treads on the heels of Joy; Anguish rides swift after Pleasure.

"Come to me again, Carlo," said I, to my dog; and I patted him fondly now only by the light of the dying embers.

It is but little pleasure one takes in fondling brute favorites, but it is a pleasure that when it passes, leaves no void. It is only a little alleviating redundancy in your solitary heart-life, which if lost, another can be supplied.

But if your heart, not solitary—not quieting its humors with mere love of chase, or dog—not repressing year after year, its earnest yearnings after something better, more spiritual,—has fairly linked itself by bonds strong as life to another heart—is the casting off easy, then?

Is it then only a little heart redundancy cut off, which the next bright sunset will fill up?

And my fancy, as it had painted doubt under the smoke, and cheer under warmth of the blaze, so now it began under faint light of smouldering embers to picture heart-desolation.

—What kind congratulatory letters, hosts of them, coming from old and half-forgotten friends, now that your happiness is a year, or two years old!

"Beautiful."

—Aye, to be sure beautiful!

"Rich."

—Pho, the dawdler! how little he knows of heart-treasure, who speaks of wealth to a man who loves his wife, as a wife should only be loved!

"Young."

—Young indeed; guileless as infancy; charming as the morning.

Ah, these letters bear a sting: they bring to mind, with new, and newer freshness, if it be possible, the value of that, which you tremble lest you lose.

How anxiously you watch that step—if it lose not its buoyancy; How you study the colour on that cheek, if it grow not fainter; How you tremble at the lustre in those eyes, if it be not the lustre of Death; How you totter under the weight of that muslin sleeve—a phantom weight! How you fear to do it, and yet press forward, to note if that breathing be quickened, as you ascend the home-heights, to look off on sunset lighting the plain.

Is your sleep, quiet sleep, after that she has whispered to you her fears, and in the same breath—soft as a sigh, sharp as an arrow—bid you bear it bravely?

But then,—the embers were now glowing fresher, a little kindling, before the ashes—she triumphs over disease.

But Poverty, the world's almoner, has come to you with ready, spare hand. Alone, with your dog living on bones, and you, on hope—kindling each morning, dying slowly each night,—this could be borne. Philosophy would bring home its stores to the lone-man. Money is not in his hand, but Knowledge is in his brain! and from that brain he draws out faster, as he draws slower from his pocket. He remembers; and on remembrance he can live for days, and weeks. The garret, if garret covers him, is rich in fancies. The rain if it pelts, pelts only him used to rain-peltings. And his dog crouches not in dread, but in companionship. His crust he divides with him, and laughs. He crowns himself with glorious memories of Cervantes, though he begs: if he nights it under the stars, he dreams heaven-sent dreams of prisoned, and homeless Galileo.

He hums old sonnets, and snatches of poor Jonson's plays. He chants Dryden's odes, and dwells on Otway's rhyme. He reasons with Bolingbroke or Diogenes, as the humour takes him; and laughs at the world: for the world, thank Heaven, has left him alone!

Keep your money, old misers, and your palaces, old princes,—the world is mine!

I care not Fortune what you me deny,—

You cannot rob me of free nature's grace,

You cannot shut the windows of the sky;

You cannot bar my constant feet to trace

The woods and lawns, by living streams, at eve.

Let health, my nerves and finer fibres brace,

And I, their toys, to the great children, leave,

Of Fancy, Reason, Virtue, naught can me bereave!

But—if not alone?

If she is clinging to you for support, for consolation, for home, for life—she reared in luxury perhaps, is faint for bread?

Then, the iron enters the soul; then the nights darken under any sky light. Then the days grow long, even in solstice of winter.

She may not complain; what then?

Will your heart grow strong, if the strength of her love can dam up the fountains of tears, and the tied tongue not tell of bereavement? Will it solace you to find her parting the poor treasure of food you have stolen for her, with begging, foodless children?

But this ill, strong hands, and Heaven's help, will put down. Wealth again; Flowers again; Patrimonial acres again; Brightness again. But your little Bessy, your favorite child is pining.

Would to God! you say in agony, that wealth could bring fulness again into that blanched cheek, or round those little thin lips once more; but it cannot. Thinner and thinner they grow; plaintive and more plaintive her sweet voice.

"Dear Bessy"—and your tones tremble; you feel she is on the edge of the grave. Can you pluck her back? Can endearments stay her? Business is heavy, away from the loved child; home, you go, to fondle while yet time is left—but this time you are too late.

She is gone.

She cannot hear you; she cannot thank you for the violets you put within her stiff white hand.

And then—the grassy mound—the cold shadow of head-stone!

The wind, growing with the night, is rattling at the window panes, and whistles dismally. I wipe a tear, and in the interval of my Reverie, thank God, that I am no such mourner.

But gaiety, snail-footed, creeps back to the house-hold. All is bright again.

The violet's bed's not sweeter, than the delicious breath Marriage sends forth.

Her lip is rich and full; her cheek delicate as a flower. Her frailty doubles your love.

And the little one she clasps—frail too—too frail;—the boy you had set your hopes and heart on. You have watched him growing, ever prettier, ever winning more and more upon your soul. The love you bore to him when he first lisped names—your name and hers—has doubled in strength now that he asks innocently to be taught of this, or that, and promises you by that lively curiosity that flashes in his eye, a mind full of intelligence.

And some hair-breadth escape by sea, or flood, that he perhaps may have had—which unstrung your soul to such tears as you pray God, may be spared you again—has endeared the little fellow to your heart a thousand fold.

And now, with his pale sister in the grave, all that love has come away from the mound, where worms feast, and centers on the boy.

How you watch the storms lest they harm him! How often you steal to his bed late at night, and lay your hand lightly upon the brow, where the curls cluster thick, rising and falling with the throbbing temples, and watch, for minutes together, the little lips half parted, and listen—your ear close to them—if the breathing be regular and sweet!

But the day comes—the night rather—when you can catch no breathing.

Aye, put your hair away,—compose yourself—listen again.

No, there is nothing.

Put your hand now to his brow,—damp indeed—but not with healthful night-sleep; it is not your hand, no, do not deceive yourself—it is your loved boy's forehead that is so cold; and your loved boy will never speak to you again—never play again—he is dead!

Oh, the tears—the tears;—what blessed things are tears! Never fear now to let them fall on his forehead, or his lip, lest you waken him! Clasp him—clasp him harder—you cannot hurt, you cannot waken him! Lay him down, gently or not, it is the same; he is stiff; he is stark and cold.

But courage is elastic; it is our pride. It recovers itself easier, thought I, than these embers will get into blaze again.

But courage, and patience, and faith, and hope have their limit. Blessed be the man who escapes such trial as will determine limit!

To a lone-man it comes not near; for how can trial take hold where there is nothing by which to try?

A funeral? You reason with philosophy. A grave-yard? You read Hervey and muse upon the wall. A friend dies? You sigh, you pat your dog,—it is over. Losses? You retrench—you light your pipe—it is forgotten. Calumny? You laugh—you sleep.

But with that childless wife clinging to you in love and sorrow—what then?

Can you take down Seneca now and coolly blow the dust from the leaf-tops? Can you crimp your lip with Voltaire? Can you smoke idly, your feet dangling with the ivies, your thoughts all waving fancies, upon a church-yard wall—a wall that borders the grave of your boy?

Can you amuse yourself with turning stinging Martial into rhyme? Can you pat your dog, and seeing him wakeful and kind, say, "it is enough?" Can you sneer at calumny and sit by your fire dozing?

Blessed, thought I again, is the man who escapes such trial as will measure limit of patience and limit of courage!

But the trial comes: colder and colder were growing the embers.

That wife, over whom your love broods, is fading. Not beauty fading;—that now that your heart is wrapped in her being would be nothing.

She sees with quick eye your dawning apprehension, and she tries hard to make that step of hers elastic.

Your trials and your loves together have centered your affections. They are not now as when you were a lone man, wide-spread and superficial. They have caught from domestic attachments a finer tone and touch. They cannot shoot out tendrils into barren world-soil and suck up thence strengthening nutriment. They have grown under the forcing glass of home-roof, they will not now bear exposure.

You do not now look men in the face as if a heart-bond was linking you—as if a community of feeling lay between. There is a heart-bond that absorbs all others; there is a community that monopolizes your feeling. When the heart lay wide open, before it had grown upon, and closed around particular objects, it could take strength and cheer from a hundred connections that now seem colder than ice.

And now those particular objects—alas for you!—are failing.

What anxiety pursues you! How you struggle to fancy—there is no danger; how she struggles to persuade you—there is no danger!

How it grates now on your ear—the toil and turmoil of the city! It was music when you were alone; it was pleasant even, when from the din, you were elaborating comforts for the cherished objects—when you had such sweet escape as evening drew on.

Now it maddens you to see the world careless while you are steeped in care. They hustle you in the street; they smile at you across the table; they bow carelessly over the way; they do not know what canker is at your heart.

The undertaker comes with his bill for the dead boy's funeral. He knows your grief; he is respectful. You bless him in your soul. You wish the laughing street-goers were all undertakers.

Your eye follows the physician as he leaves your house: is he wise, you ask yourself; is he prudent? is he the best? Did he never fail—is he never forgetful?

And now the hand that touches yours, is it no thinner—no whiter than yesterday? Sunny days come when she revives; colour comes back; she breathes freer; she picks flowers; she meets you with a smile: hope lives again.

But the next day of storm she is fallen. She cannot talk even; she presses your hand.

You hurry away from business before your time. What matter for clients—who is to reap the rewards? What matter for fame—whose eye will it brighten? What matter for riches—whose is the inheritance?

You find her propped with pillows; she is looking over a little picture book bethumbed by the dear boy she has lost. She hides it in her chair; she has pity on you.

Another day of revival, when the spring sun shines, and flowers open out of doors; she leans on your arm, and strolls into the garden where the first birds are singing. Listen to them with her;—what memories are in bird-songs! You need not shudder at her tears—they are tears of Thanksgiving! Press the hand that lies light upon your arm, and you too, thank God, while yet you may!

You are early home—mid-afternoon. Your step is not light; it is heavy, terrible. They have sent for you.

She is lying down; her eyes half closed; her breathing long and interrupted.

She hears you; her eye opens; you put your hand in hers; yours trembles, hers does not. Her lips move; it is your name.

"Be strong," she says. "God will help you!"

She presses harder your hand:—"Adieu!" A long breath—another; you are alone again! No tears now; poor man! You cannot find them!

Again home early. There is a smell of varnish in your house. A coffin is there; they have clothed the body in decent grave clothes, and the undertaker is screwing down the lid, slipping round on tip-toe. Does he fear to waken her!

He asks you a simple question about the inscription upon the plate, rubbing it with his coat cuff. You look him straight in the eye; you motion to the door; you dare not speak.

He takes up his hat and glides out stealthful as a cat.

The man has done his work well, for all. It is a nice coffin—a very nice coffin! Pass your hand over it—how smooth!

Some sprigs of mignonette are lying carelessly in a little gilt edged saucer. She loved mignonette.

It is a good stanch table the coffin rests on;—it is your table; you are a house-keeper—a man of family!

Aye, of family!—keep down outcry, or the nurse will be in. Look over at the pinched features; is this all that is left of her! And where is your heart now! No, don't thrust your nails into your hands, nor mangle your lip, nor grate your teeth together. If you could only weep!

—Another day. The coffin is gone out. The stupid mourners have wept—what idle tears! She, with your crushed heart, is gone out!

Will you have pleasant evenings at your home now?

Go into your parlor that your prim house-keeper has made comfortable with clean hearth and blaze of sticks.

Sit down in your chair; there is another velvet cushioned one, over against yours, empty. You press your fingers on your eye-balls, as if you would press out something that hurt the brain; but you cannot. Your head leans upon your hand; your eyes rest upon the flashing blaze.

Ashes always come after blaze.

Go now into the room where she was sick—softly, lest the prim house-keeper hear you and come after.

They have put new dimity upon her chair;
they have hung new curtains over the bed. They have removed from the stand its phials and silver bell; they have put a little vase of flowers in their place; the perfume will not offend the sick nurse now. They have half opened the window, that the room, so long closed, may have air. It will not be too cold. She is not there.

Oh, God! thou who dost temper the wind to the Shorn Lamb—be kind!

The embers were dark; I stirred them; there was no sign of life. My dog was asleep. The clock in my tenant's chamber had struck one.

I dashed a tear or two from my eyes—how they came I know not. I half ejaculated a prayer of thanks that such desolation had not yet come nigh me; and a prayer of hope that it might never come.

In a half hour more, I was sleeping soundly.
My reverie was ended.

SONG.

I make no boast of feeling—
I do not say the love
That o'er my soul is stealing
Like music from above—
May never lose its power to bless,
Or charm the weary spirit less.

I do not say the gladness
Of youth's enchanting dream—
May never change to sadness,
When paled its golden beam:
For is there aught of heavenly birth
That fadeth not, when brought to earth?

The visions that we cherish,
The day-dreams of the heart—
Like flowers of autumn perish,
Like rainbow tints depart—
All that is beautiful must fade,
O'er brightest hopes there falls—a shade.

Yet this my spirit dareth,
To whisper unto thine—
The true heart never feareth
Its earnest love's decline—
The fond vow breathed—the promise spoken—
Ah! were they uttered—to be broken?

An—angel's sunny pinion—
Will be lifted from my soul,
If thy love's bright dominion
Should lose its blest control—
And desolate will be my lot—
If thy sweet influence cheer it not.

I make no boast of feeling,
But Lady! do not deem
This passionate revealing
Of youth's enchanting dream—
The idle fantasy of song—
That glows—but cannot linger long.

P. H. B.

Edgefield, S. Carolina.

[From the Virginia Historical Register.]

THE OLD SWAN.

I have a thousand associations and recollections connected with the old building formerly known by this name, as it used to stand, (and still stands under a new title.) on H, now called Broad Street, near the Rail-Road Depot. When I say old building, I do not mean to insinuate that it was so very old, and, in truth, with its present painted face and altered aspect, it is difficult to regard it as a relic of antiquity. It is, however, an old building; for I have passed my tenth lustrum, (some time,) and I can remember it as the old Swan even in my boyish days, and even then it looked to my young eyes like a time-worn mansion, not quite old enough indeed to have existed ab urbe condita, but clearly to have been erected at a period not long after the commencement of our revolutionary war; and I am confident that it must have been nearly coeval with that memorable event. I shall leave the point, however, to the investigation of the chroniclers about me.

Now I have certainly no ill will to the present proprietors of this venerable establishment, but I confess I did feel something like a shock, and perhaps a very little rising of choler, when, passing by the building one morning, a few months ago, I discovered, for the first time, that the good old bird with its well-remembered graceful neck of tarnished gilt, that used to stand out on the sign, in all weathers, had entirely disappeared.
and that, in lieu of it, there was only a plain blue ground, with the words, "Broad Street Hotel," thereon; (how flat, and prosaic in the comparison!) to amaze and offend my eyes. Indeed how could I be otherwise than shocked when this discovery not only gave me a sudden start of surprise, but seemed, at the moment, to scatter and dispel a thousand pleasant and long-cherished associations connected with the old sign, and the old house? I had looked at the brave bird perhaps a thousand times, and always with great satisfaction; but it was now gone, and forever. And the old tavern which it so appropriately announced and symbolized—how metamorphosed! It looked, for all the world, like an old lady trying to pass herself off for a young one, by putting on a fine dress;—and I could hardly tell whether it was itself or another. My thoughts were all confused, and my recollections scattered about; but I have rallied them again, as well as I could to Head Quarters, and will now put them down here on paper, to preserve them, as far as possible, against any further chance or change that may happen hereafter.

It is, I suppose, some forty-five years since this famous ordinary had attained its highest and fairest fame. There was at that period, a great deal of competition among the members of the Boniface fraternity, in our rising city. The House near the old market, which had been formerly kept by Col. Bowler, famous for his sandy-colored wig and revolutionary cocked hat, was perhaps un peu passé, but still not without reputation; and the Eagle, then one of the most conspicuous buildings on Main Street, was the resort of many visitors of all classes; country merchants and planters, lovers of sport, and rich young gentlemen in pursuit of pleasure and gaiety. But the old Swan was even a tip above that. It was the resort of a more select, and yet considerable, circle of customers whom business or recreation attracted to the metropolis. Here were to be seen, at the regular seasons, the venerable judges of the Court of Appeals;—lawyers of eminence from various parts of the State;—and leading members of both Houses of the General Assembly. The company indeed was the pride of the establishment. The house itself was but a plain building, of ordinary and almost rustic appearance. The furniture too, was as plain as possible. There were no gas-lighted chandeliers to blind your eyes, nor costly mirrors to reproach your extravagance by their reflections; but every thing was old-fashioned and unpretending. But if the standard of ostentation was low, that of comfort was at the highest point. Then, the keeper of the house was the very pink of landlords. Colonel John Moss, who was also the proprietor, was in fact, in many respects, the head of his class. He was, to be sure, a little starched and stately, and looked as if he was always on duty; but then he was not above his business, nor above himself. The whole house reflected his character. Every thing was clean and neat—exactly so. The floors, in summer, were always bright and polished by hard rubbing, and, in winter, covered with comely rag-carpets. If the chambers were rather small and inconvenient, the beds and bedding were always clean and well-aired; and if the table never glittered with plate, nor groaned under French dishes, nor sparkled with costly champagne, the ham was always prime, the meats the very best the market could afford—the cooking unrivalled—and the wine the best London particular imported direct from Madeira in exchange for old Virginia corn. It is true it was often whispered about the table that “mine host” was a very nice calculator, and filled the mouths of his guests so exactly, that it was shrewdly suspected he must have counted their noses; but still they always had enough, and of the best to eat, and could not reasonably complain that they had not more to waste. Then the Colonel was so kind and obliging in his way, that it was impossible not to feel the greatest respect for his personal presence; and a deep sense of his superior merit.

Next in rank and importance to the Colonel, was the Major-domo, or bar-keeper, by the name of Lovell, who besides possessing some of his employer’s peculiarities, was something of a wag, and frequently displayed his ready wit at the expense of others. Lovell was remarkable for a long aquiline nose, and wore an exceedingly short and shabby coat,—probably more from poverty than choice. A member of the Legislature from N—, by the name of R—, one of the regular lodgers, and a constant customer at the bar, was much in the habit of teasing Lovell, and I remember, that on one occasion, I witnessed a small passage of wit between them, which caused some little laugh at the time, and, boy as I was, amused me greatly. “Lovell,” said R— with a droll look, and tugging at the scanty garment of the bar-keeper from behind, “your coat, old boy, is entirely too short.” “It may be too short now,” replied the other huffishly, “but I think it will be long enough before I get another.” “Perhaps it will,” rejoined R—, “but in the mean time, to make amends for the shortness of your coat, you are supplied, I see, with a very long bill!”—accompanying his words with a gesture that seemed to threaten the tapster’s nose with a tweak. But said he, “my bill may be a long one, but not so long as yours will be at the end of the session, unless you slacken your visits to the bar-room.” Here R— whose rubicund face seemed to give point to the bar-keeper’s wit, was evidently confused, and shuffling off some idle remark or other, was glad to make good his retreat through the door.

But what were these small “wit-crackers” of the porch, to the lights of law, and luminaries of learning, within that attic dome? Here, no doubt, was “the feast of reason and the flow of soul.” Here was “the sprightly dialogue, the tart reply, the logic, and the wisdom, and the wit.” Oh how I longed to hear them all; and to share in those noctes cœnaque deum, as I verily thought them at the time! But alas I was yet too young to be admitted into those "penetralia Vestæ" and could only, as yet, imagine the treat which I hoped to be one day admitted to enjoy. In the mean time, I had now and then some furtive glimpses of the great classics of the establishment, which pleased me not a little. Once, in particular, I recollect, I was the bearer of a paper or document of some kind or other, to the venerable judge Pendleton, a short time before his death. I found him sitting alone in his chamber, reading some record, I suppose, of the Court of Appeals, and his emaciated form, with his pale face and white cap, made a deep and indelible impression upon my mind. He was probably engaged, at the very time I saw him, in preparing his opinion on the great question of the constitutionality of the act of assembly confiscating the Globe lands. That opinion, I have always understood, was adverse to what was afterwards the decision of the court in the case; and was to have been delivered on the very day on which he died. How mysterious this intervention of Divine Providence appeared to many at the time; and yet who does not now see that it was "all for the best."

But again, I remember that sometime in the summer of the year 1807, shortly after the memorable attack of the Leopard upon the Chesapeake—when our whole city rang with patriotic indignation against the British—and a meeting of our citizens had been summoned to convene in the Capitol that evening, I went over, in the afternoon, to see a young friend, a student of medicine, who boarded at the Swan; when I found his room partly occupied by a stranger whom I had never seen before. He was apparently about the age of six or seven and twenty, elegant in his manners, and uncommonly handsome. He conversed familiarly with us who, compared with him, were but boys, and I observed that his dark eyes flashed with meteor brilliancy as he spoke of the recent outrage of the British, and the contemplated meeting at the Capitol. I remember that he fascinated me at once by his eye and his tongue, and that, like Desdemona, I did, "with greedy ear, devour up his discourse." I determined accordingly, and my young medical friend with me, that we would be at the Capitol that evening, for we felt assured that he also would be there. We went accordingly, at an early hour, and I recollect climbing up into one of the niches in the Hall, to take a full view of the scene before me. After a while, the object of the meeting was announced, and the Committee appointed for the purpose had reported resolutions of a very warlike tone, when two gentlemen, J. G. G——, of Richmond, and C. F. M——, of Loudon, both men of note and talent, proposed an amendment somewhat softening and qualifying the language of the resolutions, whereupon a stranger, whom I immediately recognised as the handsome and dark-eyed lodger of the Swan, rose from his seat, mounted the platform erected for the speakers, and poured out a strain of bold and fervid eloquence that electrified the whole assembly at once. He protested vehemently against all efforts to dilute and qualify the resolutions, and dwelt upon the manifold wrongs which had been inflicted upon us by England, with overwhelming effect. His speech produced, of course, a powerful and palpable impression upon the meeting; and I saw, for the first time, how "the stormy wave of the multitude" (as Curran has it,) could be both raised and quelled by the orator's exciting and yet subduing blasts. The resolutions were adopted at once, by acclamation; and the hall rang aloud with the praises of the speaker, whose name was now on every tongue. And who was he? Who was he indeed but Benjamin Watkins Leigh;—then a young lawyer residing in the town of Petersburg—but soon to be the pride of our own city, and of our whole state. But alas! he too is gone, and I often feel, when I think of him, (in the spirit of Shenstone's celebrated inscription) how much less it is to hear the speeches of others, than to remember his.

H.

SONNET.

BY E. JESSUP KAMES.

I.

In the hush'd stillness of the starry night,
When the sad voice is felt and tears will flow—
Then floating in a mist of softest light,
A meek-ey'd seraph spiritually bright,
Bends o'er my couch, and on my weary brow
Presses her angel lips, and whispers low
Sweet words of comfort to my spirit-ear;—
Ah! well I deem her from the upper sphere!
Glimpses of glory then are round me cast,
Immortal eyes shine on me from afar—
Through their clear light, clear as Eve's brightest stars
Her spirit shines! Oh, loveliest, if thou hast
One memory of Human Love, in thy far home of bliss,
Be still, my hope and comforter, through all the woes of this!

August, 1849.

THE SELDENS OF SHERWOOD.

CHAPTER VI.

Juliana was right in thinking that every member of the family at Travers Lodge, would be somewhat at a loss, as to how their guest was to be entertained, and that a dread was felt, if not avowed, of a long day in perspective, without any resource but conversation. There recurred also the puzzling question as to what manner of conversation would be appropriate for a minister. It was determined in the family council not to mention to George, that Charles Selden was expected to dinner, as he would then return home as usual, after his morning ride, and, finding the minister there, be thus compelled into civility and good humor.

Charles, at his first entrance into the parlor at Travers Lodge, perceived at a glance that an air of the most uncomfortable and respectful constraint was diffused over the group. Each of the ladies advanced a few paces from their seats to meet him, then resumed them mechanically, and taking up their work again, fixed their eyes on it with the most intense gravity.

Mr. Travers courageously prepared to support the whole weight of the conversation, and began with a preliminary hem—"We were very fortunate in having so fine a day for church yesterday."

Charles assented.

"It would have been a disappointment to many," observed Mrs. Travers, somewhat nervously, "if the day had been rainy; it has been so long since the people have had an opportunity of going to church."

"I observed some persons there yesterday," said Mr. Travers, "who are professed infidels: Dr. Howard, for instance, who has embraced all the new-fangled notions of the French school. I wonder what benefit he proposes to derive from going to church."

"We have a natural love for assembling ourselves together, and many are attracted to a public meeting for any purpose whatever," replied Charles; "besides, there is a pleasure in feeling one's self superior to the prejudices by which common minds are fettered, and the fallacies which they utter makes the consciousness of the strength of one's own reasoning powers more gratifying."

"I have observed," said Mr. Travers, "that all these infidels have a considerable share of vanity; but Howard is really a man of talent and information, and not so conceited as people of that class usually are. I should like to hear you in serious argument with him on the truth of religion. You must make his acquaintance."

"I shall be much obliged to you to assist me in becoming acquainted with all who are willing to know me; but I think arguments on the truth of religion are seldom beneficial to the cause."

"Indeed!" said Mr. Travers, with a look of surprise and disappointment, though he was too polite to enter upon the discussion of such a subject with a clergyman.

"This seems a strange assertion, perhaps," said Charles, replying rather to the looks than the words of Mr. Travers, "as it might seem to imply that the subject would not bear investigation; this, however, is so far from being my opinion, that I believe the more thoroughly Revelation is examined, the more firmly will its truth be established; but then the inquiry must be conducted with sincerity and candor on both sides, to produce a good effect on the minds of those engaged in it. We do not often argue for the sake of discovering truth, but for victory; and we do not like those who have defeated us in argument at all the better for it, nor are we apt to yield to convictions that are forced upon us."

"This is certainly true in most cases," said Mr. Travers. "I have often observed the truth of your remark in political contention, and I doubt not it will hold good in polemics. But is a man to be left in his errors?"

"By no means, other methods of convincing him are likely to prove more efficacious."

A step was heard just then in the passage, and Mr. Travers arose hastily, saying, he thought it probable his friend, Mr. Nelson, who had promised to dine with them, had arrived: he, however, thought it much more probable that it was his son George, and wished himself to apprise him that Charles was in the parlor, that his entrance might be made with due decorum and gravity, and to give him a few preliminary hints as to his department.

Charles looked towards Mrs. Travers and her daughters, who sat in immovable silence. Mrs. Travers and Anna Maria, both meditating on something which would be sufficiently sensible and suitable to say—Juliana secretly enjoying their embarrassment. Turning towards an open window, shaded by the luxuriant branches of a sweet-briar bush in full bloom, he remarked—

"How delightfully fragrant the bloom of the sweet-briar is, and then its little buds are so beautiful, like miniature moss roses. I prefer it greatly to our garden roses."

"Are you fond of flowers?" asked Anna Maria, delighted to find any thing to say, though the subject in discussion was so much less momentous than any she had expected to enter upon.

"Extremely so. My mother and sisters have such a passion for flowers, it would have been impossible for me not to learn something about their cultivation; and then, one cannot cultivate them without learning to love them. I am glad to find a few rose bushes and bunches of pinks in the garden at the Rectory—they look like old friends.”

Juliana looked up from her netting with a glance that said as plainly as if she had spoken, “Why you talk exactly like other people.” Charles could scarcely forbear a smile at the expression of her countenance.

Mrs. Travers, glad to find an opportunity of obliging him, offered all the various kinds of shrubbery which her garden afforded, when the proper season arrived for setting it out, and Charles thankfully accepted the offer, saying that he hoped, however, to impose the trouble of planting out his flower garden on one who could arrange it with more taste and skill than he possessed.

What did this mean? thought both Anna Maria and Juliana. Anna Maria colored a little, Juliana with difficulty repressed a fit of giggling, when their speculations were suddenly ended by Charles adding with an air of simplicity—

“My Aunt Mason has kindly consented to take the cares of my establishment on herself, and of course the flower-garden will be her province.”

Anna Maria felt relieved, and Juliana was obliged to have recourse to the window, under the pretext of plucking a bouquet of sweet-briar buds, but in reality to conceal the laughter which was convulsing her, at this simple explanation of a speech, which she had understood so differently, and the effect which she knew it had produced on her sister.

Anna Maria had prepared a speech some minutes previously, and fearing the subject would slip away before the speech could overtake it, hastened to say in a sentimental tone, “What a sweet book is Hervey’s Meditations, Mr. Selden. Do you not remember the passage about the lily?”

“Anna Maria can repeat it word for word,” observed her mother. “I believe you never miss reading it on Sundays, my dear.”

Anna Maria blushed a little, and it was quite impossible for Charles not to smile a little too, but the expression of his countenance was so kind and open, that no one could have imagined the smile to proceed from ill-nature, or from a desire to ridicule either Anna Maria or her mother.

“I recollect the passage,” he replied. “Hervey’s writings have enjoyed a considerable share of popularity, and certainly evince religious sentiment. Many have derived pleasure and improvement from his pages.”

This was quite as much as Charles could say with sincerity in favor of Hervey’s Meditations; but as he did not like to disparage any book of moral or religious tendency, which might be useful or pleasing to some minds, he hastened to change the subject.

How many are the conversational aids, enjoyed by the present favored generation, of which our ancestors were ignorant! No books of prints were scattered on the tables of our grandmothers’ sitting-rooms, no new periodicals furnished them with ever-varying themes for social converse, rarely did a new work make its appearance, nor had the velocity of the flying horse of Ariosto been then exceeded by the marvellous rapidity of steam, bearing with fiery wings tidings from one end of the civilized world to the other. Female education, using the word education in its common, limited sense, that is, an acquaintance with knowledge derived from books, was but little attended to, and if there were some exceptions to this amongst families, whose views were rather in advance of the age in which they lived, the few ladies who were competent to discuss questions of science or literature, never ventured to do so but in their own domestic circles. This destitution of external aids, while it imparted the interest of raciness and originality to the conversation of those who were distinguished by strength of mind, or sprightliness of imagination, had however the general effect of depressing the tone of colloquial intercourse, and confining its range within the narrowest limits. In such a state of things, gossiping became almost a necessary evil.

There was a modest simplicity, a natural ease in Charles Selden’s manner, which could not fail to have some effect in dispelling the constraint under which the ladies had hitherto suffered, and Mrs. Travers was led almost unconsciously into something like easy chat with him. After observing his remarkable resemblance to his mother, Mrs. Travers, in answer to Charles’ inquiries, as to whether she had ever seen Mrs. Selden before her marriage, went on to describe, with more animation than he had supposed her capable of evincing, a ball at which they had been together, the admiration Mrs. Selden’s beauty had excited, the many beaux and belles who had figured on this occasion, and various incidents of the evening. Suddenly recalled to a recollection of Charles Selden’s position, by a reproving glance from Anna Maria, Mrs. Travers was somewhat disturbed at the thought, that the subjects on which she had been descanting were by no means edifying or appropriate: she colored slightly, and remarked gravely, that Mr. Selden must excuse her for talking of such vanities and trifling things unworthy of his attention.

Charles’ kind smile assured her that she had not lowered herself at all in his estimation, and he replied—"I can well imagine the interest and pleasure connected with remembrances of youthful days, so indelibly associated with our first and strongest affections, the brightness and freshness of novelty, with which every object is invested, when the world lays smiling before us."

"Smiling, alas, deceitfully," observed Anna Maria, in a soft, sentimental tone.

"Yes, deceitfully, if we trust to its smiles for our happiness, but a very good world if we remember always to view it in connection with a higher and better state of things."

Anna Maria smiled dubiously, as she was somewhat at a loss how to reply to this speech; she was, however, spared the trouble of doing so, by Mr. Travers' entrance with his son George and Mr. Nelson. There was nothing remarkable in George Travers' appearance. He would generally have been called a fine looking young man, as his stature was above the ordinary height, and his features rather regular than otherwise, but there was an expression in his countenance of indolence and self-indulgence, which showed that his moral and intellectual nature had never been developed or disciplined. As soon as he had been introduced to Charles, he threw himself carelessly on a seat near Juliana, and began listlessly to play with her netting, his whole air seeming to denote that he did not consider it his affair at all to assist in entertaining the company. Mrs. Travers regarded him with a look of maternal gratification, and really thought it was a mark of goodness of heart, and of a desire to please his parents, that he should constrain himself to make one of the company, when he might have absented himself on various pleas.

George eyed the young minister superciliously for some minutes, and then commenced a whispering conversation with Juliana, whose giggling was only suppressed by a marked glance of disapprobation from Mr. Travers.

Some hours lay in dreary perspective, ere the day should close, but Charles endeavored with so much good sense and sprightliness, to impart something like cheerfulness and ease to the tone of the conversation, that he certainly succeeded, in a great measure, in making them pass off agreeably to the rest of the company. For himself, time moved on leaden wings, as he felt that he was constantly expected to sustain the prominent share in conversation, and yet every remark that dropped from his lips was weighed and canvassed. He thought of the happy family circle at Sherwood, where all regarded it not only as a duty, but a pleasure, to endeavor to contribute to the happiness of those around them, without thinking of how they should appear themselves, and his heart sank when he remembered that he must no more look to this dear home as a refuge. Other thoughts and feelings, however, soon came to his aid; he had only to regard those around him as immortal beings; if he hoped to be the means of awakening within them a consciousness of their spiritual nature, a desire for eternal happiness, he must endeavor to gain their affections. This hope imparted fresh courage and cheerfulness. When the day was fairly over, and his farewell greetings were made, it was with a sensation of light-heartedness, amounting to positive exhilaration, that he turned his horse's head towards his own domicile.

CHAPTER VII.

Changeful and faint was her fair cheek's hue,
Thou' clear as a flower which the light looks through;
And the glance of her dark, resplendent eye,
For the aspect of woman at times too high,
Lay floating in mists, which the troubled stream
Of the soul sent up o'er its fervid beam.

Mrs. Hemans.

When the family assembled at breakfast, on the following morning, at Travers Lodge, there was another individual added to their number, so different in manner and appearance from any one present, that it was evident she was a being of entirely a different order. There was something in the very turn of this young lady's head and neck which denoted elevation, independence, perhaps pride of character, and the lofty brow and classic outline, the lips somewhat firmly closing, the pale, pure cheek—the dark grey eye, shaded with long dark lashes, indicated still more clearly the distinctive traits of Edith Fitzgerald's character. A flash now and then of her eye, and the smile that played on her lip—as she was listening to the history of yesterday from her cousins—showed that sportiveness was mingled with the seriousness of her disposition.

"Oh, Edith, I wished for you heartily to help us out yesterday," said Juliana; "we were so much at a loss to entertain the minister."

Anna Maria cast a grave and indignant glance at her sister, as she said, "I experienced no sort of difficulty in conversing with Mr. Selden."

"Oh, Anna Maria," said Juliana, "I appeal to George, if"—

"But," said Edith, hastening to interrupt Juliana, "you have not told me any thing about Mr. Selden yet, what sort of a person he is,—my curiosity is somewhat excited, I confess."

"I never could imagine," said George, in a tone of pique, "what there could be interesting about a parson. I know of nothing he is good for but to give us a sermon once a week, christen children, marry couples, and bury the dead."

"Mr. Selden would certainly be considered a handsome man, if he were not a minister," said Juliana; "he is tall, has a good figure, fine eyes and a very pleasant smile. He rides well too—but then all this is of no consequence to himself or any body else."

Edith smiled. "Does he converse agreeably?" she asked,—“this, you know, is of some consequence to those who may have to spend many a long summer day in his company.”

"I cannot answer that question," said George, for I did not take the trouble to listen to him. I thought it doing quite enough to spend two or three hours in his company."

"That was indeed quite as much as could have been expected from you," said Edith, in a tone which George did not quite like. "You are of course then no judge of Mr. Selden's merits, and I must ask of the rest of the company how he converses."

"Very sensibly," said Mr. Travers.

"Very agreeably," said his wife.

"Divinely," said Anna Maria.

"Much better than I expected," said Juliana.

"On the whole, the verdict of the company is favorable," said Edith; "why then did the day pass off so heavily?"

"Because no one knows what to talk to a minister about," said Juliana.

"He saved us the trouble, my dear," said Mrs. Travers, "of finding subjects of conversation, and your father, at least, I suppose you will admit to be capable of conversing with him."

"Of course, I was not speaking of papa," said Juliana, glancing at her father, "but even papa could not talk to Mr. Selden with as much ease as he could have done with any other gentleman, especially so young a man."

"You seem to have formed strange ideas of a minister," said Edith, "I cannot imagine why any rational subject of conversation might not be as well addressed to him as to any one else."

"Oh, but who wants to be confined to rational subjects of conversation?" said Juliana, "what is so odious as to weigh every word you say,—and besides it seems to me there should be some allusion to the church, the congregation, the services, sermons and subjects of this kind, in conversing with a minister."

"Mr. Selden converses on a variety of subjects," said Mr. Travers, "and remarkably well upon them all. His choice of a profession is somewhat remarkable, for he really appears to have talents which might have distinguished him in any line of life. This is more apparent in his conversation than in his preaching, for the language of his discourse was rather plain for a young man who had received such a good education."

"But then, my dear," interposed Mrs. Travers, "the sermon was very interesting, for I never recollected one so well before, and many people were very attentive last Sunday, that I never saw appear interested in any discourse until then."

"Very true," replied Mr. Selden, "it was certainly a sensible, interesting discourse, but there was not as much of the orator about Mr. Selden as I expected."

"Now I thought there was quite too much of the orator," said George; "he was waving his white hand, and looking towards the young ladies frequently, every now and then using pretty similies and figures of speech stolen, no doubt, from Milton or some of those old poets."

Edith laughed,—“Unless you can trace the theft, you have no right to accuse him, George.”

"Certainly not," said Anna Maria, "I doubt if George ever read six pages of Milton in his life, or indeed of any other poetry than a song book."

George reddened and replied, "you are a warm advocate for the parson, Anna Maria, I didn't know before that you were so much interested in him, or I should not have ventured to attack him."

"At all events," said Edith, in a grave but gentle tone, "he is a stranger and has, no doubt, come amongst us with a desire and intention of doing good; this should certainly insure him gratitude and respect, until he does something to forfeit them. If I am correctly informed, he does not receive any salary from his parishioners, and in a country such as this, where there are so many avenues open to ambition, a young man, with his talents and prospects, could scarcely have been actuated by any but high and pure motives in the choice of a profession."

"Spoken wisely and well, Edith," said Mr. Travers, "he is a fine young man, and I am sure a good one. I am resolved to stand his friend, for I really feel interested in him and sorry for him."

"He does not look at all unhappy, my dear," said Mrs. Travers, "I don't believe he repents the step he has taken."

"Well, perhaps not. I am sure I hope he does not, but he little knows yet all that he has given up, or all that is before him." So saying, Mr. Travers pushed his chair from the breakfast table which was the signal for a general dispersion, and the different members of the family betook themselves to their various occupations.

Edith Fitzgerald was the only child of an Irish gentleman who had emigrated to America about twenty-two years before the commencement of this story, and had married Harriet Travers, sister of Mr. Travers, about a year after his arrival in the country. Edith was an only child, and her mother died when she was not more than fourteen years of age. Mrs. Fitzgerald's health was always extremely delicate, so that she looked to Edith for assistance in every thing; this developed, at an early period, the energies of Edith's naturally strong mind, and awakened the tender feelings of her heart. The character of an only child is generally enervated by too much indulgence, but this had not been the case with Edith Fitzgerald; the habit of constantly thinking for her mother, and the numerous daily ministrations of love which the delicacy of Mrs. Fitzgerald's health and the weakness of her nerves required, prevented Edith from dwelling much upon herself. Mr. Fitzgerald also contributed to strengthen and develop his daughter's mind and character, by treating her rather as a companion and friend than as a child; he was proud of her talents, and imagined her abilities to be greater even than they really were. It would have provoked a smile from any impartial person to listen to the subjects he would discuss gravely with Edith, and though her opinions and views were often rash and crude enough, still there was always something of originality and sprightliness about them.

It has generally been thought and said, by judicious people, that it is injurious to place in the hands of children, books designed for those of riper years, or to attempt to converse with them on subjects beyond their comprehension. Like most general remarks, however, there are many cases to which it does not apply. A mind naturally strong, bold and investigating, is stimulated by the very effort to enter into subjects rather beyond its understanding. If those who possess minds of this class do not learn to comprehend the subjects presented to them in their whole extent, still the very effort of attention is often serviceable,—some new ideas will be called forth—and a profitable lesson of humility learned, by those who are naturally rather too prone to boldness and self-reliance.

These effects were certainly produced on Edith's mind, and Mr. Fitzgerald took great pains to provide her with a governess, a woman of sense, information, and accomplishments, who devoted herself sedulously to the care of Edith's education; still she always found her father's conversation, the books he read with her, and those which he recommended, to excite and stimulate her mind, more than days and weeks spent in the usual routine of study. Madame De la Porte, for such was the name of her governess, was not a woman of that sort of character calculated to exert much influence over such a girl as Edith; her influence indeed was entirely of a negative sort, and if the same amount of information could have been extracted from an automaton, it would have had nearly the same effect on Edith's mind. Long custom, and habits of daily intercourse, had produced in Edith very much the same sort of feeling towards Madame De La Porte, that one entertains for an old piece of furniture, or a tree, and she was shocked at her own insensibility when Madame De La Porte quitted her father's house, to reside with some relations who had invited her to do so.

Edith had too much good sense and sincerity to affect what she did not feel, and was really mortified when the parting hour between Madame De La Porte and herself arrived, that no tears flowed spontaneously; a kind farewell, good wishes and some valuable parting tokens of remembrance were all she had to offer, and Edith reluctantly admitted to herself, that she was devoid of sensibility. Yet nothing could be more mistaken than such an idea; it is true that Edith had little of what is usually called sensibility, for she had strong nerves, was not easily affected by trifling causes, was not apt to take youthful fancies either in friendship or love; this, perhaps, arose partly from a high ideal standard of character, and somewhat too, it must be admitted even by her friends, from too much pride of character. But in strong, deep feeling, in elevated sentiments, in powers of self-devotion to those whom she really loved, few excelled Edith Fitzgerald.

The sufferings of Edith from the death of her mother had been long and intense, and from that time her whole soul had been bound up in her father. Next to Mr. Fitzgerald, the person upon earth to whom she was most devotedly attached was Gerald Devereux, an orphan nephew, brought over by her father from Ireland, in a state of infancy, and who had been to him as a son. Edith had been taught to regard him as a brother, and she scarcely ever remembered that he was not really such.

Mr. Fitzgerald had devoted himself to the practice of law, and settled in Virginia, but his residence was distant from that of Mr. Travers, their manners and habits were quite different, and their intercourse became so infrequent that the younger members of the Travers family, and Edith, could scarcely be said hitherto to have had any acquaintance with each other. Mr. Fitzgerald, having recently inherited a considerable property in Ireland, had gone over to make some arrangements respecting it, but as taking Edith with him would be attended not only with inconveniences, but serious difficulty, he had refused her request to accompany him.

Edith greatly wished to go with her father, but as she was by no means apprehensive in her disposition, she did not fear for his safety, and would not, for her own gratification, urge him to a step to which he was so averse. Her uncle, Mr. Travers, had kindly insisted that Edith should remain at Travers Lodge until Mr. Fitzgerald's return from Ireland, and Edith to please her father consented with apparent willingness. Nothing, however, could have been more distasteful to her than this plan, and she would greatly have preferred remaining entirely alone at home, had it been left to her choice. When she determined on a sacrifice, no one could make it more gracefully, and Mr. Fitzgerald left her at Travers Lodge quite satisfied that he had made an arrangement as agreeable as it was suitable to his daughter.

Though there was no congeniality of mind, nor similarity of pursuits between Edith and any member of her uncle's family, their kindness excited her gratitude and good will, for her feelings towards them scarcely deserved a warmer appellation, and she could not help considering it as another proof of her coldness of heart, that she could not reply with corresponding warmth to the professions of affection which Anna Maria and Juliana lavished upon her. Yet she could at least requite their kindness by doing every thing in her power to contribute to the happiness of the domestic circle, by maintaining a constant appearance of cheerful good-humor, and suppressing all the many sorrowful feelings her separation from her father often cost her, and these efforts she made successfully. Those only who have made like exertions can appreciate the cost of such daily and hourly acts of self-control.

The day Charles Selden spent at Travers Lodge, Edith was absent on a visit to a lady, Mrs. Grattan, a former acquaintance and friend, who lived at a distance of some miles, and she did not return until after he had left the house. Mrs. Grattan was somewhat indisposed on Sunday, which prevented Edith's attendance at church, and her curiosity was keenly excited respecting the young minister, as all she heard of him convinced her that he was at least a remarkable person.

—
CHAPTER VIII.

My life has been like summer skies,
When they are fair to view ;
But there never yet were hearts or skies,
Clouds might not wander through.

Mrs. L. P. Smith.

The absence of Charles Selden from Sherwood had caused a great vacuity in the family circle. The sensations experienced by Mr. Selden were compounded of many painful and unpleasant feelings ; it was not the loss of his son's society that so much disturbed him, though no one liked better than himself to be surrounded by his family, but he regarded him almost as one cut off from the land of the living. Vexation and grief at what appeared to him the strangeness and perversity of Charles' course, were mingled with tenderness and regret when he thought of what hopes and prospects he had sacrificed, and an involuntary sentiment of respect for the firmness and consistency of his conduct. To divert his mind from these unpleasant themes of meditation, it was necessary for him to use as much out-door occupation as possible ; he found Arthur a most invaluable assistant in driving away thought, and though he sometimes gave him general advice as to the necessity of devoting a large part of his time to study and reading, the particular period seldom came that appeared to either father or son suitable for the purpose.

Mrs. Selden and Margaret felt the deprivation of Charles' society quite as much as his father, but with their feelings there was nothing of bitterness or regret mingled. The clear light of Christian truth illuminated their minds, and softened their hearts, and though their partiality estimated most highly the degree of worldly reputation and honor which Charles might have attained had he sought for such rewards, they were convinced that his aims were higher, nobler than those of mere earthly ambition, and the blessings which he would be the instrument of diffusing among his fellow men, incalculably greater and more imperishable than any which have reference merely to the mortal destinies of man. Their affections, their sympathies, their admiration were called forth for him, with redoubled strength, since he had left them to enter upon the arduous duties of his profession.

Margaret and Virginia were sitting together one evening in their mother's chamber, busily engaged at work ; at least, Margaret's fingers were moving rapidly while Virginia frequently let her work fall in her lap, descanting to her sister upon various imaginary schemes of happiness, and complaining of the monotonous course of ordinary life. The door was suddenly opened, just as Margaret was about to reply, and Arthur entered.

"Oh what a noise and bustle you do make," said Virginia, somewhat unpleasantly roused from the visions in which she had been indulging, "one would imagine you were about to announce some important piece of intelligence. Now don't tantalise me, my dear brother, you know I should like, of all things, to hear any thing that is really interesting ; our lives are rolling on at present in the dullest and most uneventful manner."

"And if we are so dull," said Arthur, "what must Charles be ! I declare, I think of the poor fellow with the most sincere compassion. Can nothing be done, Margaret, to extricate him honorably from his present horrible situation? How would it do for us to go out together to settle some of my father's western land, and stay there a year or two, until his profession was in some measure forgotten?"

"It would not do at all, Arthur," said Margaret with a smile, "if you are really serious in making so absurd a proposal, I think Charles would not suffer himself to be extricated from his present horrible situation, as you call it, and strange as it may appear, I believe he is much happier than any of us."

"Well, I wish it may be so," said Arthur, with an involuntary sigh, "since he has determined on this way of life, I should be sorry for him to regard it as I do."

"The time will come I hope," said Margaret gently yet gravely, "when you will regard it differently. At present we will not talk any more about it."

"That is much the best way," said Virginia, "as I can not see what good talking about it can do. and now, Arthur, for your important intelligence!"

"I did not say I had any important intelligence."

"Come, don't tease Virginia any longer," said Margaret, "I am sure you have heard no very important intelligence, but I am equally certain that something has pleased you; whatever it is, it may please us also, and I know you are too good-natured to withhold it."

"Well, I was about to tell you that the Davenport's are going to have a little dancing party Thursday evening, in honor of Charlotte's birthday, and that two of Louis Davenport's friends arrived yesterday, to spend several weeks with him. I suppose they will form quite an agreeable addition to our society, as one of them is said to be very clever, intelligent and all that sort of thing, knows how to fish, shoot and ride as well as any of us, Louis says, and the other he declares is admired by the ladies wherever he goes, and is considered quite a model of beauty. The last one I am sure I shall not like, but I suppose the girls will, so he may assist in preventing stagnation."

"Thursday evening," said Virginia, her beautiful face coloring with pleasure, "oh! Margaret, our wreaths from New York have arrived in good time, and the lace to trim our dresses. You have not even looked at them."

"No, but I am sure they are pretty if you tell me so," said Margaret, "and except as it concerns you, wreaths are not more interesting to me than they would be to Reginald or Arthur."

"Why," said Virginia in a tone of disappointment, "should not you like what is pretty, Margaret? You, who have such good taste in every thing, and admire beauty in all its forms. I can not see why we may not use good taste in dress as well as in other things. You think me vain and trifling I am afraid," she added in a questioning tone.

"You must not draw so many inferences from a simple speech," said Margaret smiling. "I certainly do not disapprove of using good taste in any thing, especially in dress, for I really consider it as a matter of some importance; it is, as has often been said, an index of the mind and character, and I regard it as so weighty an affair that I have laid down fixed principles on the subject to which I always try to conform."

"You surprise me, Margaret," said Arthur, "I have always thought you attached less value to personal decoration than any girl I ever saw."

"And yet," said Virginia, "Margaret must have thought much more about the subject than I ever did, for I never had a theory or principle about dress in my life. But let me hear what your principles are, though I shall not admit the truth of them if they condemn our beautiful wreaths."

"The rules of dress," said Margaret, "must of course vary according to circumstances; the same would not apply to you and myself; they should always be adapted to the appearance. The dress should so harmonise with the person that it should seem to make a part and parcel of it; now, a beautiful wreath of flowers would seem the most natural and suitable of all ornaments for one who so much resembles them in the purity and brilliancy of their tints, in the flexibility and delicacy of their forms as yourself. But on my head they would be discordant with my appearance, and would awaken continually an idea of contrast between the flowers and the wearer, most uncomplimentary to the latter."

"What strange, mistaken ideas you have taken up, Margaret, with regard to your appearance," said Virginia in a tone of real concern, "just let me bring the wreaths and try them on your head, and appeal to Arthur if they do not suit you; he shall be judge."

"Poor Arthur! no indeed; his sincerity shall be put to no such useless test, it would stand but a poor chance opposed to his good nature. I am a better judge in this matter than either of you can be, and have ceased to regard it in the pathetic light in which you consider it, Virginia."

"Indeed I do not regard it in any such light," said Virginia, "because, in all sincerity, I think you a very pleasant, interesting looking person, and if you had not always seemed to take it for granted that you were so plain in appearance, such an idea would not have entered into any one's head."

"There is a great deal of truth in what Virginia says," said Arthur. "I know twenty girls, at least, who are not to compare with you in good looks, who really pass for very pretty, because their friends and themselves seem to take it for granted that they are so, and that every one must agree with them in opinion."

"I shall impose no such task either on myself or my friends," said Margaret laughing. "you know I am a foe to pretension of all sorts, if it were for no other reason, for the very trouble it requires to support it. But to relieve your minds from the belief that I am suffering under the horrible consciousness of ugliness, I must tell you, that because I am not Beauty I am not obliged to consider myself the Beast. I do not imagine there is any thing striking or disagreeable in my appearance, I think it simply plain and one not likely to attract much observation."

"That is because you cannot observe the play of your countenance," replied Virginia.

"The Spanish fleet you cannot see Because it is not yet in sight," said Margaret with a good humored smile. "We have discussed this subject enough for the present and we will dismiss it with one of Charles' favorite observations, which though not very original, is so true that we cannot too often recur to it in our own minds. As all our gifts are from God, they should not be subjects of pride, nor should the want of them be causes for regret or humiliation. It is always best to see the truth; if we are beautiful, there is no harm in being conscious of the advantage, and pleased at it, provided we do not attach an undue value to it, on the contrary, if nature has denied us this gift, it is much better that we should be aware of the fact without grieving or repining at it, and this is true, not only of beauty but of all the gifts of God."

"That is sensible and comfortable doctrine," said Arthur, "but there is some difficulty in applying it in one's own case. Suppose a person born an incurable dunce, what can console him for this marked inferiority to the rest of his species, allowing him to have just sense enough to perceive his own deficiency?"

"Very, very few, are born incurable dunces, though many, I admit, become so. But even in this case, if we have understanding sufficient to make us responsible beings, we are capable of receiving the simple idea that we are placed by our Creator in this world as on a stage, where each has his part assigned him, and to secure his own happiness and the favor of his Maker nothing is necessary but that he should play his part well, however humble it may be."

"Oh yes, if one could be satisfied with only the prospect of happiness after this life, but very few could be satisfied without some share of it in our present state of existence."

"Nothing could so well secure our happiness in this world as such a view of things would do. It would prevent envy, repining and pretension."

"And hope."

"Not at all, it would only give a rational direction to our hopes and efforts; we are all capable of indefinite improvement, but then we must take such methods as are calculated to produce success. A thorn will not bring forth apples, nor a vine figs."

"I must confess," said Virginia, "that I have not a spark of philosophy in my composition. I could not be satisfied to be ugly, or silly, or—"

"Or poor," said Arthur, "that ought to make one of your list of evils."

"No, I do not admit poverty to be an evil."

"Because you have not the most distant idea what poverty is; your notions of life are drawn altogether from imagination and romances."

"Why do you think so, Arthur, do I not read history every day?"

"Yes, but as though you read it not,—don't be vexed, Virginia, you know it is my own way"—

"But we have wandered very far from the wreaths," said Margaret, "let us see them, Virginia, I am not too philosophic to look at them, and it is more than probable I shall be tempted to take possession of mine."

"To whom will you give it?" said Arthur.

Margaret shook her head in token that she would not tell, and Virginia went with a light step to bring the beautiful wreaths, hoping that a sight of them would induce Margaret to change her determination as to wearing one.

CHAPTER IX.

Joy's light hearted dances
And Melody's glances
Are rays of a moment—are dying when born;
And Pleasure's best dower
Is naught but a flower,—
A vanishing dew drop, a gleam of the morn.
Bilderdijk.

Thursday evening came, and Virginia's heart beat high with anticipations of pleasure; her satisfaction was somewhat heightened too, by the reflection in the mirror of a form of surpassing beauty, arrayed in muslin and lace, light as the gossamer's web, in whose golden locks was gracefully entwined an exquisite wreath of moss roses and lily of the valley.

"Oh how beautifully you have dressed my head, I could not have done it so well myself, if I had worked at it all day," said Virginia, turning to her sister with a radiant smile; "but dear

Margaret do you not intend to put some sort of ornament on your own head, or something showy about your dress?"

"No, I think I am dressed for the evening. Mamma, does not my dress look sufficiently neat and respectable?"

"Respectable!" said Virginia, laughing; "one would suppose you were some housekeeper, or old woman."

"Your dress fits you admirably, my dear," said Mrs. Selden, "and is neatly and tastefully arranged, but it is somewhat too severe in its simplicity; let me fasten this pink sash around your waist," she added, selecting a peach-colored ribbon which lay on the bed amongst various ribbons and laces, "it will give a pretty finish to your dress."

Mrs. Selden fastened on the sash, Virginia pronounced the effect to be charming, and said, "Now, Mamma, please make Margaret wear her wreath."

"I rather think that is out of my power, for if I mistake not the wreath is no longer in her possession."

"How provoking you are, Margaret: to whom did you give it?"

"Look around you this evening, and perhaps you may discover," said Margaret with a smile.

"It is time you were off," said Mrs. Selden, looking out of the window, "the carriage is waiting for you, and Cesar seems to find some difficulty in keeping the bays quiet. I never feel altogether easy when those horses are in the carriage."

Mrs. Selden kissed both the daughters affectionately, and accompanied them to the door, that she might charge Arthur to take especial care of their safety.

"Oh, I am glad you have come, mother; you have saved me the trouble of going to look for you. I want you to see how well my new coat fits, and to compliment me, in fact, on being such a fine looking young fellow when my dress does justice to my appearance," said Arthur.

"A perfect Adonis," said Mrs. Selden laughing, "and the coat really does fit admirably, but Arthur, now I have done my part, you must do yours. I entreat that you will be very careful of your sisters this evening—those horses are so spirited that I feel somewhat uneasy lest some accident should happen. Above all, caution Cesar against drinking too freely, and if this should happen after all, drive the girls home yourself."

"Yes, yes, I will do every thing you desire; though really there is not even a shadow of danger, it is a pity to torment yourself about nothing."

"I shall rest satisfied with your promise to use all necessary caution, Arthur, and now a pleasant evening to you, my children; Margaret shall entertain me to-morrow with an account of the party."

Mr. Selden just then entered the portico, where they were all still standing. He looked at Virginia's lovely face and sylph-like figure with the most evident pride and pleasure, though he only complimented her on the manner in which her hair was dressed, and the beauty of the wreath she wore.

"Margaret must have the credit of whatever taste has been displayed in dressing Virginia's head, as she worked most assiduously at it," said Mrs. Selden. She was hurt to observe that her husband had not looked towards Margaret, he had been so much engrossed in his admiration of Virginia.

"Margaret has shown her good taste, as well as her good nature," replied Mr. Selden, somewhat conscious that he had entirely overlooked her. He then added, "but why did you not do the same kind office for yourself, Margaret, had you not a wreath too?"

"Oh yes, papa, I had one, but wreaths do not become me particularly; but come, Virginia," she said, drawing her hand affectionately within her own, "it is time we were off."

So saying, they both tripped lightly away, accompanied by Arthur, scolding at their tardiness.

Margaret had understood perfectly her mother's look and tone. She knew that she was hurt at Mr. Selden's apparent neglect of herself, and in her heart she felt thankful for the uniform kindness and wisdom, that had always been manifested in her mother's conduct towards her. "And yet," she thought, "it would be unreasonable to blame my father for the pride and pleasure he feels in Virginia's beauty, it is so natural."

The evening passed off very pleasantly, and the party did not disperse until a late hour. It was one of those delightful summer nights, which are so refreshing in our climate after a very sultry day, and the splendor of a full moon lighted our party on their return home. Arthur gave his horse to the servant, who had accompanied them, that he might have the pleasure of riding home with his sisters and talking over the events of the evening.

"Well, we have had a very pleasant evening, have we not?" said Arthur.

"Yes, very pleasant," said Margaret, "and we shall have a delightful drive home; the pleasure of it would be quite perfect, if I did not think mamma was lying awake now, anxiously listening at every noise to be sure that we had returned home in safety."

"Pshaw! my mother has too much good sense to be guilty of such an absurdity; besides, she knows that I am with you; so think no more about it. Your wreath was well bestowed, was it not, Virginia?"

"Yes, Anne Howard looked very sweet and pretty, and the wreath became her very much, though I had much rather have seen it on Margaret's head."

"I never knew until this evening what a very pleasing girl Anne Howard could be; she is generally so modest and shrinking, and I never saw her completely drawn out before. I suppose the consciousness of looking uncommonly pretty inspired her with confidence; such things will have this effect;—even I forgot my usual modesty, when I remembered the unrivalled cut of my coat, and caught a glimpse in the mirrors of the fine looking fellow clad in that incomparable garment."

"What insufferable vanity," said Margaret, laughing; "how could you think of your own appearance when the star of fashion, the observed of all observers was present?"

"What, Augustus Vernon? Oh, he is just such a looking man as ladies admire, bright black eyes, pink cheeks, rosy lips, dark brown ringlets. Why, I should be ashamed to look in the glass and see such a girlish looking face, I should never feel the least respect for myself afterwards."

"Surely, Arthur," said Virginia, with some warmth, "you are not in earnest; it is impossible to look at Mr. Vernon without thinking him superlatively handsome, for his is not only the beauty of form and coloring, but of expression."

"What does his countenance express?" said Arthur.

"It expresses refinement, sensibility, generosity, nobleness of character."

● Does it? Well, I confess I did not perceive it. He is not in the least to be compared in appearance with Gerald Devereux, and I did not hear a lady in the room remark on his beauty. It is scarcely worth while to be handsome, as one never finds a girl who has the good taste to appreciate manly beauty. Margaret, I appeal to you whether Gerald Devereux is not a much finer looking young man than Augustus Vernon?"

"After just observing that no girl has good taste enough to appreciate manly beauty, you surely ought not to appeal to Margaret on such a question."

"Oh, but Margaret is so little like other girls, that I never include her in my observations on that class of society. She has no young ladyism about her, and I am willing to abide by her decision."

"I must acknowledge," said Margaret, "that I greatly prefer Gerald Devereux's looks, though I do not believe he would generally be considered even a handsome man. There is something about his appearance which indicates elevation of character, and a very superior degree of intelligence, though I do not trust implicitly to physiognomy, for we are always liable to mistakes in inferences drawn from such grounds."

"You surprise me, Margaret," said Virginia, "I think physiognomy an infallible test of character, and it appears wonderfully strange that you should admire the expression of Mr. Devereux's face, more than that of Augustus Vernon's. Mr. Devereux's appearance is so little striking indeed, that I scarcely observed it all. I noticed that his stature was considerably above the middle size, and that seemed to me the only circumstance about him likely to attract attention."

"This very circumstance ought to convince you, Virginia, how very little certainty there is in physiognomy. We all see the same persons, and draw different inferences as to their characters from their faces. Yet I do believe, that the dispositions of the heart, the workings of the mind always leave their traces on the countenance, though we want skill to understand them; it is like decyphering hieroglyphics, when we have scarcely any means of verifying our interpretations, and for even a plausible explanation, must resort to a variety of ingenious conjectures, when perhaps an entirely different set of suppositions may offer an interpretation, apparently equally probable."

"But some persons have an intuitive gift of reading these obscure signs, when written on the human face, and you must not think it vanity, if I say, I think I possess this intuitive gift," said Virginia.

"Take care your intuitive gift does not lead you into some horrible mistakes," said Arthur.

"Mr. Vernon is an only child, is he not, Arthur?" asked Margaret.

"No, an only son, which is perhaps worse, as he has sisters to assist in spoiling him. His parents reside at present in Philadelphia. Mr. Vernon, his father, is quite an opulent man; he went originally from Virginia, at the invitation of a wealthy uncle, who adopted him as his heir, and he sometimes talks of returning to his native state. The Davenports think he will purchase an estate near them, so it is possible we may have the pleasure of gaining the exquisite Mr. Vernon as a neighbor, if he can consent to rusticate in Virginia."

Virginia's cheeks glowed, her heart beat quicker, and she thought, though she did not say, that such an event would form quite a new era in their state of society.

"Gerald Devereux," said Arthur, "was born in Ireland, and though he was brought from his country, while an infant, by his uncle, Mr. Fitzgerald, you may perceive many national traits about him; I believe they are innate."

"Or perhaps acquired," said Margaret, "you say his uncle, Mr. Fitzgerald, is an Irishman."

"Yes, he is an eminent lawyer, he is now gone to Ireland on business, but is expected to return in the course of a few months. Devereux is not born to opulence, but will have to rely on his own exertions to build up his fortunes. Davenport tells me he greatly distinguished himself at college, and that he has talent enough to enable him to succeed in any pursuit. He studied law two or three years, and commenced the practice about a year ago. And now, I think I have given you all the information I possess about the two gentlemen, can you tell me, Margaret, whether Anne Howard is actually engaged to that odious fellow, Campbell?"

"Why is he particularly odious?" said Margaret, smiling.

"Oh, because there is something so stiff, and solemn, and precise about him; he is perfectly insufferable. And such a dancer! It is impossible Anne Howard can be in love with him, after seeing him dance a Scotch reel to-night with his thumbs in perpetual motion."

"I will answer your question, Arthur, if you will first answer mine; are you particularly interested in the state of Anne Howard's heart?"

"No, yes,—indeed, I scarcely know whether I have any particular interest in it, but then one naturally dislikes to see any sweet, pretty girl, sacrifice herself to a solemn prig for the sake of money."

"It is only a week ago, I think, since you said, that Anne Howard was a dull companion, had exactly what you called a tiresome face, and that Mr. Campbell and herself would be well matched."

"But cannot you imagine how one may change an opinion? You are as literal as Virginia to-night." Virginia started at the sound of her name, but relapsed into reverie, as soon as she found she was not addressed. "To tell you the truth, Margaret, my attention was first attracted towards her to-night, by hearing her pronounce a very warm eulogy upon you; she did not know that I was near, for she started and blushed when she saw me. She spoke in such a warm-hearted, affectionate manner, I began to think I had perhaps done her injustice, and for the first time her face struck me as being sweet, and not insipid. I found, too, she could converse quite interestingly, and Charlotte Davenport's excessive spirits made the gentleness of Anne Howard more attractive. But you have not answered my question yet, Margaret, you are very unfair, you have a way of making me tell you anything, and tell me nothing in return."

"Not at all, I will answer your question explicitly. I am very sure that Anne Howard is not engaged to Mr. Campbell, and that she has no present intention of marrying him, but she esteems him very highly, and is very grateful to him for the benefits he conferred on her brother. He took unwearied pains, for her sake, to reclaim poor John from his course of dissipation, and in the last months of his life, when he had become an outcast from respectable society, he nursed him during declining health, and treated him with the kindness of a brother. Anne, so far from being cold-hearted, as you once supposed, suffers from excessive sensibility, and her very quiet manner, is a sort of shield, which she uses instinctively, as a defence against her own weakness."

"Yes I can readily believe it, I observed indications of great sensibility in her countenance to-night."

Margaret laughed—"But, Arthur, you must remember that constancy is not your forte, and flirtation with Anne Howard is out of the question; so you must not think of falling in love with her, unless you mean to continue so."

"You do me great injustice, how can you suppose, I would think of flirting with such a girl as Anne Howard. But if you talk with such solemnity of falling in love, and remaining so forever, the very idea will extinguish the spark, before it ever becomes a flame. Here we are at the gate, and Virginia is still composing sonnets to the moon, I suppose, or thinking of that personification of refinement, nobleness and sensibility, which has just alighted on our orb, as I have not heard her speak for an hour."

Virginia was much disconcerted, and said in a somewhat garrulous tone, "How unkind it is in you, Arthur, to be always endeavoring to ridicule me."

"You take things too seriously, my dear little sister," replied Arthur, "I only try to extract some amusement from everything within my reach; of course, you must contribute your share."

"It is very reasonable," said Margaret, "to talk of Virginia's silence when you have given her no chance to speak. But see, how sweet old Sherwood looks beneath a full moon," she added, as they drove through an avenue of lofty tulip trees, whose magnificent masses of foliage displayed, with striking effect, the quivering rays of silvery brightness contrasted with the magic shadows of moonlight.

THE ODE OF REGNER LODBROG.

From M. Mallet's translation of the Edda of the Icelanders in his "INTRODUCTION DE L'HISTOIRE DE DANNEMARC."

BY MRS. M. E. HEWITT.

Regner Lodbrog, a famous warrior, poet and pirate, reigned in Denmark near the beginning of the ninth century. After divers maritime expeditions, he was taken in combat by his enemy Ella, king of a part of Britain, and perished by the bite of serpents with which they had filled his prison. This ode, dictated by the fanaticism of glory and religion, was composed amid the torments which preceded his death. The sons of Regner avenged his horrible death as he has predicted in this poem.

M. MALLET, Trans.

We fought with swords that day,
When in youth I sought the East;
And the lean wolves, gathered o'er their prey,
Fed full upon the feast.
Like one vast wound, all gore,
In the twilight lay the main;
And the hungry vultures swam at eve
In the life-blood of the slain.

We fought with swords that day
When in all their iron gear,
I sent the chiefs of Helsingør
To Odin's halls of cheer.
Then away to Ifa's coast
Our broad-winged vessels bore,
And we mowed like ripened grass the host
That met us on the shore.
Upon their battered shields
Our blows fell fast like hail,
And the iron of our smoking spears
Pierced through their ringing mail.

We fought with swords that day,
Where an English headland rose;
When at eve amid the carnage lay
Ten thousand of my foes.
Swift at their iron helms
Our death-sped arrows flew,
And downward from our darkened blades
The warm blood dripped like dew.
My soul is fierce with joy
When I see a foeman's face,
And swifter than to clasp a maid
I rush to his embrace.

We fought with swords. The youth
Loved by the maidens fair;
Beneath the stroke of my red brand,
Fell in his golden hair.
What is a warrior's fate,
If it be not thus to die,
Where the axe cleaves down the ringing shield,
And the well-aimed javelins fly?

For the coward never knows
The pride that scars impart;
Nor the quenchless thirst for daring deeds
That fills a hero's heart.

We fought with swords. The youth
Should know no craven fear—
He should early learn to dye in blood
The iron of his spear.
For the hero never quails,
His hand is swift to smite;
And he who seeks a maiden's heart
Should be foremost in the fight.

We fought with swords that day
When I fell upon the plain,
And the dead that lay around, beneath,
Were the foes my hand had slain.
But the stern, relentless Fates
My destiny have wrought,
And Ella's hand will give the death
I long in battle sought.
Their ships went shuddering down,
Where the Scottish waves closed red;
And the gaunt wolves scented from afar,
The banquet I had spread.

We fought with swords—but now
My life-tide runneth fast,
For a poisonous viper on my heart
To night makes his repast.
To the banquet of the Gods
The pale Valkyries call—
For me, for me the feast is spread
To night in Odin's hall!
In Odin's halls of cheer,
Where the souls of heroes wait;
I soon shall quaff the foaming beer
From the skulls of foes I hate!
If my valiant sons could know
The torments of my cell,
Revenge would fire their dauntless hearts,
That blood alone would quell!
But the rage of their young breasts
Will awaken unrestrained,
And the iron of their spears will soon
With Ella's blood be stained.

We fought with swords, and far
In fight our banners bore—
I in my boyhood learned to dye
My lance in crimson gore.
I have never known a king
Than I more brave and bold,
And I smile amid my pain to know
My hours of life are told.
For Odin's daughters wait—
A hero's death I die—
And I shall feast with the Gods to night,
Where the beer is foaming high!

A PLEA FOR ART.

A delight in beauty is a primitive, natural feeling in the hearts of the rational dwellers on the earth. This is a truism. There is beauty spread by nature over the land, the sea, the sky; therefore there is also the spirit of Beauty kindled within the rational race of man, because he is the chief character in the drama of this life. He is chief spectator and enjoyer, especially of the outward, objective world. It cannot be that such a feeling, or rather such a law of feeling, so universal, so homogeneous, so like an inward echo to the outward call, can be a mere acquired, educated, man-taught mood of the soul. It exists either as a necessity of the soul, and so ever co-existent with it: or else, by a touch of the all-cunning Hand, one moment after the creating, life-giving touch. This might be shown by adducing from human life anywhere and everywhere, those little rose-buds of sentiment, offsprings thick as Vallambrosa leaves, of the wedlock of the inner and the outer beauty, which at once demonstrate the wedlock itself, and its legality and fitness.

And this primitive delight in beauty is a principle of considerable conservative force in society. Love—heroic, romantic, tender, tearful, faithful, idolatrous love—grows out of this principle; and binds the highest and the roughest minds of both sexes, oftentimes, with a clasp which no stale insipid prudence, such as—"Pretty is as pretty does"—can unlock; nor any jeremiads, such as—"Beauty is a fading flower"—can elude. Religion, loyal, adoring, loving, zealous, purifying and satisfying faith in God—grows out of the love of the beautiful, or at least, has some of its strongest roots in that soil; and is the grand conservative clasp of the life of man.

A taste for the fine arts is another manifestation of the same principle of our nature, and must be admitted to be, like the other offspring, eminently conservative, salubrious, positively beneficent in society. Free, thrifty, enterprising nations are apt to attach small importance to art, as the unsubstantial and useless tinsel of life. This is the cant of utilitarianism. It may be applied, it has been applied, to all the higher things of mental life which make man more than an animal, a sensualist, or a money-changer. It is as hollow and false as it is ignoble. It is to be hoped that its power is waning in many quarters. It is high time, by the clock which strikes the hours of social weal and progress, that it were waning in all quarters.

The arts are conservative, because they create local attachments; they call out from all but the dullest and driest of souls, a love to the places where they shed their charms. The places at which the ancient patriarchs and prophets met angels from heaven, were hallowed places to them forever afterwards. The places at which the grand scenes and persons of Hamlet, of Lear or of Paradise Lost first passed before us, even in perusal, are not unconsecrated places to us afterwards. Were there, at this time, in the older States of this Confederacy, places where all comers might gaze at Rembrandts, Correggios, and Salvador Rosas, on American and Virginian temple-walls,—places at which might be seen Apollos fresher and nobler (as becomes a new world) than even the Belvidere; Venuses fairer and brighter, if it may ever be by creation of man, than even she of the Medici; Madonnas, sybils, saints, and prophets of truer and purer ideal than Roman, Florentine or Lombard; domes, columns, gates, grander than those of Italy, because produced by a higher, brighter age of the world,—then would such places surely be hallowed places; the temples, the halls, the capitols in which they were to be found would be sacred edifices; the imaginations of men would be refreshed and elevated; memory of by gone years would be a more magically checkered plain; the restless, roving, emigrating Californian spirit among us would collapse and speedily die; our life would be bettered. With us the very grave-yards are too unhallowed. The places where the bones of our fathers lie—and such fathers too as ours, the high, pure old men of other and better days—the places where even they sleep, are but too often seen, especially in the country, as bare and as rude as if the sleepers there had lain down "unwept, unhonoured, and unsung."

In these days of some progress and much brag in education, we hear a good deal about the developement of the man; not the developement of any one, three, five or seven particular protuberances either of cranium or of character; but now we are to have the developement of the whole man—all bumps, protuberances, faculties and fates. This language, we are aware, is employed as the promise of a culture adapted to the conscience as well as the intellect, to the religious faculties as well as the social and intellectual. And it is all excellently well as far as it goes, and as far as the promise shall be wisely and faithfully kept. Conscience, the religious principle, is a part of the whole man: and should be thoroughly and soundly educated. But we ask the Professor of Moral Science in the University, the Presidents of William and Mary, of Hampden Sydney, of Washington, and of Randolph Macon Colleges, is not the Love of the Beautiful, the Spirit of the Arts, a part also of the whole man? Have they, any of them, any apparatus for the education of that part of the whole man? Can they hold out the promise of readiness to educate the whole man while they have no such apparatus? Who but God made the souls of the Artists, who poured Beauty and Grandeur in such munificence and magnificence upon the Acropolis at Athens? Who else gave to Florence and to all succeeding ages, the soul of Michael Angelo, yearning after, and creating all artistic beauty that man's soul can know? Who made the souls of all those who made "the fairy halls" of the Etrurian Athens? Who gave the souls of those who have made even modern Rome "the City of the Soul"? And who indeed but that God whom she has sometimes declared to be a non-entity, kindled the taste and spirit which decorate (partly with her own genius and partly by plunder) even that tigress courtesan of cities, modern Paris? Why then is this God-given impulse to be totally omitted in our boasted systems of education for the whole man? How can American education make pretensions to completeness while there is such a hiatus in it? There is hardly an educational instrumentality for that end, and for the male sex, in our state. There is probably none of much account in the United States. Unless indeed perspiration over Homer and Virgil; the stealthy and snatched perusal of Shakspeare, Byron, and Bulwer; the shilly-shally looking at pictures in rotundas, society-halls, or costly ornithological toy-books, can be regarded as such an instrumentality. It may be replied that there is hardly such an instrumentality in connection with a College or University in the world anywhere. Be it so. In old countries there are associations of individuals and families with their native places, for time to which neither the memory nor the records of man run back. There is history, deep enchanting antiquity; and there are galleries, cathedrals, courts, piazzas, rich with the mature collected fruits of art for many ages, which serve as both nurseries and refectories for the Love of the Beautiful. Even if these things were not so, Europe is no model for us. The bonds of local attachment are bursting upon her shores. The "disjecta membra" are thick on our shores. In new States, where social life is yet too recent and too raw for the deeper charms of the historic and poetic muses, where roving locomotion and small attachment to household gods is too much a peculiarity of the citizens, where the "restlessness and wild endeavour" of man's heart needs the oil of this sort of consecration, such instrumentalities are more needed than in other States, and must probably depend more upon a connection with institutions of learning for their existence. These things are a part of the inevitable history of man. They are a part of his very nature. No state of society can be perfect without them. A state of society entirely without them is very far from perfect, all that the love of Do-nothingism, or the adoration of the clink of the Omnipotent Dollar may say to the contrary notwithstanding. Pericles, Maecenas, and Cosmo de Medici were not fools. They were not base, narrow spirits. The world is not, this day, the worse that they have lived in and adorned it. There are feelings over which art can exert a most potent influence for good. Nothing else can exert that influence. The want of it, in the absence of art, must and does leave a drooping and deficient character, individually and socially. On what just grounds could it be thought, by the coldest, hardest mind among us, that an Academy of Music, Painting, Sculpture and Architecture would be nonsense to-day, in Virginia or any other of our States?

But it may be said that Art wedded itself to the superstitions of a corrupt religion in mediæval Europe, so that art had to be destroyed before superstition itself could be destroyed; that art has always been the nursing mother of superstition; that the spiritual heroes of the sixteenth century found that the only way to oust the rooks was to pull down the rookeries. This may all be true. Perhaps it is. We will not defend Art at the expense of truth, freedom, or social purity. But the mischief complained of, sprung not from art itself; but from the wedlock of art and superstition. That this is not a necessary union, that pure religion and art can co-exist with mutual honor and advantage, that the very purest spirit of religion is consistent with the very noblest love of Beauty, the name of MILTON alone will sufficiently attest. The union of the church and the state produced very great evils at the very same time when these evils of art blended with superstition were felt. It is just as logical and as wise, to say that there ought to be no church at all, or no state at all, because these two, in unlawful wedlock, produced monstrous evils, as to say that there ought to be no art, because art blended with religion, produced monstrous superstitions. The simple answer is: let us have the church and the state, but not united;—let us have the religion and the art, but not united; let us have the pure high art of an enlightened age, and not the sickly and corrupt art of the dark ages. We can surely at length learn that the abuse of things, if not necessarily incident to their use, is no just ground of their impeachment.

There is an incessant, and probably increasing influx of European literature upon us. It comes preaching daily to open ears, things that best us about as well as the armour and battle-axe of Richard Coeur-de-Leon would have suited Captain Walker or Pierce Butler in the Mexican War—toryism, feudalism, medievalism, all manners of retrogradism and rottenness in opinion, all manners and moods of contempt for ourselves and for each other, all variations of desire for false and ruinous conservatism. We calmly acquiesce in such a state of literary dependence as would become only an infant or subject position. We must pass beyond the Atlantic wave to find gratification for some of the noblest and strongest of our natural aspirations. Even our own authors must often seek foreign scenes, and personages, to bring naturally into their works that brightness and glory of art which is, at the same time, the very vital warmth of polite letters. To us the rule of the sage does not apply, as it does to nations in which the arts are cultivated, that that most interests us which comes home to "our business and our bosoms." We have a singular amaurosis hiding from us only things at hand. Yet we have a noble continent where nature has wrought no "journey-work with prenticed hand;" we have glorious skies—forests—rivers—cataracts—lakes—savannahs. We have unfettered limbs, unfettered minds, an unfettered faith. These all have their own departments in our nature; and most nobly, or it is our own fault, may those departments be filled. Yet we ourselves prove to ourselves by the books and journals we most read, that there is yet another department which none nor all of these can fill. We still pine for Parthenon, and Coliseum, and dome, and statue, and glorious visions on Italian walls. Our longings for heroes, orators and sages are more than satisfied with the memories of Washington, of Franklin, of Henry, of Marshall and their like. We have had the heroes. We pine for the Beautifiers of life. We have been freed from the wounding chains of civil oppression; but we stretch out our hands after the silken cords of captivity to the ennobling, the exalting, the gladdening influences of social life. Where are our Phidias, our Zeuxis, our Raffaele, our Michael Angelo? We wait for them.

Many persons consider all this to be mere romance, because it will not tell in the ledger or the purse. It is a sailing through the sky in chase of some impalpable charm; a vain pining after an impracticable El Dorado of sentiment. With them, man is merely a being who eats bread, wears clothes, and casts up accounts. We desire no argument with any of that family. But a respectful word or two about practicability. "No prophet is so infallible as he who fulfils his own predictions." No dungeon is deeper, no doors made faster, than the dungeon and the doors of that Doubting Castle of which we have a master-key and free egress, as soon as we awake to the consciousness that we have them. We can dig canals, build rail-roads, stretch out speaking wires, erect lunatic, orphan, deaf, dumb and blind asylums:

"The mountain's giant crags that prop the sky
Are hurled asunder; and the brazen steed
The fiery rail-car sweeps exulting by.
The word goes forth, and dreary fens are dry
Wide blooms the arid desert as the rose;
The frowning forest lifts its boughs on high
The advancing giant's footsteps to oppose
And strives, but strives in vain, and sinks before its foe."

Whenever we shall see then, the clear absolute necessity of providing for the nobler and yet unsupplied wants of coming generations, there will not be a want of ability. Possent quia se posse putant. Having done so much to connect city with city in commerce, to sweep over and laugh at distance in the flight of news, we can, when we shall become aware that we can, do much to ennoble man's imagination and bind him to the homes and graves of his fathers. Without this, civilization must ever be imperfect. Such is the law under which man is created. He who made him and kindled within him the love of the beautiful, the pure and the sublime, made also the natural objects in the world around, which evoke and gratify those feelings. As man hungers and thirsts, the munificence of the planet-home to which he is now bound, gives food and drink; and thereby shows that it is now his appropriate and adapted home. As his spirit also hungers and thirsts, both for higher things, and for the grand, the sublime and the beautiful, so also the munificence of his home provides the thousand-fold grandeurs of sky and cloud, and the earthly beauties of spring and summer, and the thunder and the cataract and the roar of the ocean, and thereby proves itself adapted to, and not contemptuous of, the wants even of his imagination. That only is a complete civilization which patterns in this respect after nature and the Author of Nature; which in its schemes for the education of the whole man, embraces intellect, conscience, passions, emotions, reverence, love of beauty, love of pure, high, ennobling nature, and pure, high, ennobling art.

B.

COLERIDGE'S ESTIMATE OF THE FRENCH.

Frenchmen are like grains of gunpowder,—each by itself smutty and contemptible, but mass them together and they are terrible indeed.

FREDERICK JEROME.*

BY WILLIAM (ROSS) WALLACE.

We must not omit to mention an act of heroism exhibited towards the close of this melancholy scene (the burning of the "Ocean Monarch.") When only a few persons, among them some women and children, remained on the burning wreck, paralyzed with fear and totally incapable of helping themselves by descending from the tottering bowsprit to the boats, which, in the midst of a heavy sea and wreck, in vain offered their assistance below, an Englishman, Frederick Jerome, (a sailor on the American ship, "New World," which, with other vessels, came up to the scene of action,) stripping himself naked, made his way through the sea and wreck, and with a line in his hand succeeded in lowering the last helpless victims safely into the boats, being himself the LAST man to leave the wreck.—London Illustrated News.

Noon took the waters. Quiet noon
Was on the quiet sky,
When like a grand and joyous tune
A proud ship floated by.
O sweetly from her broad white wings
The wind was whispering happy things
To full five hundred souls:
It spoke of forests waving green
Far from the weary foam;
Of mountains in the distance seen;
Of cots in vallies stretebed between;
Of friends that from the windows lean
To welcome wanderers home.

On Rider of the bounding deep!
On Pilgrims of the solemn sea!
From world to world 'tis thine to sweep,
And who can dream of death with thee?
They dream a day-dream wreathed in flowers;
They dream—it is of festal hours;
They dream—it is of foreign bowers,
While fresh the land wind swells;
The flocks go up the mountain side;
The wood dove calls her summer bride;
Serenely o'er the village glide
Old tones from Sabbath bells.—
They dream—that dream has changed—and lo!
A vision comes of flame and wo
And seas in sullen ire—
The smoke rolls up—the red flames break—
The timbers burn—the topmasts shake—
It is no dream! Awake! Awake!
The Ship's—the Ship's on fire!

O! wild and high the wailing rose
Of hundreds rushing from repose
Upon the burning deck;
And fierce and fiercer, fiercer through
That ship the fiend of fire flew,
And louder yet the wailings grew
Along the crackling wreck.
Then manhood looked and darkly smiled;
The mother, frantic, pressed her child;
And lovers pressed together lips,

* I would take this occasion to express my thanks to Mr. Dyott, the fine Tragedian, for the very brilliant and effective manner in which he declaimed this lyric at the New York Broadway Theatre.

Then leaped into the sea,
And grey-haired Age and blooming youth
Knelt down, O God, to Thee!
New horror strikes the pallid crowd;
Some feebly moan, some shriek aloud,
Some, silent, only weep—
But hark that cry! that long, wild cry
Of bitter, hopeless agony!—
Again—it sinks into a sigh—
And hundreds seek the deep!

Then fell a hush upon the few
That round the burning bulwarks threw
Their arms, and, clinging still to life
With one last wild emotion,
Looked forth for help in that red strife
Upon the lurid Ocean.
The moments fly—the hot smoke, rolled
Denser and denser from the hold,
Clings round them—see! they gasp for breath,
And one by one sink down to death.
The moments fly—what cry again
Sweeps wildly on the heaving main?
There is a mingled joy and wo
That tells of succor in its flow.
O Heaven! shall these survivors hope?
Dost thou no longer frown?
Hurrah! Hurrah! Some noble ships
Like clouds are floating down
Upon the burning grave!
They come—they come with smile and shout—
They near—the eager boats are out
To save the wretches tossed about
On spar and gurgling wave.

And well the gallant sailors there
Fought with the flame and tide,
And hundreds sinking in despair
Were seated by their side.
Alas! a piteous group remain
On the last remnants of the deck;
To these the seamen call in vain
To leave the sinking wreck.
Fear freezing every heart, they stand,
Unconscious of the frequent cries,
Like statues in a ruined Land
With folded arms and moveless eyes.
From boat to boat the question ran
Is there no one to save?
"THERE IS!" cried out their noblest man,
And plunged into the wave.
He breasts the billow in his might—
Undaunted keeps the ship in sight;
To him a carnival of light
Amid the wreck-strews foam:
Nor winds, nor waves the Hero check—
One effort more—he mounts the wreck,
And towering on the flaming deck
The crews behold JEROME!
There mid the rolling smoke and flame,
With joyous brow and fearless frame
The glorious sailor strides:
He wakes the old man from despair,
The gasping child and woman fair:
See, at his quick command they dare
To take the peopled tides!

Room, England! in thine Abbey room
For him when Death must fold
His body in Earth's burial gloom

Among her Great of old!
 He is thy son: from thee he drew
 The blood that like sheet-lightning flew
 Through all the cloudy past—
 The mighty blood that Vikings gave Like water to the Northern wave,
 While shouting through their beards a stave
 Of triumph on the blast.
 Yes, Mother of the Nations! save
 For him, thine own, a bloodless grave:
 And, more than NELSONS, such as he
 May keep thy throne upon the Sea.
 Thy mighty Daughter of the West,
 In Freedom's beaming mantle drest,
 Shall waft the Sailor's relics home—
 Her flag of stars around his breast,
 Her standard on the foam!
 There she will clasp thy mother's hand,
 And, reverent, cry to thee,
 "Place by the Howard of the Land
 The Howard of the Sea!"

New York, 1848.

* JEROME has become a citizen of the United States.

Camp Life of Hon. William Wirt.

We anticipate much pleasure from Kennedy's Life of William Wirt, which we understand will be before the public by the time that our present number is issued. From the documents and papers of Mr. Wirt, which have been put in Mr. Kennedy's hands, we look for much that is novel and interesting relative to this distinguished man and his times, personally as well as politically. We append an extract from an epistolary diary by Mr. Wirt, while serving as a Captain of Artillery, during the alarm at Richmond, in 1814.

[Ed. Mass.

We shall now find some pictures of a militia campaign, in the following extracts from a correspondence with Mrs. Wirt. The enemy had captured Washington on the 24th of August. The British fleet had descended the Potomac River, and was now in the Chesapeake Bay. Its destination remained unknown in Richmond, until the movement on Baltimore became apparent. The failure on Baltimore, on the 12th and 13th of September, animated the hopes of the people living in the vicinity of the Chesapeake, and increased their confidence in their power to repel an attack on any other point. A camp was formed below Richmond, on the York River, at a place known as Warrenigh Church. Wirt was there, a captain of artillery, in command of a battalion.

These extracts supply some incidents of camp life.

WARRENIGH, September 9, 1814.

"Your most reasonable supply, under convoy of our man Randal, came in last evening. The starving Israelites were not more gladdened by the arrival of quails and manna, than we were by the salutation of Randal. The fish would have been a superb treat, had there been such an article as a potato in this poverty-stricken land. And yet the parish, according to the old inscriptions, is called 'Bliss-Land.'—The church was built in 1709.

"The British fleet are said to have descended the bay, or to be now doing so. There was a seventy-four at the mouth of York River, day before yesterday. She weighed anchor, yesterday, and went up the bay."

September 12.

"Your kindness and thoughtfulness has filled my camp with luxury. I fear we shall have no opportunity to become memorable for any thing but our good living—for I begin to believe that the enemy will not attempt Richmond. They are said to have gone up the bay on some enterprise. If they are hardy enough to make an attempt on Baltimore, there is no knowing what they may not attempt. We are training twice a day, which does not well agree with our poor horses. We have a bad camping ground—on a flat which extends two miles to the river—the water is not good and the men are sickly. I shall want a tent,—about which Cabell must interest himself. Let the materials be good, and have it made under Pryor's direction."

September 13.

"An express this morning tells us that five square-rigged vessels are at the mouth of York River. It is conjectured that the British fleet is coming down the bay. Their object of course, is only guess. Their position indicates equally an ascent of York or James River, or an attack on Norfolk, or a movement to sea to intercept Decatur's squadron.

September 16.

"A letter last night from Cabell, with a good tent and some clothes—for which I beg you to thank him."

* * * * *

September 19.

"The struggle, I now believe, will be a short one. The invincibles of Wellington, are found to be vincible, and are melting away by repeated defeats. The strongest blows they have been striking have been aimed only at the power to dictate a peace. A few more such repulses as they met at Baltimore, will extinguish that lofty hope, and we shall have a peace on terms honorable to us.

"We have heard nothing from them since they left Baltimore: so that they cannot be yet coming this way,—and we are at a loss to conjecture what they are at.

“Our volunteers are becoming disorderly for want of an enemy to cope with. Quarrels, arrests, courts-martial, are beginning to abound. I have had several reprimands to pronounce at the head of my company, in compliance with the sentence of the courts. To one of these, James, our man, held the candle—it being dark at the time;—and when I finished and turned round, the black rascal was in a broad grin of delight. I was near laughing myself at so unexpected a spectacle. My men are all anxious to return home:—constant applications for furloughs, in which Col. Randolph indulges them liberally. At present, I have not more than men enough to man two guns. One of my sergeants deserted this morning;—another will be put under arrest presently. So much grumbling about rations,—about the want of clothes,—about their wives,—their business, debts, sick children, &c., &c.,—that if I get through this campaign in good temper, I shall be proof against all the cares of a plantation, even as Cabell depicts them.

“— I am perpetually interrupted by the complaints of my men. Yet I do well, and if they leave me men enough I shall be prepared for a fight in a few days. We expect the enemy somewhere in Virginia, to avenge their discomfiture at Baltimore.”

September 26.

“Still at Warrenigh, and less probability of an enemy than ever. We are doing nothing but drilling, firing national salutes for recent victories, listening to the everlasting and growing discontents of the men, and trying their quarrels before courts-martial. I have endeavored to give satisfaction to my company, so far as I could compatibly with discipline. My success, I fear, has been limited. In addition to their rations, which have been very good and abundant, I have distributed to the sick, with a liberal hand, the comforts which your kindness had supplied. The company is well provided with cooking utensils, yet they murmur incessantly. Such are volunteer militia when taken from their homes, and put on camp duty. One source of their inquietude is, that they thought they were coming down merely for a fight, and then to return. Being kept on the ground, after the expectation of a battle has vanished, and not knowing how long they are to remain—looking every day for their discharge—they are enduring the pain of hope deferred, and manifest their disquiet in every form. Of such men, in such a state of mind, in such a service, I am getting heartily sick.

“I was never in better health, and were my men contented, I should be in high spirits. As it is, I shall bear up and discharge my duty with a steady hand.

Frank Gilmer, Jefferson Randolph, the Carrs, Upshur, and others, have got tired of waiting for the British, and gone home. David Watson is the only good fellow that remains with us. He is a major, quartered at Abner Tyne's,—messes with us.—takes six pinches of snuff to my one, which he thrusts two inches up his bellows nostrils, and smiles at the luxury of the effort. He is an excellent fellow, and has spouted almost all Shakspeare to us. You remember him as a contributor to the Old Bachelor. He, my second captain, Lambert, and my second lieutenant, Dick, make admirable company for me.”

September 28.

“The Blues at Montpelier are suffering much from sickness. Murphy, your brother John and his friend Blair are all down. The other companies are almost unofficered—the men very sickly. I strongly suspect that if we are kept much longer hovering over these marshes, our soldiers will fall like the grass that now covers them. We hope to be ordered in a few days to Richmond. It is believed on every hand that the British, with their mutinous and deserting troops, will not attempt a march on Richmond through the many defiles, swamps, thickets and forests that line the road, where, besides the abundant opportunities for desertion, nature has formed so many covers for our riflemen and infantry.

“If we should be ordered to Richmond, I have no idea that my company will be discharged. It will be kept there ready to march at a moment's warning.”

Here ends the campaign of Captain Wirt, and with it the last of his military aspirations. This little piece of history is a faithful transcript of some of the most characteristic incidents of militia warfare in nearly all the service of the war of 1812.

“I would not,” says the author of this brief diary, in a subsequent letter to Mrs. W., “with my present feelings and opinions, accept of any military commission the United States could confer. I will be a private citizen as long as I can see that, by being so, I shall be of use towards maintaining those who are dependent upon me; holding myself ever ready for my country's call in time of need.

“We shall soon see whether Lord Hill, who is expected on the coast with fourteen thousand men, will single out Virginia for his operations. My own impression is that he goes to the relief of Canada, which feels itself in danger from our recent successes there."

Some business for a friend now took him to Washington. It was in October of this year—1814. Congress was in session. The Capitol was in ruins, having been burnt by the enemy in August. The President's house was in the same condition. There were other vestiges of the ravage of the late visitation of General Ross and Admiral Cockburn.

[From the Home Journal.]

TO MISS AMELIE LOUISE RIVES,

ON HER DEPARTURE FOR FRANCE.

* LADY! that bark will be more richly freighted,
That bears thee proudly on to foreign shores,
Than argosies of which old poets prated,
With Colchian fleece or with Peruvian ores;
And should the prayers of friendship prove availing,
That trusting hearts now offer up for thee,
'Twill ride the crested wave with braver sailing
Than ever pinnace on the Pontic sea.

The sunny land thou seekest o'er the billow
May boast indeed the honors of thy birth,
And they may keep a vigil round thy pillow
Whom thou dost love most dearly upon earth,
Yet shall there not remain with thee a vision,
Some lingering thought of happy faces here,
Fonder and fairer than the dreams elysian
Wherein thy future's radiant hues appear?

The high and great shall render thee obeisance,
In halls bedecked with tapestries of gold,
And mansions shall be brighter for thy presence
Where swept the stately Medicis of old—
Still 'mid the pomp of all this courtly lustre,
I cannot think that thou wilt all forget
The pleasing fantasies that thickly cluster
Around the walls of the old homestead yet!

Σ

* These lines are transferred to the columns of the Messenger, at the request of several friends, from that very excellent paper, "The Home Journal." As a change is made in the signature attached to them, (the letter "E" having been erroneously substituted by the Journal's compositor for the Greek Σ)—a liberty which could not be taken except upon the "best authority,"—the Editor of the Messenger thinks it not improper to state that he wrote them himself.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?

The gentle Juliet would probably have never asked this question of her lover, had she lived within the jurisdiction of the English Court of Common Pleas, or, had she asked it, would have been furnished with a satisfactory answer in the dictum of the Lord Chief Justice and his confreeres of the long robe, in the case of Kimersley v. Knott. £65 10s. it seems may be in a name even when expressed only by the initial letter. We recollect, in the days of our catechism, to have seen the answer of "M or N" to the simple question of "What is your name?"—which would doubtless be held bad upon demurrer, since the judgment of the court in the case cited. However this may be, we feel satisfied that our readers will not quarrel with us, for laying before them the arguments of counsel and other proceedings, in extenso, in Kimersley v. Knott, the more especially as the ingenious and accomplished Talfourd is the chief speaker. The legal fraternity everywhere will appreciate the wit that has been thrown around this Knott-y question, nor will the best hits be "caviare to the general." It is not often that the stern countenance of Themis is relaxed with such comicolities, or that Mr. Justice Maule assumes the cap and bells for the amusement of the public.

[Ed. Sou. Lit. Mess.]

Court of Common Pleas.----Sittings in Banco.

KIMERSLEY v. KNOTT.

A declaration against the indorser of a bill of exchange, in which the defendant is styled simply "James M. Knott," is bad, because the Christian name of the defendant is not properly set forth under stat. 4, William IV., ch. 42.

In this case the plaintiff, as endorser of a bill of exchange of £65 10s., brought an action against the defendant as the acceptor, and declared against him by the name of "John M. Knott," being that by which he had signed the note, but without stating in the declaration that the defendant had so signed it. To this declaration the defendant demurred specially, and assigned as the ground of his demurrer, that the declaration had not properly set forth his Christian name, nor assigned any reason under the statute, 3rd and 4th, Wm. IV., c. 42, for not doing so.

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, on behalf of the defendant, said their lordships were often told that a case rested on a word, but here, it rested on a letter only. It was his duty to contend, both upon principle and precedent, that this was a good ground of demurrer. The court had decided that the letter "I," being a vowel, and capable of pronunciation, might be taken to be a Christian name, but they had at the same time intimated, that such would not be the case with a consonant, which, as it could not be sounded alone, would be deemed to be not a name, but an initial letter only. Now, in this case, "M" was plainly an initial letter, for it could not be pronounced by itself. Standing by itself, therefore, it meant nothing. He was sure a very eminent authoress, (Miss Edgeworth,) whose loss they had recently had to lament, was of opinion, that all the letters of the alphabet, by the mode in which they were explained, were rendered little more, (to use judicial language,) than a "mockery, a delusion, and a snare,"—that A B C D, &c., meant A B C D, &c., and nothing more; but even if it would avail him, he feared his friend could not rely upon such authority.

The Lord Chief Justice: You say the "M" means nothing—then let it mean nothing. Would a scratch be demurrable?

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd: I say that "M," by itself, cannot be pronounced, and means nothing; but here it does mean something, which something ought to have been stated or explained under the statute. Suppose a person of the name of John Robbins, the court would surely hold a declaration bad, which described him by the word John and figures of the red-breast! In like manner the court would hold this declaration bad, because it either put a sign for one of the defendant's names, or described it by the initial letter. A consonant by itself, was a mere sound without meaning. The letter H, indeed, by the custom of London and some other places, was no sound at all, [laughter] though elsewhere it often protruded itself on all occasions, [renewed laughter.]

Mr. Justice Maule: I had a policeman before me as a witness the other day, who told me he belonged to the "hen" division, and it was not until some farther stage in the cause, that I discovered it was not a division designated by the name of a bird, but by "N," the alphabetical letter, [Great laughter.]

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd: It will probably be contended that this person might have been christened in the manner the bill is signed, but I submit that the court will not intend that. It is true we often hear of absurd Christian names, and I myself remember when many persons insisted upon having their children christened "Sir Francis Burdett."

Mr. Justice Maule: I remember a very learned and ingenious argument by Mr. Jardine when I sat in the court of exchequer, by which he proved to the satisfaction of the court, that the Christian name is the real name, and the surname is only an addition; that in the case of John Stiles for instance, John is the real name, but Stiles was perhaps originally added only because the ancestor lived near one.

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd: Then having, I hope, convinced the court that "M" by itself cannot be a name, and means nothing, I submit it must be understood as an initial, and therefore that it have ought to have been so stated.

Mr. Justice Maule: Pleadings are in writing, therefore the law presumes that the court can read and know its letters. Vowels may be names, and in "Sully's Memoirs" a Monsieur D'O. is spoken of; but consonants cannot be names alone, as they require in pronunciation the aid of vowels.

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd: Yes, but in the case of consonants, they are taken to be but initials, when used alone both in law and in literature. Throughout the ponderous volumes of Richardson's novels, for instance, we find persons spoken of in this manner. In "Clarissa Harlowe," for instance, "Lord M." is mentioned throughout four volumes, but it could never be understood that this was the real name or any thing more than an initial. Again, an author well known to the lord chief justice (Charles Lamb) wrote a farce, entitled simply "Mr. H.," but the whole turns upon this being the initial only of a name he wished to conceal. In his prologue to it, he humorously says:

"When the dispensers of the public lash
Soft penance give; a letter and a dash—
When vice reduced in size shrinks to a failing,
And loses half her progress by curtailing,
Four pas are told in such a modest way,
The affair of Colonel B—with Mrs. A—,
You must forgive them; for what is there, say,
Which such a pliant Vowel must not grant,
To such a very pressing consonant?
Or who poetic justice dares dispute,
When mildly melting at a lover's suit,
The wife 's a Liquid, her good man a Mute."

And he concludes by an appeal to the consequences of this "mincing fashion," which (said the learned serjeant) I trust will have great weight with your lordships, for he adds—

Oh, should this mincing fashion ever spread
From names of living heroes to the dead:
How would ambition sigh and hang the head,
As each loved syllable should melt away,
Her Alexander turned into great A,
A single C, her Cæsar to express,
Her Scipio sunk into a Roman S—
And nick'd and dock'd to those new modes of speech,
Great Hannibal himself to Mr. H—."

The learned serjeant then cited and argued upon a variety of cases on his side of the question, and submitted that their lordships ought to decide in favor of his client.

Mr. F. Robinson, on behalf of the plaintiff, said he did not deny the right of every Englishman, to be called by every name given him at his baptism; but he submitted that before he claimed to be privileged on that account, he must show that his privilege has been invaded. Here it was assumed throughout, that the "M" in the name "John M. Knott" was an initial letter, but he believed there were instances in which persons had been christened in this remarkable way in this country. He was told there was lately a bank director who was christened "Edmund R. Robinson;" but were it otherwise in this country, did it follow, that in no other country. Jew, Turk, or heathen might not use such names? If, however, it were not an initial letter, why did not his friend apply to have the right name substituted? If it were a misdescription, it was pleadable in abatement. Such a name might originate from an error of the clergyman at the christening.

The Lord Chief Justice: In the upper circles of society it is customary to hand in the name in writing, which prevents mistake.

Mr. Justice Maule: The practice of the circles with which I am conversant was, and I believe is, to give the name verbally. There was, however, a gentleman, the sheriff of one of the counties I went through on circuit, Mr. John Wanley Sawbridge Erle Drax, whose name was very probably handed in, [laughter.]

Mr. Robinson: There are many Scotch and French names, such as M'Donald, M'Taggart, D'Harcourt, D'Horsey—how are such names to be set out in the pleadings? Suppose, again, a man's name were the name of a river, as X?

Mr. Justice Maule: But that is not spelt so; it idem per idem, X for ex. Beer, I believe, is sometimes called X, but not water, [laughter.]

Mr. Robinson: There are some of our names which are precisely those of letters; as Gee, Jay, Kay, &c.

Mr. Justice Maule: But here it is not sonans, only consonans, and cannot be sounded without other letters.

Mr. Robinson: Their lordships should remember the existence of a publication called the Phonetic Nuz, and unless they meant to give a "heavy blow and great discouragement" to that rising science, he hoped they would not decide against his client, [laughter.] But he had seriously to submit, that by demurring to this declaration the defendant admitted, according to legal principles, that his name was that which was stated in the declaration.

Mr. Justice Crosswell referred to and distinguished this case from the case of "Roberts v. Moon," in 5 Term Reports, where a plea in abatement of misnomer, beginning "and the said Richard, sued by the name of Robert," was held bad.

Mr. Justice Maule suggested that as £65 10s depended upon the question, it would be better for the plaintiff to amend. Mr. Robinson declined to do so, and contended no case could be cited directly in support of the demurrer, and therefore that the court should decide in favor of the plaintiff.

Mr. Sergeant Talfourd having briefly replied,

The Lord Chief Justice: The various stages in the argument in this case have been already discussed and decided. The courts have decided that they will not assume that a consonant letter expresses a name, but they will assume it expresses an initial only; and they further decided, that the insertion of an initial letter instead of a name is a ground of demurrer, and is not merely an irregularity. In the case of Nash v. Collier, this court decided that a demurrer to the declaration which described the defendants' name as William Henry W. Collier was not frivolous, and gave a strong intimation, which the plaintiff had the good sense to attend to, that he ought to amend his declaration. That decision was acted upon by the court of exchequer in the subsequent case of Miller v. Hayes, and as it appears to me the case is precisely similar to the present; I think we must decide in favor of the demurrer.

The other judges concurring.

Judgment for the defendant.

A PEEP INTO FUTURITY.*

Michel rang the bell, ordered a sumptuous breakfast to be served up, of which, however, he alone partook, and among other things expressed a wish to Asmodeus to know something of the condition of the world in future, say a hundred years hence, as he thought that the discovery of steam power and its application to the new inventions of the age, especially rail-roads, must necessarily create great changes.

"If you wish," said Asmodeus, "directly after breakfast I will entertain you with some pictures of futurity."

"Let the breakfast go to the d—," exclaimed Michel springing up from his chair, "let me see them now, and then for Vienna."

Asmodeus struck with his stick upon a small table and it was instantaneously transformed into a large show-box in which nothing was as yet visible but the glass in which the spectator gazes.

"Now look in there," said he, "and I will explain wherever it may be necessary."

Michel did not wait for him to repeat this invitation but stuck not only his nose but his whole

* Extract from a late German work entitled Dämonische Reisen in alle Welt, or A Journey with Asmodeus round the World.

visage into the aperture and stared with mouth and eyes wide open.

"Mon Dieu! I ought to know this country," exclaimed he, "is not that Mainz. Surely I see the Dome, the Eichelstein and our glorious Rhine! But how is this? I must be mistaken, for I see no fortifications and what does this mean? Yonder lie the ruins of a rail-road?"

"Quite correct, but pay attention and it will explain itself to you." Michel looked and suddenly there appeared about two hundred yards above the earth two little air-ships which met directly over the city of Mainz. Each of them contained one solitary but most splendidly dressed passenger. When they arrived within a few paces of each other a mutual recognition seemed to take place, and by pressing on a spring they caused the wing-like wheels of their little vessels to pause while they remained stationary in the air. Michel who was not only all eye but also all ear, now plainly heard the following conversation which was held in the air.

"Ah, my best compliments to you, Madame Tiltrina, whence come you so early in the morning?" was the address of a Berlin court-tailor to a court-milliner from St. Petersburg, seated in the other little ship.

"The Princes Y. has chasod me thus early from my elastic hair-couch in order to procure in great haste a sylphide dress for her from Paris, as she wishes to attend a fête given at the court of Constantinople this evening. All the beau-monde from London, Paris, St. Petersburg, Berlin and Vienna will be there in high gala dress, and I must also, in my wanderings, obtain a pair of rattlesnake bracelets of the newest style, together with the celebrated "variations to God save the King," composed by Adkinson Goddamounth, for the Princess H. Only a short half hour ago I left St. Petersburg. But allow me to ask in turn whence you come so early, honored Mr. Dünnspecht?"

"I come from the place to which you are going, most worthy lady; the same cause which takes you there has started me thus early. I had to procure from the steam factory of M. Toulpret new dresses for two princes who will wear them to night at the festival of the Turkish emperor. Only see how splendid they are, (Dünnspecht unfolded the dresses and showed them to the lady.) The Diné dansant will be in full costume."

"I know it, and you will make your own profit by it not so dear, Mr. Dünnspecht?"

The artist-tailor laughed pleasantly.

"But tell me, dear sir, what ruins are those lying directly under us?"

"They are the remains of a rail-road of the last century which led from Frankfort to Mainz, and on which they used to travel before the discovery of our air-ships with their steam engines."

"Travelling must have been very tedious in those days."

"Certainly, my dear, only imagine, they scarcely made four or five German miles in an hour, and our good ancestors thought it marvellous with what speed they travelled."

"How very tiresome, a true snail-post. But when did the wise idea of air-navigation first originate?"

"Some fifty years ago; it was in the year 1893 (about fifty-three years ago, as we are now in 1946) that an English mechanic discovered these useful air-machines which enable us to travel with so much more comfort and speed as well as so little expense. They have been improved upon until they have attained their present state of perfection, going at the rate of fifty or more German miles an hour, and the wheels having the power of from 10 to 500 eagles' wings. Indeed, by the most accurate accounts, the great American war-ships, which carry twenty pieces of steam cannon and four steam mortars have a power equalling nearly 800 eagles' wings."

"You astonish me, Mr. Dünnspecht! But, apropos! they speak of a war which has broken out between North America and the empire of Japan?"

"It is true, my best lady, Japan is the only state in which duties are still imposed, for they have been abolished for more than fifty years in all the other countries of the world as useless and disadvantageous to the States, inasmuch as the mercantile interests were soon balanced by the immense interchange of all the products of the world, and as the revenues of the different governments diminished by the loss of the duties were richly covered by the increase of direct taxes."

"Oh, that must have been a great plague! To see duties laid on one's honestly acquired estate, or to have one's little baggage rumpled and thrown about by good-for-nothing custom-house officers. But to return to the war with Japan. How did it turn out?"

"After the Japanese had surprised, imprisoned the crew and confiscated the goods of an American air-merchant ship which had come down in the night in the neighborhood of Jeddo and was endeavoring to smuggle her merchandise into the city, the news induced an imperial American air-fleet to weigh anchor, and some three days ago they flew to Japan, and this morning it was reported on the Exchange in Paris, that their Capital, Jeddo, had been utterly destroyed in a few minutes for refusing to deliver up either the spoil or prisoners, by a storm of fire bombs and rockets which the fleets discharged upon them from a height of 1000 feet."

"Mon Dieu! that is very frightful! If it only does not injure our business, though I have had little to do with Japan as yet, still— But only look, Mr. Dunnspecht! yonder in the mist-like distance I perceive several specks, what may they be?"

"Gracious Heavens! they are air-pirates; quick to the earth, my best lady, or we are lost."

They both hastily let themselves down till within a few yards of the earth.

"But where are we now, Mr. Dunnspecht! I do not recognise the country rightly."

"Just over the boulevards of Maintz; see they are still employed in levelling some places where the walls once stood. Since air-travelling has become general, all fortifications are as useless and impossible as duties are—everywhere they have been destroyed, and in Paris the last vestiges of those built in the time of Louis Philippe are fast disappearing."

"I only wonder that they have not discovered and erected air-fortifications ere this!"

"Oh they may come yet. But, my charming Madame Tiltrina, the pirates must have taken another direction, we have lost sight of them. How would it be as we are so near the earth if we were to take a slight breakfast? Allow me the pleasure of inviting you to partake of one. After travelling in the air one has always an appetite."

"You are too kind, Mr. Dunnspecht, but I accept your invitation. Where shall we put up?"

"I think in Frankfort, the second city in the kingdom of Hessa, in the China Hotel formerly known as the White Swan, we shall be excellently served. Mr. Kühner has always the freshest sea-lobsters and the most costly skiras."

"Just as you please, Mr. Dunnspecht."

And the two little ships peaceably descended together to Frankfort, which, since the last peace, had united itself for the kingdom of Hessa, formerly a Grand Duchy, for its own welfare and benefit. They descended in the Comedien Platz and proceeded to the China Hotel.

"You have had enough for one time," said the devil drawing a bolt over the glass, "another time you shall see more." And with a stroke of his stick the box once more resumed its original shape of a table.

"That is all well enough," said Michel, "if you have not been deceiving me."

"By no means, you have seen nothing but the bare truth in the mirror."

"Well then our successors will have it a hundred times better than we ourselves. But now for Vienna."

THE MARSEILLES HYMN.

A TRANSLATION.

BY J. E. LEIGH.

In the following translation of the Marseilles Hymn the sense of the original has been adhered to with reasonable fidelity. Whenever the author has not given its very ideas, he has endeavored to preserve its spirit; and it will probably be perceived that every departure from the conceptions of the original has been made by the substitution of sentiments obviously suggested by the original ideas. This attempt at a translation of "The Marseillaise" is certainly an act of temerity. The author does not flatter himself that it has been executed in the spirit of poetry, and would not offer it but for the fact that the lines generally received as a version of the Hymn, beginning

"Ye sons of France, awake to glory!
Hark! hark! what myriads bid you rise!"

are in no sense a translation. They constitute indeed an exceedingly spirit-stirring poem, and are not inferior in vigor to the Marseilles Hymn; but they are in truth an original poem. They do not convey the ideas and sentiments of the French of Rouget de Lisle.

I.

Ye sons of France, ho! now 's the hour!

The day of glory dawns for you:
See frowns of tyrants o'er you lower!

Their blood-stained banner streams in view:
Hark! hark! where'er that flag is floating,
Exulting Slaughter's shouts are heard!

On comes the foe, at tyrants' word
Your children, wives, to death devoting.

To arms! to arms! ye men!
In serried ranks advance!

March on! march on! that tyrants' blood
May fertilize our France!

II.

This horde of slaves by traitors headed!

These banded kings, what is't they seek?
For whom prepared these fetters dreaded?
For whom these chains so long they keep?
Ye men of France! for us intended!

What indignation should we feel,
When tyrants thus their plans reveal,
Renewing bondage which we ended!

To arms! to arms! ye men!
In serried ranks advance!

March on! march on! that tyrants' blood
May fertilize our France.

III.

Shall foreign troops for conquest banded,
 At our own hearth their law prescribe?
 Shall hirelings base, by gold commanded,
 Appal our warriors' hearts of pride?
 Shall wretches in their chains exulting
 Impose on us their cherished yoke,
 Or tyrants with their vengeful stroke
 Cleave down our rights from God resulting?
 To arms! to arms! ye men!
 In serried ranks advance!
 March on! march on! that tyrants' blood
 May fertilize our France.

IV.

Ye despots tremble! traitors tremble!
 Ye scorned and spurned on ev'ry side!
 No longer now can ye dissemble,
 Nor from our wrath your treason hide:
 We'll seek you where the battle rages,
 And if we fall, our place supplied,
 A quenchless vengeance we'll confide
 To those who follow, through all ages.
 To arms! to arms! ye men!
 In serried ranks advance!
 March on! march on! that tyrants' blood
 May fertilize our France.

V.

Bold champions of a gen'rous people!
 Know when to spare and where to strike;
 O spare th' unwilling foes and feeble,
 Who by constraint against you fight!
 Strike despots down, for blood contending;
 Slay, slay the traitors to your cause,
 The fiends who, false to nature's laws,
 Are seen their mother's bosoms rending.
 To arms! to arms! ye men!
 In serried ranks advance!
 March on! march on! that tyrant's blood
 May fertilize our France!

VI.

O Love of Country, flame most holy!
 Our hand to vengeance now incite.
 O, Freedom, goddess, chiefest glory!
 Now for thy vot'ries rule the fight,
 That vict'ry then thy form beholding,
 May seize and bear our flag on high,
 And ev'ry foe shall fall and die
 Beneath thy might, our cause upholding.
 To arms! to arms! ye men!
 In serried ranks advance!
 March on! march on! that tyrant's blood
 May fertilize our France.

Memphis, Tenn. August, 1849.

A few Reflections on the Conquest of Mexico by Cortez.

In the search of the mind after greatness, no period of the world's history will so much command its attention as the sixteenth century. The era of Charles the Fifth, of Henry the Eighth, of Francis the First, of Leo the Tenth, is replete with knowledge and instruction to the student who desires to trace the development of all that is wonderful and fearful in man's physical, moral and intellectual nature.

Amid the various causes which aided in rendering this an age conspicuous for its energies of mind, are to be found that love of adventure and thirst for discovery, the offspring of that grand impulse given to the world by the genius and perseverance of Columbus.

Spain stood preëminently renowned among the nations of Europe, and her chivalrous sons sought new arenas for the display of that valor which had rendered her fields classic, as the home of the knight and the birth-place of the troubadour.

As the characteristic feature of the age, the power of the monarch rose superior to, and above the will of the people—the concentration of all authority. Fostered and protected beneath the wings of this mighty influence, there sprung into existence as the fit instrument of its exercise, those vast and powerful monopolies, the scourge of humanity, and the demonstration of that despotism which, seated in power, acts upon man as the subject of its fearful oppression. Through the medium of these monopolies the reckless and daring, the fallen grandee, and the man of dissipated habits, were induced to seek a trial of their military prowess and reparation of their fortunes in those newly discovered regions which imagination had clothed as abounding in all the riches of the East—the splendid realization of the wildest fancy. The security, the rights, the possessions of nations which had hitherto enjoyed in innocence the blessings of Heaven, were trampled upon, while vast empires were utterly destroyed by the cruelty and oppression of these colonists.

It was under circumstances such as these, and under patronage of such a character, that one of the most remarkable men appeared to act in the grand drama of this century, a point conspicuous for the ability, the daring and the want of principle with which it was performed. This was the conqueror of Mexico—this was the man who, rearing for himself a monument upon the destruction of an ancient people and empire, has handed down as a theme for universal detestation the name of Hernando Cortez.

Although there is within us a strange and mysterious feeling which prompts us to look with something like mystic reverence upon those exhibitions of courage and devoted heroism where thousands "end their feverish dream of life," and incites the imagination to roam with delight over those fields which have been rendered classic by the loss of the brave and the great, yet it would be needless to pause and harrow up the nicer sensibilities of our nature by dwelling upon the career of the actors of this conquest, traced as it is by blood, and marked by every thing revolting to humanity. There would be no pleasure in the retrospection—there would be no high and lofty exhibitions of the virtues of human nature—nothing would be presented but a violation of every principle of right resulting in the destruction of an ancient empire, the execution of a noble monarch, the wilful murder of inoffensive inhabitants, the pillage and desecration of their temples of worship, and the slavery of a people who had enjoyed in undisturbed possession the blessings of an independent government throughout many ages. And yet such is the enthusiasm which always attaches to deeds of conquest, such the captivating influence which history exerts as it unfolds in its pages of immortality feats of oppression and splendid daring, that the mind is bewitchingly enticed to lose sight, in the contemplation of grand and brilliant achievements, of the dark and destructive means by which those achievements have been accomplished. This disposition, to be deluded by the fictitious coloring which deeds of military renown throw over the principles of justice, is not confined to the illiterate and narrow-minded, but pervades all classes, and the man of enlightened judgment and lofty understanding, as he pores over the pages of the ancient chronicler of these startling events that so fearfully destroyed the hitherto unbroken silence and mystery of a newly discovered world, catches that feeling which operated so powerfully upon the mind of our illustrious historian, and is induced with him to turn to the defence of those who converted "a happy and smiling country into a bloody sepulchre."

But experience will prove that while we should study and investigate the works of those great minds who have thrown rich floods of intellectual light over the darkness of history, or any other department of literature, they would by no means be safe guides to follow when we come to weigh the justice of men's actions by the high standard of the present age. This conclusion is irresistibly forced upon the mind in a perusal of Mr. Prescott's History of the Conquest of Mexico—and we feel compelled to agree with the writer who remarks, "that the imagination of the author, caught and dazzled by the hero's fame and wonderful qualities, had mastered the calm judicial impartiality so material for the purposes of history."

Whilst therefore we would add our humble tribute to the tide of gratitude to him for having placed the literature of our country upon so noble and enduring a basis, we feel constrained respectfully to differ from the conclusions that he has drawn from the facts which he has recorded. But as the design and character of these brief reflections alike forbid that I should enter at large upon the objections to these conclusions which appear at the end of his work, I shall only notice his justification of Cortez and his measures, on the ground of his having introduced the christian religion—and also what the historian has set forth as the result of these measures.

We are told that Cortez, as he stood amid the vast and magnificent scenery of the new world and beheld the idolatry of those nations who had reared grand and massive temples to their Divinities, felt his soul moved by the desire to bring them to the knowledge of the Cross and make them subjects to the crown of Spain. We are even told that this desire for the extension of Christianity formed one of the leading objects of his life. But it must be confessed, after a careful investigation, in the most accredited histories of the day of the causes of his actions, from the time when buoyant with hope and filled with the love of adventure, he left his native country, to the day, when the riches and splendor of the Indian empire lay unveiled before his eyes, we have been utterly unable to find any demonstration of a particular religious sentiment, and the first expression that fell from his lips, upon landing in the New World, that "he came to get gold and not to till the soil like a peasant," as well as the general character and habitudes of the man, would seem sufficiently to disprove it.

Claiming as he and his associates did the Bible to be the standard of their actions, its holy precepts and commandments based upon mankind as the subjects of universal philanthropy at once condemned them.

The spotless integrity and singleness of purpose of those who first proclaimed the tidings of "Peace and good will" among men as they went forth poor and friendless wanderers upon the face of the earth, contrast strangely with the character of these conquerors who panoplied in power, acted upon the darkest and blackest of all maxims—"that the end justifies the means."

If then robbery, pillage and the exhibition of all the vilest passions of human nature are at variance with the Bible, it is evident that these men cannot be justified by that standard—and to urge in their defence that they bore with them the word of Life is but to endeavor by the drapery of religion and virtue to cover those deeds of darkness and cruelty, at which the cheek of shame itself would blush.

The result of the conquest has been set forth in defence of the motives which prompted it—and in order calmly to consider the effect of this reasoning we would briefly direct attention to the situation of Mexico before and after its subjugation.

Losing their origin in the antiquity of past ages, the Mexican people had risen in power and their empire had become the pride and glory of the western world. With a system of jurisprudence remarkable for its equity, and firm and decided in its execution, order and harmony were the characteristics of its government. The more refined acquirements of Music, Poetry and Painting were cultivated to a great extent, but our minds are more deeply impressed with the solemn grandeur and lofty conceptions of the Mexican Mythology. They reared to their Divinities grand and magnificent temples, which still remain as monuments of their architectural greatness, and living criticisms of the pigmy efforts of those by whom they were succeeded. The barbaric splendor, the dark and mysterious rites, the superstitious reverence of their worship, fill us with awe and amazement. They had reached their golden age, they had arrived at the climax of their greatness. Fearful was the responsibility of those who removed from the nations of the earth a people so numerous, the monuments of whose genius, like those of the ancient Egyptians, still stand a problem and study for the investigation of the man of science and the devotee of literature. But the accomplishment of their destiny was at hand. Those men came, who seemed to have borrowed the thunder of heaven and the lightning of the clouds, in order to effect the accomplishment of the dark prophecy which had been handed down from earliest antiquity, that "a race of men from the East should come and possess their country."

We read of revolutions and civil wars upon the page of history, and trace the exaltation of man and a higher advance in civilization to the conflict of these elements—but here whole nations have been destroyed, and where is the grand result? where are the mighty blessings to be offered as a recompense for the effusion of so much blood?

Opening the record, we read the result, as though by divine infliction, in the loss of power, of greatness, and position of the Spanish nation—we read it in their subjugated country—that land of revolution and chaos—the hot bed of faction—the exemplification to mankind of moral and political degradation for the last three centuries.

Living as we do in the highest period of man's civilization, with all the lights of the past around us, to direct us in our search for truth, we can learn a grand and impressive lesson, from the result of the two great events that have occurred upon the Western Continent—the Conquest of Mexico by Cortez, and the Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers—the one accomplished through the auri sacra fames—the other effected in the fear of the Almighty, for the erection of a "faith's pure shrine"—the one an illustration of the effects of an indulgence of the viler passions of man's nature—the other leading to the establishment of a powerful empire, the nursery of wise, and great, and gifted men.

In regard to Mexico, the heart of the philanthropist is grieved to discover that no bow of promise has as yet appeared to gild the dark cloud of her national degradation or point him to her moral and political advancement. As he wanders amidst her vast solitudes and majestic mountains, he discovers the monumental vestiges of a great people—they have been destroyed—but casting his eyes over the scene presented to his view, he reads the solemn result of national turpitude and injustice—in a feeble and impotent government exercising its petty tyranny over those lands which were once ruled by the puissant and accomplished Montezuma—and feels his heart filled with sorrow at the destruction of a mysterious and fearful race, as he stands amid the records of the past, where

Some mouldering shrine still consecrates the scene
And tells that Glory's footsteps there have been—
There hath the spirit of the mighty passed
Not without record, though the desert blast
Borne on the wings of Time hath swept away,
The proud creations reared to brave decay.

H.

A SONNET OF MOXON.

The cygnet crested on the purple water,
The fawn at play beside its graceful dam;
On cowslip bank, in spring, the artless lamb;
The Hawthorn robed in white, May's fragrant daughter;
The willow weeping o'er the silent stream;
The rich laburnum with its golden show;
The fairy vision of a poet's dream;
On summer eve earth's many-colour'd bow;
Diana at her bath; Aurora bright;
The dove that sits and singeth o'er her woes;
The star of eve; the lily, child of light;
Fair Venus' self, as from the sea she rose!
Imagine these, and I in truth will prove
They are not half so fair as she I love.

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

OLIVER GOLDSMITH: A Biography. By Washington Irving. New York: George P. Putnam, 155 Broadway. London: John Murray. 1849.

Poor Goldy has been fortunate in his biographers. First there came Prior, already known for his Life of Edmund Burke, an industrious student, who compiled two volumes of memoirs, most reliable and instructive, the facts gleaned by patient research from the best sources of information. It was the office of Prior to give to succeeding generations the first distinct idea of Goldsmith as a man, to resuscitate him, as it were, and cause him to pass before us bodily, and to disabuse the public mind of an impression which seems to have fastened upon it, that Goldsmith was at best but a bear with the reflective faculties, whom the patronage of Dr. Johnson, the was major, alone kept in social respectability. A habit had become general to narrate the most absurd and ridiculous stories of his awkwardness, and Garrick, in the midst of those satirical epigrams which provoked the mirth of St. James's Coffee House, had spoken of him, as one

Who wrote like an angel, but talked like poor Poll.

Most of these popular legends were dissipated by the painstaking investigations of Prior, whose work, though out of print, and in some measure superseded by later publications, will long be regarded as a valuable collection of historical materials.

"The Life and Adventures of Oliver Goldsmith" from the pen of John Forster of the Inner Temple, was the next work on the same subject. From the habitually critical and inquiring mind of the Editor of the London Examiner, the public had a right to expect a work of graceful composition and of philosophical acuteness. His former effort, "Lives of the Statesmen of the Commonwealth," had heightened this expectation. Nor was the public disappointed. Taking the facts already gathered by Prior, and adding to them in a few instances, he produced a picturesque and discriminating biography, full of earnest sympathy with the subject, and subtle criticism upon his writings. The work of Forster may be regarded as a fitting companion to the Vicar of Wakefield, tracing the career of Goldsmith through all its pathetic vicissitudes of light and shade, and while reproving all too gently the errors into which he fell, pleasing us with its spirit of charity, and instructing us with the full exposition of the results of folly, even in the most gifted.

Lastly, we have a Biography of Goldsmith, written by him, who of all others, more nearly resembles Goldsmith in the purity and freedom of his style—Washington Irving. The history of this work is succinctly told by Mr. Irving in the Preface. It was originally but a meagre sketch, written to accompany Baudry's Paris edition of Goldsmith's Writings. In preparing for the press the complete series of his works now in course of publication by Mr. Putnam, he was induced to re-write and materially enlarge it, availing himself without stint, as he handsomely acknowledges, of the labors of both Prior and Forster. The result has been that we have now before us a biography of Goldsmith, which will be in every body's hand; a genial, happy representation, in which the group around the board of the "Three Jolly Pigeons" relieves the dogmatism of Johnson and the impertinence of Boswell; a book full of incident and anecdote narrated by the same delightful companion, who has hitherto led us over prairies and mountain solitudes to the far distant shores of the Pacific, who has directed our steps through the verdant windings of Sleepy Hollow, who "peopled the Alhambra and made eloquent its shadows," and of whom it may be said with equal propriety as of Oliver himself,

Qui nullum fere scribendi genus
Non tetigit,
Nullum quod tetigit non ornavit.

This volume is the eleventh of the series of Mr. Putnam's new edition which we have had occasion so frequently to commend. We observe with pleasure, a notice from the publisher, that he designs very shortly to commence the publication of the "Miscellaneous Works of Oliver Goldsmith," in uniform style, which shall be the most complete and elegant edition ever issued.

Irving's Life of Goldsmith may be found at the store of Messrs. Nash and Woodhouse.

LETTERS FROM THE ALLEGHANY MOUNTAINS. By Charles Lanman. New York. Geo P. Putnam, 155 Broadway. 1849.

Mr. Lanman is well known to the readers of the Messenger as a pleasing and accurate writer, and they will not need our recommendation to induce them to purchase the present volume. He excels in the very department of composition of which these Letters constitute a specimen, the description of nature in mountain and flood and forest. His "Summer in the Wilderness" met with large and well-deserved success, and his pictures of scenery in the Alleghany Mountains, can not fail to delight the appreciative reader. These letters having first appeared in the National Intelligencer, the volume is appropriately dedicated to Joseph Gale, Esq.

Messrs. Nash & Woodhouse have it for sale.

WHEELER'S SOUTHERN MONTHLY MAGAZINE. C. L. Wheeler, Editor and Proprietor, Athens, Georgia.

Through inadvertence we failed to greet the first number of this pleasing little monthly, which made its appearance in July last. We have now to make our acknowledgments to the Editor for two subsequent numbers, and to welcome him cordially to the Literary Press of the South. He is supported in his undertaking by a corps of able contributors, and we shall look to him for substantial assistance in the good work of fostering a taste for letters in the Southern States.

THE HISTORY OF PENNENSIS. His Fortunes and Misfortunes, His Friends and his greatest Enemy. By W. M. Thackeray. Author of "Vanity Fair," &c. New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers.

We have on our table the first two numbers of this new novel of Thackeray, in a beautiful reprint of the Harpers, which presents a close resemblance to the original London edition. Some of the wood-cuts are capital. They are designed, if we are not mistaken, by the author himself, and give therefore a much better idea of the persons and scenes that he depicts in the letter-press, than could be afforded by the work of another person.

Thackeray has an established position in English literature. Vanity Fair gave it to him. The knowledge of the world exhibited in that biting satire upon fashionable life set him apart distinctively from the rest of his cotempo-aries. No one else seizes bold of a foible so readily or presents it in such a ridiculous light. Becky Sharp, in whom were united almost all those bad qualities over which the varnish of wealth throws a deceitful gloss, was therefore recognized at once as a type of character, somewhat overdrawn, perhaps, but strongly marked for remembrance and illustration as Dugald Dalgetty or Miss Miggs. We do not see far enough into Pendennis as yet to enable us to determine whether it will come up to Vanity Fair. We conjecture simply that it does not aim so high. Yet we predict that it will be pleasanter reading. It seems so far to be a book of purely domestic life in town and country, with some finely drawn characters and a slight infusion of goodness which Vanity Fair wanted.

The book is for sale by A. Morris.

GOTHIC ARCHITECTURE, Applied to Modern Residences, &c., &c. By D. H. Arnot, Architect. New York: 1849. Nos. 5. and 6. D. Appleton & Co.

The growing taste for ornamental country-houses throughout the United States, is gratifying to the lover of the graceful and beautiful. We are pleased to see it manifested very decidedly in Virginia in the erection of handsome cottages, and occasionally, more aspiring residences in a castellated style. The tasteful structures that adorn the banks of the Hudson and skirt the suburbs of Boston, strike the eye of the stranger with peculiar pleasure, and it will not be long we trust before the fine sites that one observes around our own city are occupied by similar edifices. One by one, the old family-seats in lower Virginia, erected in colonial days, with their queer dormer-windows and fantastic gables, are passing away. As long as they are capable of repair, we would cling to them, as ancestral relics of a by-gone age. But accidents of fire or flood, or the progress of decay will remove them now and then, and huge piles of red-brick or stucco take their places. We could wish the designs of Mr. Arnot were followed in all such instances, as we conceive the Gothic style to be admirably suited to our climate and our landscapes. Upon the savannahs of the far South, a more oriental style is preferable, such as is displayed in the vicinity of New Orleans and the chief ornament of which is the verandah. We have seen one or two fine specimens of the Gothic in Virginia of very striking effect. To all who feel an interest in the study of rural architecture, we commend this work, in connection with the excellent volumes of Mr. Downing. Mr. Arnot is an architect of distinction, and his work is very well printed by the Appletons. It may be obtained of Messrs. Nash & Woodhouse.

A SECOND VISIT to the United States of North America. By Sir Charles Lyell, F. R. S., &c., &c. New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers, 82 Cliff St. 1849.

One feels a gratifying assurance, in the perusal of this book, that he is reading the reflections of a gentleman, and not the recorded slanders of a vulgar cockney, who abuses America to ensure a sale of his volume. Sir Charles Lyell, it is clear, belongs rather to the class of the Murrays and Morpeths, than to that of the Halls and Dickenses. A man distinguished for scientific attainment and travelling chiefly for geological observation, his attention has not been confined by any means to what lies beneath the earth's surface, but he has carefully marked out and studied the strata of our social economy and acquainted himself with our formations, political and intellectual. His impressions are set forth in an easy and simple style of correct and flowing English. We are not surprised to learn that this work of Sir Charles Lyell has met with little favor at home, since he in no degree sympathises with the anti-slavery fanaticism which manifests itself annually at Exeter Hall in unmeasured denunciation of the Southern States of our Union. On the contrary, while it is evident that he considers slavery an evil in the abstract, he bears willing testimony to the happy condition of the slaves,—testimony, which will be most unacceptable to the Frederick-Douglass philanthropists of England. Sir Charles Lyell has also incorporated in his volumes a great deal of useful miscellaneous knowledge with regard to America, which it would be well for Americans themselves to learn.

The work has reached us through A. Morris.

THE LIBERTY OF ROME: A HISTORY. With an Historical Account of the Liberty of Ancient Nations. By Samuel Eliot. In Two Volumes. New York: George P. Putnam, 155 Broadway. 1849.

These sumptuous octavos comprise a work of a high order of merit. The author seems to have been eminently fitted for the task he took upon himself, that of a philosophical inquiry into the genius of Roman Liberty, and he has executed it in the most satisfactory manner. Thoroughly in love with his subject and imbued with the spirit of the classics he has made an elegant contribution to literature, and rendered a real service to the cause of freedom. Mr. Putnam has done well to reprint the work and the handsome appearance of the volumes is creditable to his taste and enterprise.

For sale by Messrs. Nash & Woodhouse.

THE HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. From the Discovery of the Continent to the Organization of Government under the Federal Constitution. By RICHARD HILDRETH. In Three Volumes. Vols. 1 & 2 New York: Harper & Brothers, Publishers, 82 Cliff St. 1849.

We are disposed to award high praise to Mr. Hildreth for the faithful execution of this history. His style is remarkable for perspicuity and vigor, and he possesses very considerable powers of generalization. The work has one rare merit, that of being unencumbered by wearisome reflections on the part of the author, who is content to tell a simple story and leave to his readers the task of deducing the moral. From the two volumes before us we do not hesitate to say that we consider the work reliable authority, on all matters of American history. It wants that picturesqueness of detail which lends an irresistible charm to the volumes of Macaulay, and is not likely, we think, to become a favorite with the million. It will always be regarded, however, as an excellent historical treatise and as such we cheerfully commend it to the public.

It is for sale by A. Morris.

BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE and the Foreign Reviews. New York. Leonard Scott & Co. 79 Fulton Street. Richmond. Nash & Woodhouse, 139 Main Street.

The DIES BORRABLES of Christopher North impart a new interest to Old Ebony, and make graceful amends for the heretical and absurd political doctrines of which it has long been the apostle. A recent number contains a clever dialogue of a critical character, in which Gray's Elegy is torn into shreds,—no bad imitation of a style of review-writing much in vogue.

The Reviews for the summer quarter possess unusual interest. There is an eloquent article in the Edinburgh, from the pen of Lord Dover, on Macaulay's History, wherein Mr. Croker is made to appear in very diminutive proportions, and full justice is awarded to the excellences of the great historian. The North British, among other things, discusses Lieut. Lynch's Narrative of the Expedition to the Dead Sea, in rather a depreciating spirit. It contains an article of interest on the "Railway System of Great Britain."

THE MAGIC OF KINDNESS. Such is the attractive title of a very pleasing volume published by Harper and Brothers. It is written by the brothers Mayhew; and is a handsome and ingenious allegorical—yet essentially true exposition of the beauty, wisdom and truth of genuine philanthropy.

HISTORY OF THE CONSTITUENT ASSEMBLY. The same house have issued this very useful and interesting work consisting of reliable portraits of prominent members of the French Assembly since the last revolution and accounts of the proceedings.

CHILD'S HISTORY OF ROME;—a very pleasing and judicious compend from the excellent pen of Miss Sewall, whose "Gertrude" and other domestic tales proves her fitness to instruct as well as entertain the young. Published by D. Appleton & Co.

A LIST OF ERRATA.

Elia, in one of his Essays, speaks of a poor relation as the greatest annoyance of life, and employs a formidable catalogue of similes in his description of the class, which we consider peculiarly applicable to another sort of petites miseres—typographical errors. "A Poor Relation," says he, among other things, is "a blot on your 'scutcheon—a rent in your garment—a death's head at your banquet—Agathocles' pot—a Mordecai at your gate, a Lazarus at your door—a lion in your path—a frog in your chamber—a fly in your ointment—a mote in your eye—a triumph to your enemy, an apology to your friends—the one thing not needful—the hail in harvest—the ounce of sour in a pound of sweet."

All this to the sensitive author or editor is the typographical error.

It invadeth his repose, it destroyeth his peace of mind, it causeth him not unfrequently to utter maledictions upon innocent persons, it oppresseth him with a sense of an irreversible fate, from which there is no escape and for which no remedy can be supplied. The author, perhaps, has written an ingenious treatise upon the Homeric poems and looks with interest for its appearance in print. He opens the magazine containing it, and finds it so full of blunders that it is indeed "all Greek" to him. Thereupon he swears at the printer and writes down the editor an ass. The Editor, beholding with dismay the sad work of his compositors, must submit to the worst imputations upon his scholarship, or seek to repair "the wreck of matter" by inserting that most awkward of all possible emendations, a list of errata.

It is well indeed if the blunders make simple nonsense of the original. A page thrown into pi, or types out of place, might be taken as something bizarre or whimsical, like the typographical vagaries of Tristram Shandy—but it often happens that the meaning of a passage is altogether changed, by the substituted letters going to make another and very ludicrous version. During the Mexican War the papers at one time gravely informed us that "Gen. Pillow and seven of his men had been lost in a bottle," and we all recollect the complaint of Miss Biddy Fudge of the blunders of the County Gazette—

But 'tis dreadful to think what provoking mistakes
The vile country Press in one's prosody makes.
For you know, dear,—I may, without vanity hint—
Though an angel should write, still 'tis devils must print;
And you can't think what havoc these demons sometimes Choose to make of one's sense, and what's worse, of one's rhymes.

But a week or two since, in my Ode upon Spring,
Which I meant to have made a most beautiful thing,
Where I talked of the "dewdrops from freshly-blown roses,"
The nasty things made it "from freshly-blown noses!"

The Messenger is usually as free from typographical errors as a Magazine can be, and when we consider the 'awful' MSS. from which it is sometimes printed, we have reason to congratulate ourselves on its accuracy. But in our present number, we find several blunders of such a provoking character, that we are constrained to point them out, and say something in explanation of their occurrence.

We shall mention only the prominent mistakes, leaving all minor blunders to the correction of the intelligent reader.

In the article on Moore's Anacreon, p. 564, four notes are marked in the text but not given. They were omitted in the MS. by an oversight of the author. The notes were most probably the Greek words employed in the Iliad.

In Mr. Tuckerman's article—Manzoni—p. 567, "Cherbylle" should be Cheeryble, p. 588 "Albermarlet" should be Albemarle Street, p. 588, 2nd column "Anderson's" should be Andersen's, p. 590 "darkness" should be darkest, p. 591 the name of the Swedish novelist is again misprinted, and Ware is transformed into a vase.

In "A Bachelor's Reverie," p. 604, for "Ebsesoir" read Elzevir and a few lines lower down, same column, for est, ave, read est, ave,—p. 607 for "martial" read Martial, and p. 609 for "the sick nurse" read "the sick sense." The errors in this article, with the exception of the last, occur, however, in but a small portion of our edition.

Our list of errata is finished. We deem it due to our readers, our contributors and ourselves to say how they came to be made. A short time during August and the early part of September the editor was absent from home, and the revision of sheets devolved on the proof-reader of the printing-office. Now it happens to be a maxim with the craft "to follow copy even should it go out of the window," and we have found on recurring to the MSS. that in every case the printer has strictly adhered to the characters as set down.

Our friend Mr. Tuckerman makes a legible and graceful orthography, yet he sometimes abbreviates and writes two words together to the perplexity of the compositor. Thus occurred the most awkward error in his article: "Albermarle St." written together having very much the appearance of "Albermarlet."

We have been not a little annoyed at these apparently trivial matters, inasmuch as they subject us to unjust meddling at the hands of the critical reader. Not to know the home of John Murray, or the chorus of the Greek tragedy, or the name of the most famous of printers, or that Martial meant a man, would argue in us a melancholy want of fitness for our position as editor of the Messenger. We cry in this instance peccaminus and beg our correspondents in future to be careful in the preparation of their MSS. for the press.

superficial reading, to transitory speculations, to sickly and ephemeral sentimentalities, and false and extravagant sketches of life and character.

I wish it every success; and my only fear is, that it may not meet as full success with the public as it deserves. I shall be glad to be a subscriber. I am, very truly and respectfully, yours,
Cambridge, April 24, 1844.

JOSEPH STORY.

DEAR SIR,—I approve very much of the plan of your work, to be published weekly, under the title of the "Living Age;" and if it be conducted with the intelligence, spirit and taste that the prospectus indicates, (of which I have no reason to doubt,) it will be one of the most instructive and popular periodicals of the day.

I wish it abundant success, and that my name be added to the list of subscribers. Yours, very respectfully,

JAMES KENT.

New York, 7th May, 1844.

It seems to me that a selection from the highest foreign journals, if conducted with discrimination and taste, might have a very favorable influence on our reading community, deluged as it is, with periodical and other publications, which have little to recommend them but their cheapness. I have looked occasionally into the Magazine formerly conducted by Mr. Littell, and I have little doubt, from the capacity he showed in that selection, that he would compile a magazine, from the sources indicated in his prospectus, that would furnish a healthy and most agreeable banquet to the reader.

Believe me, Dear Sir, your obedient servant,

Boston, May, 1844.

WM. H. PRESCOTT.

From the specimens that the public has seen, it cannot be doubted that Mr. Littell is able to make, from the mass of contemporary literature, instructive and interesting selections. I wish you success, with all my heart.

Yours, very truly,

GEORGE BANCROFT.

DEAR SIR,—I have never seen any similar publication of equal merit; and I heartily wish for it that wide success it deserves, as a most agreeable and useful selection from that vast mass of the current periodical literature of our time, which has grown to such importance that none are beyond the reach of its influence, and few can safely be ignorant of what it is constantly sending forth to the world. Be pleased, therefore, to consider me a regular subscriber to the Living Age from the beginning.

Very truly yours,

Boston, 5th August, 1844.

GEO. TICKNOR.

MY DEAR SIR,—I have much pleasure in congratulating you upon the success of the Living Age, which has been well deserved by the great cleverness shown in its management. It has been a welcome visitor to my family, always giving us a variety of instructive and pleasant reading. Indeed, the only fault I have to find with it, is that it gives too much weekly—a fault which those of more leisure than myself, will not be likely to find.

Yours, very truly,

Philadelphia, October 29th, 1844.

GEO. W. BETHUNE.

WASHINGTON, 27th DECEMBER, 1845.

Of all the Periodical Journals devoted to literature and science which abound in Europe and in this country, this has appeared to me to be the most useful. It contains indeed the exposition only of the current literature of the English language, but this by its immense extent and comprehension includes a portraiture of the human mind in the utmost expansion of the present age.

J. Q. ADAMS.

To insure regularity in mailing the work, all orders should be addressed to

E. LITTELL & CO., Boston.

A. MORRIS,

SUCCESSOR TO

DRINKER & MORRIS,

Publisher, Bookseller, Stationer and Dealer in Piano Fortes.

Is constantly supplied with the most important publications in every department of Literature. All New Publications received as soon as published. Foreign Books imported to order.

He Publishes the following Books:

Tate's Digest of the Laws of Virginia, 1 vol., 8vo.

Tate's Analytical Digested Index of the Virginia Reports, 2 vols., 8vo.

Tate's American Form Book, 1 vol., 12mo.

Joynes on the Statute of Limitations, 1 vol., 8vo.

Howison's History of Virginia, 2 vols., 8vo., bringing down the History of the State to the recession of Alexandria, 1847.

PIANO FORTES.

He is the agent for the sale of the unrivalled Piano Fortes, manufactured by H. Worcester, of New York, and solicits an examination from purchasers.

He is also the agent for the sale of the Magnificent Grand Pianos and Pianinos, manufactured by the celebrated Pianist, Henri Herz, Paris.

THE KNICKERBOCKER MAGAZINE.

EDITED BY LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK.

This is pronounced, by the press of America and England, "the best Magazine in America." It has now begun its thirty-fourth volume, and in its list of upward of a hundred contributors, are found the names of every distinguished writer, male and female, in America, with several equally prominent of Great Britain, Turkey, Sweden, etc. A new volume, containing a superb engraving, a portrait of the editor, engraved by Cheney, from a painting by Elliott, was commenced on the first day of July, 1849. The following notices of the Knickerbocker are from the American and English press, to which might be added hundreds of others.

"The last Knickerbocker is exceedingly good. Some of the articles are worthy of Blackwood's palmiest days. The Editor's Table is in Mr. Clark's happiest vein; varied and racy in a remarkable degree."—New York Commercial Advertiser.

"The Knickerbocker seems to increase in attraction as it advances in age. It exhibits a monthly variety of contributions unsurpassed in number or ability."—National Intelligencer.

"The Knickerbocker is one of the most valuable Magazines of the day, and outstrips all competition in the higher walks of literature."—Albany Argus.

"The Knickerbocker Magazine is now beyond a question the magazine of the country. Whoever wishes his money's worth, and something over, let him subscribe now to 'Old Knick,' and our word for it, the Editor's Table alone will amply satisfy his expectations. It is not a periodical to be lightly glanced over and thrown by, but it forms a library book to save and re-read. A set of the Knickerbocker, bound up in volumes, on the shelves of one of our popular libraries, is more consulted (so the librarian has often told us) than any other similar work."—Boston Daily Transcript.

The London Examiner.—"This very clever Magazine is the pleasantest periodical in the United States. Its articles, which are numerous and short, various and interesting, are well worthy of imitation by our Magazines on this side of the Atlantic."

London Morning Chronicle.—"Judging from the numbers before us, we are inclined to consider this the best of all the American literary periodicals. Its contents are highly interesting, instructive and amusing."

REDUCTION IN PRICE TO CLUBS.

The publisher has determined to do every thing in his power to bring the Knickerbocker within the means of all, and invites the attention of those who feel an interest in circulating the best American literature, to the following terms to clubs, viz:

| | |
|--|---------|
| For five copies sent to one address, the price will be | $20 00 |
| " ten " " " " " | 35 00 |
| " twenty " " " " " | 60 00 |

Post Masters throughout the United States are invited and requested to act as agents. To all those who may interest themselves in getting up clubs, we will send a copy free so long as they keep up, and remit regularly the yearly payment.

To the Subscribers and all interested in our Work.

The publisher desires to avail himself of this opportunity to thank those who have manifested their unabated interest in the Knickerbocker, by sending subscribers. Quite a number have done so, and no doubt with a very slight effort on the part of some friends, our list might be doubled. As a further inducement for this effort on the part of our patrons, we wish to say, that no pains or expense will be spared to enhance the value of the work, and our pages will prove that our readers will receive at least as large a share of benefit from our increased means as we could expect ourselves.

AGENTS WANTED FOR THE KNICKERBOCKER MAGAZINE.

Enterprising, active agents are wanted in every town and city in the United States, to procure subscribers for the Knickerbocker. To competent, active persons, with satisfactory references, the most liberal terms will be allowed. Apply, post paid, to SAMUEL HUESTON, 139 Nassau-street,

GREAT INDUCEMENT TO SUBSCRIBE FOR THE KNICKERBOCKER.

FOUR YEARS FOR TEN DOLLARS.

The undersigned will give the Volumes of the Knickerbocker for the years 1847, '48, '49, and '50, to all persons who will remit to him ten dollars, in funds current in this city, post paid.

Back Volumes or Numbers supplied, and a complete set for sale.

Specimen Numbers sent free of charge on application, post paid.

TERMS—$5 per annum in advance. All remittances must be made to

SAMUEL HUESTON, Publisher,
139 Nassau-street, New-York.

IMPORTANT STATISTICS.

The Bankers' Magazine and Statistical Register.

VOLUME IV. COMMENCING JULY, 1849.

AN ENLARGED SERIES. II

This work is now published in monthly numbers, 48 pp. each, at five dollars, per annum.

JULY, 1849.—CONTENTS.

Account of the Mont. De Piète.
 Account of the English Mint.
 Opinions on Currency and the Revenue, by a Baltimore Banker.
 Bank Statistics of Ohio and Connecticut.
 New Banking Law of New York.
 Account of the London and Westminster Bank.
 [With an Engraving.]
 Legal Miscellany: Important Cases in the Courts of Maine, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Alabama, Maryland, Louisiana, Tennessee, Missouri.
 Recent Cases in Life Insurance.
 On the Gold Mines of Siberia.
 English Banking Law.
 Bank Items—New Appointments.
 Stocks and Exchange, at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore and New Orleans.
 Notes on the Money Market for May.

AUGUST, 1849.—CONTENTS.

Bank Robberies—Robbery of the City Bank.
 On the Origin of Notaries Public.
 Important Law Cases in Maryland Relating to Banks.
 On Usury.
 Annual Report of the Bank of British North America.
 Review of the English National Debt.
 On the Wealth of Nations.
 Life Insurance Premiums and Policies.
 On Capital—Its Origin, Growth, Application and Uses.
 New Banking Laws of the State of New York.
 A Sketch of the Banks of Albany.
 Circulation and Coin in Great Britain.
 Bank Statistics of Kentucky.
 Bank Items—New Appointments—Notes on the Money Market.
 Stocks and Exchanges, at New York, Boston, Philadelphia and Baltimore.

SEPTEMBER, 1849.—CONTENTS.

On the state of Banking in Ireland.
 On the Intellectual Occupations of Business Men.
 On Banking in South America.
 On the Distribution of Riches among Mankind.
 On Good Banking—Security.
 On the Banking Policy of Massachusetts; The Suffolk Bank, &c.
 List of Banks and Bankers in London, 1849.

List of Bankers on the Continent of Europe in 1849.
 Chancellor Johnson's Opinion on the Transfer of Bank Stocks by Executors.
 Banking Statistics of Kentucky, Missouri and South Carolina.
 Important Law Cases respecting Banks, Bankers, Bills of Exchange, Notes, Usury, Stocks, &c., in the several States.

Especial attention will be given in the present volume to late and important decisions in the States of Virginia, New York, Maryland, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Louisiana, Georgia, &c., upon topics of moment to bankers and to chartered companies. The volume will also comprise:—Biography of distinguished Bankers in Europe and America. Accounts of Foreign Banks and Banking Systems. Historical Sketches of the prominent Banks of the large Cities. Statistics of the Banks of each State.

Orders for the work to be addressed to the Editor and Publisher.

J. SMITH HOMANS, Baltimore, Md.

On hand a few copies of the third volume, complete, from July 1848 to June 1849, price three dollars, (or three dollars and fifty cents per mail free to any part of the United States.) This volume comprises the following articles, not to be found in any other periodical in the U. States, viz.
 Humboldt's last Essay on the Production and Consumption of the Precious Metals. Translated for the B. M.

Tables showing the Bank Capital and No. of Banks in each town or city in the U. States.

Table showing the present Bank Capital, population, and ratio of increase, in each State of the Union.

Historical Sketches of the Merchant's Bank of New York, and of the Manhattan Bank: the Bank of Scotland, &c.

List of all the Banks in England, Scotland and Ireland, with the circulation of each.

Sketch of the new "British Bank" of London.

Statistics of the Coinage in England, France, North and South America.

Opinions of Joshua Bates, Adam Hodgson, Horsley Palmer, Messrs. Turner, Morris, Peas-Gurney and Tooke, upon the late Commercial crisis and the Bank of England.

SCHOOL BOOKS FOR THE MILLION.

ECLECTIC EDUCATIONAL SERIES.

The best and cheapest school books ever published. More than 5,000,000 have been sold.

READING AND SPELLING.—McGuffey's Eclectic Primer, for little children; McGuffey's Eclectic Spelling Book, for primary and common schools; McGuffey's Eclectic First Reader: lessons in reading and spelling for the younger pupils; McGuffey's Eclectic Second Reader: lessons in reading and spelling for young pupils; McGuffey's Eclectic Third Reader, for the middle classes: chaste and instructive lessons in prose and poetry; McGuffey's Eclectic Fourth Reader, for the more advanced classes: extracts in prose and poetry from the best authors; McGuffey's Rhetorical Guide, or Fifth Reader, a rhetorical reading book for the highest classes; The Hemans Reader, for Female Seminaries—Elegant extracts in poetry and prose—compiled by Prof. Pinneo.

ARITHMETIC.—Compiled for the Eclectic Series by Dr. Joseph Ray, Professor of Mathematics in Woodward College. Ray's Arithmetic, Part 1st: simple lessons for the little learner; Ray's Arithmetic, Part 2d: a complete text book in mental arithmetic; Ray's Arithmetic, Part 3d, for schools and academies: a full and complete treatise, on the inductive and analytic methods of instruction; Ray's Key to Third Arithmetic.

ALGEBRA.—Ray's Algebra, Part 1st, for common schools and academies: a simple, progressive, and thorough elementary treatise.

Each Part of the Arithmetical course, as well as of the Algebraic, is a complete book in itself, and is sold separately.

Booksellers, Teachers and others can get their supply of these Books on the best terms of

J. W. RANDOLPH & CO.

121 Main Street, Richmond, Agents for the State of Virginia.

PRINTING ESTABLISHMENT,

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.

LAW BUILDING, NOS. 14 & 15. UP STAIRS.

MACFARLANE & FERGUSSON,

Respectfully announce to their friends and the public generally, that they have recently added largely to their present stock of Printing Materials, and propose to execute every description of Letter Press Printing—such as

BOOKS,

PAMPHLETS,

CATALOGUES,

BANK CHECKS,

BILLS OF EXCHANGE,

NOTE BOOKS,

CIRCULARS,

RECEIPTS,

HANDBILLS,

COMMERCIAL AND OTHER

BLANKS,

BLANK AND OTHER CERTI-

FICATES,

NOTIFICATIONS,

HORSE BILLS,

SHOP BILLS,

FUNERAL TICKETS,

CARDS, LABELS, &c.

THOSE WISHING PRINTING DONE, WILL FIND IT TO THEIR INTEREST TO CALL AT THE OFFICE OF

THE SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

M. & F. will personally attend to their own business, with able assistants, and will endeavor to do all work they may be favored with, in such manner as to give satisfaction.

Orders from a distance promptly attended to.

1849 Jan 8

P352.1

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

JNO. R. THOMPSON, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

VOL. XV., No. 11.

NOVEMBER, 1849.

Whole Number, CLXXIX.

ORIGINAL PROSE ARTICLES.

| | PAGE. |
|--|-------|
| 1. Original Novel. The Chevalier Merlin. Chapters Thirteenth, Fourteenth and Fifteenth..... | 641 |
| 2. Steele. By H. T. Tuckerman. Characteristics of Steele as developed in a love-letter to him. Biographical Sketch—his dissolute habits and social advantages. Mission of Steele as a man of letters; causes which led to the establishment of the Spectator—its influence upon society,—the true office of satire considered, &c., &c..... | 651 |
| 3. The Early English Dramatists. John Ford. A Review..... | 656 |
| 4. Advertisement Extraordinary. Stanzas on the proposed Sale of the Natural Bridge. By S..... | 664 |
| 5. The Seldens of Sherwood. Chapters X., XI. and XII..... | 666 |
| 6. The Late Chapman Johnson, Esq. Coincidence in the death, within a short time of each other, of two of Virginia's noblest sons,—Chapman Johnson and Benjamin Watkins Leigh. Early Life of Mr. Johnson, his settlement in Staunton as an Attorney at Law—his Senatorial career and appearance in the Convention of 1829. Character as a statesman and as a jurist: Tribute to his social and domestic virtues: Universal grief occasioned by his death..... | 674 |
| 7. Gleanings. By C. C..... | 678 |
| 8. Recollections of Weimar, the Native Place of Goethe. From the Unpublished Journal of Theresé. Translated by Marie. Goethe's secluded life at Weimar; his habits and personal appearance—the poet's humble dwelling: Julia Eyloffstein, the protégée of Goethe: Tableaux Vivans of the Faust; the demon and Margaret; incident that occurred during the representation, &c., &c. 684 | 684 |
| 9. From our Paris Correspondent. State of parties in the French capital in September: Reflections | |

ORIGINAL PROSE ARTICLES—(CONTINUED.)

| | PAGE. |
|---|-------|
| thereupon.—Relaxation of the Quarantine Laws; Report of M. Prus to the Royal Academy of Medicine—The Cholera, its last distinguished victim, Jules André Guèret ,—Death of Mme Mirbel —Rumored marriage of Louis Napoleon—M. Foy, the marriage-broker, Law Suit of Foy vs. Lebreton—Religious imposture—Suicide at the Place Vendôme—Debts of Louis Philippe; Theatres, &c..... | 686 |
| 10. The Late Edgar A. Poe. An estimate of his Literary character. By the Editor..... | 694 |
| 11. MS. Letter of Wm. Wirt..... | 698 |

ORIGINAL POETRY.

| | |
|--|-----|
| 12. The Monk's Vision. By Matilda F. Dana..... | 650 |
| 13. Song..... | 656 |
| 14. National Lyrics. By James W. Simmons. Battle of Fort Moultrie..... | 673 |
| 15. Lilienhorn. A Dramatic Poem. By J. E. Leigh..... | 681 |
| 16. The Open Window. By Henry W. Longfellow..... | 686 |
| 17. Thanatos. By Sidney Dyer..... | 693 |
| 18. The Ideals. Translated from the German of Schiller..... | 697 |

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS:—

The History of Pendennis—History of the French Revolution of 1848—History of the American Bible Society—Outlines of Astronomy—The Man of Letters, an Address by J. L. Reynolds—New Edition of Shakspeare's Dramatic Works—The Metropolis—Dr. McGuffey's New Eclectic Series—Bulwer and Forbes on the Water Treatment—The Cassique of Accabee—Principles of The Mechanics of Machinery and Engineering, &c.....699—704

LOCAL AGENTS.

KEITH & WOODS, St. Louis, Mo.
 J. C. MORGAN, New Orleans,
 GEORGE P. PUTNAM, London,
 E. P. NASH, Petersburg, Va.
 W. R. SCRIVEN, Petersburg, N. Y.

MACFARLANE & FERGUSSON, Richmond, Va.
 DEWITT & DAVENPORT, New York.
 JOSEPH ROBINSON, Baltimore, Md.
 C. C. CLEAVES, Memphis, Tenn.
 JOHN P. WRIGHT, Lynchburg, Virginia.

THIS WORK IS PUBLISHED IN MONTHLY NUMBERS AVERAGING SIXTY-FOUR PAGES EACH, AT FIVE DOLLARS, PER ANNUM, INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

RICHMOND, VA.
 MACFARLANE & FERGUSSON.
 1849.

GENERAL COLLECTORS FOR THE LITERARY MESSENGER.

Wm. Gouldin, General Agent and Collector for Virginia.

Thomas L. Jones is our General Collector for the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee and Louisiana.

Israel E. James, is our General Travelling Agent, for the following States, District of Columbia, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana and Arkansas—assisted by James K. Whipple, Wm. H. Weld, O. H. P. Stem, John B. Weld, T. S. Waterman, John Collins, James Deering, Albert K. Wellington, R. S. James, and E. A. Evans.

Henry M. Lewis, is our General Agent, for Alabama and Tennessee.

C. W. James, is our General Collector, for Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois and Missouri; Wisconsin and Iowa—assisted by James R. Smith, J. T. Deat, E. Y. Jennings, T. G. Smith, and Frederick J. Hawse. Mr. C. W. James also makes a Fall trip to the Eastern States, and the District of Columbia.

Eli M. Stevenson, General Collector for Kentucky, and specially authorised to solicit new subscriptions.

Wm. Wertenbaker of the University of Virginia is our authorised agent for the county of Albemarle, Va.

Addison A. Bell, of Alabama, is authorised to procure New Subscribers.

J. F. Staunton is authorised to procure New Subscribers for the Messenger, generally.

R. Morris & Co., Jackson, Mississippi, are authorised to Collect and procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

J. W. B. Garrett, is authorised to procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

Baalis Davis is duly authorised to Collect Money and procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

W. Ramsay, Frankfort, Kentucky, is authorised to procure new subscribers for the Messenger.

B. F. Somerville, Locust Dale, Virginia, is authorised to procure New Subscribers.

B. M. Dewitt, is authorised to procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

JUST PUBLISHED BY RUDOLPH GARRIGUE,

FOREIGN BOOKSELLER AND PUBLISHER, NO. 2 BARCLAY STREET, NEW YORK,

ICONOGRAPHIC ENCYCLOPÆDIA

OF SCIENCE, LITERATURE, AND ART;

Systematically arranged by G. HECK, with 500 Steel Engravings, by the most distinguished Artists of Germany. The text

TRANSLATED AND EDITED BY SPENCER F. BAIRD, A.M., M.D.,

Professor of Natural Sciences in Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa.

Part I., containing Plates No. 1 to 20, and text pages 1 to 80, to be published in Twenty-Five monthly parts at One Dollar per part.

Subscriptions for the whole work taken by all booksellers in the United States.

RUDOLPH GARRIGUE, 2 Barclay Street, N. Y., Publisher.

I have examined with pleasure the first number of Prof. Baird's translation of the text to the Iconographic Encyclopædia of Brockhaus, now publishing by R. Garrigue, of New York, and am happy to be able to bear testimony, both to the merits of the original, as a valuable and convenient book of reference, and to the fidelity of the translation. Few works comprise so great an amount of important information in so small a compass as the plates and text of the Iconographic Encyclopædia, and few persons are so competent as Prof. Baird to execute a task requiring so multifarious knowledge, as the translation of a work of this character.

Every scholar will find the Icon. Encyclopædia a valuable addition to his library, and I have no doubt that the liberal enterprise of the German and American publishers in bringing out a work of so much beauty and utility at so moderate a price, will be rewarded by an extensive patronage.

(Signed)

GEORGE P. MARSH.

New York, September 21, 1849.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY AT FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM—JNO. E. THOMPSON, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

VOL. XV.

RICHMOND, NOVEMBER, 1849.

NO. 11.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1849, by John R. Thompson, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia.]

THE CHEVALIER MERLIN.

CHAPTER THIRTEENTH.

"The haughty monarch, in spite of a perilous combination of adverse circumstances, did not relinquish his schemes for changing the ancient boundaries of kingdoms."

Atterbury.

Some hours after he had reached the Swedish camp, Merlin, escorted by Count Piper, the favorite and minister of Charles, and the head of the Swedish house to which our friend Captain Gustavus Piper belonged, approached the tent of the king. Letters from the Senator Sture to Count Piper, brought by the Norwegian, had gained for him the immediate protection of this great man about the person of the monarch. The minister said, as he led the way to the presence of his master:

"The king has been engaged with your travelling companion—who indeed is still with his majesty. Your arrival is connected with circumstances of disappointment and ill-omen."

"How so, sir?" Merlin asked.

Count Piper, a dark-eyed and adroit looking civilian, lean, and slovenly in his apparel, answered with a show of surprise:

"You appear not to know that you came with Mazeppa, the General of the Ukraine. We have expected his arrival with an army, but he comes like a fugitive, with a handful of Cossacks at his back."

"I did not, indeed, know," Merlin replied, "that the chief was Mazeppa the Hetman. We met upon the plains, and joined company with the confidence of men not fearing each other, and without an uncourteous indulgence of curiosity."

With this the speakers reached the royal tent, the outskirts of which were without guards, or attendants of any sort; and were presently met by a gentleman whom Merlin heard Count Piper address familiarly as Grothusen. In the next moment, the Norwegian stood for the first time in the presence of the King of Sweden.

The appearance of Charles was not very imposing at the first view. His stature was moderate. He wore the coarse gray coat, the taffety band about his neck, and the rough jack boots, of which the Elector of Saxony had spoken in his account of the meeting at Altranstad. His head was thinly covered with sandy hair, which left the round and retreating forehead much exposed. His face was tufted with a straggling and starved beard, as dingy in its hue as the hair above. Of course there could be nothing very majestic in all this. But there was certainly in the countenance of the renowned monarch, much that proclaimed, or agreed with, his strong and unyielding character. His blue eyes were resolute and penetrating; his jaws were firmly set, and his nose, wide and free in its nostrils, curved into the Roman eagle-beak.

As Merlin entered the tent, the young monarch—he was now in his twenty-seventh year—stood leaning on the pommel of his sword, in a listening attitude. Mazeppa, who stood before him, had been speaking. The countenance of the white-bearded chief bore traces of sadness and embarrassment. Charles, who appeared wholly undisturbed by the disasters which the Hetman had doubtless recounted, fixed a keen glance upon the gigantic figure of the Norwegian.

"Who is this?" he said briefly, and without changing his position.

Count Piper replied:

"A Norwegian soldier, sire, who has travelled five hundred leagues to join us. He comes recommended to my favourable regard, and through me to your majesty's favour. The gentleman is named Merlin Brand."

Charles then received the Norwegian graciously, but with few words.

"You seem a capable soldier," he said, "and we will find you the opportunity of proving whether you are also a brave man."

"I am sure," said Mazeppa, advancing a step and speaking with kindly dignity, "that my comrade will prove such. Men learn to know each other quickly when they hunger and thirst together in the desert."

Merlin bowed his thanks to the Hetman; he presently gave to the King of Sweden the roll of the Countess of Konigsmark.

Charles opened it; an inner roll distinct from the envelope remained in his hand, whilst he read from the envelope itself.

"The Countess of Konigsmark," he at length said coldly, "informs me that you are a knight of the order of the White Eagle."

"Yes, sire," Merlin replied, "there was indeed a somewhat absurd imposition of such an honour upon me. But I have no wish to remember it whilst serving your majesty."

"You speak like a sensible man," said Charles. "But you are nevertheless a knight. Grothusen, enrol Sir Merlin Brand as a member of the household and provide for his accommodation."

"In what capacity, sire?"

"As the king's friend," said Charles, who then carelessly opened the inner roll from which the envelope had been removed. As this roll was opened, a girdle of beautiful workmanship glittering with jewels, some of them of noble size and all of rare lustre, appeared within it. A scroll attached to the girdle contained the words "The zone of Venus to Hyperion."

"What is this?" said the king.

Mazeppa stroked his beard and smiled. Grothusen and Count Piper drew nearer to examine the precious ornament.

"It is a woman's belt, sire," said the latter. "Madame has sent her belt to your majesty, whom she chooses to style Hyperion."

"Who was Hyperion?" said Charles.

Count Piper observed that his majesty's service had been for many years so exacting that he had quite lost the polite learning which at one time he possessed. Grothusen had not forgotten for the reason that he had never known. Mazeppa, continuing to smoothe his long beard, looked on with a degree of simple curiosity not a little striking in one of so venerable an appearance.

Merlin possessed too much tact to enlighten the king, and his high officers, by producing his learning to contrast with their ignorance. He contented himself with saying that if the Venus of Konigsmark had found a resemblance between his majesty and Hyperion, Hyperion must doubtless have been an illustrious and invincible personage in ancient history or poetry. This was received as a satisfactory explanation.

"What are the stones worth?" said the King of Sweden, passing the girdle to Count Piper.

"At least fifty thousand crowns," replied Count Piper, when he had examined the jewels.

"A sum to equip a battalion!" said Charles. "Put it into the treasure-chest, Grothusen."

Grothusen picked from the ground, where it had fallen, the inner envelope which had been immediately about the girdle, and replaced the girdle in it. As he did so he saw an address upon it, which had been until then overlooked. He read aloud—

"Exclusively for the hands, and for the private eyes of Sir Merlin Brand."

"So"—said the King of Sweden. "That makes a difference."

He read the address for himself, then added:

"Sir Merlin Brand, it seems that we have been mistaken, and that you are Hyperion."

Merlin, greatly annoyed and embarrassed, stood in the royal presence very much like a fool. The king condescended to smile. The girdle, instead of going into the treasure-chest, was placed in the hands of the true Hyperion, who said, as he received it:

"I will retain this valuable toy, sire, until I find the means of restoring it to the Countess of Konigsmark."

The king soon after dismissed his new recruit. Grothusen conducted him from the presence to a neighbouring tent. Merlin, reflecting upon his interview, found no great difference between Charles at Altranstad, as the Elector of Saxony had described him, and Charles as he had just seen him. In the one case a coat and a pair of boots had made the staple of his conversation, in the other a woman's girdle. How little of the martial hero, as brave, munificent, enterprising as Alexander his model,—the hero who in his early youth had passed at a stride to a glorious manhood, and become in those years of man's life when pleasure generally holds him captive, the admiration and terror of the world—how little of such a hero appeared in the plain and reserved young monarch! In the story of defeat which Mazeppa had come as a fugitive to tell, it might have been supposed that the baffled king would find a torch to ignite even his guarded nature into the fury of disappointment—into a majestic anger. Not a swollen vein, not a glance of the eye, had betrayed such excitement. But Merlin read the King of Sweden aright, notwithstanding that he bore away in his mind an unheroic image of the hero. He saw in the sober and somewhat repelling demeanour of the conqueror the reserve of a nature all sufficient to itself—a nature that demands no communion or counsel in its gravest measures—that underrates the value of foreign aid, and consequently does not view its loss as fatal, or even as greatly disastrous. "It must be with a very different demeanour," he meditated, "that the invincible King of Sweden dazzles the eyes of men, in moments of high action. He is something quite different when, exalted by the music of battle, he rides like a cadet over broken battalions, wet with the blood of his enemies. And his address is doubtless more royal when he decrees the submission, and dictates the laws of nations."

When, under the care of Grothusen, the quarters of the Norwegian had been selected, and he had taken possession of them, he became aware that the boy who had escaped from the Tartars, and who had ridden into the camp on the steed of the chief Osbeck, had determined to become his servant. This boy, without waiting to be bidden, went about the duties of a valet, informing his new master that he had already discharged those of a groom. The lad was a slender, active, little fellow of fifteen, sharp and clever, with the bronze of Egypt in his face, and large, eager black eyes. Merlin interested by his conduct in the scene with the Tartars, and by his appearance, asked him many questions. The reader shall learn his brief story in the answers which he gave to these questions.

"Where I was born I do not know," said the boy, in a clear but humble tone. "My mother was a Bohemian, and travelled with her people from country to country. When I had grown large enough to do a great deal of mischief I was praised for doing it well. The Saxons gave me a name because I could imitate the neigh of a horse; they called me Weigen. Afterwards the people of another village, in the neighborhood of which we lived for a year, called me Caputsch, because my mother made me wear a cowl which she had in some way procured from a monk. That continues to be my name. I am your servant Caputsch, master."

"Where is your Bohemian mother?" Merlin asked.

"She is dead, sir. They whipped her to death in Silesia."

"Poor child!" said the Norwegian.

Caputsch, as if rebellious against the pity of his master, replied quickly:

"But, sir, if they whipped my mother to death I was not too young to kill them for it. I brought down Groffer Hans, the burgomaster who ordered her to be whipped, with a stone from a sling, which made him die. I shot the hangman from behind a hedge, and then I burnt their town. The fire was kindled as often as they put it out. On the seventh night there was a glorious wind, and the town burnt like a hell in the valley."

"Caputsch," said Merlin, not very favourably impressed by the latter portion of the young fire-brand's narrative, "I have no need for your services."

The boy replied with a sudden change from the exalted tone, to which, in recounting his filial vengeance, he had risen:

"I can be thankful for kindness, master. When the Tartars would have returned and killed me, you came up and saved me. And you spoke kindly, and looked kindly, to me. Caputsch is not used to kindness. In the camp it is 'Caputsch, you son of a monk, furbish my firelock'—'Caputsch, you spawn of a gypsy, rub down my horse'—'Caputsch, you imp of the devil, put wood to the fire, and grill the bones.' So it runs, master, when they are in an excellent humor—these brave Swedes. When they are angered they beat me. It is better to serve one master than many. Take me into your service and I will do every thing to please you; and indeed you will find me useful, and ready to do as much for love, as the killing of my mother taught me to do for hate."

"How did you come among the Swedes?" said Merlin.

"After I had killed the men who whipped my mother to death, and burnt their town, I remained with our people for some time, and lived such a free life as the whistling plover lives. But I was getting old enough to think that there might be some better life in spite of its liberty. One day I heard the guns thundering in one of the battles, and went to a hill to see the famous sport. The drums, and the trumpets, and the roar of the guns, and the rushing of the horses, made me unable to remain on the hill. I gathered some round stones, and fitted one to my sling; and then I ran down, and began to fight as if I had as good a reason for fighting as the rest—which perhaps I had. I kept near the drummer of a regiment. At last he fell with his elbows on his drum, and nodded so naturally that I did not understand at once that he was dead. When I saw that he was truly dead, I took the sticks from his hands, and emptied the head of the drum of his blood that had filled it, and then I beat away as fast and as loud as I could. So I became a drummer. At first the men made a pet of me. But when I was no longer new to them, they found that as I was not much higher than my drum, and only reached to the elbow of one-eyed Gofried the fifer, I did not make a good figure as a drummer; and so they made a pot-boy of me. That is the whole story, master."

"How was it that you fell into the hands of the Tartars?" Merlin asked.

"I went to find the horse of the Ritter Dombinski—the horse had gone away to the plains. Do you know the terrible Ritter? He threatened to put me on the coals, and boil his kettle with me, if I did not bring his beast back. The Tartars came around me. I dodged them for some time, but the ground was too open, and they rode me down. Then you saved me from them."

"It was hardly so, Caputsch," said Merlin. "You owe your escape to your own courage, and presence of mind. We only prevented your re-capture."

He presently added:

"You took a wild and barbarous vengeance, not natural to one of tender years, upon the murderers of your mother. But you were doubtless trained a young savage, with the good of your nature hidden under the shadow of its bad, and the murder of a mother is such a provocation, to the wildest vengeance, as none of us might resist. I receive you into my service, Caputech, since you desire that I will do so. You can be as sure of my kindness as I can be of your fidelity."

So Merlin acquired, in this little elf Caputech, a servant destined to share many perils with him, and to stand him in good stead on critical occasions of his adventurous life.

CHAPTER FOURTEENTH.

"The philosopher Calanus laid a dry and shrivelled hide before Alexander, and first trode upon the edges of it; this he did all round; and as he trode on one side, it started up on the other. At last he fixed his feet on the middle, and then it lay still. By this emblem Calanus showed him that he should fix his residence, and plant his principal force in the heart of his empire, and not go away so far, carrying a wandering dominion, liable to be lost, to the distant extremities."—Plutarch.

It is not my purpose to narrate in detail the events, which, in the several succeeding months, rendered the situation of the King of Sweden perilous in the extreme. Day after day brought disaster after disaster. Within a week of the arrival of Mazeppa, presaged by rumors of the saddest character, came Lewenhaupt, the broken hope of Sweden. His gallant army had contended its way obstinately forward, through terrible obstacles of man and nature. With a force originally consisting of but fifteen thousand men, he had fought five pitched battles against an army of forty thousand, an army which the Czar, who in person opposed him, recruited from day to day as the courage of Sweden thinned its ranks. The army of fifteen thousand men had been reduced to four thousand, by the time that, stemming the currents of the Sossa, Lewenhaupt gained its southern bank and shook off his enemy. Of eight thousand wagons, loaded with supplies for his King, all were burnt, or in the hands of the Czar. Of his artillery he retained not a gun. In this condition, with nothing but honour left to him, the brave general joined his royal master.

Thus the King of Sweden found himself destitute of supplies, cut off from all communication with Poland, and surrounded by enemies, in the heart of a wild country beyond the borders of civilization. But the arrival of Lewenhaupt, like that of Mazeppa, produced no change in his demeanor.

The winter became, as it advanced, one of unprecedented severity. Charles removed his camp southward. In the march of one day two thousand men fell dead, of cold and hunger.

The horses died; cannon were left behind for want of means to drag them. But for Mazeppa the force of the King of Sweden would indeed have been annihilated. He collected a portion of his dispersed followers, and was enabled, by the love of the Cossacks for their Hetman, to feed his ally. The splendid host which had left the borders of Saxony covered with gold and silver, and numbering forty thousand soldiers emboldened by the uninterrupted victories of eight campaigns, had by the end of that terrible winter been reduced to eighteen thousand men, half-starved, and clad in the furs of wild animals. Toward the end of winter, hostilities, which the severity of the season had suspended, were renewed. One or two unimportant battles were fought; skirmishes were of frequent occurrence. In these unimportant battles, and skirmishes, the Chevalier Merlin bore his part well, and even succeeded, by good fortune, in distinguishing himself on several occasions. He had obtained a post in the army, and, rising by his gallantry, had become the major of the famous mounted regiment of Smaland. Early in the winter he had written a detailed account of his adventures at the Chateau d'Amour, to send to his mistress in Sweden, concealing nothing except the fact that the Countess of Konigsmark was the Circe to whose arts he had been a victim. He did not extenuate his fault in this confession, but with mournful candour admitted his miserable weakness, and the presumption of his former confident and proud self-reliance. He besought only that the Swedish maiden would not cast him hopelessly off, but await the result of his efforts to prove his penitence, and a purer worth, in the trials of that career upon which he had at last entered. This frank, manly and earnest letter, he had found opportunity to despatch, by a Polish courier whom Charles had sent to King Stanislaus, during the enforced armistice of mid-winter.

Under all the disasters of his situation the King of Sweden had lost neither the hope nor the design of penetrating to Moscow. But he needed artillery and supplies. The Czar had formed a magazine in Pultowa, a town on the river Voruka in the eastern extremity of the Ukraine, thirteen leagues from the Boristhenes. Charles determined to possess himself of the Czar's magazine; the possession of it would enable him to await in safety and abundance the arrival of succours, which he expected from Sweden, Livonia, Pomerania, and Poland. Therefore with his mixed force of eighteen thousand Swedes and Poles, and about twelve thousand Cossacks and Wallachians mustered by Mazeppa, he took position, about the middle of May, before Pultowa.

On a pleasant morning King Charles rode to view the defences of the beleaguered town, destined to blend its obscure name with his fortunes, darkly, to all times. At his side rode Velt Marschal Renschild. Merlin, and an officer of his own age and rank, followed at the distance of a few paces. As the Norwegian reined his horse, Galba, no longer the superb and dashing animal that he had been, but a bony, equine giant, scarred and toil-hardened, the young officer, his immediate companion, addressed him.

"This," he said "is his majesty's birth-day."

"So I understand," said Merlin.

"Heretofore the day has been differently celebrated," the Swede, with his bold gaze somewhat clouded, continued. "Two hundred heavy guns were fired on this day last year, not for parade, but loaded with balls, and into the enemy's ranks. His majesty is careful of ammunition, and prefers to win a battle with the lightning of his guns whilst their thunders are proclaiming his birth-day. Now the times are changed, chevalier; we have no enemy in a clear field, and our artillery is reduced to a few light pieces, whose shot fall with hardly more effect than hail-stones on the walls of this town."

"But we might storm better defences than these," Merlin replied, "and doubtless his majesty will so order it. Sir, you have been fortunate in witnessing those glorious actions which have filled the world with the fame of Sweden. I came so late as to lose many great opportunities, and will rejoice when the enterprise of his majesty places it in my power to take part in a general and conclusive action."

"You have lost the glory, chevalier," said the Swede, "but you have no cause to complain of the want of hardship and danger. Narva was a merry and safe sport, compared with any one day of our camp life in this country. Then, sir, our lives were glorious with battles, the news of which couriers, flying over Europe, carried to city and field, to draw forth the admiration of men, and the praise of ladies. Every day brought honour. The time is passed now, and I have but little hope ever to see those brave pleasures renewed."

"I trust for their renewal to the great king, to whom every thing is possible," Merlin rejoined.

"Every thing is not possible, my dear chevalier," said his companion. "And be sure of the fact that no man ever retained an extraordinary good fortune through his whole career, when his rashness invited it hourly to desert him. His majesty has never been wounded; now he is about to take us under the muskets of this town without a necessity. A bullet in the heart of the king would destroy the thousands of brave fellows who have followed him so far. We could make no head under the gloom of such a disaster as his majesty's death."

"And yet," said Merlin, "when the heroic Gustavus Adolphus fell at Lutzen, his soldiers did not permit themselves to be broken and dispersed. Duke Bernard of Saxe-Weimar led the regiments to victory even on that day over the body of their king. And for many years Oxensteirn the civilian, with the Swedish generals, maintained the honour of the north in the heart of Germany."

"Such results might have followed had his majesty fallen a year ago in Saxony," said the Swede. "His death then would doubtless not have been fatal to an army, unbroken, near available allies, and in fact within reach of the continental provinces of Sweden. But this becomes a dull discourse, chevalier. After all you and I are humble pieces with which his majesty plays his game, and are but to be moved, not to move of our own wills:—certainly it is not our business to think. A sweet lady, in her home on the banks of the Windala, in the Bothnia which we have left so far behind, looks for my return. If she loses her lever, why, my dear chevalier, his majesty is the responsible party—and that ends the matter."

As the Swede spoke, Charles arrested his party on a mound within point blank musket shot of the fortifications.

Renschild, a man of iron nerves, with ponderous brows, and a courageous sagacity in the expression of his half-visible eyes, drew rein at the king's side tranquilly, and as if unconscious of the least danger in their position. The king surveyed the defences.

"Bear to the right," said his majesty, getting again in motion. A bullet pierced the hat of the Velt Mareschal, and displaced it somewhat on his heavy brows. Renschild righted its position without a word. As the party turned on its course, the officer who had hitherto kept at Merlin's side, placed himself, without seeming to design doing so, between the king and the town. Charles detected in the movement the purpose to screen him, and, reaching to the Swede's bridle-hand, compelled him, smiling as he did so, to exchange positions. This was no sooner done, than the Swede, precisely in the spot which the king had left, received a shot through the head. He drooped to one side, tottered for an instant, then fell to the ground. All dismounted at once.

"Poor Lieven!" said Charles. "A strange Fortune rules in these things."

"His father fell at the siege of Thorn under similar circumstances," said Renschild. "This house of Lieven is doomed to furnish substitutes for your majesty, whenever Destiny is at a pinch under the aim of sharp-shooters."

Charles looked darkly toward the town. Merlin had raised the body, and, finding the head shattered and life extinct, replaced it upon the sod; but not until his arms and breast were covered with blood. He looked sadly upon the warm stains, and ventured presently to say to the king:

"Sire, be warned by the fate of this brave gentleman. Achilles himself was not wholly invulnerable."

"Are you afraid, sir?" said Charles.

"No, sire—or if afraid not so for myself, but for the most sacred life of all."

"Brother," replied the king, "the life of one gallant man is of as much worth as that of another. Those who have been baptized in blood with us are our equals." He added after a pause: "Lieven died well. He passed quickly. A man could not meet a better fate, when the hour of death comes, than to fall, shot through the head, fronting his enemy."

Charles died such a death, himself, years after, in the trenches before Frederickshal.

"A brave wise man will wish, sire," said Merlin, "to live long enough to break the strength of his enemy. The bells of Moscow would soon be ringing for joy, if your majesty died to-day. The Czar, whom your majesty has driven from so many fields, would be victorious and secure."

The king had remounted during this conversation. His manner was again cold and abstracted. Without seeming to hear Merlin's last words, he turned to continue his circuit of the fortifications, in spite of the continued discharge of musketry, and the admonition furnished in the death of the young soldier. He had not moved five paces when suddenly a shudder passed over his frame.

"Are you struck, sire?" said Renschild quickly.

"Yes: and, like Achilles, in the heel," Charles replied, directing, as he spoke, one of his harsh smiles to the Norwegian. If vulnerable, it was yet only as the son of Thetis was: evidently such an idea touched the vain chord in his nature.

This wound of which the king spoke tranquilly was a most serious one. A musket ball had shattered the bones of his heel.

He kept his saddle six hours after receiving the hurt. One of his domestics, at length, observing that blood issued from his boot, ran to call the surgeons. The pain had become so exquisite, and the flow of blood had been so great, that it was necessary to lift him from his horse into his tent. The surgeons examined the wound and declared amputation to be necessary. The consternation of the army became excessive. One of the boldest of the surgeons affirmed, however, that he could save the leg by making deep incisions. "Fall to work then presently," said the king to this man, whose name was Neuman—"cut boldly and fear nothing." Charles beheld, and sustained, the deep gashes, made by the surgeon, with a countenance expressive of as little concern as if nature had rendered him as proof against pain as against fear.

Even whilst under the knife, he ordered preparation to be made for assaulting Pultowa early the next day. This order had scarcely been given when news came that the Czar was advancing against him with an immense host. It then became necessary to alter his measures. The wounded monarch did so promptly. He sent after nightfall for Renschild, not to ask counsel of him, but to give him orders.

As this most distinguished of the Swedish generals came out of the royal tent, after the lapse of a few minutes, he encountered Count Piper.

"What is to be done?" said Count Piper.

"The king's pleasure," Renschild answered.

"What is that?"

"Ask of his majesty," Renschild replied, shrugging his shoulders, and passed on, to distribute the royal orders.

Count Piper entered the tent.

"Has Renschild told you nothing?" said Charles.

"Nothing sire," answered Count Piper.

"Well then I will tell you," replied the king.

"To-morrow we shall give battle."

"My God," exclaimed the poor minister, "your majesty will not persist in such a measure. The force of the Czar is three times our own, and supplied fully with artillery, of which we have none."

Charles returned no answer.

Count Piper, after the first unguarded moment, did not remonstrate. He well knew the impossibility of making his master yield up a purpose. He expressed his alarm only by a nervous silence. As he lingered in the tent, his mind in a state of tension from its silent terrors, he heard a sound, at first low and like a whisper, then swelling to a harsh murmur. It was the breathing of the king. His majesty had fallen asleep, as easily as though to-morrow's wild work was to be some such blithe sport as the hunting of the bear in his Swedish forests of Falun.

CHAPTER FIFTEENTH.

"Ah! Pultowa—Charles the Twelfth—Pultowa." Napoleon tracing routes on a military map, in the return from Moscow.—[Scott.]

Peter the Great, in the afternoon of the day on which the King of Sweden was wounded before Pultowa, crossed the Vorska, at a point down the stream about a league from the town. The Vorska runs from north-east to south-west. Pultowa stands on the southern bank of the Vorska. The Czar, coming from the north, crossed the river in safety, and immediately formed his camp on its bank. The Swedish army was posted south of Pultowa, bending an arm around on the east. Its baggage was placed in an intrenched position a mile in the rear, southward. The reader will bear these facts of position in mind, or he can have no clear idea of the battle which ensued.

The Day of Pultowa dawned with red skies. With the earliest dawn, the Czar who had laboured late into the night in throwing up redoubts, and mounting his cannon, began to form in order of battle. By sunrise the Swedish army, of whose motions he had been apprised, appeared in his front.

King Charles, borne in a litter—for his recent wound prevented his mounting a horse—occupied his usual position in the van of his centre. The Swedish force consisted of about sixteen thousand Swedes and Poles, and five thousand of the lighter troops furnished by Mazzeppa. The remainder of the combined forces, Swedes, Poles, Cossacks, and Wallachians, remained behind to protect the camp and baggage against a sortie of the garrison of Pultowa. With such an army, and but four pieces of ordnance, Charles assumed the offensive against ninety thousand Russians, in a chosen position, guarded by seventy-two heavy guns. It was the remembrance of Narva that thus emboldened the Swedes to an onset against odds so fearful.

The Czar did not command his army. He had begun his military career, in his own armies, as a lieutenant, and although his promotion had been rapid enough, he was now but a major general second to a commander in chief, and obeyed Zeremetoff. But he appeared on the day of Pultowa as an emperor as well as a subordinate general. Mounted on an Arabian horse, the gift of the Sultan Achmet, he rode in front of his forces, haranguing them as he passed. The generals of Sweden did the same before their host, reminding the veterans of battles which had always been victories, and calling upon the brave hearts to maintain the renown, and assure the safety of their wounded king, who, five hundred leagues from his native land, surrounded by enemies, needed the utmost efforts of a devoted courage in the crisis of that day.

Mazzeppa only said to his Cossacks: "Children, I am too old to be broken on the wheel. You doubtless think so; but the Czar will not think so, if you run away and leave me in his hands. As for yourselves, life and freedom in your native land are more to be desired than the stake, the knout, the cross, the mines. Victory will assure to you the better lot, defeat the worse."

Martial music filled the air, as the harangues of the leaders ceased. A gallant fury possessed both hosts. Cavalry, impatient at the long-drawn blast of the trumpet, trembled through its masses. The courage of man, and the passion of the war horse, were strung, and fired.

Charles began the battle with a charge of cavalry against the right wing of the enemy. This right wing, commanded by the Russian general, Count Gallowin, was composed of infantry protected by a few hurriedly constructed redoubts lined with cannon, and of cavalry drawn up between the redoubts. The Swedish horse, four thousand strong, charged this right wing of the enemy. Artillery made gaps in their rushing ranks, but nothing could break or resist the fury of the onset. Over the wing of the enemy swept, like waves over the jutting rocks of a low headland, the irresistible cavalry, seeming to beat down, overwhelm and utterly crush all opposition. General Schlippenback, a grim old warrior, covered with seams from a hundred sabres in the battles of his past career, led this successful charge. Merlin Brand shared in the glory of it; but laurels are not to be reaped by the individual, when four thousand heroes are joined in the same heroic work. He was but one enthusiastic and fearless man, in a multitude whose hearts were as firm, whose swords and spears were as sharp, as his own.

The charge of Schlippenback, in breaking and beating down the right wing of the enemy, produced almost the sudden result which had been witnessed on many former occasions: it came very near deciding instantly the fortunes of the day. The Russian centre swayed and shook, as its guarding wing was broken. A shout which rose above the din of the Muscovite guns proclaimed victory to Sweden, as Charles put his infantry in motion to perfect the work begun by his cavalry.

But the energy and courage of the Czar saved his army at the crisis. He dashed like a madman from rank to rank, in his imperial robes, mounted on his Arabian horse; his hat and clothes were pierced with bullets; he succeeded in restoring the courage and efficiency of his troops. He brought a portion of his artillery to sweep the position of the Swedish horse, still in the confusion of victory on the ground recently occupied by his right wing. Musketry aided the heavier guns, and Schlippenback, in the storm of shot, staggered. Nothing but retreat or the speedy arrival of the king could save him. But the principal part of the Russian artillery poured destruction into the advancing ranks, as Charles came on. Fortune at this point aided the Czar. A cannon ball struck the litter of the King of Sweden, and brought the litter and its occupant to the ground. This for a few moments arrested the advance of the infantry. The Russian cannon filled up these moments fearfully. The ground about the wounded king was covered with dead. His litter destroyed, he was borne on the crossed pikes of his men. His order was still to advance; and it is recorded that these repeated orders were delivered with that sardonic laugh of the lips, in which the eyes never joined, which was habitual with him. But to advance in the central range of the hurricane of balls and grape-shot was impossible. Of four and twenty drabants, who relieved each other in carrying him, one and twenty were killed. This havoc of the Russian artillery soon produced a fatal result. The Swedish centre, although led by the invincible king in person, fell back, not in consternation, but in impotent fury.

Then the Czar, despatching Prince Menzikoff, who commanded his left wing, with a large force of foot and horse, to act between the rear of the Swedes and their camp, advanced with overwhelming force against the receding columns. Prince Menzikoff—who from apprentice to a pastry cook had become one of the ablest generals of Russia—met a reserve of three thousand Swedes and Cossacks on their way from the camp to the field of battle. He surrounded them and cut them to pieces. The movement of the Czar was equally successful. The retrograde movement of the Swedish main body became a disorderly retreat under the first pressure of his advance. This soon became, in turn, a wild flight. The heroes of so many renowned fields—Renschild, the Prince of Wirtemberg, Schlipenback, Roos, and others, were made prisoners. Charles, involved in the pursuing battalions of the Czar, unable to defend himself, yet refused to yield or fly. Merlin—he ever after regarded it as a noble favour of fortune—was brought in the tumultuous flow of the battle and rout to a place in the ring which a few hundred of his faithful veterans formed about the wounded monarch. How the few devoted men who defended the crown of Gustavus Adolphus on the head of Charles the Twelfth, and fenced the throne of Sweden, bore themselves in that dark hour, let history, and not the idle weaver of legends, recount.

Whilst the king maintained his post, like a rock between counter currents, many of his faithful followers were seeking him in different parts of the field. Count Piper, and the officers of the chancery, had remained in the camp. They now ran about in the confusion, deploring the fate of their master. Clouds of dust and smoke covered the country, and, blinded and bewildered, they came by mistake to the walls of Pultowa, and were made prisoners by the garrison. Many a brave man, seeking the king that he might shield his life, lost his own in the wild melee. Amongst those of his friends who, forgetting their own safety, sought the King of Sweden, was a Polish gentleman, Count Poniatowski. He traversed a part of the field where the storm of flight and pursuit had spent itself. The scene about him was as deserted except its dead, as the black ground of a prairie which the flames have visited and left. A light wind had struck the smoke and dust clouds, and beaten them back for a small space. The Pole drew rein for a moment, and endeavoured with eye and ear to gain a knowledge of the position of the king. Away toward the camp and Pultowa sounded the dread noises of the multitudes. Northward, the rattle of arms, and the dull tramp of horse, betokened the lingering presence of battle. There indeed Lewenhaupt, yielding slowly with a remnant of the right wing, maintained the honour of Sweden. More to the west, and nearer, the Pole heard sounds which proclaimed another point of resistance. Sharp shouts might be heard in the midst of the various noises of the field. He was about to ride to this latter point, as that which most agreed with what he had known of the position of the king, when he saw, sitting along the skirt of the near cloud, which piling before the breeze rose from the ground, as its base, and towered high in dusky and shifting masses, a boy mounted upon a small and swift-going horse. The Pole recognised him. It was Caputsch. The lad undertook to conduct Poniatowski, and these two were presently in the midst of the enemy who surrounded the forlorn hope gathered about the king. The Pole forced his way inward, with a sweeping sword, and the vigour of his heavy charger. Caputsch followed keenly, like a fine scimitar gliding into the gashes made by a broad sword. They were presently within two bounds of the Swedish ring. Merlin recognized the costume of the Pole, and the dim figure of little Caputsch. He drove Galba straight through the hostile crowd to meet them, and with one or two sword strokes made a clear passage; and the Pole, with the boy Caputsch, joined the circular line.

Poniatowski at once assumed the controul and lead of the band. Charles, the implacable expression of his countenance blended with something like stupor, leaned on the shoulder of one of his attendants, and regarded, without directing, the close contest. The Pole came to his side:

“Sire,” he said with gallant emotion, “your life is too renowned and too valuable to be sacrificed. Permit the retreat to be sounded. We are able to cut a way through the enemy.”

Charles made no answer. The Pole observed that his obduracy had become lethargy. He addressed no more words to him, but, calling to two strong men, bade them put him upon horseback. This was done, although the king had been unable to sit a horse at an earlier period of the day. Then the Pole singling the Norwegian, for his great strength, and approved gallantry, from the five hundred picked men who made the band, said :

“Chevalier, take your post, and keep it, on his majesty’s left. I will ride on his right.”

Instantly, at a signal, the advance began. The King of Sweden moved with five hundred men toward his camp, already filled with the enemy; then toward the baggage, a mile to the south. The five hundred cut a way through the enemy for the distance of a league, piercing the ranks of ten regiments. Many of their small number were slain. To be unhorsed in such an enterprise was to be at the mercy of the foe. The steed of Charles was killed under him. The world well knows that Colonel Gieta, covered with wounds and spent with loss of blood, gave his horse to his master, and became by the act of devotion a slave in the Siberian mines.

The flight did not terminate with their arrival at the baggage; but here a brief delay was made. Count Piper’s coach was found. Charles had never used one since he left Stockholm. He was now put into this vehicle, and the remnant of the band dashed off with him for the Boristhenes.

The king, who, from the time he had been placed on horseback to his arrival at the baggage, had not spoken a word, inquired at length what had become of Count Piper.

“He is in the hands of the enemy, sire; and so are all the officers of the chancery,” said Poniatowski.

“And General Renschild, and the Duke of Wirtemberg?” added the king.

“They are also prisoners,” said Poniatowski.

“Prisoners to the Russians!” returned Charles: “Come then, let us rather go to the Turks.”

His attendants could not perceive the least mark of dejection in his countenance. His lethargic condition seemed to have left him. He travelled with swift wheels for the Boristhenes, but with the manner of one who had not sustained defeat and wounds.

The Chevalier Merlin rode in the rear of the royal attendants. Caputech followed the strong bounds of his charger with the light lopes of the little Tartar horse. The hum and rattle of the fast-moving wheels, which whirled under the royal freight, the continuous hoof-strokes of the galloping steeds, became more separately audible, as the field of Pultowa with its wild din was left farther behind. Mingling with these less deafening sounds, a voice, pitched to an ordinary key, reached the ear of the Norwegian. He turned in the saddle; Mazeppa came on near at hand with a dozen Cossack horsemen. He had been informed of the flight of the king, and had recently joined it. The Hetman and the Norwegian were, in a moment galloping side by side. The white beard of the old man was heavy with dust, and begrimed. His splendid accoutrement was torn and blood-stained. Spots of blood were also plashed upon his forehead and cheeks. The expression of his countenance was sad, but full of a gallant composure.

“What lies before us?” said Merlin to the Hetman.

“Rivers, and deserts, and finally the questionable amity of the Turk,” Mazeppa replied.

“This day undoes the work of many glorious years,” said the Norwegian.

“Nothing is conclusive except death,” said Mazeppa. “Flight is now a duty. We fulfil it. There may come after this field others of a different issue.”

“So may it be,” Merlin replied, in bold sympathy with the unvanquished spirit of the old warrior.

As they continued to converse, the coach in which the king rode came down with a crash. A wheel had broken in the speed of the flight. The crowd of the king’s attendants were in a few moments stationary about the broken vehicle. It was again necessary to put his majesty upon horseback. Merlin, who had formerly been anticipated in a similar act of devotion, proffered his charger to the king. Many others did the same, and some confusion ensued. Mazeppa interposed.

“The chargers,” he said, “would deprive his majesty of comfort, if not of life, by their hard paces and headlong disposition. The horse of the lad—the fleet courser of Osbeck—will be better.”

But it was observed that Caputech had covered the animal with such a variety of haversacks, mails, and articles of use in camp life, that he sat amongst them like a monkey in a storehouse. Mazeppa, despairing of the speedy removal of the complicated burthen, called to one of his Cossack attendants. The Cossack, so called, leaped to the ground, and led forward a thin flanked courser, the mottled cheanut of whose sides scarcely moved with a quickened breathing from the exercise of the day, and made the animal kneel before the king. Charles, not speaking a word, was assisted into the saddle. The flight was renewed. The Cossack, who had surrendered his fleet Tartar, possessed himself of one of the coach horses, and was soon with his comrades, observing with a simple pride, as he rode, how his little courser curved his slender neck and deported himself in every respect as if conscious that he carried the hope of nations on his back. So the flight to the Boristhenes continued.

Two things were at length discovered by the fugitives. First that the king grew faint and feeble. Then that their route had been discovered and that pursuit was made. But, pressing on, the Swedes sustained their disabled monarch with cheering words, which he scarcely heard, and sought by an indirect course to avoid the pursuing enemy.

"The light riders may overtake us," said Mazeppa, as he pricked on, "but we can deal with them."

He spoke to Merlin, who again rode at his side. After many hours some high wooded hills became visible before them. These however were far away beyond a grassy plain. They were the hills that throw their shadows upon the uniting waters of the Voraka and Boristhenes. They were too distant to be gained with the failing horses and tottering king. A forest covering a flat lay nearer, and a little south of their line of flight. The Hetman, scanning the horizon behind them, found that no enemies were in view, and proposed that this forest should be entered as a place of refuge. Night was drawing on. The proposition of Mazeppa was adopted, and the fugitives were soon in the shade of the majestic trees, whose drooping boughs, mingling with a thick undergrowth, rendered the work of concealment less difficult. Penetrating deeply into the wood, for the greater security, the foremost riders came soon to some pools of water, surrounded by thickets dense and entangled. Here Mazeppa called a halt, and Charles was lifted to the ground. His face was flushed with fever, but its heat did not overcome the languor which so many trials had produced, and his hardy attendants held him in their arms as if he had been a sick child. Cloaks were spread for him, and laid upon these he sank at once into a dull sleep. Under the melancholy boughs of the oak tree which made his canopy, a great poet has imagined that he questioned and drew from Mazeppa the story of his wild ride into the Ukraine. But it was not so. The poet has however proved as true as history upon one point. Whilst the Swedes were casting themselves in hunger and weariness upon the ground, and making pillows of the gnarled roots of the great oaks and chestnuts, Mazeppa gave a comrade's attention to his faithful steed.—

"But first, outspent with this long course,
The Cossack prince rubbed down his horse."

And the Norwegian bestowed, with the aid of Caputsch, the same friendly services upon his Hungarian charger.

THE MONK'S VISION.

There is an old legend of a monk, who, while one day praying in his cell, beheld a vision of the Saviour. The demands of the poor at the convent-gate drew him forth to minister to their necessities; on his return he found the vision awaiting him, and heard these words—"Hadst thou lingered here, I had departed."

The light of day was fading from the sky,
And the bright sunset gleams
Shed forth a flood of glory from on high
With their departing beams.

It poured its brightness over castled hill,
O'er many a kingly hall,
Yet spurned it not the deep and shady dell,
The lowliest out, of all.

It shone within the walls where wearily
The desolate one sighed,
And a voice whispered that for him should be Light, though at eventide.

It shed its radiance o'er the place of graves,
Making strange beauty there,
And the dear symbol of the Faith that saves
Shone more divinely fair.

Lingering, lest aught of brightness to withhold,
On sacred dome and spire,
O'er where men prayed, as in the days of old
Hung tongues of living fire.

It beamed where dim in many a pictured nook
Was traced the Apostles' band;
The mighty limner's art new glory took
From the Celestial Hand.

It paused where knelt an aged form in prayer,
With upturned brow the while,
And lovingly it seemed to linger there
As with benignant smile.

Long years of penitence that soul had known,
Day by day wearily,
And night by night, in secret vigil lone
Praying in agony.

Oh, not by man may sacrifice be made
For sin's atonement now;
For One hath suffered, and its weight was laid
Upon the thorn-crowned brow!

—"O Jesus! thou who takest guilt away,
Now let my soul be shriven,
And let some sign," (thus did the old man pray)
"In mercy now be given!"—

A glory, than the sunset far more bright
Dwelt on the holy shrine,

For there, enveloped in celestial light,
Stood Mary's Child Divine.

And, as of old the wondrous works he wrought,
Bade sin and sorrow cease,
So on the heart that his forgiveness sought,
Again was shed sweet peace.

Fain would the monk, in trembling joy adore,
And yet he might not wait,
For, seeking alms for Christ's dear sake, the poor
Stood at the convent gate.

With benedictions did that old man holy
The suffering ones greet,
And kneeling down, in posture meek and lowly
Washed the disciples' feet.

Then eagerly he sought again the cell,
Late blest with presence bright,
And still, within its narrow walls did dwell
A glory and a light.

And spake a voice, whose tones of power untold,
The slumbering dead have woke,
Mighty, yet gentle, as when it of old
The world's first stillness broke.

"Hadst thou but lingered here, my presence would
For aye, have gone from thee;
Before the convent-door, I waiting stood
Seeking sweet charity.

"When to the famished and the sick ye came,
Ye came to me, your Lord;
Nor cup of water, given in my name,
Shall fail of its reward.

"A stranger, shelterless, ye gave me rest;
When weary, comfort showed;
And henceforth, I, an unknown angel-guest,
Make with you mine abode."—

—The sunset beams had faded quite away
But light more holy, shed
O'er hall and cottage, spire and dome, its ray,
And o'er the Slumberer's bed,

Making earth's solitary places glad,
Its wilderness to bloom,
And like a rose its desert, late so sad,—
Wide-scattering joy for gloom.

The Perfect Presence, who our earth hath trod
A man, with erring men,
Hath sent forth light to mark the onward road
Our steps should tread again.

That blessed light of Love! it shineth still,
To show Christ's footsteps given;
Walk we therein! so may our Father's will
Be done in Earth, as Heaven.

MATILDA F. DANA.

Boston, Massachusetts.

STEELE.

BY H. T. TUCKERMAN.

One day, early in the last century, if an Asmodeus had peeped into a certain respectable-looking house in London, he would have seen a lady in whose beautiful countenance pride and tenderness were rarely mingled, seated alone in profound reverie, with an open letter in her hand, and writing materials on the table beside her. Her attitude and expression might have furnished captivating hints for a graceful artist. Now she nibbles the feathered end of her pen, and looks up to the ceiling, as if expecting a resolution to descend; now she disposes herself to write; and, anon, rises with an impatient air, and walks to and fro, while perusing, for the twentieth time, the unanswered epistle; one moment she breathes a gentle sigh, and the next her fair lip is wreathed with a complacent smile. At last she reseats herself and begins to scribble after the manner of a wayward girl in a sentimental quandary. Although not given to rhyming, she half-unconsciously traces a couplet;—

Ah! Dick Steele, that I were sure,
Your love, like mine, would still endure!

A good psychologist might thence infer her lover's whole character. The exclamatory note suggests desire, attraction—a mesmeric influence, in fact that he was what she, at once, declared him to be to her friends—"as agreeable a man as any in the kingdom;" and what she felt him to be in her own heart, "a master of the art of love." The familiarity of the appellation indicates that he was an accessible, open-hearted, sociable fellow; while the doubt of his constancy reveals an impulsive nature. Such were, in truth, the characteristics of Steele. His numerous dedications present a versatility and tact in compliment that show how aptly he could touch every note of elegant flattery; a vivid sense of the beautiful, especially in manners and character, displayed in his writings, evidence one of those thoroughly appreciative minds upon which no trait of female attractiveness is lost; and his own confession that, while a youth, he wrote and published the "Christian Hero," in order to commit himself before the world, to virtue and religion, and thus be shamed into consistency of demeanor, is an impressive proof of his consciousness of moral weakness.

The father of Steele was private secretary to James, first Duke of Ormond, lord lieutenant of Ireland; and his son was born in Dublin, came to England when a child, was educated at the Charter-House School; and his first recognized literary effort was a poem called the Procession, for the funeral of Queen Mary in 1695. A naturally chivalric temper inclined him to military life; and having entered the army, he rode privately in the Guards; while ensign, he, however, made two important discoveries;—one was that his pen was likely to be a far more useful weapon than his sword, the other that the career of a soldier would confirm ruinous habits of dissipation already contracted. It was under these impressions that he put forth the treatise to which we have alluded,—an act that subjected him to frequent ridicule. In 1702—a play intended to satirize the affectation of mourning—then prevalent, which he had offered to the manager of Drury, attracted the King's notice, who gave its author the post of Gazetteer. Then followed the "Tender Husband," and other successful dramatic pieces; the appointments of Stamp Commissioner, Surveyor of the Royal Stables, Governor of the Royal Company of Comedians, &c. Steele became an active pamphleteer; and in March, 1713, was expelled the House of Commons, where he represented Stockbridge, for objectionable partizan writings. Soon after the accession of George I., he was knighted, elected a member of Parliament from Yorkshire, and, after suppressing a rebellion at the North, was named one of the commissioners of forfeited estates in Scotland. He obtained a patent for his project for bringing fish to market alive; and the great popularity of the "Conscious Lovers" gained him a royal douceur of five hundred pounds. He retired to Wales, after becoming paralytic; and died there on the first of September, 1729. Statistics like these, however, only serve to point out the landmarks of Steele's career. His political life has been severely criticised, although his intimates urge that he lived when party spirit ran high and integrity was little valued; and they claim that no illiberal or ungentlemanly invectives and no weak abuse deform his controversial papers; and that there, as in his other relations, is visible "an enthusiasm of honor." The anecdotes of his improvidence are curious and familiar; the two related by Savage, of his hiding in a tavern to get up a pamphlet to pay for his dinner, and inducing the bailiffs, who were quartered at his house, to enact the part of servants before his guests, are characteristic alike of his ready wit and painful exigencies. His domestic affections were strong, as shown in his conjugal sentiment, and fidelity to his illegitimate daughter. He built a residence in which he could not afford to live; and received, with the utmost courtesy and good nature, his friend Addison's practical reproof, administered in the shape of an execution upon the house and furniture, for an old debt of a thousand pounds, which failed however of its intent—"to awaken him from a lethargy which must end in his inevitable ruin." His social advantages were of the highest order. Not only was he the favorite guest of the most desirable of the nobility, and the most gifted of the fair; but the political leaders, the wits and the artists of the day, were his boon companions; he was equally at home in the palace and behind the scenes; in Garth's study and Congreve's sick-chamber; he had almost daily meetings with Addison at their coffee-house; Swift called at his office for his letters; and, at his request for "an ode as of a cheerful dying spirit," to help off a musical festival he projected, Pope sent "warm from his brain"—the "Vital spark of heavenly flame."

Steele once reproved an acquaintance for looking gravely upon the unsuccessful jocularities of an ambitious wag—saying "do laugh, 'tis humanity to laugh;" and this kindly sympathy was never chilled by pleasure, misfortune or age; for, at Hereford, where he died, we are told that he would be carried out upon the green, on summer evenings, to see the peasants divert themselves; and delighted to give an order on his agent, for a new gown to the best dancer.

Now that the political squabbles of Sir Richard are forgotten, his convivial graces vanished like the wine bubbles of an ended feast, his plays superseded by a new dramatic taste, and the weary clamor of his duns hushed in eternal silence,—he rises to the imagination in the friendly guise of a "fine old English gentleman," whose finances were indeed often visionary, and whose practice was not always reliable, but whose excellent sense and genial sentiment gave birth to one of the most pleasing and useful of literary inventions.

The art of combining utility and pleasure has advanced in the ratio of civilization; it is the great aim of modern science, the fond dream of philanthropy, the new triumph of genius. To read the glowing experiences of imaginative homoeopaths and hydropaths, it would seem that the "ills that flesh is heir to," can be made, through agreeable remedial processes, the occasion of vivid enjoyment. Ideal socialists point out a way in which domestic infelicity may be rendered productive of sentimental delight. Musically organized enthusiasts indicate how the most grateful emotions are suggested by apt and exquisite harmony; while professors of magnetic science and recipients of Swedenborg's intuitions, become intimate with truth and cognizant of spiritual life, without intellectual labor or the emancipation of death. Such, in its extreme manifestation, is the tendency to attain good through pleasure; and to realize the requisite and the desirable by virtue of inheritance; and, however fanatical in some of its pretensions, or visionary in its declared results, there is essential truth in the idea that lies at the basis of the experiment and absolute wisdom in the spirit of its disciples. There must be relish or there is no perfect assimilation either in physical or moral life. No idea enters into the soul except through the sympathies; thoughts, things, events and persons are objective to the individual except when in relation to him, and, only through his affections, modify his nature; so that, although the ungenial may excite and invigorate, its opposite can only enrich and inspire.

In no form has the problem we have hinted, struggled more toward solution than in that of education, in the broadest acceptation of the term;—how inadequately thus far in regard to youth, may be inferred from the almost universal fact that men and women of character, when released from the prescribed routine of their first years, seek and pursue quite a different culture, according to their own wants and impulses;—and this is the only education that moulds or reproduces their latent and individual nature. It is therefore with more faith that we turn from the hackneyed and obsolete systems to which the young are usually doomed, to those varied resources and excitements designed to afford mental stimulus and direction to a later and more thoughtful era of life. The most prominent and active in our times is literature; and its most delicate and difficult office is censorship. To criticise without malignity, raise the tone of manners without assumption, gently correct, winsomely improve, unostentatiously reform, and scatter the germs of truth without intruding into the field or obstructing the pathway of another—is a task which demands a blending of judgment, nobleness, tact and urbanity,—the knowledge and quickness of a practised man of the world and the warm, sympathetic heart of unsophisticated youth. Tried by such a standard we are at no loss to account for the failure of most preachers and editors in their efforts to improve society. Few unite the ability to perceive what is wanted with the tenderness and generosity indispensable to its efficient supply.

If there was ever a man formed to discharge successfully this peculiar vocation it was Steele. His very defects were available in this regard. Had he been more of a scholar, pedantry would have formalized the colloquial style that gave him access to the multitude; with more sustained moral elevation, he could scarcely have felt that indulgence for the weaknesses of others which gave to his admonitions a sympathetic charm; more retired and fastidious in association, his address would have been less frank and brotherly.

His generous impulses prevented cynicism; his spontaneous feeling warmed the actual reprover into the apparent friend; and even his convivial habits, injurious as they were to his own interests, kept the social instinct fresh, while his improvidence was a sure though melancholy check upon "the indolence of office." Akin to the most polished race by birth and social position, one of the fraternity of genius by virtue of his own gifts, intimate with official experience by life in the camp and the court, and brought through the vicissitudes incident to an irregular career, into familiarity with the trials of the least fortunate of mankind—he was prepared to understand and to feel in a comprehensive and intelligent way. A social cosmopolite, a wit and a good-fellow in the general tone of his nature, he was, at the same time, a devoted partizan, a chivalric friend, a man of letters and an ardent lover—touching the circle of humanity at each salient point.

We can readily appreciate the objection of a German critic to the species of literature rendered popular by Steele,—that it tends to substitute display for erudition. This, however is a very partial view of its merit. The world had enough profound scholars; intellectual activity, like all other social forces, at this new impulse, emerged from a monastic seclusion to enlarge and quicken the mass. It obeyed the democratic and the Christian tendency of a more liberal and enlightened era; and to this revolution, so limited and casual in its origin, we may justly ascribe the spread of intelligence and taste which distinguishes this from past centuries. Previously, except to the few, mental improvement was a vague and often a hopeless privilege. By the advent of periodical literature it became an element of ordinary life, a refreshment obtainable by the way-side of toil and during the intervals of business. Its aim was not to convey recondite knowledge, but to excite men and women to observe and learn them to think; to induce a love of reading, to elevate gossip into conversation, and to refine and amplify the resources of the individual and of society.

As a means of social progress it is difficult to overestimate its value. The brilliancy and power of later writers of the same school, now render the Spectator and its immediate offspring, comparatively tame; but if the world has outgrown some of its teachings and advanced to the relish of a more vigorous style, the method and spirit to which it gave birth retain all their interest and efficiency. Character is but an aggregate of qualities and these are of gradual attainment; hence the foibles, errors and social incongruities which Steele and his associates strove to reform, however apparently insignificant, were allied to the essential principles of human welfare. Before his day, England was allowed to indulge all the crudities of self-esteem with complacency. Neither law or theology meddled with those details of conduct their professors deemed of minor importance. Hence the need of a set of lay-preachers, tasteful, witty and insinuating, to lop the excrescences, guide the blind impulses and meliorate the life of society. If we glance at the pages of the old essayists, we shall find that they made constant war upon all kinds of affectation, mercilessly exposed bullies, coxcombs, pedants, oglers, dandies, wags, croakers, coquettes, and all the gay, noisy and venomous insects that infest the social atmosphere. The strong-holds of cant and ostentation were invaded; the baseness of slander unveiled, and the beauties of literature, the claims of genius and the dignity of truth vindicated with tact and eloquence. From the abolition of such customs as the levelling of opera glasses before recognition, the indiscreet mention of a set of acquaintances outlived, and the dangling of canes from a button-hole, to the high acts of distinguishing between realities and appearances, and disengaging one's-self from the opinions of others, the Spectator was the bland champion of improvement. He mingles with the habitués of the coffee-house, the audience and the actors at the theatre, the clubs of politicians, the festive scenes of hospitality, the grave coteries of scholars and the affectionate gatherings around the domestic hearthstone, and thence retires to indite grateful praise or judicious censure adapted to each scene and occasion. Perhaps there is as much wisdom in such a humanitarian application of one's knowledge and sympathy, as can be discovered in the more ostentatious efforts of modern philanthropy. It was, at least, one of the primary developments of that benevolent enterprise that, in our day, exhibits itself in the writings of Crabbe and Dickens, and the teachings of Spurzheim and Combe; and in all the varied labors of men of letters and science to make the different classes of society known to one another and promote human well-being by disseminating a knowledge of natural laws.

Those who are disinclined to recognise so wide and benign an aim in the writings of Steele, do not justly estimate the genuine nobility of his character. Perhaps to many he is most frequently remembered as a good-hearted man about town, with considerable wit and reckless habits. This view, though in a measure correct, is altogether inadequate. We find ample evidence of the generous and elevated designs he cherished. He revered the nature to which he would fain minister. "I consider," he says, "the soul of man as the ruin of a glorious pile of buildings; where, amidst great heaps of rubbish, you meet with noble fragments of sculpture, broken pillars and obelisks and a magnificence in confusion." Thus if he explored human life with a critical eye and sometimes busied himself with its veriest details, the survey was inspired by reverence and sympathy; and amid the quaint allegories, old-fashioned modes of speech and diffuse commonplaces that sometimes weary a reader of to-day, the essays of Steele not infrequently glide from the vivacious to the sublime, from conventionalities to philosophy, and from a question of manners to an evidence of immortality. His prefaces contain the most deliberate statement of the purposes he cherished and the motives by which he was actuated; and some of these have a cordial and noble tone that can scarcely fail to charm a generous and discriminating mind.

Thus, in one instance, he observes—"When learning irradiates common life, it is then in its highest use and perfection. Knowledge of books is like that sort of lantern which hides him who carries it, and serves only to pass through secret and gloomy paths of his own; but in the possession of a man of business, it is as a torch in the hand of one who is willing and able to show those who are bewildered, the way which leads to their prosperity and welfare." A prominent object he elsewhere declares to be "to expose the false arts of life, to pull off the disguises of cunning, vanity and affectation, and to recommend a general simplicity in our dress, our discourse and our behavior." Accordingly he penetrated the nooks of experience, and constantly enforced minor philosophy, so needful yet so rare which induces the "honest and laudable fortitude that dares to be ugly;" the adoption in dress of "the medium between a fop and a sloven," the content which dwells on "such instances of our good fortune as we are apt to overlook."

His "practical scheme for the good of society," has, therefore, continued to influence both the form and spirit of subsequent literature; and popular reading now bears its traces in the careful exposition of events, as in the Annual Register, and the minute analysis of the spirit of the age by such writers as Hazlitt. Modern reviews and novels, as well as many contributions to the daily press, are also imbued with the observant, critical and suggestive habitudes of the original essayists. In fact men of wit became ashamed, after so noble an example, to employ their gift otherwise than in the service of truth; and the Spectator's creed was more generally adopted even in literature,—that "the greatest merit is in having social virtues, with benevolence to mankind." At the outset, indeed, while female cultivation was rare, to be speculative was fashionable; so that Goldoni ridicules, in one of his comedies, the lady-readers of the Spectator; but there can be little doubt that the galaxy of admirable English female writers, that adorn this century was, in part, at least, drawn into the literary firmament by the recognition and the impulses afforded by Steele and his fraternity. Mental independence was one of the happiest and most needful lessons they taught;—demonstrating that “we purchase things with our blood and money quite foreign to our intrinsic and real happiness;” that true “Honor is the conscience of doing just and laudable actions, independent of the success of these actions;” and that we should aim to “banish out of conversation all entertainment which does not proceed from simplicity of mind, good-nature, friendship and truth.” Another striking service rendered by this literary reform, was that of calling public attention to neglected authors. It is conceded that Addison’s papers on Milton, first caused Paradise Lost to be universally read and appreciated; thus literature, manners, character and life found enlightened and affectionate interpretation, and were “touched to finer issues;” so that, by the consent of the judicious, it was recorded of Steele that he “took upon himself to be the censor of the age, and for years exercised that delicate office with suitable dignity and general approbation.”

Society perpetually needs criticism; and, notwithstanding the offence which the strictures of travellers in the United States, have given our sensitive people, they have induced actual reforms. Domestic economy is auspiciously modified by the intelligent suggestions of writers on principles of taste and the laws of health. The advantage of ventilation and ablution, the wisdom of inexpensive entertainments, and refinement in public amusements, are daily more appreciated through the intelligent advocacy of literature, the architecture and furniture of dwellings cannot fail to become more fit and pleasing by means of the eloquent treatise of Ruskin; while the lionizing and blue-stocking mania is obviously on the decline since it has become the subject of masterly satire. Let us not forget that no small degree of that salutary impulse which gave this practical direction to literature, is referable to the candid and kindly example of Steele. Women, especially, owe him no small obligation, for advocating the mental capabilities, recognising the social mission, and exposing the baneful follies of their sex. He indicated how they may derive positive benefit from men of letters, by sharing with them the domain of taste and cultivating the amenities of life. Many questions of vital import to their usefulness and satisfaction, previously kept in abeyance through false delicacy or proud indifference, were thus brought fairly into discussion, and submitted to the ordeal of truth; so that we may ascribe, in a measure, the increased consideration the sex enjoy, to this wise application of literature to life. We regard Steele as a kind of bold and graceful steward at the feast of letters, who, uniting intellectual gifts with social instincts, won the thinker from retirement and the worldling to books, broke the ice of pedantry, melted the reserve of scholarship, and gently led the careless votary of pleasure into the temple of reflection. He was a pioneer in that great achievement of modern civilization—the diffusion of knowledge. He strove to make the acquisitions of the few available to the many; and first successfully established, among the Anglo-Saxons, and indirectly elsewhere, the magnetic telegraph of social literature—now the familiar blessing of the world,—the cheapest of luxuries, the most unfailling of resources and one of the main-springs of human interest. Not so much by genius and erudition, but through a hearty frankness, a captivating address, and liberal sympathies he became the favorite companion at every London breakfast-table; and lived in the world “rather as a spectator of mankind than as one of the species;” and to such advantage, that the list of subscribers to each of his periodicals, comprised the most illustrious names in the kingdom. How natural for Lamb to exclaim, with the zest of a cotemporary, “O to read Steele new!” La Bruyère had analyzed character and Castiglione drawn up a code of manners, but with a more genial and comprehensive aim, the Spectator and Tatler surveyed the whole field of human life and reasoned of its inward elements and external phases, so that their projector deserved the encomium of one of his biographers, who says that “all the pulpit discourses of a year scarce produced half the good that flowed from the Spectator of a day.” In a purely literary point of view, Steele merits the distinction of having illustrated the availability of our vernacular. He took the language from stilts and placed it on its feet. The most felicitous of his essays are colloquial without any loss of dignity, and expressive without the use of any sonorous or peculiar words. He knew how to write like a gentleman as well as a scholar; reproduced original simplicity of diction, and from a ponderous mace that only the erudite thought of handling, moulded and tempered it into a delicate but keen rapier, light to carry and graceful to wield. Writing became more conversational and talking more finished from the easy rhetoric of the old essayists, and, although Steele modestly yields the palm to Addison—declaring himself “undone by his auxiliary;” we are inclined to think, with Swift, that “the ingenious gentleman who did thrice a week, divert and instruct the public with his papers, tried the force and compass of our language with eminent success." He had the nature and the independence to print talk, the sense to make it useful, and the fancy to give it a charm; and it has, therefore, been justly said of him and his co-laborers,—that for more than half a century they "supplied the English nation with principles of speculation."

Con amore is the secret of eloquent advocacy. Steele loved truth and beauty in form, manners and action, with an enthusiasm that few divines realized; hence their exposition was to him a peculiar delight. He lacked the firmness to embody these high principles in his life; but the consciousness of this, gave new fervor to the sentiments their contemplation inspired. He had the nobility to appreciate what he felt was beyond his reach; and seemed to atone for personal disloyalty to virtue, by sincere public homage at her shrine. The inconsistency might have been fatal, had he ministered openly at the altar whose secret priest he aspired to be; but addressing his readers under the humorous name of Isaac Bickerstaff—to which the wit of Swift had given the prestige of notoriety, there was no inevitable association of the censor with the man. An universality of aim took away the special intent of his hits at folly; and self-love was not wounded by the judicious advice of a kindly man of the world anonymously tendered. Besides and above all, there was the undertone of genuine affection, to render musical even the hoarse voice of reproof; the satire had too much of pleasantry to embitter its object; and the magnetic touch of that spirit of humanity which lives in the famous line of Terence and the cherished song of Burns, took the sting of enduring pain from the needful blow of correction.

SONG.

I.

When I met thee Belovéd!
In hope, and in gladness—
I thought not so soon
I should leave thee in sadness—
The dream that my fancy
Caressingly cherished—
Its radiance has vanished—
Its glory has perished.

II.

The wounds of the heart,
Are forever unclosing—
The spirit that suffereth
Knows not reposing.
If the soul from oblivion
One bright beam should borrow,
Too soon waketh memory
The wild harp of sorrow.

III.

I strive to recall not
The hopes that are flying,
Like birds to the shadows
When daylight is dying.
Yet when their sweet music
Heart-echoes have started—
Those echoes remain,
Though the song has departed.

IV.

Thy beauty extorted
Love's warmest emotion,
I bowed at its altar
With Eastern devotion.
But away from the shrine,
The fond worshipper driven—
The soft ray of love's star
Has grown dim in its heaven.

V.

From all dreams of bliss,
There's a fearful awaking—
The life-chords seemed crushed,
And the heart almost breaking—
Yet a plague on the fool,
Who, tho' slighted, loves blindly—
Perchance there's another
Will treat him more kindly.

P. H. H.

THE EARLY ENGLISH DRAMATISTS.

JOHN FORD.

It is a circumstance previously remarked, that within the short space of half a century, from the middle of Elizabeth's reign, to the breaking out of the Great Rebellion, there flourished almost all that England can boast of as masters in the art of serious dramatic literature. Perhaps we should make a few exceptions in favor of the authors of the Samson Agonistes, the Fair Penitent, the Mourning Bride, and a few other spirits of like kidney, but reflection will yet show strong reasons for including imitators and contemporaries in the general rule we have noticed above. After these 'reverend seniors,' how little have we!—In the literary fragments of this "golden age of merry England," we

See how the floor of heaven
Is thickly strewn with patines of bright gold!
There 's not the smallest orb,
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still quiring to the young eyed cherubim:
Such harmony is in immortal souls!

But in the superior effulgence of the fame of Shakspeare, that sun which shall never set, are comparatively lost to view many bards, whose beauties would otherwise have been familiar to our tongues. The Persian apologue of the clay that received its sweetness from a neighboring roseplant, must be reversed in this connection by the admirers of Ben Jonson—Beaumont and Fletcher—Massinger—Webster—Kit Marlowe, and numerous others. And among other contemporary kindred spirits, John Ford held in his day a very high position, which even now he must be allowed to have merited.

John Ford, or as he sometimes spelt his name, Forde, was born of reputable parentage, in Devonshire, England, during the spring of 1586. It is the lamentable dearth of all positive evidence, even on such a point as this, that has caused one of the most distinguished British poets to say, "it is painful to find the name of Ford a barren spot in our poetical biography, marked by nothing but a few dates and conjectures, chiefly drawn from his own dedications." However, there is still extant, at Islington, the record of his baptism, dated April 17th, 1586.

It is, we believe, unknown and unnoticed by any of Ford's previous biographers, that he was born at the family seat of the manor of Bagter, near Ashburton, in the county of Devon; a town which nearly two centuries after, gave a title to another illustrious son, John Dunning, the first Baron Ashburton. It may boast also of giving birth to two other persons eminent in the literary world, Dr. Ireland, Dean of Westminster, and Mr. Gifford, the former editor of the Quarterly Review. The manor is at present one of the seats of Lord Ashburton, but will revert in about ten years to the Creswell family of that ilk.

Like Congreve and many others of the brotherhood, Ford, after receiving a liberal education, was entered in the Middle Temple, 16th November, 1602, as a student of law. It would seem that in after life he was a practitioner of no mean eminence in this science. In 1606, not yet arrived at the age of manhood, he published an affectionate tribute to the memory of the Earl of Devonshire, in the shape of some verses entitled "Fame's Memorial," &c. Twenty-three years after this, we again find him before the public. In 1629, he published his "Lover's Melancholy," which, he assures us in his dedication to the Society of Gray's Inn, was his first printed dramatic effort. It is probable that he had in the interim composed several plays for representation, although none of them had as yet been submitted to the press. Happily for our curiosity, his dedications afford us some irrefragable testimony in regard to the history of the compositions to which they are attached. The first play that appears on the stage, the product of Ford's pen, seems to have been "The Brother and Sister": (although it is not known by that name, we will venture to substitute it for the original title,) which was not published, however, till 1633. In the dedication to the Earl of Peterborough, our author styles it "the first fruit of his leisure in the action."

From the very nature of this play, its damnation ensues. Like Massinger in his Ancient Admiral, Ford seems to have thought that the portraiture of the passion of Love, (in which he so eminently excelled,) in any phase whatever, no matter how sinful or revolting, was redeemable by exquisite delicacy of touch and soft depth of coloring. The horrible traits in the character of the hero and heroine of the piece, render it unfit for perusal by the young, and sickening to the old. The student of early British poetry will call to mind, in this connection, the beautiful old ballad of the Bonny Hynd, in which a similar catastrophe is produced with a degree of poetical spirit worthy of a more noble theme. As our author was a lawyer, he should not have been unmindful of the axiom of the civilians:—"Facinora ostendi dum puniantur, flagitia autem abscondi debent."

Not to do him injustice, however, we transcribe what we may suppose to be his real sentiments, taken from the mouth of Friar Bonaventura, a second Friar Lawrence, in the very opening of the play—

"Dispute no more in this, for know, young man,
These are no school-points; nice philosophy
May tolerate unlikely arguments,
But heaven admits no jests! Wits, that presumed
On wit too much, by striving how to prove
There was no God, with foolish grounds of art,—
Discovered first the nearest way to hell;
And filled the world with devilish Atheism.
Such questions, youth, are fond: far better 'tis
To bless the sun, than reason why it shines;
Yet He thou talk'st of is above the sun.
No more; I may not hear it."

Hear the lover, describing the charms of his mistress in an impassioned strain, worthy of Ariosto himself:

"View well her face, and in that little round
You may observe a world of variety;
For coral, lips; for sweet perfumes, her breath;
For jewels, eyes; for threads of purest gold,
Hair; for delicious choice of flowers, cheeks;
Wonder in every portion of that form.
Hear her but speak, and you will swear the spheres
Make music to the citizens in heaven."

A single specimen more must suffice for this tragedy. In strong contrast with the foregoing, we select an extract in which the Friar describes the consequences of sin:

—There is a place
(List daughter) in a black and hollow vault
Where day is never seen; there shines no sun,

But flaming horror of roedemning fires ;
 A lightless sulphur, choked with smoky fogs
 Of an infected darkness ; in this place
 Dwell many thousand thousand sundry sorts
 Of never-dying deaths ; there damned souls
 Roar without pity ; there are gluttons fed
 With toads and adders ; there is burning oil
 Pour'd down the drunkard's throat ; the usurer
 Is forced to sup whole draughts of molten gold ;
 There is the murderer for ever stabb'd,
 Yet can he never die ; there lies the wanton
 On racks of burning steel, whilst in his soul
 He feels the torment of his raging lust.

Although a most hideous and enormous sin is held up to the popular odium in this tragedy, still even the goodness of the author's motives can scarce excuse his subject. Yet he has the slight defence, that he may have taken the hint from the ancient Greek drama, of which this vice was a not uncommon subject. And in this feeling we are borne out by many of the most able critics. The author of the Pleasures of Hope held still stronger language in this connection, and the late Charles Lamb, in a note to an extract from this play says, "Sir Thomas Brown, in the last chapter of his enquiries into Vulgar and Common Errors, rebukes such authors as have chosen to relate prodigious and nameless sins. The chapter is entitled "Of some relations whose truth we fear." His reasoning is solemn and fine.—'Lastly, as there are many relations whereto we cannot assent, and make some doubt thereof, so there are divers others whose verities we fear, and heartily wish there were no truth therein. Many other accounts like these we meet sometimes in History, scandalous unto Christianity, and even unto Humanity ; whose not only verities, but relations honest minds do deprecate. Nor of sins heteroclital, and such as want either name or precedent, there is oftimes a sin even in their histories. We desire no records of such enormities ; sins should be accounted new, that so they may be esteemed monstrous. They omit of monstrosity, as they fall from their rarity ; for men count it venial to err with their forefathers, and foolishly conceive they divide a sin in its society. The peas of men may sufficiently expatiate without these singularities of villainy ; for, as they increase the hatred of vice in some, so do they enlarge the theory of wickedness in all. And this is one thing that may make latter ages worse than were the former : for the vicious example of ages past, poison the curiosity of these present, affording a hint of sin unto seducable spirits, and soliciting those unto the imitation of them, whose heads were never so perversely principled as to invent them. In things of this nature silence commendeth History ; 'tis the veniable part of things lost, wherein there must never rise a Pancirollus, nor remain any register but that of Hell.' Pancirollus wrote De Antiquis Deperditis, or of the Lost Inventions of Antiquity."

We take leave of this play, for the "Lover's Melancholy," with feelings much akin to those inspired by stepping from a cold damp charnel house, into an airy, agreeable garden. This tragedy-comedy we have alluded to before ; it is undoubtedly a most superior production—containing several passages that would singly suffice to immortalize any play. The plot is also of a very graceful character—in it our author delineates with a masterly hand the progress and cure of two kinds of insanity, without suffering the interest of the piece to pall for a moment. The reader will agree with Mr. Lamb in regard to the following extract, that "it is as fine as any thing in Beaumont and Fletcher, and almost equals the strife it celebrates. It depicts a contest between a Musician and a Nightingale : the tale on which it is founded is familiar to all classical readers.

Menaphon. "Passing from Italy to Greece the tales
 Which poets of an elder time have feigned
 To glorify their Tempe, bred in me
 Desire of visiting that Paradise.
 To Thessaly I came, and living private,
 Without acquaintance of more sweet companions
 Than the old inmate of my love, my thoughts,
 I day by day frequented silent groves,
 And solitary walks. One morning early
 This accident encountered me : I heard
 The sweetest and most ravishing contention
 That art or nature ever were at strife in.
 A sound of music, touch'd mine ears, or rather Indeed, entranced my soul : as I stole nearer,
 Invited by the melody, I saw
 This youth, this fair-fac'd youth, upon his lute
 With strains of strange variety and harmony
 Proclaiming, (as it seem'd,) so bold a challenge
 To the clear quiristers of the woods, the birds,
 That as they flocked about him all stood silent,
 Wond'ring at what they heard. I wondered too.
 A Nightingale,
 Nature's best skill'd musician, undertakes
 The challenge ; and, for every several strain
 The well shaped youth could touch, she sung her down ;
 He could not run division with more art
 Upon his quaking instrument, than she
 The nightingale did with her various notes
 Reply to.
 Some time thus spent, the young man grew at last
 Into a pretty anger ; that a bird,
 Whom art had never taught cliffs, moods, or notes,
 Should vie with him for mastery, whose study
 Had busied many hours to perfect practice :
 To end the controversy, in a rapture,
 Upon his instrument he plays so swiftly,
 So many voluntaries, and so quick,
 That there was curiosity and cunning,
 Concord in discord, lines of diff'ring method
 Meeting in one full centre of delight.
 The bird, (ordain'd to be Music's first martyr,) strove to imitate
 These several sounds ; which when her warbling throat
 Fail'd in, down dropt she on his lute
 And brake her heart. It was the quaintest sadness

To see the conqueror upon her hearse
 To weep a funeral elegy of tears.
 He looks upon the trophies of his art,
 Then sigh'd, then wiped his eyes, then sigh'd and cried,
 'Alas, poor creature, I will soon revenge
 This cruelty upon the author of it.
 Henceforth this lute, guilty of innocent blood,
 Shall never more betray an harmless peace
 To an untimely end : ' and in that sorrow,
 As he was dashing it against a tree,
 I suddenly stept in."

We may as well state here, that under the sanction of very competent authority, we have ventured to clip and to curtail the foregoing from a dialogue to a monologue, in order to render it a more perfect excerpt.

We now come to the "Broken Heart," which, taken all in all, is undoubtedly Ford's chef d'œuvre. This tragedy, which would have reflected credit upon Shakspeare himself, was first published in 1633, and is dedicated to the heroic Earl Craven. We may be excused for dwelling some time upon it, as it will serve to put forth the masterly genius of its author better than any other of his works. Let us resort again to Mr. Lamb, whose language is incapable of improvement : "I do not know where to find in any play a catastrophe so grand, so solemn and so surprising as this. This is indeed, according to Milton, 'to describe high passions and high actions.' The fortitude of the Spartan Boy who let a beast gnaw out his bowels till he died without expressing a groan, is a faint bodily image of this dilaceration of the spirit, and excutation of the inmost mind, which Calantha with, a holy violence against her nature, keeps closely covered, till the last duties of a Wife and a Queen are fulfilled. Stories of martyrdom are but of chains and the stake; a little bodily suffering; these torments

On the purest spirits prey
 As on entrails, joints, and limbs,
 With answerable pains, but more intense.

What a noble thing is the soul in its strengths and in its weaknesses! Who would be less weak than Calantha? who can be so strong? the expression of this transcendent scene almost bears me in imagination to Calvary and the Cross; and I seem to perceive some analogy between the scenical sufferings which I am here contemplating, and the real agonies of that final completion to which I dare no more than hint a reference." The plot is as follows: Penthea a noble Spartan maid, betrothed by her father and a mutual love to Orgilus, is, on her father's death, compelled by her brother Ithocles, to wed Bassanes, a jealous old lord. Ithocles in time, is enamored of Penthea's friend, the Princess Calantha, and after long intercession, prevails on his sister to exert her influence with Calantha, in his favour.

Orgilus, however still retains his implacable anger towards Ithocles, and at length assassinates him, when he had inspired the Princess with so great an attachment for him, that she had decided to marry him. From the many noble passages throughout we select the following, in strong contrast with Sir John Falstaff's well-known ideas on the same subject.

"Honour consists not in a bare opinion
 By doing any act that feeds content,
 Brave in appearance cause we think it brave;
 Such honour comes by accident, not nature;
 Proceeding from the vices of our passion,
 Which makes our reason drunk: but real honour
 Is the reward of virtue, and acquired
 By justice or by valour, which for basis
 Hath justice to uphold it. He then fails
 In honour, who, for lucre of revenge,
 Commits thefts, murders, treasons, or adulteries,
 With such like, by intrenching on just laws,
 Whose sovereignty is best preserved by justice.

The scene where Penthea persuades the Princess to accede to her brother's suit, is so perfect, that we cannot resist the temptation to transcribe it, fearful lest in making extracts, we may mar one of its beauties. It must be premised that Penthea, through the machinations of this very brother, is now tottering on the verge of the grave.

Calantha. Being alone, Penthea, you have granted
 The opportunity you sought, and might
 At all times have commanded.

Penthea. 'Tis a benefit
 Which I shall owe your goodness even in death for:
 My glass of life, sweet princess, hath few minutes
 Remaining to run down; the sands are spent;
 For by an inward messenger I feel
 The summons of departure short and certain.

Cal. You feed too much your melancholy.

Pen. Glories
 Of human greatness are but pleasing dreams,
 And shadows soon decaying; on the stage
 Of my mortality, my youth hath acted
 Some scenes of vanity, drawn out at length
 By varied pleasures, sweetened in the mixture,
 But tragical in issue; beauty, pomp,
 With every sensuality our giddiness
 Doth frame an idol, are unconstant friends,
 When any troubled passion makes us halt
 On the unguarded castle of the mind.

Cal. Contemn not your condition, for the proof
 Of bare opinion only: to what end
 Reach all these moral texts?

Pen. To place before you
 A perfect mirror, wherein you may see
 How weary I am of a lingering life
 Who count the best a misery.

Cal. Indeed
 You have no little cause; yet none so great
 As to distrust a remedy.

Pen. That remedy
 Must be a winding sheet, a fold of lead,
 And some untrod-on corner of the earth,—

Not to detain your expectation, princess,
I have an humble suit.

Cal. Speak and enjoy it.

Pen. Vouchsafe, then, to be my executrix,
And take that trouble on you to dispose
Such legacies, as I bequeath impartially ;
I have not much to give, the pains are easy,
Hear'n will reward your piety, and thank it
When I am dead ; for sure I must not live :
I hope I cannot.

Cal. Now, beshrew thy sadness,
Thou turn'st me too much woman.

Pen. Her fair eyes
Melt into passion ; then I have assurance
Encouraging my boldness. [Aside.] In this paper
My will was character'd ; which you, with pardon
Shall now know from mine own mouth.

Cal. Talk on, pr'ythee ;
It is a pretty earnest.

Pen. I have left me
But three poor jewels to bequeath. The first is My youth ; for though I am much old in griefs,
In years I am a child.

Cal. To whom that ?

Pen. To virgin-wives, such as abuse not wedlock
By freedom of desires, but covet chiefly
The pledges of chaste beds for ties of love,
Rather than raging of their blood, and next
To married maids, such as prefer the number
Of honorable issue in their virtues
Before the flattery of delights by marriage ;
May these be ever young !

Cal. A second jewel
You mean to part with.

Pen. 'Tis my fame ; I trust,
By scandal yet untouched : this I bequeath
To Memory, and Time's old daughter, Truth.
If ever my unhappy name find mention,
When I am fallen to dust, may it deserve
Besseeming charity without dishonor.

Cal. How handsomely thou play'st with harmless sport
Of mere imagination ! Speak the last,
I strangely like thy will.

Pen. This jewel, madam,
Is dearly precious to me ; you must use
The best of your discretion to employ
The gift as I intend it.

Cal. Do not doubt me.

Pen. 'Tis long ago, since first I lost my heart :
Long have I lived without it, else for certain
I should have given that too ; but instead
Of it, to great Calantha, Sparta's heir,
By service bound, and by affection vowed,
I do bequeath in holiest rites of love
Mine only brother, Ithoocles.

Cal. What say'st thou ?

Pen. Impute not, heaven-blest lady, to ambition
A faith as humbly perfect as the prayers
Of a devoted suppliant can endow it :
Look on him, princess, with an eye of pity ;
How like the ghost of what he late appeared
He moves before you.

Cal. Shall I answer here,
Or lend my ear too grossly ?

Pen. First his heart
Shall fall in cinders, scorcht by your disdain,
Ere he will dare, poor man, to ope an eye

On these divine looks ; but with low bent thoughts
Accusing such presumption ; as for words,
He dares not utter any but of service.
Yet this lost creature loves thee.—Be a Princess
In sweetness as in blood, give him his doom
Or raise him up to comfort.

Cal. What new change
Appears in my behaviour, that thou dar'st
Tempt my displeasure ?

Pen. I must leave the world
To revel in Elysium, and 'tis just
To wish my brother some advantage here ;
Yet by my best hopes, Ithoocles is ignorant
Of this pursuit. But if you please to kill him,
Lend him one angry look, or one harsh word,
And you shall soon conclude how strong a power,
Your absolute authority holds over
His life and end.

Cal. You have forgot, Penthea,
How still I have a father.

Pen. But remember
I am a sister, though to me this brother
Hath been, you know, unkind : Oh, most unkind !

Cal. Christalla, Philema, where are ye ?—Lady,
Your cheek lies in my silence.

While celebrating the nuptial feast of two of her favorites, Calantha is suddenly notified by one messenger, that the king her father is dead : by another that Penthea has committed suicide by starvation, and finally Orgilus announces that Ithoocles, with whom the Princess had interchanged pledges of mutual love, is cruelly murdered by his hand. The struggles with which the now queen restrains her emotions amply justify Mr. Lamb's eulogia. Having meted out to all the actors in her unhappy drama of life, their proper dooms. Calantha transfers the crown to her cousin Nearchus, Prince of Argos ; and finally, the corpse of Ithoocles being brought forward in solemn state and placed upon the stage, she expires upon the coffin of her lover, with this soliloquy :

—Now I turn to thee, thou shadow
Of my contracted lord ! bear witness all,
I put my mother's wedding ring upon
His finger ; 'twas my father's last bequest :

(Places a ring on the finger of ITHOOCLES.)

Thus I new-marry him, whose wife I am ;
Death shall not separate us. Oh, my lords,
I but deceiv'd your eyes with antic gesture,
When one news straight came hurrying on another,
Of death, and death, and death, still I danced forward ;
But it struck home, and here, and in an instant.
Be such mere women, who, with shrieks and outcries
Can vow a present end to all their sorrows,
Yet live to vow new pleasures, and outlive them :
They are the silent griefs which cut the heart strings ;
Let me die smiling.

An intelligent critic has suggested that the catastrophe in this play is far from being faultless ; that some distinction should be drawn between the fates of the virtuous Calantha and of the malignant Orgilus—of the generous Ithoocles and the jealous old Bassanes. But with all due deference to this opinion we beg leave to dissent from it. To a noble mind, death under certain circumstances is the most precious boon. And setting aside the great moral truth, that

'Tis not the whole of life, to live,
Nor all of death, to die, which perhaps is not peculiarly apropos in this connection, we still think that it would seriously degrade the lofty characters of Penthea and Calantha, were they to be temporarily rewarded in the course of the drama, and that Ford has shown a deep insight into the nobler feelings of the heart in his conclusion. Sir Walter Scott elegantly expressed the ideas which we have sought to convey, in somewhat the following language:—“A character of a highly virtuous and lofty stamp is degraded rather than exalted, by an attempt to reward virtue with temporal prosperity. Such is not the recompense which Providence has deemed worthy of suffering merit; and it is a dangerous and fatal doctrine to teach young persons, the most common readers of romance, that rectitude of conduct and of principle are either naturally allied with, or adequately rewarded by, the gratification of our passions or attainment of our wishes. In a word, if a virtuous and self-denied character is dismissed with temporal wealth, greatness, rank, * * * the reader will be apt to say, verily virtue has had its reward. But a glance on the great picture of life will show that the duties of self-denial, and the sacrifices of passion to principle, are seldom thus remunerated; and that the internal consciousness of their highminded discharge of duty, produces on their own reflections a more adequate recompense in the form of that peace which the world cannot give nor take away.”

“Love’s Sacrifice”—first printed in 1633, is the next in point of time, of our author’s works. Its general merit is the delineation of the gradual progress of the jealous passion; the virtuous fortitude, and the insatiate revenge in the breasts of his characters. The intriguing Machiavellian policy of the Italian courts of that age is also well depicted. It would seem to have been better received on representation in its day, than others by the same author, to which it is decidedly inferior. This temporary triumph was undoubtedly owing to the deference paid to the low tastes of the canaille, in the introduction of various vulgar passages. Mr. Weber considers the whole play an imitation of Shakspeare’s Othello; and in truth there is ground for such an insinuation. Ford is well known to have been an ardent admirer of the “harmonious monarch of the mind;” and as we shall presently see, ventured on a still more palpable attempt to rival his great master. We have not marked any passages from this play for quotation, lest we fatigue our readers with unfair specimens of our author’s merits. In 1634, Ford seems to have temporarily laid aside his plays in which the higher passions predominated, and committed the most egregious blunder of attempting openly to compete with Shakspeare in the Historical Drama. “The Chronicle History of Perkin Warbeck” was probably intended by its author to connect Shakspeare’s chain of English historical plays, by coming in between the dramas of Richard the Third and Henry the Eighth. In affirming the poet’s failure, we must in candor admit that he labored under disadvantages more than sufficient to appal any ordinary mind. He would undoubtedly have better consulted his fame, had he never deserted that line of dramatic composition in which consisted his forte. The auditories of those days did not receive “Perkin Warbeck” with any great degree of favor: nevertheless testimonies of the regard in which it was held by several of the literati of the age, (among others, by the celebrated Dr. Donne,) still exist in their works. It was reprinted in 1715 and in 1745, by the friends of the House of Hanover, to excite and foster ill feeling against the Jacobite cause; albeit the author had dedicated it to that famous Earl of Newcastle, whose staunch adherence to the Stuarts during the Great Rebellion has tended more to immortalize him than his literary productions. The final act possesses much real merit; several of the speeches are grand, and worthy of Shakspeare. What utter contempt is shewn by Warbeck to the suggestion of his predecessor in rebellion, Lambert Simnel, the titular Earl of Warwick, that he should sue for pardon to King Henry the Eighth.

“For pardon? hold, my heartstrings, whilst contempt
Of injuries in scorn, may bid defiance
To this base man’s foul language! Thou poor vermin,
How dar’st thou creep so near me? Thou an earl?
Why, thou enjoy’st as much of happiness
As all thy swing of slight ambition flew at.
A dunghill was thy cradle. So a puddle,
By virtue of the sunbeams, breathes a vapour
To infect the purer air, which drops again
Into the muddy womb that first exhaled it.
Bread, and a slavish ease, with some assurance
From the base beadle’s whip, crowned all thy hopes.
But, sirrah, ran there in thy veins one drop
Of such a royal blood as flows in mine;
Thou would’st not change condition to be second
In England’s state, without the crown itself!
Coarse creatures are incapable of excellence:
But let the world, as all, to whom I am
This day a spectacle, to Time deliver,
And by tradition fix posterity,
Without another chronicle than Truth,
How constantly my resolution suffered
A martyrdom of majesty.”

Nor is the scene where the quasi Richard IV. is led to the scaffold, less imposing. His speech is just what we should expect from Warbeck, were his character a real and not an assumed one. This is no place to discuss the question, whether the pretensions he instituted—backed by Margaret of Burgundy, the aunt of York, and by James IV. of Scotland—were genuine. Yet the passion that makes him in his death agonies reaffirm his title, could not have been other than real courage inspired either by a conviction of truth, or by a singularly gross self-deception. Let us proceed to the passage itself.

Oxford. Look ye, behold your followers, appointed
To wait on you in death.

Warbeck. Why, Peers of England,
We'll lead them on courageously. I read
A triumph over tyranny upon
Their several foreheads. Faint not in the moment
Of victory! our ends, and Warwick's head,
Innocent Warwick's head, (for we are prologue
But to his tragedy) conclude the wonder
Of Henry's fears: and then the glorious race
Of fourteen kings Plantagenets determines
In this last issue male. Heaven be obeyed.
Impoverish time of its amazement, friends;
And we will prove as trusty in our payments,
As prodigal to nature in our debts.
Death? pish! 'tis but a sound; a name of air;
A minute's storm, or not so much; to tumble
From bed to bed, be massacred alive
By some physicians, for a month or two,
In hope of freedom from a fever's torments,
Might stagger manhood: here, the pain is past
Ere sensibly 'tis felt. Be men of spirit!
Spurn coward passion: so illustrious mention
Shall blaze our names, and style us Kings o'er Death.

We will venture to assert that a large majority of those readers who peruse Shakspeare methodically from beginning to end, have regretted and do regret the omission of any history of the reign of Henry VII.; and he who is lost in the bald, flat narrative of Lord Bacon, will sympathize with them. But Shakspeare must have seen the great inapplicability of that reign to theatrical purposes; this renders the attempt of Ford more chivalric, if we may so style it, to venture on a flight at which Shakspeare hesitated. Our author probably held with Montrose thirty years after—

He either fears his fate too much
Or his deserts are small—
Who dares not put it to the touch
To win or lose it all.

And much as Ford's effort is below "the Swan of Avon," it is nevertheless infinitely superior to any other open imitation that we have yet encountered. We now come to an era in Ford's life, when the whole current of his mind must have undergone a complete change. Heretofore, his compositions may generally be noted for their solemn and serious cast—but the only two remaining products of his pen are of a totally different nature: more in the style of Fletcher's best comedies, with any of which they will favourably compare. The first of these is styled, "The Fancies, chaste and noble;" printed in 1638. In the prologue, Ford assures us, that — In it is shown

Nothing but what our author knows his own,
Without a learned theft.

The extreme singularity of the plot has called forth some invidious censure, inasmuch as it withdraws the attention from the general style and execution of the composition itself. It strikes us that an equally sensible objection might be urged against the Tempest, or the Midsummer's Night's Dream. We think that a critical examination will decide that if any fault is to be found, it must be with the plot itself, per se, on account of its improbability. Some of the passages scattered throughout are admirably adapted for quotation: we cannot resist giving one.

— She was once an innocent,
As free from spot as the blue face of heaven,
Without a cloud in't; she is now as sullied
As is that canopy, when mists and vapours
Divide it from our sight, and threaten pestilence.

In 1639, the "Lady's Trial" was published: akin in its nature to the last, but both in plot and in composition, infinitely superior. As a whole, it is, to our mind, equal to anything of the kind that Fletcher ever penned. Mr. Weber says of it; "There are scenes which may be read by the most sagacious critic, and defy the severest scrutiny. The characters of the noble Auria, the precise and scrupulous Aurelio, the discontented Malfato, and the gay Adurni, are well contrasted with the strutting Guzman, the conceited Fulgoso, and the roaring Benatzi. In Castanna and Spinella, Ford evinces that his skill in the delineation of the female character had not deserted him to the last. The parting scene of Auria and his wife in the first act, his altercation with the friend of his heart in the third; the arraignment of Adurni in the fourth, and the reconciliation of Spinella and Auria in the last, would not disgrace the pages of any of his dramatic contemporaries." The gist of the plot is briefly, that whilst in enjoyment of all temporal dignities, the husband can find no happiness until his wife whom he falsely supposed unchaste, has returned to him with proofs of her innocence. The following is Auria's advice to Spinella, on his departure for the wars.

The steps
Young ladies tread left to their own discretion,

However wisely printed, are observed
 And construed as the lookers-on presume :
 Point out thy ways then in such even paths,
 As thine own jealousies from others' tongues
 May not intrude a guilt, tho' undeserved.
 Admit of visits as of physic forced,
 Not to procure health, but for safe prevention
 Against a growing sickness ; in thy use
 Of time and of discourse be found so thrifty,
 As no remembrance may impeach thy rest ;
 Appear not in a fashion that can prompt
 The gazer's eye, or holla to report ;
 Some widow'd neglect of hand, some value ;
 In recreations be both wise and free ;
 Live still at home, home to thyself, howe'er
 Enriched with noble company ; remember
 A woman's virtue, in her lifetime, writes
 The epitaph all covet on their tombs :
 In short, I know thou never wilt forget
 Whose wife thou art, nor how upon thy lips
 Thy husband at his parting seal'd this kiss.—
 No more.

This passage has many strikingly elegant points: the anxious care with which the husband dictates the proper course of conduct to be pursued by his wife, is admirably penned. Perhaps, however, if husbands in that as well as the present day, treated their wives more like human beings and less like slaves or pets, who were withdrawn from the domestic influence by a day's absence, there would be considerably more family comfort in this world. The following outburst in which Malfato works up his personal spleen against the lord Adurui into a fancied slight upon his social position, has been much and deservedly admired.

A gentleman, free born ; I never wore
 The rags of any great man's looks, nor fed
 Upon their after-meals ; I never crouch'd
 Unto the offal of an office promised,
 Reward for long attendance, and then miss'd.
 I read no difference betwixt this huge,
 This monstrous big word lord, and gentleman,
 More than the title sounds ; for ought I learn,
 The latter is as noble as the first,
 I'm sure more ancient.

We may as well mention here, that there is nothing more extant of which John Ford was the undoubted author. Of the "Sun's Darling," a masque, by Ford and Dekker, and of the Witch of Edmonton, a tragedy, by Ford, Rowley, and several others, we forbear saying anything, since it is impossible to discriminate correctly and precisely as to what particular parts came from our author's hand. And with the others, we have nothing here to do. Nevertheless, we may state that they are very meritorious productions: the plot of the former is ingenious and the language beautiful, the latter is founded on the superstition so prevalent through Christendom during the seventeenth century. Nor must we omit to notice the numerous beautiful little songs which are scattered through the preceding pages. Some of them are perfect gems, and will recall very forcibly to the reader's mind similar verses, which we meet in Shakspeare and Ben Jonson. We give as specimens, three or four :

SONG—From the Lover's Melancholy.

Fly hence, shadows, that do keep
 Watchful sorrows charmed in sleep!
 Though the eyes be overtaken,
 Yet the heart doth ever waken
 Thoughts, chained up in busy snares
 Of continual woes and cares :
 Loves and griefs are so expressed,
 As they rather sigh than rest.
 Fly hence, shadows, that do keep
 Watchful sorrows charmed in sleep.

The following are from the "Broken Heart," before alluded to.

PENTHEA'S SONG.

Oh, no more, no more ! too late
 Sighs are spent ; the burning tapers
 Of a life as chaste as fate,
 Pure as are unwritten papers,
 Are burned out : no heat, no light
 Now remains ; 'tis ever night.
 Love is dead ; let lover's eyes,
 Locked in endless dreams,
 Th' extremes of all extremes,
 Ope no more, for now love dies,
 Now love dies, implying
 Love's martyrs must be ever, ever dying.

A DIRGE ON CALANTHA'S DEATH.

Glories, pleasures, pomps, delights and ease,
 Can but please
 Outward senses, when the mind
 Is not troubled, or by peace refined.
 Crowns may flourish and decay,
 Beauties shine, but fade away.
 Youth may revel, yet it must
 Lie down in a bed of dust.
 Earthly honours flow and waste,
 Time alone doth change and last.
 Sorrows mingled with contents, prepare
 Rest for care ;
 Love only reigns in death ; though art
 Can find no comfort for a Broken Heart.

We have thus briefly noticed all that remains of Ford's compositions. Other plays he undoubtedly composed, but they were never published, and the manuscripts are no longer extant. Every thing connected with our author seems to have hazarded existence ; his very death is unknown, when, where, or how. There is good reason to suppose, however, that he did not survive long after 1640—but nothing positive can be adduced on this point. The tales told of his contests with Ben Jonson, etc. are at present received with no credit: they are undoubtedly forgeries of the last century ; Malone and Campbell regard them in this light. Ford's compositions are remarkable for the extreme delicacy with which the female character, particularly when depressoed by adverse circumstances, is portrayed. His melodious and polished versification may be also noticed with praise. Undoubtedly, he is as much inferior, as an author to Ben Jonson, Beaumont, and Fletcher, as they were to Shakspeare. But with Middleton, Rowley, and Massinger, comparisons may be instituted without fear of the consequence by Ford's admirers. His style has much less vigour and masculine energy than Massinger's, but yet possesses far more sweetness and polish. In fine, we may conclude this critique in the language of the inimitable Charles Lamb—"Ford was of the first order of poets. He sought for sublimity, not by parcels in metaphors or visible images, but directly where she has her full residence in the heart of man; in the actions and sufferings of the greatest minds. There is a grandeur of the soul above mountains, seas and the elements. Even in the poor perverted reason of Giovanni and Annabella, (see the Play first noticed in this article,) we discern traces of that fiery particle, which, in the irregular starting from out of the road of beaten action, discovers something of a right line even in obliquity, and shews hints of an improveable greatness in the lowest descents and degradations of our nature."

ADVERTISEMENT EXTRAORDINARY.

By virtue of a decree of the Circuit Superior Court of Law and Chancery for the County of Rockbridge rendered on the 16th of September, 1848, in the case of Joel Lackland vs. Walter K. Cole and others, I shall certainly sell, at public auction, to the highest bidder, for cash, on MONDAY, the 3rd day of Dec. next, the undivided two-thirds of that famous property known to the world as the Natural Bridge of Virginia.

Oh! that Mr. George Robins, who so long rhapsodized in the advertising columns of the London Times over the beauties of real property committed to his hammer,—Robins, whose pen has depicted the glories of the English landscape more fittingly than Christopher North in ink, or Gainsborough in oils, and whose "Visits to Remarkable Places" have conferred on them more enduring celebrity than any pilgrimage of Howitt—oh, that this Prince of Puffs, this most accomplished of auctioneers, this Crichton of criers, were now alive and in Virginia, that he might have the describing and selling of the Natural Bridge! With what generous fervour would he not dwell upon this wondrous specimen of Nature's handiwork, with what a climax of superlatives would he not rise in unfolding the mental emotions inspired by so sublime a spectacle, in what refreshing contrast would not his glowing periods stand to the cold rhetoric of the Commissioner's advertisement in the Richmond Whig! Not that our Commissioner has failed in the duty assigned him by the court, for in the foregoing paragraph, (which we take from the Richmond Whig of October 2nd,) it will be seen that he sets forth the time and terms of sale, (stating in another sentence that it will be conducted on the premises, where else could it be?) and we soon find him, after summing up its advantages as a Tavern Stand, indulging in the following flourish, which we must say is indeed very true.

In the spring, the summer, and the fall seasons, it is the constant resort of large parties, who go thither in pursuit of pleasure, to gratify their curiosity, and to spend their money—and so long as the sublime and wonderful works of nature attract attention, just so long will the Bridge be the resort of the curious, and of the gay and fashionable world.

But is it of "the curious, and of the gay and fashionable world" that the visitors to the Natural Bridge alone consist? Does not some one occasionally descend to the bed of the stream below, and look up to that stupendous arch with feelings other than those of idle curiosity or the disposition of the "gay and fashionable" traveller, who "does" the Natural Bridge as he has "done" perhaps Vesuvius or Sorrento? Alas, why could not our commissioner have been more discursive in his description, why need to be so curt in his panegyric? Oh for the mantle of the defunct Robins, that we might supply what he has so unhappily omitted!

This is an age of marvels: so much so, indeed, that we have hitherto acted on the principle of nul admirari in sheer self-defence. But we confess we were greatly surprised to learn that the Natural Bridge was to be sold. Such a thing had never occurred to us. Somehow—we know not how—we had taken up the idea that it belonged to nobody, that it was a sort of nullius in terra, that it was indeed incapable of transfer from one person to another. It possesses, it is true, in a very marked degree, this characteristic of real property, that it cannot be moved, yet as a mere "piece or parcel of land, lying and being in the County of Rockbridge" we had never learned to regard it. If we had looked upon it as property at all, we should have rather considered it an "incorporeal hereditament" as affecting the imagination, and we should as soon have thought of buying a rainbow or a sunset, evanescent as they are, as becoming the owner of the Natural Bridge. The magnificent phenomena of nature everywhere—Alps, torrents, cataracts, illimitable prairies,—seem to us in their eternal grandeur to mock the efforts of man to reduce them into possession.

And yet the Natural Bridge is for sale, and may be had on the 3rd of December next, by the highest bidder for ready money. We fancy we can see the red flag hanging over the cliff, as a signal to all passers-by of the approaching event. We should like very much to attend, if the weather should prove mild, for the very novelty of the thing. At what value should such a bridge be held? In ordinary structures of this description, the value bears some proportion to the cost of building. But he who should sit down, with card and pencil, to estimate the cost of putting up another Natural Bridge, would be apt, we think, to find the task a pons asinorum.

It may be objected by the reader who thinks of purchasing, that it does not appear, from the advertisement as we have so far given it, that more than two-thirds of the bridge can be purchased after all. And who, says he, would care to hold it by tenancy in common? To be seised per my et per tout, to have an undivided moiety of the whole, would be bad enough, but who would wish for the whole of an undivided moiety? The other tenant might be constantly giving you trouble about the respective interests, and at last ask for a partition. And would not the attempt to divide the Natural Bridge put a hemisphere in commotion? But, my dear sir, we have not given the whole advertisement. Observe: the Commissioner appends a Nota Bene :—

N. B.—I am requested by Col. Jesse Wootten, of Henry co., who is the proprietor of the other third, to say, that he is willing either to sell or lease his interest. He will be present at the sale, and persons who may wish to buy the whole, can have an opportunity of doing so.

And now, sir, come to Virginia and buy the property. It may not be offered for sale again, in the present century. It is perhaps your last chance for this wonder of the world. Consider the satisfaction of inviting a friend to visit my Bridge. You may be able afterwards to buy Niagara, and, in the convulsions of the old world, it may happen that the Giant's Causeway will be in the market. Or perhaps some day or other the Colossus of Rhodes might be had a bargain, or you might get "an eligible property" in the disinhumed streets of Pompeii. Begin with the Bridge, sir, while the opportunity offers, and consider yourself lucky in obtaining it.

We do not wish to throw an obstacle in the way of the Commissioner, but we should like to know in what manner he proposes to make investiture of the property. How shall livery of seisin be performed? Shall the two-thirds or the whole pass, with all the rights, privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging, by mere delivery of a deed? Or shall the old custom of giving "a turf or a twig" be resorted to? And would it be considered a safe tenure to hold it by the twig that Col. Piper caught at, when he made his perilous ascent of the precipice?

We are in a state of perplexity with regard to the whole matter, and with solicitude await the issue of the sale. In the mean time, we beg leave to record the emotions that rise within us in contemplating that event, and trust we shall be pardoned for giving them the shape of

STANZAS ON THE PROPOSED SALE OF THE NATURAL BRIDGE.

A Sale! A Sale! Earth's proudest things are daily bought and sold,

And art and nature coincide in bowing down to gold,
Alas! at such a sale as this, sad thoughts within us rise
Until the Bridge becomes to us a very Bridge of Sighs.

Ho! citizens of Lexington, ho! Keepers of the Springs,
To whom the Bridge a revenue in transient travel brings,
Rebuke the cruel auctioneer with your severest frowns,
Before in his destructiveness he seeks to knock it down!

At least, ere he proceeds to such extremity as that,
Be good enough to bid him first remember what he's at,
Let even-handed Justice too, cry loudly in his ears
That he should give this ancient bridge a Trial by its Piers.

Now, by the bones of Captain Smith, how shall he dare to cry
(For crying's his "vocation, Hal," though with unmoistened eye),

That this great span which hath endured for centuries unknown,
At bidding of a purchaser is going, going, gone!

Oh, for a Wordsworth's flowing lines to sonnetize the Bridge
And paint in Tintern Abbey tints the Valley and the Ridge,
But what's words' worth in such a task as lies before us here,
As little as to give the face of placid Windermere.

The only ode, oh noble Bridge, that should be sung to thee
Is heard among the mountain pines and heard upon the lea,
A Miserere lofty as that anthem of the surge,
When on the sunset strand it chants the day's departing dirge.

The earth is full of stately works of monumental pride—
The famed Rialto thrown above the dark Venetian tide—
And pyramids and obelisks of ages passed away—
And friezes of Pentelicus majestic in decay :—

But arches, domes, colossal piles, that human skill has wrought,
All, all, when in comparison with thy proportions brought,
Are fleeting as the palaces fantastically vain,
That Russian monarchs rear in ice on Neva's frozen plain!

A Saxon Priest once stood beneath the Coliseum's wall,
 And augured that the globe itself should topple with its fall!*
 Oh when this mighty arch of stone shall from its base be hurled,
 An elemental war shall work the ruin of the world!

Σ

* See Gibbon's Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire.
 "While stands the Coliseum, Rome shall stand,
 When falls the Coliseum, Rome shall fall,
 And when Rome falls, the world!"—Childe Harold.

THE SELDENS OF SHERWOOD.

CHAPTER I.

Therefore farewell! I go my soul may fail me,
 As the heart panteth for the water brooks,
 Yearning for thy sweet looks—
 But thou, my first born, droop not, nor bewail me;
 Thou in the Shadow of the Rock shalt dwell,
 The Rock of Strength—Farewell!

Mrs. Hemans.

TO REV. CHARLES SELDEN.

My Beloved Son:—Here I am, in the library, sitting before an open window, with the mocking bird singing in the rose bush, the door locked, and all cares and duties imposed upon Margaret, that I may have nothing to disturb the pleasure of unrestrained communion with you. I shall never be able to fill up the blank occasioned by your absence, nor do I even wish to do so, and yet I would not recall you. I did not give you up without counting the cost, nor do I repent the sacrifice, but rejoice in the firmness with which you have pursued your course, convinced that no earthly object of desire or ambition could confer such high and everlasting happiness upon you as the path of action you have chosen. The soul, naturally immortal in its desires, can only find repose and happiness by coming to that Fountain of living water which he who drinketh of shall never thirst; then all earthly things, assuming their due subordination and value, yield the measure and degree of pleasure which they were designed to convey, and in this sense do "the meek inherit the earth." They may pluck each flower from the path of life, and without sorrow or surprise, observe its beauty vanish and its lustre fade; they know that these flowers were not immortal, but only types of those which shall bloom for us in Paradise.

I have always thought the calling of a minister not only the most holy, but the highest and most extensively useful vocation that a human being could follow. Preaching is but one, and not the most important of his duties, for it is the business of his life to promote good and repress evil in all their forms. What an infinite field for action here presents itself, action too, attended with the delightful reflection, that when all earthly things have vanished away, not an effort that has been made in this field shall be lost!

I saw Mr. Carter from your parish yesterday, and felt as if he were a parishioner of my own. He spoke of you with so much kindness, that I found it impossible to remember he was only the acquaintance of a day, and should I dare say have forgotten the dignity of manner necessary for a matron of my age and Mrs. Selden of Sherwood (as you know your father calls me sometimes, when he wishes to recall me to a sense of my position in society,) if I had not observed Mr. Selden's eye fixed upon me. Mr. Carter seemed to enter into my feelings, described to me your style of preaching, and told me several anecdotes in which I recognized my own Charles so plainly that I could have vouched for their authenticity. During our conversation your father was apparently engaged in looking over a newspaper, but I believe not a word we said was lost upon him, for I observed his eyes wandered several times towards the place we were sitting, and I saw a suppressed smile lurking occasionally around the corners of his mouth.

I am delighted to hear your aunt Mason has at length arrived, her society and assistance will prove invaluable to you. Brought up as you have been, I am sure you could not be altogether comfortable without some female companionship; indeed, the best and gentlest of men require some such softening. A habit of practising the "small, sweet courtesies of life," the necessity of daily consideration for the wants and wishes of those around us are necessary to unfold the germs of love, of patience, of disinterestedness within our hearts, and gives them vigor for the great trials of life.—I have read and reread your letters so often that they are almost worn out; I found Margaret carefully repairing your first, yesterday morning, with a cambrie needle and the finest thread she could procure. Your letters convey to me so vivid an idea of your feelings, your employments, your neighbors and your household, that as I read them you seem present with me, and I feel sometimes almost like answering you aloud.

But I must remember that you will want to hear every thing about home, and abridge all that I should like to say about yourself. Your father, I see, misses you sadly, though of course he would not express what he considers a weakness; he seems more than usually restless, and as motion is Arthur's element they have become almost constant companions. I marvel how they can go on fishing, walking, riding and projecting for ever. This may do for a while, until Mr. Selden's spirits recover their usual tone, but then I really must persuade him to join with me in endeavoring to induce Arthur to devote some time to reading and study, and to form some definite and rational plan of life. Arthur's spirits are so buoyant, his love of novelty and adventure so great, that I have always feared to urge him respecting his future plans, lest he should wander off on some wild pursuit. With a thousand good feelings and fine traits of character, he is a source of great anxiety to me, poor fellow. God grant he may never come to harm!

Reginald continues as much devoted to study as ever, too much so indeed, for it makes him silent and abstracted, and prevents his contributing to the happiness of the family, or receiving pleasure from them in return. Your father applauds his diligence, and seems proud of his talents, but has entirely given up trying to make a companion of him as lost labor; he is succeeding remarkably well at the practice of law, and made a speech the other day which was greatly admired and complimented by his professional brethren as well as others. Mr. Selden was greatly delighted at his success, and I should also have been much gratified but for the thought that it is only adding fuel to the flame, which is already consuming him. I labor in vain to inspire him with other and higher views and to check his ambitious aspirations,—they are too strong for me to hope to control,—and I feel daily that I have arrived at the most trying stage of a mother's existence, when she can only watch over without the least power of controlling the destinies of her children.

We have two young men added to our circle of acquaintance here, who seem to have caused a great sensation in the community, one of them I fear is destined to disturb our tranquillity, and I wish from my heart he had remained in Philadelphia. The elder of these two young gentlemen, Gerald Devereux, is a native of Ireland, though he left it during his infancy; he has no parents and has lived, since his recollection, with his uncle, Mr. Fitzgerald, who came over to America more than twenty years ago. Though I have seen him several times, my opinion is scarcely yet settled, even as it regards his manner and appearance, to say nothing of his character; of the superiority of his mental endowments and qualifications there can be no doubt; it would be impossible to converse with him an hour without perceiving the extraordinary power of his intellect. This superiority, however, is manifested without the slightest effort, apparently without the slightest consciousness of its existence. His appearance is striking, whether it is handsome or not I am unable to say, but when you observe the play of his countenance it has all the effect of beauty; as to the interest it excites, the expression of his face is perpetually changing, and these very changes rivet your attention, sometimes from the impossibility of decyphering their meaning, sometimes from the depth of feeling which they express. His manner is very distinguished, yet it is not the manner formed by much intercourse with the world, or fashionable society; indeed, there is so much of individuality about him that I believe he would never, under any circumstances, have received what are called highly polished manners.

His companion, Augustus Vernon, is totally different in mind, manner and appearance. He has a face such as would be termed beautiful, with all the delicacy and brilliancy of feminine beauty, and a slight, graceful figure, in short, is just such a looking man, that it would be almost miraculous if he escaped being a coxcomb. Just such an exterior as his I should consider one of the greatest natural disadvantages for one of my sons. His manners are all softness, extremely polished, and his mind appears to me to be thoroughly common-place, though as he has evidently read many works of fiction, and has a good memory, he knows how to shine in borrowed plumage. I cannot of course speak with any certainty of the moral qualities of either of these gentlemen, but confess that I am inclined to judge rather unfavorably of Mr. Vernon in this respect. Margaret's opinion of the merits of this gentleman coincide with mine; unfortunately, Virginia seems to have arrived at very different conclusions on this subject.

I fear, greatly fear, that Virginia's fancy is so much captivated by the external attractions of this Augustus Vernon, that her affections will soon be fixed, past the power of recalling them, and this would be sad indeed, for if my views of his character are correct, it would be impossible for such an attachment to be productive of happiness. He professes, I understand, the most unbounded admiration for Virginia, and his every glance towards her is a declaration of love, and yet I doubt whether his heart is really at all touched. Personal idolatry effectually excludes love, and I am sure he is not capable of feeling it. But even if he really loved Virginia, it would make me very unhappy to see her married to such a man, and were I to oppose her wishes on the subject it would be a source of much misery both to her and myself.

Virginia lives in a world of illusions, and her sensibility, you know, is excessive; she must suffer much before the fairy world in which she lives, can be divested of its enchantments, and all things can appear to her in their proper hues and colors, and I know not how a heart so soft and sensitive as hers can undergo the rough experience of life without being crushed or broken. How much I wish I could endow her with the strength of mind of my noble Margaret. Every day I feel more deeply the value of such a character as hers; she is like another right hand to me, I hardly know how I could get through life without her. My confidence in her is so great that I am never uneasy as to how she will act in any situation, nor am I tormented with apprehensions as to her future fate. Her happiness is beyond the power of external circumstances, for it is derived from the love of God and from internal resources. Margaret may feel the trials of life, and doubtless will, for her feelings are unusually strong, but she can never be miserable, for she bears within her heart a perennial fountain of strength and hope. Poor Virginia is a frail flower, bending beneath every gale of feeling and always requiring a prop.

I must conclude this long epistle, as I hear your father's voice in the passage inquiring for me. Write soon, my dear son, and be as minute as you can upon every thing respecting yourself; you cannot dwell too long on this subject for me. Give my best love to Charlotte and the boys, tell her if I can persuade Mr. Selden that Sherwood can exist for a week without me, I shall endeavor to pay you a visit in the course of a few weeks. I must not forget to send the united love and remembrances of all the family, servants included, who never fail to inquire most affectionately about you, and request that whenever I write I will send their best respects to "Mas Charles." That God may bless and preserve my dear son is the constant prayer of his devoted mother,

M. SELDEN.

CHAPTER XI.

Whilst skies are blue and bright,
Whilst flowers are gay,
Whilst eyes that change ere night
Make glad the day;
Whilst yet the calm hours creep,
Dream thou—and from thy sleep
Then wake to weep.—Shelley.

"Sing me some sweet song, Margaret," said Arthur, who was lying on a sofa in the parlor, suffering under temporary confinement from a severe sprain in the ankle which he had received the day before from the kick of a refractory horse he had been attempting to subdue.

Margaret had a voice which, with a little scientific cultivation, might have made the fortune of a public singer; it was clear, flexible, strong and surpassingly sweet, alike capable of expressing grand, pathetic, or humorous emotion. She immediately began to sing one of Burns' inimitable songs, with exquisite taste and feeling, but just as she had commenced the concluding stanza, light footsteps were heard in the passage, and Virginia's cheek instantly became crimson, and the flowers trembled in her bosom as if they had been shaken by a breeze.

Arthur was listening with a sense of pleasure to Margaret's song, but he was never so much absorbed as to be unobservant of what was passing around him, and his quick eye immediately detected the change in Virginia's face. "What is the matter, Virginia, what has happened?"

"Nothing," said Virginia, striving to answer with an unconcerned air, "but I thought I heard footsteps in the passage."

"Is that all?" said Arthur smiling, and Margaret stopping short in her song as soon as she had glanced towards Virginia, rose to receive the guests.

Gerald Devereux and Augustus Vernon entered. The latter cast a delighted glance of admiration towards Virginia and exclaimed, with a theatrical air,

"Can any mortal mixture of earth's mould
Breathe such divine, enchanting ravishment?"

Virginia blushed deeply, and for the first time in her life envied Margaret's beautiful voice. She did not observe that Gerald Devereux also looked towards her, and that his countenance expressed genuine emotion and feeling, excited by the song to which they had been listeners.

"Will you have the goodness," said Gerald Devereux, "to sing that beautiful song once again for us, otherwise I shall not forgive myself for having interrupted it;" he turned towards Virginia as he spoke, and she replied with some embarrassment—

"You must address the petition to Margaret, it was her voice you heard."

Augustus Vernon cast a look upon Margaret, which said as plainly as words could have expressed the thought—Is it possible?

The smile of good-humored amusement, with which Margaret met Mr. Vernon's glance, was not lost upon Gerald Devereux, who turning instantly to Margaret, said

"I appeal then to Miss Selden's good nature to grant my request, and I am sure such an appeal cannot be made in vain."

Margaret colored slightly, and without one disclaiming or modest speech, instantly recommenced the song, to which Gerald Devereux listened with rapt attention. Arthur declared afterwards he saw a tear glisten in his eye, but this remained questionable. Augustus listened with an air of languid and polite attention, plainly evinced that he had no genuine taste for music, and employed himself in arranging and re-arranging a beautiful bouquet of flowers he held in his hand.

The last sweet tones of Margaret's voice had scarcely died away on the ear, when Augustus arose, and seating himself by Virginia, presented the bouquet to her with a smile meant to be ineffably sweet, and said in a tone soft as a sigh, "Is it not a beautiful idea, to represent the emotions of the heart, by fair and fragile flowers, and to consider these lovely?"—he paused a little, as his sentence was not constructed exactly as he had designed, then continued—"and to view beautiful and fragrant blossoms, as emblematic of the attributes of the loveliest and most enchanting portions of creation?"

Virginia's face, which was always a faithful mirror of her feelings, showed that she thought this speech very beautiful, and she received the bouquet, with a blushing cheek and tremulous hand, saying, with a forced smile—

"I have always thought flowers had a language of their own."

"Surely they have," said Augustus, with a significant air, as if he thought they had both been guided by some mysterious sympathy, to a wonderful discovery.

"Pray, what do rue and tansy express?" said Arthur, who did not half like the sentimental tone the conversation was assuming, nor the extreme tenderness of Mr. Vernon's tone and manner.

Mr. Vernon raised his brilliant eyes, fixed them for a moment with a smile upon Arthur, as if to imply that such a question did not deserve an answer, then turned again towards Virginia, and meditated a speech.

"Rue and tansy," said Margaret with a smile, determined to give a light and general tone to the conversation, "express useful qualities with a plain exterior."

"I confess myself a worshipper of beauty," said Augustus, with a furtive glance towards Virginia, "I shall never pluck rue or tansy to place in my bosom, but leave them to wither with their useful qualities, in the kitchen garden; no, the blushing rose, the snowy lily must form my bouquet."

Virginia, vexed at the conscious blush which she felt on her cheek, bent over her work and assiduously employed herself in netting a silk purse.

"Alas poor rue and tansy!" said Arthur with a mock-heroic air.

"Do you not perceive that there is a beauty of expression, as well as of form and coloring?" said Mr. Devereux addressing himself to Augustus. "We would not reject the mignon-nette because it does not possess external beauty."

"No, we prize the mignonnette for its fragrance."

"But this is not external beauty—the fragrance of the mignonnette is the beauty of the soul, shedding a hidden charm around it, not the less strong from its being invisible."

"Such a sentiment as that diluted into a sonnet," said Arthur, smiling, "would quite establish your reputation as a poet."

"I do not aspire to the laurel crown," replied Gerald. "I am sure I could not write a sonnet if my life depended upon it. When I was about fifteen, I was very fond of beginning epics and tragedies in five acts, but I seldom proceeded beyond a few pages, before my plots became entangled in such inextricable confusion, that I would destroy the old web in despair, and begin to weave a new one, which was fated to have no better success."

Arthur and Margaret laughed, but neither Augustus or Virginia appeared to hear or see any thing that was passing around them.

"For my part," said Arthur, "I can never proceed to the length of forming a poetical idea; ghosts of ideas fit before me sometimes, but as soon as I attempt to seize them, they are gone again like Will-o'-the-Wisps."

"Are you not fond of poetry?" said Augustus to Virginia, "but why should I ask such a stupid question, I know that you must be passionately devoted to it."

"I have always been extremely fond of poetry, indeed, too fond, for it has beguiled me of many hours that ought to have been differently spent."

"I can scarcely conceive how your life could be spent otherwise than amid poetry and flowers."

Vain as Augustus Vernon was, he could scarcely have conceived the depth and delight of the emotions which speeches such as these, made for the hundredth time, caused in Virginia's sensitive and unpractised heart. Margaret heard his soft accents, and observed his sweet glances directed towards Virginia, with a degree of disturbance and vexation it required her utmost efforts to conceal. After revolving various methods to detach him from her sister's side, a happy idea occurred to her—to request him to favor them with his performance on the flute.

Augustus, like many other ordinary performers on this instrument, was passionately fond of it, and feeling somewhat flattered at the request, did not hesitate to comply with it. He played with a thousand airs and graces, and introduced various flourishes, which Margaret wished devoutly could strike Virginia's eyes and ears exactly as they did her own. But it was wonderful that a woman of Margaret's sense, possessing her knowledge of Virginia's character, could for a moment have entertained so vain an idea. Virginia listened with delight, and internally compared Augustus to all the heroes of romance with whom she was acquainted, and finally concluded that he bore a striking resemblance to Valencourt in the Mysteries of Udolpho.

When Augustus Vernon had finished his performance, and laid aside the flute, Arthur inquired of Gerald Devereux if he was not a performer on that instrument.

"Oh, no—I once made some execrable attempts at Gramachree, and a few more old Irish melodies, but fortunately for myself and others, I soon desisted. I am sure I have no musical talent, though I believe no one feels more exquisite enjoyment than I do in listening to a fine song well sung. Indeed, I can listen with pleasure to the tones of a voice, without much compass or variety, if they do but express any genuine feeling with sweetness and simplicity, but instrumental music, unless it is excellent, is to me almost intolerable. Even the best instrumental music is a soul without a body, and we are not always sufficiently spiritual to understand its expression; we want words to make the idea palpable; but when it is merely ordinary, it jars upon the senses like discord, it is only a noise, nothing more, and the lower, the more unobtrusive the noise, the better it suits my taste."

Margaret smiled, but felt a little uneasy, as to whether Augustus would not understand the latter part of Gerald Devereux's speech to refer to his performance, but she was soon re-assured by the bright smile of self-complacency that played on his lips.

The conversation now became more general, more animated. Margaret had formed a high estimate of Gerald Devereux's mind from their first acquaintance; but she had no idea of the extent and variety of his powers, for now without the least wish for display, he scattered carelessly around rich treasures of thought and brilliant gems of wit. His transitions from the noble and elevated to the humorous and pathetic, were so gracefully, yet often so rapidly made, as to produce the effect of delighted surprise on his auditors. The intellects even of the most brilliant and highly gifted of our species, are generally in a half-slumbering state; a moderate exercise of a moderate portion of our faculties, is found quite sufficient for the common purposes of life or society, but when a bright moment arrives when the mind is wide awake, what a world of thought, of fancy, does the child of genius spread out, as if by the stroke of a magic wand. The electric spark is communicated to all who are capable of receiving it, and all partake of a kind of delighted astonishment at the beauty, variety and elevation of the thoughts, which, rousing from their slumber, almost unconsciously to the speaker, clothe themselves in words.

Carried away by the interest, which Gerald Devereux's conversation excited, Margaret, Arthur, and Mrs. Selden, who had joined the company, found themselves uttering so many good things, as to occasion them not only pleasure but surprise. One striking thought, one bright sally followed another, and it was one of those evenings which all present would have marked with a white stone.

Virginia and Augustus did not partake of the general inspiration; they seemed absorbed in themselves, and in each other. Gerald Devereux addressed several remarks to Virginia, for he wished to draw out the spirit that dwelt in so fair a shrine, but Virginia answered briefly though politely, and evidently felt no interest in the conversation that was going on around her.

CHAPTER XII.

Oh, 'tis the heart that magnifies this life
Making a truth and beauty all its own.

Wordsworth.

And what was Charles Selden doing all this while? His father would at least have had no reason to regret the inactivity of a minister's life, could he have seen Charles' daily employments. From the earliest dawn until a late hour at night, his occupations were incessant, and the field of duty seemed continually extending before him. No duty was too humble, or too laborious, or too painful for him to perform willingly, animated by that "love which makes all things possible." He had given up his mind to the study of truth, in the noblest form in which it can manifest itself to the mind of man—religious truth, and from this source of all truth, he was continually led to explore its tributary streams—the various branches of human knowledge, all of which pour their waters into this inexhaustible ocean, though it requires that the eye should be full of light to discover their connection with the fountain into which they empty themselves. In the branches of natural science he traced with continually increasing delight, wonderful displays of the love and power of God, and perceived the various uses to which they might be applied for the benefit of his brethren, for such he truly considered all mankind. History he studied not as a mere collection of facts, not to support any particular theory, but to him it was interesting in the highest degree from its revelations of the dark and sad mysteries of the human heart, from the light which it throws on the dealings of God with man; when he considered the progress and connection of events in universal history, how often was his heart elevated in wonder and love to that Supreme Being who from "seeming evil still deduces good." Philological and metaphysical studies especially connected themselves with the profession which he had chosen—and in such pursuits the accuracy and subtlety of his mind, and his power of abstraction from the material world, were increased. Every species of knowledge and literature had charms for him, and every pursuit was connected with, and made subservient to, the great purposes of religion. "To the pure, all things are pure;" when the heart is softened, and the mind enlightened by the doctrines of genuine Christianity, then the eye becomes single and full of light—it is fitted to see truth wherever it may be found.

The moral world, illumined by love and faith, no longer appeared to Charles' vision as a dark chaos in which good and evil contended for mastery: the vices and follies of mankind no longer excited in his mind contempt or disgust;—the world presented to him a vast field of usefulness and labor, where glorious victories were to be won, where immortal souls were to be rescued from bondage and slavery, and made partakers of unspeakable and undying happiness;—vice and folly he regarded as a skilful physician would the diseases of his patients—the more loathsome, the more inveterate the malady, the more earnest became his desire to remove it, and the more intense his compassion for the sufferer.

A letter which Mrs. Mason addressed about this time to her sister, will give some idea of Charles Selden in the character of a country parson.

Mrs. Mason to Mrs. Selden.

I have been intending for many days, my dear sister, to allow myself the privilege of saying every thing good, bad, and indifferent to you, just as they arise in my mind, precisely as if I were sitting by your side, as in the happy days of old. I have been so busily engaged in making household arrangements, which you would have accomplished in the tenth part of the time it has taken me to effect them, and in paying and receiving visits, together with attempting to assist Charles in his multifarious duties, that I have not had a spare moment. I have always considered myself as a rather industrious person, but really this dear Charles of ours puts me completely to shame, and makes me think sometimes, that I have never until now understood what a true Christian can, and ought to be. From the earliest dawn until a late hour at night, his labors are incessant, and yet to observe the constant kindness and cheerfulness of his manner, you would never imagine them to be labors. I am often surprised at minute instances of his thoughtfulness for my comfort, and for the happiness and improvement of my boys; he has the happy faculty of being able to bring from his studies and grave occupations, a mind present to all around him, and ready to seize every passing occasion of entertainment and improvement.

The first time I went to church after my arrival here, it was with an odd mixture of sensations, that I could scarcely describe. As soon as Charles commenced his sermon, I hung my head involuntarily, and felt as much dread and embarrassment as if I had been about to address the congregation myself. The first tones of his voice, however, and the first glance I cast upon him, completely re-assured me; it was evident that he was wholly engrossed with his subject, and earnestly endeavoring to awaken in the minds of his hearers, a sense of its unspeakable importance, and to kindle in their hearts the flame of divine love which burned so brightly in his own. His voice and manner are surpassingly good, but so natural as completely to disarm criticism; and the best proof of his excellence consists in the interest and attention which you observe painted on the countenances of his auditors.

I breathed freely, then a little proudly, then almost forgot it was Charles to whom I was listening, in the interest inspired by the subject, and his manner of treating it, and in the searching examination, which he led his hearers to make of their own hearts.

As yet the whole work is before him, of establishing a spiritual church, with the Divine aid which I think is clearly promised in the Gospel to efforts such as his. The congregation is large, and composed chiefly of the most reputable inhabitants of the county. There are many nominal members of the church and some communicants; most of whom have been accustomed to consider it as a suitable and necessary thing for a member of the Episcopal Church to partake of the sacred ordinance without considering its spiritual uses or requisitions. Many, too, of his hearers are infected with the prevailing spirit of infidelity, and come to listen to his discourses to criticise and refute, but the evident ininterest which is excited by his sermons in all classes, makes me hope that a spirit of investigation may be awakened in the minds even of scoffers and unbelievers.

Charles seems to have greatly at heart the spiritual and physical improvement of the poorest and most ignorant of his parishioners, and the instruction of the children belonging to the congregation. To his own servants, and to any of the colored people, whom he can induce to seek religious knowledge, he gives plain, impressive oral instruction, so well adapted to their capacities and peculiar modes of thinking, that I, who have been present on some of these occasions, have been more struck with these simple and forcible expositions of truth, as a proof of talent in the minister who delivered them, than I have been in listening to many fine and highly polished discourses. You have reason to rejoice in such a son, my dear sister: it would be impossible to appreciate him too highly.

Fortunately, Charles has not perceived the very strong interest he has excited in some of the young ladies of the congregation, as it might throw an unpleasant restraint over his manner; and now he is perfectly unconscious and at his ease. One of the most prominent of his admirers, in this class of society, is a Miss Anna Maria Travers, daughter of George Travers, with whom brother James was formerly well acquainted, and a Miss Susan Brooke, who, she says, frequently saw you during your days of belleship, and admired you very much, though she was never very well acquainted with you. Both Mr. Travers and his wife seem very kind-hearted. They took Charles warmly by the hand as soon as he settled here, and though the old gentleman appears to think he pushes his notions on religious subjects too far, he is evidently inclined to view his actions and opinions with the greatest indulgence. Charles' conduct and opinions being so different from those of most men, they have excited not only admiration and curiosity, but censure, malignant criticism and misinterpretation. On one occasion, when his character was severely handled, I heard that Mr. Travers defended him with much warmth. Mrs. Travers is extremely kind and inoffensive, but as simple as possible, and so fearful of giving offence that I believe she would not give her own children advice which she thought would be disagreeable. She is an excellent housekeeper, and indulges the natural kindness of her disposition, by attending to the bodily wants of all around her, with the agreeable consciousness, that such attentions can never give offence. Consequently she is one of the most popular ladies in the county, and I have never heard a gentleman mention her without praise, though commendations of her puddings, her pastry, and her coffee, are sure to form a considerable part of her eulogy.

The young people of the family have of course grown up without control, and have followed the natural bent of their characters, or formed themselves after some fantastic models. Anna Maria, the eldest of the young ladies, has unfortunately chosen the latter method; for nature in her rudest forms is preferable to affectation, and I prefer the hoyden and giddy Juliana, and even the indifference which George manifests for every one's pleasure but his own, to the artificial character which Anna Maria seems, with infinite pains, to have formed. She has aimed at a mixture of piety and romance, without understanding the nature of either, and her character is a ridiculous medley of contradictory pretensions; it is evident to every one but Charles, that she has made what would be called a dead set at him, and it would amuse you to see the quiet unconsciousness of his manner, and to hear the dry simplicity of his remarks, in answer to some of her elaborate speeches, intended to excite his sympathy and admiration.

But Mr. Travers has an inmate of his house, a niece, Edith Fitzgerald, whose society is really delightful, she has so much character, talent and originality, with noble and generous feeling. She lost her mother, unfortunately, early in life, and has had no female friend to supply her place, so that the want of feminine training and influence are evident in her character and manner. There is nothing bold or unfeminine about her, but there is a sort of lofty independence and disregard for public opinion, a self-reliance, and promptness in action, which seem rather to belong to young men than to young women. She has not yet learned that the weapons of a woman's warfare must be rather defensive than offensive, and that it is impossible to pass on unwounded, without the shield and buckler of prudence and reserve. Yet she has so much candor, generosity, and tenderness of feeling mingled with spirit, that she really fascinates me, and the lights almost make me forget the shadows of her character.

I think I see you smile and say, "Charlotte is as apt to let her fancies run away with her, as she was at sixteen—how can she know so much of this young lady in so short a time." To this, I would reply, You are mistaken, dear sister; my proneness to take violent fancies, and form sudden friendships, has entirely vanished, indeed I view things in too sober a light now, but there really are some extraordinary persons left in the world, and there are some indications of intellectual and moral superiority about them, which cannot be mistaken, and yet, in some cases, cannot be so satisfactorily described, as to convince those who have never seen these gifted individuals, of the reality of their existence. Edith Fitzgerald is certainly one of these, as you will acknowledge when you see her, as I hope you will ere long.

Charles and I are expecting the promised week with much impatience, and Frank and Gustavus ask me every day when Aunt Selden and their cousins are coming. Every thing is assuming quite a pleasant and comfortable aspect around us, and I begin to have a home feeling here, which gives one you know a sort of individual attachment to all the objects around. Art has done but little for the place: some weeping-willows and Pride of China trees have been planted in times of yore, which have now attained a noble size, and we have a rustic porch covered with sweet honeysuckle and white jessamine, which have matted themselves together in neglected luxuriance. These with some beds of pinks and violets, roses, lilacs, guelder-roses and holly-hocks, disposed in straight and ample borders in an old-fashioned garden, are the only monuments remaining of the tastes of our predecessors. But we have a noble grove of oaks, some groups of tulip trees and elms planted by nature, and permitted to remain; a level covered with a thick velvet turf extending for about a hundred yards before the front door and terminating in a gentle slope; a beautiful view of the James River, of fields and forests so mingled as to produce the most striking and pleasing effects of light and shade; then from the east and west windows of the house, we look upon valleys covered with rich natural growth, and almost every tree festooned with the graceful branches of our wild grape vines.

Tell Margaret she must be very diligent in collecting flower-seed, and raising cuttings for "The Rectory," as Charles is very intent on having a flower-garden, and giving an air of order and beauty to the grounds. You know I have a natural fondness for flowers; but this, with many of my youthful tastes, has so long slumbered, that I do not think it would ever have awakened sufficiently to inspire me with a real taste for their cultivation, but for the desire of pleasing Charles.

If I did not love Charles so very much, I should think myself bound by gratitude to consult even his most trifling wishes, for it would be impossible to describe his affectionate and unweary consideration for the welfare and happiness of myself and children. But I love him too much, and have too much confidence in his regard, to feel grateful, if you can understand this apparent paradox, and seek to please him only for the pleasure of doing so.

Charles has just entered to beg my assistance as physician and apothecary, for I fill both these offices with some reputation. A poor family near us are suffering with chills and fevers, and I have not only to prepare medicine, but rice, broth, &c., &c. Then I must have dinner served up in a few minutes, as he is anxious to set out as soon as possible to visit a sick parishioner, so I must bid you a hasty adieu.

Ever yours,

C. MASON.

F**.

NATIONAL LYRICS.

BY JAMES W. SIMMONS.

BATTLE OF FORT MOULTRIE.

When science, with disdainful eye,
Mark'd the palmettoes from the wood,
She bade the hero turn and fly,
Nor vainly bathe their leaves in blood,*
Calm and majestic as the sea
Upon whose shores that structure rose,
Surrounded by his chivalry,
The warrior turn'd—to meet his foes!

Though each red minister of death,
From bulwarks frowning o'er the main,
Would stifle Freedom's struggling breath,
Nor mark her spirit soar again!
Yet those who from meridian light
Are snatch'd, their destiny fulfil,—
Since he who falls from that proud height,
Falls in the midst of Glory still!—

From out the city's distant spires
A thousand forms are seen to rise;
A thousand hearts, whose native fires
Rivalled the glow of those fierce skies!
A thousand tongues, denied to speak,
As, far along the brine,
With horrent sides, and haughty beak,
Now moved the British line!

Within that low, dark structure, lay
Souls with its ribs that vied;
As that stern host in long array,
Came down upon the tide!
In gallant trim, and steadily
To their stations as they sweep,
Flashed Moultrie's red artillery,
Like volcano of the deep!

Now, in answer'ing thunder driven,
Each bold Briton plied his deck;
But their foremost ship is riven,
And lies a baffled wreck!
Again, again the fierce eclipse,
As it rose from out that isle,
Bathed in blood the reeling ships,
And their ribs of rock groaned the while!

To that hurricane salute
Twice a hundred guns replied!
But each messenger fell mute
In the soft palmetto's side: †
"The Commodore!" ‡ our Moultrie said—
Her decks withered at the word!
Amid ranks where lay the dead,
Scarce a living figure stirred!

* Accustomed to the scientific structures of Europe, General Charles Lee, when his eye fell upon Moultrie's palmetto fort, sneeringly pronounced it a "slaughter-pen," and advised its immediate abandonment.

† The wood of the palmetto is soft and spongy.

‡ The English Flag-Ship.

And "Fire!" followed ev'ry roar
Of the true palmetto's thunder,
That shook the sea and shore,
And rent the foe asunder!
And as now came down the night
O'er the island and the bay,
Told her guns' quick flashing light,
Where that noble fortress lay!

But ere the noon was passed,
There was silence on the deep,
For the foe, in wounded haste,
Slipped his cables from their keep!
Then rose a sound upon the sea,
As of battle waged again—
It was the cry of "Victory!"
From Moultrie and his men.

THE LATE CHAPMAN JOHNSON, ESQ.

The death of Chapman Johnson has left a gap in the foremost rank of our illustrious men, that will not soon be filled. And his loss is felt the more sensibly, because it followed so closely upon the demise of another of Virginia's noblest sons—his associate in youth—his competitor in the race of usefulness and honor, wherein both were victors,—his bosom friend from early manhood till the last moment of life. Benjamin Watkins Leigh and Chapman Johnson! Where shall we find two names so hallowed by the tenderness and truth of manly friendship—so radiant with the glory that springs from private virtue and public worth? Unambitious of official rank or political distinction, they were nevertheless prompt, whenever called by the voice of duty, to sacrifice for the public good every consideration of personal convenience or professional emolument. In times when such examples have been lamentably rare, their disinterested love of country has been recognised and rewarded by the homage of men of every party. More than once, at the summons of their native State, did they abandon, for a time, the professional labors to which they had devoted themselves; but always to return with eagerness to the duties and enjoyments of private life, so soon as the public service was fulfilled. And in that loved retirement, honored with the public esteem, beloved by their numerous friends and acquaintance, comforted by the overflowing gratitude and affection of those nearest and dearest to them, they have spent the tranquil evening of their lives, and calmly awaited the coming of that dark hour which precedes the dawn of eternal day.

When such men as these are removed from the scene of human action, a natural and laudable impulse prompts us to commemorate their excellence, both as a just tribute to the memory of the dead, and an incentive to the living to emulate their well-earned fame. In this spirit, we desire to contribute our mite, however insignificant, to the praise of the great and good man, whose name is prefixed to this article; and so inevitably does the mention of the one name call up the recollection of the other, that it was impossible to take the first step, without being reminded of that contemporary and friend, with whom, for nearly fifty years, he was so intimately connected.

Chapman Johnson was born in the year 1779, in Louisa county, Virginia, on a plantation in the immediate neighborhood of "Branham's" or "Boswell's old Ordinary." He had four brothers—two of whom were older than himself, and two younger—and three sisters. His mother died while he was still very young; but nevertheless old enough to recall distinctly a scene in which he owed his life to her exertions. His clothes had taken fire, and he was in imminent risk of being burnt to death, until his mother, not without injury to her own hands, succeeded in extinguishing the flames.

His father owned the plantation on which he lived, but thought himself too poor to afford his sons an education; and their boyhood, in consequence, was passed in a state of the most profound ignorance. Hoping at length to better his condition, by joining the profits of a tavern to those of the farm, he took charge of the inn already mentioned, and trusted in this way, to support his family with less difficulty. But the step was extremely ill-advised, so far as the interests of his sons were involved. Without education, wild and untrained, at an age the most susceptible of impressions from those about them, they were thrown into daily contact with the idle, dissipated, and vicious company, which, at that day even more than at present, infested our taverns and other places of public resort throughout the country. Already deprived of a mother's guardianship, they were destined to undergo, while yet of tender age, the loss of their surviving parent. Their father died at the Ordinary; and for some time the orphan boys continued there, exposed without defence to all the mischievous influences of the place. That they did not wholly escape the contagion is no matter of surprise: on the contrary, it is more wonderful, that under circumstances so adverse, the moral instinct and mental energy of nature should have sprung up and matured amid the noxious weeds by which they were surrounded. The eldest of the boys, as was natural, plunged more deeply into the current than the others; and the imminent danger of his ruin first awoke the fears and stimulated the efforts of his brothers, Richard and Chapman. By selling their portions of the small patrimony derived from their father, they raised the means of sending their eldest brother to William and Mary College. Their exertions, their sacrifices, were not in vain: they succeeded in detaching him from the dissipated courses to which he was inclined, and in fitting him, by a competent education, to make his way in the struggle of life. Thus early did the subject of this sketch begin to exhibit towards his relations and connexions a generous regard, which throughout his life allowed no occasion for its exercise to pass by unimproved. Indeed, the benevolence of his disposition, not only to them, but to all who sought his aid, was almost a fault: for it accustomed him to forget the extent of his own resources, in his desire to supply their wants and promote their interests.

Not long after their father's death, the brothers had returned to live upon the farm; and when Chapman had sold his interest in it as already mentioned, he still continued to work upon it for regular wages. By the aid of these earnings he was enabled, at the age of nineteen, to enter the school of the Rev. Peter Nelson,* of Louisa county, with whom he continued for nearly two years. During this period, he studied with an ardor and diligence peculiarly his own, and laid the solid foundations, upon which his labor in after years built a massive superstructure. He always cherished a respectful and kindly attachment for his old teacher, together with some humorous recollections of his odd habits and quaint expressions.

Mr. Johnson, about this time also, derived considerable benefit from an intimate association with Mr. Patrick Michie, who had married one of his sisters, and who, after living some time in South Carolina, had returned to Louisa county, Virginia, and settled on a farm adjoining the old homestead. Mr. Michie's collegiate education, and acquaintance with the world, made his society at once both agreeable and instructive to his young relatives; while his influence encouraged them in the efforts they were making to improve themselves.

In 1801, Mr. Johnson went to William and Mary College, and commenced the study of the law, to which he applied himself with untiring zeal and perseverance. Thus engaged he passed a year, to which he often referred in after times as one of the happiest of his life. It was here that he became acquainted with the Tucker family, and formed a strong and enduring attachment for them. Here also he first met with Mr. Leigh: and their acquaintance, slight in its beginning, strengthened in the course of this brief year, into the warm and devoted friendship, which ever after bound them to one another.

In the course of the following year, being then twenty-three years old, Mr. Johnson left William and Mary and came to Richmond, where he shortly after obtained a license to practice law. At first he thought of commencing the practice in Richmond; but Mr. Wirt, who was then Chancellor in the Williamsburg district, having strongly recommended Staunton as a place where he would find a better opening than any where else, he went to settle in that place in the same year, 1802.

He did not escape the anxieties and disappointments which fall to the lot of almost all young practitioners, and by which so many of them are disheartened and defeated. Even his resolute spirit was half discouraged, and he thought seriously of going to set up a school in Lexington, until he was dissuaded by the kind advice of one of his warmest personal friends. This was the late Judge Coalter, of the Court of Appeals, who lived at that time near Staunton, at a pretty rural spot called "The Grove." In Mr. Johnson's own words,—“I should certainly have left Staunton, despairing as I was of success, had not Coalter—God bless him!—advised me to wait, and have patience. I did—I persevered—and in reward, succeeded.” The following extract from a letter, written to a friend in 1806, portrays as well the despondency which clouded the first years of his practice, as the joy with which he hailed the brightening prospect that succeeded. “In truth, my friend, I have of late experienced pleasure in a higher degree, and seen perfect happiness in a nearer prospect, than at any other period of my life. And no doubt, but that the unusual depression which my spirits have suffered for the greater part of the last two years—indeed, for almost the last four years—has given them an additional elasticity, which has made the height of their ascent in some measure proportioned to the depth from which they arose. While I was at Williamsburg, I was remarked for my equanimity and uniform cheerfulness; since I have been in Staunton, I have been frequently observed to be gloomy, sometimes irritable. While in Williamsburg, I was permitted to pursue those occupations which my judgment approved, to enjoy such society as my own wishes would have chosen, to indulge the feelings which were most grateful to my heart, and to taste of most of those pleasures which are agreeable to my palate. There, none of the cares of life interrupted the tranquil 'noiseless tenor of my way.' In Staunton, my situation has been very different. However, the day is gone (I hope) when I have any cause of accusation against Staunton: for now I see in it the scene of all my future happiness." Nor was he deceived in his anticipations. The lapse of more than forty years served only to draw more tightly the bond of mutual attachment, which united him to his old friends and neighbors. The warmth of his regard for them was never abated: and no where was his loss more sincerely felt and lamented, than in the society of Staunton.

* This gentleman, under the more familiar title of “Old Parson Nelson” is well recollected by many now living in Richmond, where he afterwards taught. He was a singular compound of shrewdness and simplicity: an upright man, a good scholar—but, although by no means sparing of the rod, ill calculated to manage a company of unruly boys. His pupils will never forget the pranks they played, nor the punishments he inflicted. He often referred with pride to Mr. Johnson, in whose fame and success he felt himself in some sort a participant; and more than once the pretext that Mr. Johnson was to speak at the Capitol, or the Court House, procured a holyday for the boys, when that gentleman was actually attending court in a distant county.

Long before the date of the letter just quoted, Mr. Johnson's amiable disposition and gentle manners had attracted the regard, while his talents and integrity had acquired for him the esteem, of a large circle of friends and acquaintance. In his association with the more intimate of these, and in his consciousness of innate energy and uprightness, he found resources, which often dispelled his gloomy thoughts, and revived his natural cheerfulness. And in the course of the year 1806 he realized his hopes of domestic happiness, in a marriage with Miss Mary Ann Nicolson, the estimable lady who has survived him. Her fair and delicate beauty was the least of her attractions: her open, artless disposition, gentle demeanor, warm and generous feelings, and guileless simplicity of character, won the hearts of those who knew her then, and continue still to rivet the affections of all who come within the sphere of her influence. From the time of his marriage, Mr. Johnson fixed his residence in Staunton, until the year 1824, when (for reasons to be hereafter adverted to) he determined to remove to Richmond.

On the first of May, 1805, he was admitted to practise at the bar of the Court of Appeals, and begun that career of forensic distinction, which in a few years elevated him to the highest rank in his profession. In this country, the progress of a rising lawyer not being marked (as in England) by his advance from one grade to another, his standing can be estimated only by the opinion which is entertained of him, either on the part of his professional brethren of the Bench and Bar, or on that of the community in general. These tribunals not unfrequently differ in their judgments; and the merit of an individual is highly estimated by one of them, while his reputation with the other is comparatively inferior. It was the peculiar good fortune of Mr. Johnson to combine in his favor the suffrages of both. Possessing, in a rare degree, the qualities necessary to form a profound and accomplished jurist, he superadded to them an energy and vigor of thought, a clearness and force of expression, and an earnest, warm sympathy with the feelings of his fellow men, which won him an easy entrance into their hearts, and secured him an extraordinary power over their convictions. To the traits we have ascribed to him—if not implied in what has been already said—must be added the perfect truth, rectitude, and simplicity of his character; which, in every scene of his exertions, whether in the Senate, the Courts, or in the humbler questions of municipal and social concern, disarmed his hearers of all personal prejudice, and prepared them to listen with candor and confidence.

But the busy avocations of civil life did not make him unmindful of other duties, which sometimes devolve upon the peaceful citizen. Upon two occasions, during the war of 1812, when it was apprehended that the British would make an attempt upon the city of Richmond, Mr. Johnson marched thither at the head of a company, to take part in its defence. The alarm was given in Staunton, at one of these times, by an express from the Governor, which arrived about the middle of the day on Sunday. Mr. Johnson was the first man to volunteer: and the next day, the whole company were mounted, and upon the road to Richmond. Happily, the state of preparation and activity, throughout the State, deterred the enemy from the meditated attack.

The limits of this sketch will not permit us to follow him, year by year, through the course of his long and useful life. In the Senate of Virginia, he represented for many years the Augusta district, to the entire satisfaction of his constituents, and with great and acknowledged advantage to the legislation and jurisprudence of the whole State. He retired from it, when his increasing practice in the Court of Appeals and the Chancery Court at Richmond, together with the long absences from his family thus occasioned, induced him, as has been already stated, to remove to the capital. From that period until his death he continued to reside here; but his social relations with his old neighbors were never wholly interrupted. He never failed to pass a portion of the summer and fall at his farm in the vicinity of Staunton; seasons of relaxation from his labors, which were happily spent in the renewal of old intimacies and hereditary friendships, and in the quiet enjoyments of domestic life.

Nor were his energies altogether withdrawn from the public service. Though no longer occupying a public station, his advice and assistance were often sought on occasions of great public interest; and there were few measures, involving the general welfare of the State, which did not derive some aid from the resources of his mind, and the weight of his influence. With the modesty which was characteristic of him, however, he neither sought nor desired notoriety: and was content, without show or display on his own part, to contribute all that lay in his power, towards the success of every effort for the common good.

When the convention was called in 1829, to revise the Constitution of Virginia, Mr. Johnson was summoned by the general voice of his old constituents to represent them in that body. Embracing, as it did, some of the most illustrious and venerable men of the generation then passing away, and almost all the distinguished statesmen of Virginia, who were at that period in their prime, it presented an array of wisdom, learning and dignity, not often paralleled in history. The pithy saying of John Randolph of Roanoke, that it was "the grave of local reputations," was no less true than sarcastic. Few men came out of the intellectual conflicts of that arena, without losing something of the prestige derived from former victories: still fewer, with an increase of the celebrity they had previously enjoyed. But, among these select few, nevertheless, Mr. Johnson and Mr. Leigh were conspicuous. Ranked upon opposite sides of some important questions, which were long and warmly debated, the collision of mind served only to surround with greater lustre the names of both statesmen, while it was not permitted to disturb the harmony of their personal relations. To the mutual regard which subsisted between them, and between others similarly circumstanced, was to be ascribed in no small degree, the compromise that was effected of sectional interests and jealousies, and the agreement upon that scheme of government which was ultimately adopted.

But these employments were only occasional. The regular business of his life was the practice of his profession: and he so pursued it, as to leave an example to his successors in the courts worthy of all imitation. His zeal, his perseverance, his high sense of duty, his liberality of sentiment, and his urbanity of manner, commanded, as they merited, the admiration of his contemporaries. Those who heard it will not soon forget the heart-felt and affectionate tribute to his virtues, pronounced by one who had known him from the beginning of his career, and who has since followed him to the tomb, the venerable Judge Nicholas. His high character and consummate ability could not fail to secure a very extensive practice; and he devoted himself to it with an intense and unremitting labor, which in the end proved too much even for his vigorous and manly frame. He has been often known, for weeks together, to prolong his studies several hours after midnight, and then suspend them only to be resumed at early dawn: while the hours more commonly appropriated to business were filled up with tasks no less continued and severe. As early as the year 1837, he began to feel the effects of over exertion in occasional attacks of vertigo and uncomfortable affections of the head, which from time to time compelled him to abstain from labor. But he always yielded with reluctance; and returned to his usual avocations the first moment he felt capable of doing so, without allowing himself time to recruit his strength. The habits of industry, which had in truth become his second nature, denied their usual exercise in the quiet and confinement of the sick room, produced a depression of his generally cheerful spirits, and impelled him to escape as soon as possible from this condition of inactivity. Such vicissitudes as these naturally and inevitably resulted in the gradual decay of his physical powers. For several years prior to his death, he was seldom able to appear in court, or to engage in the active duties of his profession: and the burden devolved upon his eldest son, who had been for some years associated with him in practice. During the last twelve months of his life, his decline was more marked and rapid than before; and at length, on the 12th July, 1849, the light, which had for some time flickered in its socket, was finally extinguished.

We have hitherto spoken of Mr. Johnson chiefly as a public man: as an eminent lawyer, and a distinguished statesman. We feel that our attempt has failed to do him justice, even in these aspects of his character, the most obvious and intelligible to the common eye. How shall we hope to depict the singular and attractive beauty of his private life, which no one can well appreciate, who has not enjoyed the privilege of knowing such a man at his own fireside? The recollection of his genius, his fame, his learning, his influence, was speedily lost in the contemplation of qualities more endearing,—admiration of his greatness was forgotten in the affectionate reverence, inspired by his goodness. Through every relation of life, from those of husband and father, to the remote connexions of casual acquaintance or common humanity, his loving and generous spirit made its influence felt, in due proportion, but in abundant measure. It was his fortune to survive all his brothers and sisters. Several of these left children, young and slenderly provided for. One after another, they were taken by him to his own house, placed at schools of his providing, or otherwise assisted and cared for according to their respective wants. He reared and educated them as his own children, and to him they looked up with the filial regard, which he so well deserved. With his immediate family, his intercourse was not only affectionate and tender, but sportive and familiar, tempered by a gentle dignity, which operated inensibly to restrain the exuberance of youthful spirits within just bounds. In the larger circle of his friends and acquaintance, though always unassuming in demeanor, he was easy and cheerful in conversation, and entered with alacrity and relish into the amusements and diversions of those around him. In short, had his abilities and public honors been less than they were, he must still have won the admiration and esteem of his fellow citizens by the purity of his life, and the social excellence of his character.

This sketch might be considered incomplete, without some notice of the religious sentiments of Mr. Johnson. It is true, that the uniform tenor of such a life affords evidence of the highest character to show that it was regulated by the dictates of piety and morality: men do not gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles. It is true also, that, beyond this outward proof, the fallible judgment of mortals can never penetrate: it is for God alone to read the secret heart. But it may be gratifying to many to know, that, several years before his death, he openly professed his faith in the religion of Jesus Christ, and united himself with the Protestant Episcopal Church; thus adding his express and solemn testimony of belief to the practical illustrations of it afforded by his conduct.

The intelligence of Mr. Johnson's death was everywhere received with emotions, that sought expression in private letters of condolence, and public tributes of respect for his memory. From among these, we select for quotation the preamble of the resolutions, adopted at a meeting of Judges, and members of the bar, and officers, of the Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia, then in session at Lewisburg; as well on account of the high authority, by which the eulogy is pronounced, as of the feeling and eloquent language, in which it is expressed.

"The exalted position which Chapman Johnson occupied, at the bar, in the senate, and in the general estimation of his fellow citizens, demand some notice of his death.

"As a man, Mr. Johnson, through a long life, was distinguished for lofty integrity and purity, to which was added the most disinterested benevolence.

"His influence over the minds and characters, not only of those who associated with him, but of the community in general, was much greater than ordinarily falls to the lot of distinguished public men; and this influence was always promotive of virtue, patriotism, and benevolence.

"As a senator of his native State, Mr. Johnson, by his high talents, pure character, assiduous labor, and by the universal confidence reposed in his knowledge, wisdom, and integrity, attained an influence unequalled by any man of his day; and has left the impress of his mind and character on the legislation of this State.

"After his retirement from legislative life, a large portion of Mr. Johnson's time was directed to schemes for the advancement of the interest of his native State; and in all such schemes his sound judgment, extensive knowledge, and enlarged scope of thought, made him an invaluable counsellor.

"At the bar he was distinguished for an extent of knowledge, fertility of thought, ingenuity, ability, and force of argument, which placed him in a position, in which he had few competitors.

"In private and social life, Mr. Johnson combined all the qualities which make a man beloved and honored, and he has left, to his friends, the recollection of a life in which there is no act to regret, and a character without stain."

We are sensible, that no words of ours can add anything to what has been said. We adopt, in concluding, those of another, whose solemn and beautiful thoughts are worthy of application here:—

"Peace to the just man's memory;—let it grow
Greener with years, and blossom through the flight
Of ages; let the mimic canvass show
His calm benevolent features; let the light
Stream on his deeds of love, that shunned the sight
Of all but heaven; and in the book of fame
The glorious record of his virtues write,
And hold it up to men, and bid them claim
A palm like his, and catch from him the hallowed flame."

GLEANINGS.

Sir Edward Coke, in Queen Elizabeth's time, estimated the population of England at 900,000 of all sorts. Harrison makes the men fit for service 1,172,674, while Guicciardini makes the population two millions.

The following explains the origin of the term "grog."

"Admiral Vernon usually wore a grogram cloak in bad weather, from which the sailors called him 'old Grog.' Hence the name in honor of him was transferred to the spirit and water, because he was the first officer who ordered it in this manner on board his Majesty's ships."

Scot's Mag. Vol. 52, p. 38 in note.

The smoky haze of the Indian summer has by some been attributed to the burning of the woods and grass at that season, but that notion has been exploded. However, there is no doubt those configurations enhance the natural haziness of the atmosphere. Indian summer was in old colonial times associated with images of savage incursions and massacre. It is a period when the lover of nature and poetry wanders with delight through the forests of frost-dyed foliage, orange, gold and crimson, as if painted with the rainbow. Especially amid the primitive woods of the mountain, afar from dust and turmoil, how sweetly enchanting is it to roam, lulled by the scene and the balmy lazy air into a sort of voluptuous repose and reverie, a pleasing languor, bathed in an atmosphere of poetry—a half-oblivious, pensive enchantment, somnambulist, in a land of dreamy beauty.

—

In the Athenian republic (so called) there were 84,000 free citizens, 40,000 aliens, 400,000 slaves, or more than four slaves to one freeman. The slaves were either freedmen or absolute bondsmen. The slave-trade was carried on then as now. The condition of the Athenian slaves appears to have been in some points better than that of ours, in others—worse.

—

Some writers have intimated that the title of Lord Sterling (Major General in the American army during the revolutionary war) assumed by him was never recognized as valid by the legal authorities of Great Britain. But the following advertisement is to be found in the Scots Magazine for 1759 p. 212. "William Alexander Esq. of New Jersey was proved March 1759, by an inquest before the sheriffs of Edinburgh, to be the lineal male representative of the Earl of Sterling."

—

The distances of some of the fixed stars have been estimated at from 986,000 to 224,500,000 times the length of the radius of the earth's orbit or its distance from the sun, which is 95,000,000 miles. The number of stars in the whole celestial sphere as seen by Sir W. Herschel's 20 ft. telescope was upwards of 20 millions.

—

The increase of twenty principal cities of the United States between 1830 and 1840 was 55 per centum, while that of the whole country was less than 34 per centum.

—

Niagara—O-ni-aw-ga-rah, "the thunder of water."

—

Pascond, an old writer, mentions three lakes in North America—Superior, Illinois, (probably lake Michigan) and Huron. He says that great ships may go up the Mississippi to the Illinois river. Fort Pensacola (in New Mexico as then styled, lat. 29. long. 91,) the best harbor in St. Louis' Bay (the Gulf of Mexico) was taken from the Spaniards by the French in 1719. St. Austin (Augustine) and St. Matthew he mentions as situated on the Bahama canal. New Mexico he divides into Apalacho on the North, Corsa West, Tegeste or Florida proper East, and the Bay of St. Louis South. In shape New Mexico is likened to the sleeve of a coat. It was in lat. 25 to 39, long. 83 to 107, extended 1000 miles from East to West and 900 miles from North to South.

—

The site of Philadelphia in Indian was called Kuequenaku, i. e. "the grove of the long pine trees."

—

Schenectady—German "a pine barren."

—

"I am like one of those boxes I have seen enclosing several other boxes of similar form though lessening size. The person with whom I have least congeniality sees only the outermost; another person has something more interesting in his character, he sees the next box; another sees still an inner one: but the friend of my heart alone with whom I have a full sympathy sees disclosed the innermost of all."

—

John Foster.

—

"When I recall to mind at last, after so many dark ages wherein the huge overshadowing train of error had almost swept all the stars out of the firmament of the church, how the bright and blissful reformation by divine power shook through the black and settled night of ignorance and anti-christian tyranny—methinks a sovereign and reviving joy must needs rush into the bosom of him that reads or hears; and the sweet odor of the returning gospel imbathes his soul with the fragraney of heaven."—Milton.

—

Truth is a naked open daylight that doth not show the masques and mummeries and triumphs of the world half so stately and daintily as candle light.—Bacon.

—

Some French writer has illustrated Christian humility thus: "the emptiest heads of wheat are carried the highest, but when they become filled with grain they bend modestly down."

—

The Yearly Oak in Buckinghamshire, England, was said to have been coeval with the time of William the Conqueror and to have borne the name of Matilda his consort. Its girth was 28 feet, 5 inches, a foot above the surface of the ground. Cowper wrote some admirable verses on it, not known, however, till after his death.

There is a story of two hunters in the Dismal Swamp, "the Great Dismal," who being overtaken by night, looked out for a lodging place, and found not far off an enormous old cypress tree, through whose top the winds of many winters had whistled, but which struck by lightning had fallen, breaking a good many feet from the ground, the trunk still reposing on the stump. One of the hunters chose for his sleeping-place the top of this stump. So he gathered some boughs and pieces of bark from around and laying them across the hollow of the stump, made a bed which, although not quite as soft as a bed of roses, seemed at the least secure from the attacks of the wild beasts which infest that gloomy, unfrequented morass. The other hunter chose for his resting-place the inclined trunk of the tree. During the night the hunter who slept on the top of the stump, being restless, perhaps dreaming of Gorgons and chimeras dire, tossed and turned until the boughs and the bark began to give way under him, the lowest layer cracking first, then the next, and so on till at length all were broken, and at last upon another lurch they caved in, and with them the sleeping hunter fell down into the hollow of the stump. Waking he found that he had fallen into company,—and that a family of bears were in gyratory motion about him, astounded at his unexpected descent upon them. Under such circumstances, and it being very dark, an introduction was out of the question, and the bears disgusted and alarmed at a disturbance so much in violation of all conventional rules, and so uncomfortable, determined to make for the open air. The hunter sympathizing in this disgust and alarm, and desire to emerge from the stump, seized hold of one of the bruins en passant who conveyed him out with telegraphic celerity, where the hunter, unwilling to impose upon the locomotive liberality of his "fat friend," let go his hold and awoke his companion, and proposed an incontinent decampment from this place of lodging and private entertainment, which proposal was voted reasonable and acted on without delay.

Maria Louisa Leopoldina Carolina, Imperial princess, Arch-duchess of Austria, Empress of France, and finally, by a singular anti-climax of fortune Dutchess of Parma, Piacenza and Guastalla, was born at Schönbrunn, December 13th, 1791, eldest daughter of Francis II., afterwards

Emperor of Germany, and of the second of his four wives, Maria Theresa of Naples. When Vienna was cannonaded by Napoleon, the palace in which Maria Louisa lodged, was by his own order exempted from the fire of his artillery. Napoleon marrying her by proxy in 1810, she repaired to Paris, and passed four years in France. Upon Napoleon's abdication in 1814, she returned to Austria with her son, and was made Dutchess of Parma and Piacenza. She declined sharing Napoleon's fortunes at Elba, but corresponded with him while there for a time. She remained some time at Vienna with her son the duke of Reichstadt. Upon Napoleon's return from Elba, Maria Louisa, after some vacillation, determined not to rejoin him, saying that as she had refused to partake of his adversity, she would not now participate in his prosperity. She still however retained her esteem for him. In 1816, a year after the battle of Waterloo, she went to Parma and took possession of her Duchy lying on the south bank of the Po, containing 2,200 square miles and nearly five hundred thousand inhabitants. Parma, the capital, contained a population of thirty-five or forty thousand. She was obliged, however, to leave her son at Vienna. In 1824 she married an Austrian officer, General Count Neipperg. He had lost his left eye in battle by a French lance—but when seen on the right side was very handsome. He died in 1828. She bore him three children. The eldest, a daughter, married Count San Vitale, grand chamberlain of Parma. A son, the Count de Montenuovo, (the Italian for Neipperg,) was an officer in the Austrian service in 1847, and may be so yet. A second daughter died in infancy. Upon the French revolution in 1830, the outbreak in Italy extended to her Duchy, and she was forced to escape to Austria. But the Duchy being reduced by an Austrian army she returned. In 1834 she married Count Bombelles, an old emigré. At the time of the accession of Pius IX., her Duchy was again disturbed and Maria Louisa passed much of her time at Schönbrunn. Not long after she died and was succeeded by Carlo Ludovico, duke of Lucca.

It is the prerogative of genius to stamp its interest on every thing connected with it. A worthy gentleman of my acquaintance, a native of Scotland, has in his possession some leaves of an Excise book kept by Robert Burns the poet. The first page is headed, "Excise 88th year 1794-5. Dumfries Collection and District. 4th Round Diary including 7th December, 1794, and 17th Jan., 1795.

Robert Burns."

The page is ruled into columns, the headings being "Divisions and Officers, Dates, Places Surveyed, Miles, Com'n. Br's, Victuallers, Chandlers, Tanners, Spirit Dealers, Tea Dealers, Tobacco Dealers, Tobacco Manufacturers, Reports." The Reports are addressed "Hon'le Sirs." The first Report, dated December 7th, 1794, is as follows: "Preceding Round ended the 6th Inst. Sunday in obedience to the Collector's orders I took charge of this District and received from Mr. Findlater (indisposed) the cheque-book, &c." This report is marked "Ex'd J. M." i. e. Examined by John Mitchell. The next report regards the Dumfries Division and is in the following cabalistic terms: "In Vict'ry [Victuallery] had a preparatory remark and two charges. Two. Tobeco. Manufrs at work; Stocked all the Tobco. Deals per weight. On examining the Books only observed in the Tobacco Book page 5th, Nov. 22d, m. 10. and 25 m. 10. Returns of Tobco. altered from 89 lbs to 41 lbs on the 26 mg. and 28 m. 10 from 138 to 90 lbs. More care promised. Opposite the notice of this delinquency is written, "Admonish. G. B. Done J. C." i. e. G. B. a superior functionary of the Excise orders the culpable Victmaller to be admonished on the occasion, and J. C., the subordinate officer, says that he has admonished him. The last report on this page is:—"Had a charge and took worts off in Brewery and weighed to the Tanner 2 Backs and 3 Hides at 112 lbs." The next report is, "Surveyed as per margin In Paper, weighed of first class 5 Bundles, of second class 23 Bundles, of third class 39 Bundles—in all 1315 lbs—also exam'd remaining stock of malt, six guages; all with practical agreement. Nothing to blame in the Books." The places thus surveyed or where these last services were performed were, Park, Drumwhinnie, Kirkquinzion, Dalbeattie, Mount Pleasant, Home. On the 18th of the same month, December 1794, Burns reports—"A Guage a charge and Preparatory Remark in Brewery. Examined three stocks of Leather and weighed seven Hides, and two calves at 203 lbs. In malt four guages. Any inadvertencies in the books but trifling."

On another day the poet-exciseman "Returned and in Brewery took off second worts and had a confirming Guage of the first. Weighed a stage of candles at 240 lbs." Again he took "Two Guages in Cn. Brewery, counted large stock of depending Leather. Fourteen Guages of malt. Nothing considerable in the Books;" and "weighed 15 Backs, 13 Hides, 27 Kipps and 02 Calves at 908 lbs."

The Excise Divisions in that part of Scotland were Dumfries, Bridgeen, Annan, Woodhouse, Lochmaben, Lockerby, Sanquhar—and the Division officers, John Lewars, John McQuker, Geo. Gray, James Hosack, Leond Smith, John Crawford, Wm. Penn, Peter Warwick, Alexr.

Hill, Jno. McCulloch, Alexr. Easton, James Graham and Robert Burns.

When Julian, the philosophic emperor, came to the throne, it was found necessary to indoctrinate him in the rudiments of the military art, and while undergoing the process of the drill, being seriously bored, he exclaimed—"Heavens, what an employment for a philosopher!" So Burns, when weighing candles and hides and malt, had reason to exclaim—"Heavens, what an employment for a poet!" C. C.

LILIENHORN.

A DRAMATIC POEM BY J. E. LEIGH.

The reader will find in Book XII. of Lamartine's History of the Girondists a very interesting account of the conspiracy against Gustavus III. King of Sweden, by many of the Swedish nobles, together with Lilienhorn, Commandant of the Guards at Stockholm, and of the assassination of the King on the night of the 16th March 1792.

CHARACTERS.

| | |
|--------------------------------|----------------|
| GUSTAVUS III., King of Sweden. | } Conspirators |
| LILIENHORN, Cominandant, &c. | |
| COUNT DE RIBBING. | |
| COUNT DE BRAHE. | |
| COUNT DE STEGEBORG. | |
| BARON D' ERENSWARD. | |

SCENE I.—Stockholm. The King's Palace.

Gustavus, Solus.

Whence come the warnings of impending ill
So strongly urged, so multiplied of late?
From watchful friendship's quick excited fears,
Or cunning foe's most subtle stratagem?
I fain would know, yet nought it doth import,
For fear of friend and scheme of foe I scorn.
And at my life then, treason aims its blow—
These warnings manifold do all declare,
But point not out the hand that's raised to strike,
Nor tell the hour appointed for the stroke.
In each man thus I must th' assassin fear,
And feel the pangs of death in ev'ry hour!
Behold the doom that is designed for me,
By thousand hands a thousand deaths to die!
Ha! ha! I hold the sovereign power here
Whose chiefest form and action mercy is,
And on our royal self I do bestow
That saving grace which others oft have known,
And from this sentence will absolve ourself
And grant a pardon from this dreadful doom.
So from the pangs of death before it comes,
By virtue of this sovereign grace I'm freed.
I have met Danger often in his shape
And shivered in his hand his threat'ning lance:
He stood between the throne and my high aim,
A lion in the path in which I trod.
This full-blown crown attests my viet'ry gained.
He menaced ruin with the Russian Bear
And came to crush me with its icy arms;

But 'neath my blows the Northern monster reeled
And found its safety in my wrath appeased.
Vanquished thus in ev'ry open strife,
Lo! Danger now a masked disguise assumes
And by my fears would subjugate my soul.
That may not be—my fears are but my subjects,
Too fearful far to make essay to rule.

Enter LILIENTHORN.

Gustavus, continuing.

Ho, Lilienthorn! you come most opportunely,
This, this concerns Count Lilienthorn, not me.
A letter from the noble Bouillé, this—
That son of France who, in his heart's true faith,
Doth see his honor in his master's cause
And would from secret harm his ally guard.
He writes that proof or something like to proof
He has, that disaffection's taint hath touched
The hearts of some whose very hand I've armed
And thought to wield as if it were my own—
Bids me beware—that soldiers high in trust,
In Stockholm here, against our life conspire.
Of all my army here thou art the head
And sure must know the motives of the body.

Lilienthorn.

Ay, ay, my liege, of body, limbs and head;
But do not see the workings of this plot,
Or know the soil in which this treason roots
Whose branches spreading, bloom in foreign lands,
And only to your distant friends disclose
The peril which doth threaten you here at home.

Gustavus.

This treason menaced—hast not heard before?

Lilienthorn.

Ay! no! ay, but 'twas from your highness' self.
When at the Council you declared your will Against insurgent France to lead your strength,
To strangle faction and maintain the crown,
To crush revolt and snatch the king and queen
From the fierce people's bloody appetite,
Your Highness did with mock solemnity,
So well assumed it did impress with awe,
Propound a question piercing every heart:
With wrathful tone and bent and low'ring brow,
You asked what fate deserves the traitor Swede
Who in his heart doth plot his sovereign's death?
Responses warm, that quick arose from all
Were by your Highness met with most arch smile
That shewed you touched in sport their deep hearts' chords.

With playful look of incredulity,
This phantom plot you then exposed to view,
Framed as you said of wishes of your foes
And dreamed-of horrors of your frightened friends,
And proved by two most truthful witnesses—
Rumor unsworn and fanciful surmise.

Gustavus.

'Tis true, most true, my faithful Lilienthorn.
I said I had braved the sword's biting edge
And could not fear the airy poniard's point.

Lilienthorn.

Then why, my Lord, give thought to thing so vain?

Gustavus.

De Bouillé's letter now from Verdun sent—

Lilienthorn.

No substance to the dagger gives, nor hand
To point its stroke—tells nor plot nor actor.
Horrors vague in unsubstantial mirage
Rise on Bouillé's view and hover o'er you,

Here all unseen by quick and straining eye.
Could treason germinate unknown by me,
Or have its growth amidst the vigorous crop
Of virtues the most loyal and most true
That ever subject's heart did teem withal?

Gustavus.

Well let it pass—I did but wish to know
If that which seemed but phantasy to me,
Had vital strength to mind of Lilienthorn.

Exit, Gustavus.

Lilienthorn.

Most vital strength and strength most mortal too!
Life to my hopes but deathful force to you.
But yet—ah no! remorse would now be vain—
The fatal train to surcharged mine is fired—
The arrow from the slackened string is sped:
The noblest heart of all this world's the mark!

Enter a Messenger.

I am, my Lord, by Count de Ribbing sent,
In most quick haste, to bring you the advice
That at the house of Baron d'Erensward,
Certain of your friends have now assembled
Who do desire and await your presence
On matters instant and of high import.

Lilienthorn.

My friends! my friends! as tempters ever are!

Messenger.

My Lord! my Lord!

Lilienthorn.

Away, you cur, away! and tell your Lord
You gave his words unto my listening ear,
Nor tell him more, if your base life you prize.

Exit Messenger.

Lilienthorn—continuing.

Ye hunters of the royal game, ye wind
Your horn for me chief bound to lead your pack!

SCENE 2.—Palace of Baron d'Erensward.

BARON D'ERENSWARD. COUNT DE RIBBING.
COUNT DE STEGEBORG AND COUNT DE BRAHE.

Count de Ribbing.

The speaking present loudly tells, my Lords,
We can no longer dally with our fortune
Or wait the coming of that laggard, chance.
'Tis plain, the thought which in our quickened mind
Has so long lain and grown in embryo,
Its instant birth in action now must have.

De Brahe.

I pray you, Count, distinctly to—

De Ribbing.

Last night, my Lords, from France, a courier came,
From Marquis Bouillé, with despatches charged,
Which only to the king he would commit.
Of double import I have learned they are:
That it was bruted and believed in France
A plot most subtle, deep and traitorous,
Of imminent and most fatal peril,
Against the king in Stockholm is conceived
By servants high in trust and near his throne,
With sharp expostulation urged in zeal
To ope the eye of his deep sleeping fears.
And then, as if to snatch him from his fate,
Beseeching him to speed his powers on
To rescue from the people's rough embrace
Her, his soul's homage, Gallia's periled queen.

Count de Stegeborg.

That this is true I can attest, my Lords.
 Ere matin bell had rung its waking peal,
 By the king's page I was from sleep aroused
 And summoned to his private council room.
 He, placing Bouillé's letter in my hand,
 Without much comment, did in haste proceed
 To gather from the rolls before him spread
 The number and equipment of his troops
 In all the several stations of his realm;
 And on the map, with quick unerring eye,
 The distance and the marches did compute.
 And time required for general rendezvous.
 Then all impatient at the long delay,
 He said the lightning's bolt did dart alone
 And did not wait for helping company;
 That as the lightning doth outstrip its cloud,
 So he'd outrun the tempest of his power
 And blasing on would point its way to France.
 And then in phrase of most sweet courtesy,
 A grace we know so winning in the king,
 Something of praise it pleased him to bestow
 On our well trained corps in camp at Stegeborg.
 This corps he said most suitably was placed
 Upon the route he'd chosen for his speed;
 With its strength therefore he should arm himself.
 The king to-morrow will set out for France.

(Enter Lilienhorn.)

But here is Lilienhorn from whom the king
 Conceals no thought.

De Ribbing.

Count Lilienhorn, to whose strong arm we trust
 As sword and shield, the wished for time—

Lilienhorn.

Hold! hold! my Lord,—my arm! my hand—what time?
 You do mistake—I am not Ankastroem—

Count de Brahé.

Nor hired, Count, his functions to perform:
 Ah! Lilienhorn disdains to deal the blow—
 He doth but arm the hand that gives the stab;
 Nor takes for blood his pound for pound in gold—
 He hopes to reap in pride the crimsoned crop
 Of honors rankly shooting from the blood
 Of king who wronged him only with his love.

Count d'Erenscard.

Count Lilienhorn did much o'ershoot the scope
 Of Lord de Ribbing's thoughts—

De Ribbing.

And turned them quite away from their true mark.

De Brahé.

I was the lens converged them to their point.

D'Erenscard.

Most noble Count—

Lilienhorn.

I am no Count except by courtesy!
 But of Stockholm's guards I am commandant.
 With scoffing taunt let hollow court'ay cease.
 Was it for this you summoned me to-day;
 To hear myself impeached with foulest breath
 By him of your own order deemed the head?
 To raise your order from its low estate
 Up to that height of old supremacy
 From which it fell before the king's strong will,
 With prayers and promises you asked my aid:
 Said usurpation did confer no right
 Except to strike the proud usurper down:
 That every peaceful art had long been tried
 To move the king to retrocede your powers,
 But that 'twas plain whilst King Gustavus ruled

Nobility would be Gustavus' slave.

And when I told you he had honored me
 With station, trust, and love and friendship's smile,
 You said a frown could quick succeed a smile,
 And thea would fall both station, trust and love;
 But this imperious king by my aid slain,
 Nobility's most ancient rights restored,
 On my head a coronet you would place
 Of your new flow'ring honor's fresh leaves formed:—
 And when I spuraed and tossed that bauble back,
 Calling from hell the tempter's winning art,
 You railed at tyrants and of freedom spoke
 And urged me to uphold my country's cause:
 That this blow struck, the haughty tyrant dead,
 I should be hailed the saviour of the land,
 By nobles honored, by the people loved,
 And chiefest captain of their armies too.
 This glittering prize displayed before my view
 I grasp—

De Brahé.

With hand deep dyed in blood of sovereign slain.

Lilienhorn.

Again the insults of this gibing Lord!
 Have we not here a traitor to our treason?

D'Erenscard.

Most noble Lilienhorn, restrain thy rage—
 He but assumes the privilege of age
 To give the counsels of timidity.

Lilienhorn.

Alas! he holds before foul treason's eye
 The undimmed mirror of his loyal troth,
 And makes us see an ugly image there. (aside.)

De Stegeborg.

Bear with his bluntness noble Lilienhorn,
 Nor deem there lurks in Count de Brahé's heart
 Either wish or thought of base betrayal.
 To him, in virtue, power, and age our chief,
 We did entrust our honorable hope
 With full assurance it would find support,
 Or at the worst no treach'rous enemy.
 With his frank nature he at once declared
 The aim was noble, not the means employed,
 But that our thought should find no tongue in him.

De Brahé.

If in your minds I e'er deserved the name
 Which it has pleased you to ascribe to me,
 Of chief of your renowned nobility,
 Hear in the accents of my grief-tossed soul
 The voice of honor, the behests of right.
 When first this king o'erleaped the rightful bounds
 That hedged his high prerogative about,
 And roamed the lion o'er the field of state
 Glaring his wrath on all who dared oppose,
 Encroaching daily on your own domain,
 I did exclaim, and on you called aloud
 To drive him back to his accustomed rule.
 But you, my Lords, did answer my appeal
 By protestations of your love and faith
 To him who left you yet the name of Lord.
 I do not cavil at your wisdom then,
 But what was wisdom then is honor now.
 The repartitioned powers of the State,
 Though to himself he took the lion's share,
 You did agree and swear you would maintain.
 The powers be wrongly plucked, he well has worn
 In wreath resplendent on his royal brow,
 With a new lustre from his own great deeds,
 That doth obscure your old propriety.
 Let not conspiracy regain, my Lords,

What prudent valour thought not to withhold.
Let not the dagger now disgrace the hand
That might have flashed the sword in just defence.

De Ribbing.

Forsooth, my Lords, a most sweet homily !
Who, here, has not accounted with his scruples
And in conscience' judgment gained a balance ?
Deliberation's doubts have no place here.
My Lords and Lillienhorn, your instant voice !
Shall King Gustavus fall beneath our stroke
Aimed by the hand of Ankastroem to-night !

All the Lords except De Brahlé.

The king shall fall, the nobles shall bear rule.

Lillienhorn.

No king in Stockholm, let the people rule !

Memphis, Tenn., Aug., 1849.

Recollections of Weimar, the Native Place of Goethe.

From the Unpublished Journal of Therese.

TRANSLATED BY MARIE.

In our childhood we are apt to regard great events or persons with indifference. They appear natural and common, and the most celebrated men seem to us but ordinary beings. Our living near them in daily intercourse prevents, perhaps, the effect that would be otherwise produced. But in after life, when experience has taught us severe lessons, when we find how many blossoms we lavished for a single fruit, how many vain attempts for one success, then we become more observant. Recollections long since faded away, revive in youthful freshness. The clouds disappear, we behold the vanished stars,—those flaming, everlasting constellations seem to be no visions of imagination. Dust and clouds had concealed them from our eyes, but they were never extinguished.

Such thoughts are sometimes awakened in me by recalling the days of childhood, when I walked in the shady avenues of the park of Weimar, merry and joyous, in ignorance of what surrounded me, regardless of my uncle's words when he would draw his little prattling niece apart and say, "There is Baron von Goethe." Goethe strolled daily in the park : he had there his favorite spots, his pines, his oaks, against which he used to rest himself. The narrow limits of a small town, the external monotony of a life which in later years was somewhat wasted in ceremonious forms—the title of Privy Councillor, the honor of being called "excellency"—these satisfied in advanced age the gigantic mind of the greatest poet of Germany who had risen from the son of a plain citizen to the dignity of a minister of state. He was quite content in his existence at Weimar. The little valleys of Thuringen, the stiff hedges of the Grand Duke's summer palace, the Belvidere, the quiet river Ilm, gentle as a rivulet, were pleasant to him. The poet who in the prime of manhood had enjoyed Italy with all the ardor of his fiery soul, now longed for nothing more than a trip from Weimar to the Bohemian springs. But perhaps he deigned to move in every-day life with so much apparent pleasure, because his nature transformed all things into poetry ? And yet when I read in matured age the works of Goethe, I am far rather inclined to consider him a man of penetrating mind, than an ardent nature glorified in its own intensity. Goethe was thoroughly cold and measured. It seldom happened that he smiled, and still more seldom were the graces of his soul developed in playful wit. In his immovable antique face, nothing beamed but the eye. But this was the eye of the king of spirits. It commanded, it governed, it flattered, it defied. His look was the symbolic expression of his soul—a mysterious communication, showing him an interpreter of the unknown—a revealer of the hidden things of nature. His deportment was dignified, perhaps with too much assumption and too little inborn nobleness. He wore a dark blue surtout buttoned to the neck, and carried the left hand generally hid in his waistcoat. He walked slowly, bowed his head formally to those who met him, said a few civil words and then passed on. My uncle thought himself obliged to instruct his little niece by telling her of the glory of Weimar—of the literary cultivation of the place, and though doubtless at that time the butterflies had more attraction for me than Goethe and all the poets in the world, I could not help listening, and thus became acquainted with the classical Germans who have made Weimar so celebrated. The great ones—Schiller, Wieland, Herder—were no more ; all, except Goethe, who received in the evening, with his daughter-in-law, in the very small rooms of their plain home, a little circle of friends and admirers.

Goethe's was rather an humble dwelling for a prime minister, but the poet could here repose more comfortably in the arms of the muses. The steps were narrow and led to a passage to the study. In this room Bettina, (Baroness von Arnim), the poetical child so celebrated by her work, "Letters of a Child to Goethe," may have climbed often upon his lap, and caught words of endearment from his lips. We once visited this house. My uncle and I were seated on chairs opposite Goethe. When he heard that I liked mineralogy, he showed me his fine collection and took me into a room decorated with his plaster-casts. A sunbeam shone just then into the room, and a rainbow could be perceived after a passing shower. The science of colors, mineralogy, the productions of art, all were mingled like a chaos in my mind. I confessed to myself that here was a world within the world, a mixture of the past and future, of antiquity and the present. What were to Goethe the movements, the aims of the crowd, the astounding events of the history of that epoch, (Napoleon's epoch,)—what to him even his fatherland! He possessed that in himself which creates and destroys; which led him far away from the rolling stream of events and furnished him with inexhaustible materials for reflection: he did not love, he looked down upon, mankind, and created for himself other ties—those of philosophy, taste and knowledge. He introduced his own form of language into the world; his style was that of genius. He clung to that which he had acquired in those solitary hours, when perhaps a sweet longing after something elevated filled his mind, because he felt that there was something yet to win. The train of his thoughts passed rapidly like storm-driven clouds;—he revealed them to himself and to others; he made them dearer and brighter, but never dispelled them.

The Farnesian bull in his plaster-casts, the noble ideal head of Van Dyck, were placed near the skull of a common criminal, only to show the opposition of the noblest to the meanest objects. Such contrasts Goethe tried to render prominent. What I now remember as most striking to me was the plain furniture of his study, consisting only of a few chairs and tables. Was it to show that he did not need outward magnificence, while he valued his titles, or his princely friends, of whom the highest had his preference? Goethe was a man in whom many contradictions met, he was a sovereign and slave, free and dependent, exhibiting a thousand different phases, sipping from a thousand different sources, poet and politician—demon and angel!

Among my recollections of Weimar, two have made a deep and pleasing impression on my mind—one when I assisted in tableaux vivans represented in Goethe's home, the others when I drew and painted in the atelier of the high-gifted countess, Julia Eyloffstein, while she was seated before her easel absorbed in her creations. This interesting high-born and court-bred woman possesses one of those natures which may be called powerful. She has none of the bitterness of our sex—all in her is created in large outlines. Her superior talent forms a marvellous accompaniment to the flight of her spirit, now enthroned in the skies, now descending to the depths of the foundation of things. Strong as a man, she is at the same time impressible and delicate as the tenderest female. The soul is the sovereign of her whole being, it chains her fugitive fancy and moderates her artistic enthusiasm. Often it appeared to me that this artist, who now resides at Rome, was wedded to some invisible spirit. The palette would fall sometimes from her hand and she would lean back in her chair perfectly motionless. At such times I, timid child, thought of spirits, was terrified, and would make a noise to call her back to reality. Knowledge and art had opened to her their secret treasures, her conversation might be compared to a sparkling stream flowing sometimes too rapidly along, but never exhausting itself. Art had taught her moderation. The Countess occupied the atelier of the late celebrated painter Tayemann; there she painted those sweet children from Rubens, and the many scenes from her life in Italy, which now ornament the palaces of the first sovereigns of Europe. Goethe was the intimate friend of her mother and the friend and preceptor of her childhood. Under his eyes this German Corinne, (as she was generally called,) was educated. He first perceived the genius of his little protegee, and by him it was awakened and encouraged. With such native powers developed by such a taste, how could she be otherwise than superior? Usually she spent her evenings with Goethe, and I accompanied her there, where she arranged tableaux. One evening we had scenes from Goethe's Faust, in which the grandson of Goethe represented the demon Mephistophiles. The room in which the spectators were assembled was dark, while the other apartments in which the tableaux were arranged were flooded with light. I can still see the demon entering with Faust to the poor deluded Margaret, who is admiring herself in the glass adorned with the jewels she has found. Margaret was represented by a young lady from the court, with golden ringlets and a charming, delicate figure—her costume most tastefully and charmingly arranged by Countess Julia. The demon looked like a real demon, so strikingly did the young Goethe express malice in his looks and motions. After this and other scenes, we went over to scriptural history. The sacrifices of Abraham was selected, and I was transformed into little Isaac. But in the midst of this representation, when the resigned Abraham was about to consummate the sacrifice and I began to feel quite lamb-like, a terrible noise was heard among the spectators. Abraham and Isaac started from their immoveable positions, lights were called for. Goethe himself seemed uneasy in the darkness, and when the torches blazed again, it was found that a statue of Minerva had fallen from its pedestal and lay broken in pieces on the floor. Every body looked at Goethe, who valued highly this statue, one of his Italian treasures. We feared the pleasure of the evening was over for him, but presently he asked for music, and when he saw the company still lingering over the shattered Minerva, he exclaimed, "Let the dead rest!"

Goethe's daughter-in-law was a pretty, delicate looking blonde, who, besides a highly cultivated mind and great suavity of manners, with the most unbounded admiration for Goethe, had the merit of having presented him with blooming grandsons. How did the poet love these young inheritors of a name invested by him with glory, which they should transmit to their descendants! Among those children the loving side of his soul was to be seen. In them were consecrated his brightest hopes for a promising future. They were to him the embodiment of his dearest wishes, the originals personified by him.

Within the house of Goethe, the court at Weimar formed a temple for literature, in which the memory of the great departed was kept sacred, and where the last who remained of them on earth was deeply idolized. Never has there existed a German court which could boast of so many celebrities, or which manifested so ardent a zeal for knowledge and truth. Conversation there was brilliant and far from all egotism—liberty had become united to trust and confidence. The true mission of literature—advancement in the cultivation of nations—was here acknowledged and raised to that noble standing which belongs to the development of the human mind. Speculative ideas here found responses, and what was attempted was appreciated, as well as what was effected. Charming recollections! I feel again the young breath of spring over the freshly turned soil; how it plays with the blossoms, how cheerfully ripple the waves of the Ilse. Such is the power of memory!

THE OPEN WINDOW.

BY HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

The old house by the lindens
 Stood silent in the shade,
 And on the gravel pathway
 The light and shadow played.

I saw the nursery windows
 Wide open to the air,
 But the faces of the children
 They were no longer there.

The large Newfoundland house-dog
 Was standing by the door,
 He looked for his little playmates
 Who would return no more.

They walked not under the lindens,
 They played not in the hall,
 But shadow and silence and sadness
 Were hanging over all.

The birds sang in the branches
 With sweet, familiar tone,
 But the voices of the children
 Will be heard in dreams alone.

And the boy, who walked beside me,
 He could not understand
 Why closer in mine, ah! closer,
 I pressed his soft, warm hand.

FROM OUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS, September, 1849.

At no period since the opening of the revolution, has France enjoyed so complete a calm as that which now reigns not in Paris only, but throughout the departments. The storm is hushed. Political elements are almost still. The sea is heaving sullenly from the violence of the late commotion; and the vessel of state rolls sluggishly on the billows, with hardly wind enough to keep her on her course. Angry waves, white with foam, no more beat against its sides, and bursting over the bow sweep the decks. But is the storm really over, and the danger past? Does the blue sky appear through the breaking clouds? May the weary crew retire, and the anxious passengers dismiss their fears, in the hope that henceforth they will pursue their voyage with favoring winds, and a bright sun, to the destined port? Not yet! We are now in the centre of the storm! Many a gallant vessel on the broad Atlantic has dearly expiated, by total wreck, the fatal error which mistook this deceitful momentary calm for the end of the tempest. Yet a little while, and the elemental war will recommence more furiously than ever. Seize the moment, mariners, to nerve body and heart for the coming strife! Repair the broken ropes, keep your sails close reefed, and be every man at his post! But let us drop metaphor.

The prompt repression of 13th June,—the numerous arrests which followed—the proscription of nearly forty of the most able and violent Montagnards—the state of seige—the severe laws lately enacted against the liberty of the press and the right of political meeting, have temporarily disarmed and almost silenced the democratic socialist party, the only party, which proposed, and was ready, to seize power by immediate violence. Government has its foot upon this party; it is cast down, but not extinct. On the contrary, the few organs of the press which have survived the late repressive measures, declare and prove too that it is full of life and even of hope. It is engaged in active but secret agitation and propagand. Its cause has succumbed all over Europe. Unhappy Lombardy, Piedmont, Tuscany, Baden, Rome, gallant Hungary, and ever-glorious Venice are all now beneath the feet of their former masters. The despotic principle represented by Russia, Austria, Prussia, France, (aye, France in spite of its nominal republicanism) is every where triumphant. There is not throughout the continent of Europe a republican band armed, or that dares to arm! Yet the party in France declares that the future, and the near future belongs to it. This party is unquestionably formidable here. It is strong in Paris, in many of the departments, in the assembly, and stronger, I fear, in the army, than it is safe to admit. It believes to be necessary, it contemplates, it is preparing, yet another appeal to arms. It will certainly not witness quietly the accomplishment of the designs of the monarchical parties. It cannot however enjoy even a temporary triumph in France, unless the cause is powerfully served by the irreconcilable dissensions of the other parties. The National Assembly, that great focus of political strifes, is now in the midst of its six weeks' recess, which will last till 1st October. It is to its absence we must ascribe the momentary calm which prevails. The fires of party, however, are not extinct: they are only diffused. The members are dispersed throughout all the departments, each an earnest apostle of his own political creed, striving to gain converts and influence the General Councils, (popular representative assemblies, which meet periodically in all the departments,) to an expression of opinion which will tell in his favor upon the action of the Assembly at its meeting in October. The ultra Legitimists declare that the republic was imposed upon France by an infamous coup de main, that the people have never sanctioned it, and they demand an immediate appeal to the people, proposing to be decided by universal suffrage this question, "Shall France adopt for its government the Democratic Republic, or the Representative Monarchy?" They believe that the latter would prevail; and they hope that of the three monarchical parties their own would prove the strongest. The Count of Chambord (Henry V.) with his wife has recently visited the fashionable watering place of Ems, in Germany, near the French frontier. They received there some fifteen hundred of their most devoted French partisans, among them several of their most distinguished adherents. The Legitimist party is dividing. A portion of it will hold no political communion with the other parties: will not co-operate with them upon any occasion except for common defence of life, family and property against the insurgents of June, armed and in the streets. Another portion is in intimate communion with the Orleanists or Bonapartists. It is even said that they are plotting and likely to compass the fusion of the parties of the elder and younger branches. Henry V. it is almost certain will never have an immediate heir to his rights, or pretensions. It is proposed that he shall reign, declaring the Count of Paris to be his heir, and uniting the whole power and influence of the two parties to insure his peaceable succession. This is plausible, and if all the adherents of these two families would cordially and earnestly unite for its accomplishment, it would perhaps be a feasible plan. But a portion of the Legitimists, to say nothing of the Phillipists are quite impracticable. The family hate is embittered by eighteen years of deadly strife. They would have to conquer the republicans in a bloody civil war, before the newly erected throne could acquire any stability. They would meet, too, and must gain, or conquer the Bonapartists. The imperial pretender is now in power, and wields all the influence of government. While few believe him a sincere republican—none, absolutely none, believe that knowingly and willingly he would lend himself to the restoration of any but the imperial throne, to be occupied by himself. This consummation he is still dreaming of, still working for, I have no doubt. He calls all parties into his councils hoping that they will neutralize each other, and that in the end, they will by the force of events, and his own good management, all become subservient to the accomplishment of his own purposes. Unless the force of events most efficiently serves him, unless he calls to his aid a well timed coup d'etat, backed by a goodly number of Bonapartist regiments, let him beware lest he who would play with others be himself played with. Can Louis Napoleon Bonaparte expect to win in a game of address in which he has Thiers and Molé for opponents? These men may form, as means, not as an end, the establishment of the consulate, or even of an Empire. The efforts of the Napoleonists proper are at the present moment directed to the effecting an immediate revision of the constitution, not waiting till the three years prescribed by the constitution itself for the trial of that instrument as it is, shall have elapsed. Their avowed object is to give "stability" to the government. They would declare first the immediate reëligibility of the President, which is now forbidden. Without this, M. Bonaparte must infallibly, after his term has expired, become less than an ordinary man. He will have lost the prestige of his name, and proved his own substantive want of value. Complete insignificance will await him. The President being declared re-eligible, his partisans would next lengthen the term to ten years or for life, with a change of style from President to Consul, and an increase of salary from twenty thousand dollars per month, which it actually is, to forty thousand. These changes in the constitution being effected, executive influence is to be trusted to insure the president's reelection. It is understood, however, that the title of consul, with residence at the Elyseé Bourbon, and the bagatelle of $40,000 per month, is only provisional, and accepted en passant. The desired "stability" to government will not be reached in the opinion of this party until their consul installed as Emperor, shall occupy the Tuileries, and have an imperial civil list at his command. I am partly of this opinion myself. That, or something equivalent, must take place, or France will be continually agitated, and revolution become its normal condition.

Since I last touched upon politics, the Reaction has made immense strides. Nearly all the republicans throughout France, placed in office under the administrations which preceded the accession to power of M. Bonaparte, have been removed. Attachment to republicanism is a sufficient cause. Hardly a day passes but we have notice of removals of men, who have perilled their lives on the side of order in all the crises through which the republic has passed, and who are ever ready to do so. It is impossible not to see in those removals and the appointments which follow, the settled purpose, now become a system, to put all official influence in the hands of monarchists. The early republican government placed on the retired list some twenty or thirty general officers, suspected of sympathy with one or the other of the ex-royal families. These officers have just been restored and republican officers are kept out of employ, or sent to Africa or Corsica. The names of several of the colleges in Paris, the names of many of the streets, and of several of the theatres, were republicanized eighteen months ago. The former have been, the latter are about to be rebaptized with their old names. M. Bonaparte yet has in his cabinet a republican element. This is represented now especially by M. Dufaure. This gentleman, there is little doubt, will be eliminated next month, soon after the meeting. There has never been any cordial good feeling between him and the President. The latter owes him a deep grudge for his conduct in January and December last, when, during the presidential canvass he was Cavaignac's obedient minister of the interior. It is matter of surprise that he has remained so long in the cabinet, where he was received and has been retained only in obedience to stern political necessities. Léon Faucher the predecessor of Dufaure, and one of the most thorough-going reactionists in France, is almost universally looked to as his successor. It is believed that De Tocqueville, Passy and Odilon Barrot himself, will accompany Dufaure in his retreat, as being too liberal for a government which has such crying need of "stability." The Dix Décembre a journal devoted personally to the President, believed to be his echo, and known as the organ of the imperialists, daily utters philippics against Dufaure, and eulogies on Faucher, daily advocates the revision of the constitution, and cries for "stability." Nous verrons.

But while reaction is the order of the day in politics, let me signalize one laudable step forward, which, guided by the light of science, this government has just taken in the interest of commerce and international communication. I allude to the onerous and annoying quarantine laws which have so long shackled the intercourse of Europe with the East. These laws have long been believed to be unnecessarily severe: and under the last reign several attempts were made to liberally modify them. The southern ports of France had suffered so severely from the plague, that for many years no precautions were considered excessive: and rules dictated by fear were persisted in long after experience and science had demonstrated their inefficiency in addition to their severity. In 1845, the Royal Academy of Medicine of Paris was charged by government to inquire whether, without danger to the public health, these laws might not be considerably relaxed, and to what extent. The Academy appointed a committee of eleven, in which figure the names of Adelon, Dubois, Parisot, Royer Collard, and Prus. The committee addressed itself earnestly to the investigation of the questions involved. It was made the subject of fifty sittings, in which volumes of written testimony were read, and the oral testimony taken of many physicians who had seen and treated the plague. M. Prus proceeded himself to Marseilles to conduct examinations there: in short, no means were left unemployed which would enable the committee to arrive at satisfactory, practical and scientific conclusions. Their report was made in March, 1846. It declared the plague to be endemic in Egypt, Syria and Turkey—that the disease was spontaneously developed under the influence of local and atmospheric causes—that the plague usually appears under the form of epidemic diseases and observes similar rules of progress—that clothing and bedding used by the infected, have not communicated the plague to persons who have afterwards made use of the same, even without previous purification—that no rigid system of observation has demonstrated the transmissibility of the plague by mere contact with the infected—that the transmissibility of the plague by means of merchandize in countries where the plague already exists, or where it does not exist, is by no means established—that persons infected form the only foci of infection, and they alone infect the atmosphere—that the period of incubation, or time during which the seeds of the plague lie dormant, is from three to five days, and that it never fails to declare itself within eight days. This report was in the following year, 1847, made the foundation of great ameliorations in the quarantine laws; but such was the force of prejudice against innovation upon the time-honored system of restriction, and so powerful was the influence of the multifarious official interests which had grown up under the old system, that the ordonnance of 1847, by the admission of all impartial intelligent men, left much to be desired. The step which separates the provisions of the ordonnance of 1847 from complete liberty, limited only by such restrictions as an intelligent regard for the public health based upon the conclusions of the above mentioned report would dictate, has just been taken by the President, upon the advice of the minister of agriculture and commerce.

The Cholera has not yet entirely left us. The number of deaths has slightly varied during the last month. About forty daily is the average. The total number of deaths in Paris from cholera since the commencement of its attack in March last is now considerably upward of 20,000. The total number in 1832 was only 18,000, but the visitation then was only of one month's duration. Nobody now seems to think of cholera any more than if it did not exist: and regular reports of the number of deaths have ceased to be made. But we still hear every now and then of some distinguished victim. Among its last and best known in Paris is Jules André Guéret, a denizen of la Cité. When the second volume of the "Lives of Curious and Odd Characters" is compiled, André Guéret must certainly find his page in it. At twenty-five years of age Guéret, a gay and dashing youth, saw himself in possession of his paternal inheritance, a handsome fortune. "I mean never to marry," said he, "consequently, I shall have no family to support, either with me or after me; and I don't care to leave any portion of my fortune behind. A sober man, who, though no husband himself, husbands his life, may calculate upon living to three score and ten. But if he goes it a little, if he enjoys life, he will hardly pass fifty-five—to be liberal, say sixty years. Now I mean to go it, and cannot possibly live, therefore, beyond sixty years of age. Take twenty-five from sixty, and thirty-five remain. My property converted into cash is worth so much. This sum divided by 35 gives me so much per annum: a pretty little sum—one may live upon that—one may enjoy life!" He sold his estates, turned them into gold, and having no faith in banks and bankers, he concealed his money in his own house, determined to spend every year fully the sum agreed upon, and no more. "If," said he, "when my money is spent, my life should not be, why there stands Pont Neuf—and the Seine flows below." He kept his resolution faithfully, so far as the spending and hoarding of his money was concerned: and also in another particular—he went it strong. Nobody enjoyed life in the ordinary acceptation of the term more than Jules André Guéret. But he miscalculated in one particular: and his resolution failed him in another. The sixty-first year found him without a sol, and with several miserable years to spare. He was not philosopher enough to take the promised leap, or rather he was too much of a philosopher to do so. Since 1843 a poor old beggar has been constantly seen, seated on a hard bench, occupying the same spot upon the quai des Celestins. Summer and winter, every day, rain or shine, the old man was there. A charity box rested on his knees; small bunches of phosphoric matches were in his hand. It was Jules André Guéret. He lived upon public charity. He had composed the following couplet, which was written upon a piece of paste-board, and suspended from his neck, to attract the notice of the passer by.

"Ayez pitié, passants, du pauvre André Guéret, Dont la vie est plus longue, hélas ! qu'il ne croyait."

The stroller along the quai des Celestins has often noticed a group of listeners in front of the old man's bench. He was amusing them with some racy souvenir of his youthful days. One day last week Guéret had repaired, well as usual, with his charity box, matches, and couplet, to his accustomed seat. In May and June while hundreds and thousands were dying about him, Guéret was never missed from his bench. But his time was at last come. He was seized in the course of the day with violent symptoms of cholera. Ready arms, for old André was a favorite with every inhabitant of the quarter, bore him to a neighboring hospital. And he died.

The Fine Arts have just lost in Paris one of their most distinguished and successful worshippers, the miniature painter, Mme. Mirbel, the wife of Professor Mirbel of the Garden of Plants. For the last twenty years she has been one of the best known of her art in Europe, honored with the patronage of several kings and all of the high aristocracy. Mme. Mirbel died at the age of fifty. If the walk of art which she chose was not the highest, she found it more lucrative than the highest walks have been often found to be by those who have even gloriously pursued them. She has left a considerable fortune.

Reports have been current of late that our bachelor President was hastening to avail himself of his present high political position to assure him an eligible matrimonial union: and the departure upon a mysterious foreign embassy of a high officer of his household gave colour to the reports. He had an eye not only to present convenience, but to requisites which would satisfy the exigencies of what he hoped would be ere long his own more elevated rank. A royal daughter of Sweden was the chosen fair one, already a relative of the President, he being her uncle à la mode de Bretagne. She is a grand-daughter on her mother's side of Eugene Beauharnais, who was the brother of Hortense, mother of the President. I thought it, from the first, hardly probable that a royal family would receive as a member the mere president of a republic, of so ill-assured position, of such doubtful future, and to speak most favorably, of very questionable personal value. The Moniteur du Soir has just taken the trouble formally to deny the truth of these reports.

I gave in one of my late letters an account which it was supposed would be interesting to most of your readers, of the courtiers de mariage (marriage brokers or professional match-makers) of Paris. To-day I add a sort of postscript which will complete the information contained in that letter, and at the same time render an act of justice to French legislation. It is not perhaps the only discrepancy which could be signaled between the laws of France and its customs in relation to marriage.

M. Foy, the "negociateur en mariages" who figured so honorably in my letter, the same to whom the visit there described was made, has lately had to do with a most ungrateful client, one M. Lebreton. M. L., an elderly gentleman, retired and in easy circumstances, who, in his former professional capacity had been privy to thousands of mock marriages, took it into his head that, in the decline of life, he must contract one in serious earnest for himself. Unhappy, misled man! He forgot that marriage, the truest wisdom at twenty-five, becomes a folly at fifty. "Oui," said he to M. Foy, upon whom he called in furtherance of his project, "Oui, c'en est fait, je me marie."

"Bon!" said M. Foy—to himself—"Here is another old simpleton who has come to gratify my pockets with a handful of his hard-earned gold." Methinks I see the worthy gentleman, clad in his ample robe de chambre, conducting his visiter into the retired study, and there having seated him upon the sofa, take his own place in the arm-chair before the secretary, and with imposing gravity of manner, commence his lecture of course upon the seriousness and importance of matrimony. We are not informed whether M. L., with the docility befitting his age, heard the lecture to the end; but it appears certain that the result of this first visit was so satisfactory that the second interview was determined upon. M. Foy interrogated his voluminous portfolio with accustomed success. From his long lists of ladies to marry, he selected several to be submitted to his client. Of them M. L. chose Mlle. C., who with no fortune it seems worth speaking of, was represented to possess all the qualities which the disinterested M. L. desired in a wife. Thereupon the following contract was signed between the parties. The contract does not appear fairly engrossed, written out with the hand for this particular occasion. Like a man overwhelmed with business, M. F. produced from his drawer a printed form similar to the law-forms met with in our lawyers' offices. The blanks left for names and descriptions were filled up with the pen: and the document then read as follows. You will perceive it is in the most approved and imposing technical form.

"Between the undersigned Henry Charles Napoleon de Foy, negotiator of marriages, patented exclusively ad hoc, under the No. 212, residing at Paris, Enghien street, 34 bis, of the one part, and M. Lebreton, former theatrical director, residing at Paris, Tower of Auvergne street, 18, of the other part, has been determined upon and agreed as follows:

"M. Lebreton having made known to M. de Foy his wish to be married, the parties have contracted and taken respectively the engagements hereinafter mentioned:

"Art. 1.—M. de Foy promises to take all the steps understood to be consistent with, and required by, the character of his agency, and to do every thing which shall depend upon him to facilitate the marriage of M. Lebreton, and to enable him to obtain the hand of Mlle. C....., whose father holds a high employ, &c., &c.

"Art. 2.—M. Lebreton on his part, promises and undertakes by these presents, only in case of success in his projected marriage, to pay to M. de Foy, immediately after the celebration, the sum of six hundred francs; and this by way of reward in acknowledgment of services rendered and to indemnify M. de Foy for the expenses and outlays by him to be incurred, in negotiating this marriage, and, also, for the pains, care, and diligence which he shall have exercised in its management. This sum, in consideration of the uncertainty of the event, has been fixed by M.

Lebreton, and is intended as a recompense in gross to cover all charges, without future specification.

"Art. 3.—The simple fact of the celebration of the marriage between M. Lebreton and Mlle. C. shall be deemed proof that it is by the mediation, care, and diligence of M. de Foy that the marriage has been concluded.

"It is understood that in case the marriage herein contemplated should not take place, this present instrument shall become and remain null and of no effect, and that in this event there shall not be due to M. de Foy any indemnity upon any account whatever.

"Done and signed, double, and in good faith, under private seals, and after being read, at Paris the 25th January, 1849.

"The above writing approved.

LEBRETON."

Operations were commenced immediately under the above contract; and so hotly prosecuted under the guidance of Cupid and M. Foy, that within less than six months from the signing of the contract, M. Lebreton saw his efforts crowned with success. Mlle. C. had been wooed and won. She was his in the bands of holy wedlock.

Was he disappointed in matrimony, as most elderly gentlemen who marry young wives, are, sooner or later? Had he been swindled? Had he been deceived as to the soundness or the qualities of the wife whom he had married upon the representation of Foy, without warranty? It can hardly be supposed that he was less careful in bargaining for a wife than he would have been in bargaining for a horse. Or was M. Lebreton only a shrewd swindler himself who, aware of the legal defect in his contract with Foy, was determined to take advantage of that defect, and keep his six hundred francs? This does not appear. But the fact is he did neglect to pay the said sum to the said Henry Charles Napoleon—and though often urgently requested to pay the same, he ever refused and omitted so to do. And therefore the said Henry brings his suit. It was in the progress of this suit which came up for adjudication a few days ago, that the above curious contract was produced. It was adduced in evidence of the verbal contract alleged to exist between the parties. Before suit was brought Lebreton had offered a less sum—a compromise founded perhaps upon what he deemed a trial, and after intimate acquaintance, to be the real value of his new wife. Six hundred francs is about $120. M. de Foy would listen to no compromise. He would have all or nothing. He got nothing. The court "considering that the recompense of six hundred francs was stipulated to be paid in case de Foy should succeed in bringing about the marriage of Miss C. with Lebreton—and, considering further that such a contract, having for its object the conclusion of a matrimonial alliance, not with a view to promote the best interest of the parties, due regard being had to mutual compatibilities, but in view of a pecuniary reward, must be held as vitiated by an illegal consideration," ordered a nonsuit, with costs, to be entered against the plaintiff.

I cannot resist the temptation to add here by way of complement to some illustrations given in a former letter of the extent to which religious superstition yet prevails in France, the following instance of impudent priestly imposture. It is now being practised in the city of Nantes and its vicinity with, it is said, considerable success. Men (said to be Jesuits) of very solemn and mysterious deportment, go about selling copies of two portraits which they allege to be likenesses of Christ and the Virgin Mary. These persons first present themselves at the houses of their intended dupes and leave for perusal a sort of prospectus, printed upon rose-colored paper. The next day they call and present for sale the two engravings alluded to in the prospectus which they always carefully require to be remitted to them. This prospectus is a remarkable document. Here is a copy of it.

"Veritable Portraits

of our Saviour Jesus Christ and of the Thrice Blessed Virgin Mary.

"Monsieur,

"The two portraits which we have the honor of presenting to you, have just been found in the subterranean passages of the Ancient Senatorial Palace, at Rome: where they have lain buried for more than eighteen centuries.

"One of these portraits, at the bottom of which is written in antique style a personal description of Jesus with some particulars touching his habits and character, was sent to the Roman Senate by Publius Lentulus, at that epoch governor of Judea. The other is that of the Virgin Mary. It has been recognised by various antique inscriptions to be the same which Saint Luke, the Evangelist, himself painted and gave to Mary at the time he dwelt with her in Jerusalem: and in relation to which she said upon beholding it, 'To this image I attach my grace.'

"These two admirable portraits are perfect likenesses, they having been taken during the life of Jesus and of Mary. We owe their reproduction to the pencil of a very distinguished artist, who faithfully copied them at Rome a few days ago, from the original drawings of which we spoke above, and which were found in a perfect state of preservation, freshness and beauty.

"As for the antique writings, observed at the bottom of the portraits, we have merely given a literal translation of them in order that they may be understood by all persons.

"These two precious portraits of which these few lines can give but a very imperfect idea, will soon find their place in the abode of all Christian families. Their very moderate price puts them within the reach of all fortunes.

"Price of the two portraits: 1 fr. 50 c.

"Nota. One of our clerks will have the honor of calling in the course of the day or to-morrow to offer the portraits. Please have the kindness to return to him the prospectus."

The numerous promenaders who, in the afternoon, throng the Place Vendôme, on their way to and from the garden of the Tuileries were a few days since thrown into much excitement by the sad spectacle of yet another suicide committed by leaping from the top of the column of Austerlitz upon the pavement below. This is the third event of the sort since the opening of the revolution: and the thirty-sixth since the erection of the column, giving an average of nearly one per annum. The last sufferer was a well-dressed young man supposed, from papers found in his pocket, to be English or American: but no name or address was found. The body, horribly crushed and disfigured, was taken to the Morgue. The height of the column is about 140 feet.

The High Court of Justice is to be convened at Versailles the 8th of next month for the trial of sixty-six of the persons principally implicated in the insurrection of the 13 June last. Among the accused are thirty-three members of the National Assembly, and about a dozen connected with the democratic press. Most of these accused persons had sufficient notice of the intention to arrest to enable them to escape across the frontier: most of whom are in England. Twenty-seven only have been seized. Besides these sixty-six there have been numerous other arrests made on account of this affair, seventeen hundred in all. Of these about half have been already discharged: and eight hundred remain to be tried by Court Martial.

The most various reports have been in circulation, touching the value of the property of Louis Philippe and the amount of his debts. We have now authentic information respecting his property in France. It is generally believed that there is no truth in the rumors, that he was cautious enough, in anticipation of events compelling him to abandon his throne, to invest in foreign countries, particularly in England and the United States, considerable portions of his income. The administrator, charged by the republic soon after the revolution with the management of the estate and payment of the debts, reports that the real property belonging to the late king and his sister Adelaide, who died in Paris just before the revolution, may be estimated at fifty millions of dollars. Much of it, however, is unprofitable; the aggregate of income derived from this property not exceeding one million of dollars. He left debts in France to the amount of about twelve millions of dollars. To pay these debts it is proposed to sell his well-known summer residence near Paris, Neuilly, with the famous forest of Bondy and the whole or portions of some half dozen other forests in different parts of France. The personal property, of which no account is rendered in the notices lately published, must amount besides the above to several other millions. If the late king is half so much of a philosopher as he should be, with this ample fortune he will be much happier at Claremont as Count de Neuilly than he ever was at the Tuileries as King of the French.

It is proposed to establish in Paris a mosk for the use of the numerous Mohammedans in the capital.

The theatres of Paris are suffering greatly this year too, though not so much as last from the absence of strangers. They have made again united application to the National Assembly for a subsidy to enable them to bear up under the pressure of the times. The application was for 680,000 francs, and was signed by Victor Hugo and forty-four other members of the Assembly. It has, very wisely I think, been reported against. There is even question now of withdrawal from the four national theatres all governmental aid and declaring theatrical amusements freely open to all competition. M. Dufaure, Minister of the Interior, has declared himself in favor of the project. Its realization would be a popular measure and put a stop to many crying abuses. Rachel has just reappeared at the French Theatre after a tour in the provinces from which she has netted, it is said, twenty thousand dollars profits. She is entitled annually to three months vacation from the Paris engagements. The manager offered her six thousand dollars if she would waive her rights and remain at her post in Paris this summer. But she was too well aware of the profits of these country excursions and declined the offer. Her health so seriously compromised as was communicated in my letter of January last, published in the Messenger for March, is perfectly restored, as you may judge from the wonderful amount of labor, physical and mental, which she has undergone during the late tour. During her ninety days' absence from Paris she performed eighty-five nights and traveled 2,500 miles! Reports, however, are again rife of serious misunderstandings between the tragedienne and her manager, threatening to involve her final retreat. The French opera reopened early this week with much éclat and restored to Paris its favorite dancer, Carlotta Grisi, after an absence of fifteen months. The occasion was graced by the presence of the President of the Republic with his cousin, La Marquise de Douglass, of the Grand Ducal House of Baden.

W. W. M.

THANATOS.

BY SIDNEY DYER.

I.

All nature is dying—
 Ever dies;
 To the grave all are hieing
 Where the Death-Angel flies.
 At the rush of his wings
 The strongest grow pale;
 The life-giving springs
 All suddenly fail;
 The high and the lowly,
 The king on the throne,
 The vile and the holy
 He claims as his own.
 All nature is dying—
 Ever dies;
 To the grave all are hieing
 Where the Death-Angel flies.

II.

All bloom but to wither—
 Wither all;
 To dust—they go thither,
 As the autumn leaves fall.
 Oh! will no care avail,
 No wisdom nor craft,
 When Death shall assail,
 To ward off his shaft?
 Ah, no, all is vain,
 No refuge will hide;
 His steel Death will stain
 In the heart-flowing tide.
 All nature is dying—
 Ever dies;
 To the grave all are hieing
 Where the Death-Angel flies.

III.

A maiden was kneeling—
 A fair maid;
 With the heart's deepest feeling,
 Her vows had been said.
 From the altar she rose,

With a blush on her cheek,
 While the heart with love glows
 Too blissful to speak;
 But ere she had felt
 On her lips his warm breath,
 Who beside her had knelt,
 Her bridegroom was Death!
 All nature is dying—
 Ever dies;
 To the grave all are hieing
 Where the Death-Angel flies.

IV.

When Pleasure's cup filling,
 A while yet
 Their precious time killing,
 The social have met;
 When those joys most abound
 Which they fain would prolong,
 And the chorus swells round
 As they join in the song;
 E'en then at the door
 The rude knock is heard,
 And cold ever more
 Is some bosom then stirred.
 All nature is dying—
 Ever dies;
 To the grave all are hieing,
 Where the Death-Angel flies.

V.

A mother sat smiling;
 A sweet dove
 Her heart was beguiling
 With dreams of its love.
 As she gazed it grew still,
 Its lips ceased to sigh,
 The brow waxed chill,
 And the light left the eye;
 Mid her heart-gushing joy,
 She felt a cold breath,
 Then she looked on her boy,
 And behold it was Death!
 All nature is dying—
 Ever dies;
 To the grave all are hieing
 Where the Death-Angel flies.

VI.

Though nature is dying—
 Ever dies;
 To the grave all are hieing
 Where the Death-Angel flies;
 Still, his advent ne'er dread,
 Brief, brief is his reign;
 The appointed time sped,
 Death himself shall be slain;
 Then the dead who are "blessed"
 Will Christ with him bring,
 And the grave dispossessed,
 They will reign with their king;
 Where ne'er is known dying—
 No one dies;
 To the grave none are hieing,
 And no Death-Angel flies.

THE LATE EDGAR A. POE.

So much has been said by the newspaper press of the country concerning this gifted child of genius, since his recent death, that our readers are already in possession of the leading incidents of his short, brilliant, erratic and unhappy career. It is quite unnecessary that we should recount them in this place. We feel it due to the dead, however, as editor of a magazine which owes its earliest celebrity to his efforts, that some recognition of his talent, on the part of the Messenger, should mingle with the general apotheosis which just now enrols him on the list of "heroes in history and gods in song."

Mr. Poe became connected with the Messenger during the first year of its existence. He was commended to the favorable consideration of the proprietor, the late T. W. White, by the Honorable John P. Kennedy who, as Chairman of a Committee, had just awarded to Poe the prize for the successful tale in a literary competition at Baltimore. Under his editorial management the work soon became well-known every where. Perhaps no similar enterprise ever prospered so largely in its inception, and we doubt if any, in the same length of time—even Blackwood in the days of Dr. Maginn, whom Poe in some respects closely resembled—ever published so many shining articles from the same pen. Those who will turn to the first two volumes of the Messenger will be struck with the number and variety of his contributions. On one page may be found some lyric cadence, plaintive and inexpressibly sweet, the earliest vibrations of those chords which have since thrilled with so many wild and wondrous harmonies. On another some strange story of the German school, akin to the most fanciful legends of the Rhine, fascinates and astonishes the reader with the verisimilitude of its improbabilities. But it was in the editorial department of the magazine that his power was most conspicuously displayed. There he appeared as the critic, not always impartial, it may be, in the distribution of his praises, or correct in the positions he assumed, but ever merciless to the unlucky author who offended by a dull book. A blunder in this respect he considered worse than a crime, and visited it with corresponding rigor. Among the nascent novelists and newly-fledged poetasters of fifteen years ago he came down "like a Visigoth marching on Rome." No elegant imbecile or conceited pedant, no matter whether he made his avatar under the auspices of a Society, or with the prestige of a degree, but felt the lash of his severity. Baccalauræi baculo potius quam laureo digni was the principle of his action in such cases, and to the last he continued to castigate impudent aspirants for the bays. Now that he is gone, the vast multitude of blockheads may breathe again, and we can imagine that we hear the shade of the departed crying out to them, in the epitaph designed for Robespierre,

Passant! ne plains point mon sort,
Si je vivais, tu serais mort!*

It will readily occur to the reader that such a course, while it gained subscribers to the review, was not well calculated to gain friends for the reviewer. And so Mr. Poe found it, for during the two years of his connection with the Messenger, he contrived to attach to himself animosities of the most enduring kind. It was the fashion with a large class to decry his literary pretensions, as poet and romancer and scholar, to represent him as one who possessed little else than

th' extravagancy
And crazy ribaldry of fancy—

and to challenge his finest efforts with a chilling cui bono; while the critics of otherlands and other tongues, the Athenæum and the Revue des deux Mondes, were warmly recognizing his high claims. They did not appreciate him. To the envious obscure, he might not indeed seem entitled to the first literary honors, for he was versed in a more profound learning and skilled in a more lofty minstrelsy, scholar by virtue of a larger erudition and poet by the transmission of a diviner spark.

Unquestionably he was a man of great genius. Among the littérateurs of his day he stands out distinctively as an original writer and thinker. In nothing did he conform to established custom. Conventionalities he contemned. Thus his writings admit of no classification. And yet in his most eccentric vagaries he was always correct. The fastidious reader may look in vain, even among his earlier poems—where "wild words wander here and there"—for an offence against rhetorical propriety. He did not easily pardon solecisms in others; he committed none himself. It is remarkable too that a mind so prone to unrestrained imaginings should be capable of analytic investigation or studious research. Yet few excelled Mr. Poe in power of analysis or patient application. Such are the contradictions of the human intellect. He was an impersonated antithesis.

The regret has been often expressed that Mr. Poe did not bring his singular capacity to bear

* We translate it freely,

Traveller! forbear to mourn my lot,
Thou would'st have died, if I had not.

on subjects nearer ordinary life and of a more cheerful nature than the gloomy incidents of his tales and sketches. P. P. Cooke, (the accomplished author of the Froissart Ballads, who, we predict, will one day take, by common consent, his rightful high position in American letters,) in a discriminating essay on the genius of Poe, published in this magazine for January, 1848, remarks upon this point,

"For my individual part, having the seventy or more tales, analytic, mystic, grotesque, arabesque, always wonderful, often great, which his industry and fertility have already given us, I would like to read one cheerful book made by his invention, with little or no aid from its twin brother imagination—a book in his admirable style of full, minute, never tedious narrative—a book full of homely doings, of successful toils, of ingenious shifts and contrivances, of ruddy firesides—a book happy and healthy throughout, and with no poetry in it at all anywhere, except a good old English 'poetic justice' in the end."

That such a work would have greatly enhanced Mr. Poe's reputation with the million, we think, will scarcely be disputed. But it could not be. Mr. Poe was not the man to have produced a home-book. He had little of the domestic feeling and his thoughts were ever wandering. He was either in criticism or in the clouds, by turns a disciplinarian and a dreamer. And in his dreams, what visions came to him, may be gathered to some extent from the revealings he has given—visions wherein his fancy would stray off upon some new Walpurgis, or descend into the dark realms of the Inferno, and where occasionally, through the impenetrable gloom, the supernal beauty of Lenore would burst upon his sight, as did the glorified Beatrice on the rapt gaze of the Italian master.

The poems of Mr. Poe are remarkable above all other characteristics, for the exceeding melody of the versification. "Ulalume" might be cited as a happy instance of this quality, but we prefer to quote "The Bells" from the last number of the Union Magazine. It was the design of the author, as he himself told us, to express in language the exact sounds of bells to the ear. He has succeeded, we think, far better than Southey, who attempted a similar feat, to tell us "how the waters come down at Lodore."

THE BELLS.

I.

Hear the sledges with the bells—
Silver bells!

What a world of merriment their melody foretells
How they tinkle, tinkle, tinkle,
In the icy air of night!

While the stars that oversprinkle
All the heavens seem to twinkle
With a crystalline delight;
Keeping time, time, time,
In a sort of Runic rhyme,
To the tintinnabulation that so musically wells
From the bells, bells, bells, bells,
Bells, bells, bells—
From the jingling and the tinkling of the bells.

II.

Hear the mellow wedding bells
Golden bells!
What a world of happiness their harmony foretells!
Through the balmy air of night
How they ring out their delight:—
From the molten-golden notes,
And all in tune,
What a liquid ditty floats
To the turtle-dove that listens, while she gloats
On the moon!
Oh, from out the sounding cells,
What a gush of euphony voluminously wells!
How it swells!
How it dwells
On the future!—how it tells
Of the rapture that impels
To the swinging and the ringing
Of the bells, bells, bells, bells—
Of the bells, bells, bells, bells,
Bells, bells, bells—
To the rhyming and the chiming of the bells!

III.

Hear the loud alarum bells—
Brazen bells!
What a tale of terror, now, their turbulency tells!
In the startled ear of night
How they scream out their affright!
Too much horrified to speak,
They can only shriek, shriek,
Out of tune,
In a clamorous appealing to the mercy of the fire,
In a mad exhortation with the deaf and frantic fire,
Leaping higher, higher, higher,
With a desperate desire,
And a resolute endeavour,
Now—now to sit or never,
By the side of the pale-faced moon.
Oh, the bells, bells, bells!
What a tale their terror tells Of Despair!
How they clang, and clash, and roar!
What a horror they outpour
On the bosom of the palpitating air!
Yet the ear, it fully knows,
By the twanging
And the clanging,
How the danger ebbs and flows;
Yet the ear distinctly tells,
In the jangling
And the wrangling,
How the danger sinks and swells,
By the sinking or the swelling in the anger of the bells—
Of the bells—
Of the bells, bells, bells, bells,
Bells, bells, bells—
In the clamour and the clangour of the bells!

IV.

Hear the tolling of the bells—
 Iron bells!
 What a world of solemn thought their monody compels!
 In the silence of the night,
 How we shiver with affright
 At the melancholy menace of their tone!
 For every sound that floats
 From the rust within their throats
 Is a groan.
 And the people—ah, the people—
 They that dwell up in the steeple,
 All alone,
 And who tolling, tolling, tolling
 In that muffled monotone,
 Feel a glory in so rolling
 On the human heart a stone—
 They are neither man nor woman—
 They are neither brute nor human—
 They are Ghouls :—
 And their king it is who tolls :—
 And he rolls, rolls, rolls,
 Rolls
 A psœan from the bells!
 And his merry bosom swells
 With the psœan of the bells!
 And he dances, and he yells;
 Keeping time, time, time,
 In a sort of Runic rhyme,
 To the throbbing of the bells—
 Of the bells, bells, bells—
 To the sobbing of the bells :—
 Keeping time, time, time,
 As he knells, knells, knells,
 In a happy Runic rhyme,
 To the rolling of the bells—
 Of the bells, bells, bells :—
 To the tolling of the bells—
 Of the bells, bells, bells, bells,
 Bells, bells, bells—
 To the moaning and the groaning of the bells.

The untimely death of Mr. Poe occasioned a very general feeling of regret, although little genuine sorrow was called forth by it, out of the narrow circle of his relatives. We have received, in our private correspondence, from various quarters of the Union, warm tributes to his talent, some of which we take the liberty of quoting, though not designed for publication. A friend in the country writes—

“Many who deem themselves perfect critics talk of the want of moral in the writings and particularly the poetry of Poe. They would have every one to write like Æsop, with the moral distinctly drawn at the end to prevent mistake. Such men would object to the meteor, or the lightning's flash, because it lasts only for the moment—and yet they speak the power of God, and fill our minds with the sublime more readily than does the enduring sunlight. It is thus with the writings of Poe. Every moment there comes across the darkness of his style a flash of that spirit which is not of earth. You cannot analyze the feeling—you cannot tell in what the beauty of a particular passage consists; and yet you feel that deep pathos which only genius can incite—you feel the trembling of that melancholy chord which fills the soul with pleasant mournfulness—you feel that deep yearning for something brighter and better than this world can give—that unutterable gushing of the heart which springs up at the touch of the enchanter, as poured the stream from ‘Horeb's rock, beneath the prophet's hand.’

I wish I could convey to you the impression which the ‘Raven’ has made upon me. I had read it hastily in times gone by without appreciation; but now it is a study to me—as I go along like Sinbad in the Valley of Diamonds, I find a new jewel at every step. The beautiful rhythm, the mournful cadence, still ring in the ear for hours after a perusal—whilst the heart is bowed down by the outpourings of a soul made desolate not alone by disappointed love, but by the crushing of every hope, and every aspiration.”

In a recent letter the following noble acknowledgement is made by the first of American poets—Henry W. Longfellow—towards whom, it must be said, Mr. Poe did not always act with justice. Mr. Longfellow will pardon us, we trust, for publishing what was intended as a private communication. The passage evidences a magnanimity which belongs only to great minds.

“What a melancholy death,” says Mr. Longfellow, “is that of Mr. Poe—a man so richly endowed with genius! I never knew him personally, but have always entertained a high appreciation of his powers as a prose-writer and a poet. His prose is remarkably vigorous, direct and yet affluent; and his verse has a particular charm of melody, an atmosphere of true poetry about it, which is very winning. The harshness of his criticisms, I have never attributed to anything but the irritation of a sensitive nature, chafed by some indefinite sense of wrong.”

It was not until within two years past that we ever met Mr. Poe, but during that time, and especially for two or three months previous to his death, we saw him very often. When in Richmond, he made the office of the Messenger a place of frequent resort. His conversation was always attractive, and at times very brilliant. Among modern authors his favorite was Tennyson, and he delighted to recite from “The Princess” the song “Tears, idle tears;” a fragment of which—

—when unto dying eyes

The casement slowly grows a glimmering square,— he pronounced unsurpassed by any image expressed in writing. The day before he left Richmond, he placed in our hands for publication in the Messenger, the MS. of his last poem, which has since found its way (through a correspondent of a northern paper with whom Mr Poe had left a copy) into the newspaper press, and been extensively circulated. As it was designed for this magazine, however, we publish it, even though all of our readers may have seen it before :

ANNABEL LEE.

It was many and many a year ago,
In a kingdom by the sea,
That a maiden there lived whom you may know
By the name of Annabel Lee ;—
And this maiden she lived with no other thought
Than to love and be loved by me.

She was a child and I was a child,
In this kingdom by the sea,
But we loved with a love that was more than love—
I and my Annabel Lee—
With a love that the winged seraphs of Heaven
Coveted her and me.

And this was the reason that, long ago,
In this kingdom by the sea,
A wind blew out of a cloud by night
Chilling my Annabel Lee ;
So that her high-born kinsmen came
And bore her away from me,
To shut her up in a sepulchre
In this kingdom by the sea.

The angels, not half so happy in Heaven,
Went envying her and me ;
Yes ! that was the reason (as all men know,
In this kingdom by the sea)
That the wind came out of the cloud, chilling
And killing my Annabel Lee.

But our love it was stronger by far than the love
Of those who were older than we—
Of many far wiser than we—
And neither the angels in Heaven above
Nor the demons down under the sea
Can ever dissever my soul from the soul
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee :—

For the moon never beams without bringing me dreams
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee ;
And the stars never rise but I see the bright eyes
Of the beautiful Annabel Lee ;
And so, all the night-tide, I lie down by the side
Of my darling, my darling, my life and my bride
In her sepulchre there by the sea—
In her tomb by the side of the sea.

In what we have said of Mr. Poe, we have been considering only the brighter side of the picture. That he had many and sad infirmities cannot be questioned. Over these we would throw in charity the mantle of forgetfulness. The grave has come between our perception and his errors, and we pass them over in silence. They found indeed a mournful expiation in his alienated friendships and his early death.

J. R. T.

THE IDEALS.

Translated from the German of Schiller.

And wilt thou faithless go and leave me
With all thy playful phantasy,
Of all thy joys and griefs bereave me,
Irrevocably wilt thou flee ?
Oh golden morning of my being,
Can nothing stay thee in thy flight ?
Alas ! o'er onward billows fleeing
Thou hastest towards endless night.

The sunny brightness it hath faded,
Which on my youthful roving fell ;
The beau ideal is dissipated,
Which made my ravished heart to swell.
The sweet belief in forms is vanished,
Which would to me in dreams repair ;
And rude Reality hath banished
What was so godlike, was so fair.

As erst with prayer and fond desires
Pygmalion clasped the lifeless stone,
Till the cold marble felt his fires,
And its pale cheek with feeling shone :
Thus, Nature to my bosom taking,
Round her I threw my youthful arm,
Till on my poet's-breast awaking
She 'gan to breathe and to grow warm.

Sharing my bosom's joy and sorrow
She understood its every strain,
For me she would a language borrow,
Gave me the kiss of love again.
Then saw I life in trees and flowers,
Heard music in the murmuring brook,
And of my feelings, of my powers,
E'en the inanimate partook.

Within my swelling bosom heaving
A struggling universe lay bound,
To grow to life—its prison leaving—
In word and deed, in form and sound.
This world, how glorious the Ideal,
The promise which the bud would show !
Alas ! how little was the Real,
And e'en that little poor and low !

Borne on the wing of ardent boldness,
Trusting his blithesome dreams for truth,
Unchilled as yet by the world's coldness,
On life's arena sprang the youth.
Up to the palest stars of heaven
His aspirations dared to fly,
For him, on soaring pinions driven,
Nought was too distant, nought too high.

How light his course, how free his roving !
What was too high for him, thus bless'd ?
Before him fairy-forms were moving
And round his car of life they press'd.
And love was there with gentle wooing,
Glory arrayed in starry light,
Success her golden prize pursuing,
Truth, like the sun, spotless and bright.

But scarcely had the lists been entered
 Those bright attendants proved untrue,
 Faithlessly turned their steps and wandered,
 Each in succession truant grew.
 Success left him on fleetest pinion,
 Unquenched the thirst of knowledge still,
 O'ercast was Truth's sunlit dominion
 With clouds of doubt, foreboding ill.

I saw the sacred laurels blasted,
 Upon the vulgar brow profaned;
 Too short life's honey-moon had lasted,
 The charming time of love had waned.
 And ever stiller and more lonely
 Upon the rugged path it grew,
 Scarce Hope her pallid glimmer only
 Upon the weary pilgrim threw.

But who, to me in love adhering,
 Of all that noisy company
 Side by me stands, my spirit cheering,
 True to the hour of death to me?
 Thou Friendship! gentle-handed, fairest,
 That hast a balm for every wound,
 And lovingly life's burden shares't,
 Thou, whom I early sought and found!

And thou, so fitly with her mated,
 To lull the storm, give peace and joys:
 Industry! which is never sated,
 Which slowly builds, but ne'er destroys,
 Which but with grains of sand is rearing
 Eternity's vast masonry;
 And still, each day and hour is clearing
 The great debt of Humanity.

Prince George Co., 1849.

MS. LETTER OF WM. WIRT.

The delightful volumes of Mr. Kennedy on the life of Wirt, have re-awakened the interest which attaches to every fragment from the pen of that distinguished man. We are indebted to a friend for the following interesting Letter, never before published, with reference to the Life of Henry and the "Old Bachelor."—Ed. Mess.

RICHMOND, NOV. 9, 1816.

To John E. Hall, Esq.

DEAR SIR.—I send according to your desire, an extract from my MS. sketches of Mr. Henry. You will perceive at once that the passage is selected rather from the interest of the incident, than any effort or felicity in the execution, and I begin to fear, in perusing it in its state of separation from the body of the work, that, in point of interest, it has lost so much by its detachment from the matter which ushered it in, as to be scarcely worth insertion in the Port Folio. Of this however, you shall be the judge. If you conclude to insert it, justice will perhaps require, that some notice should be taken, by an introductory remark, of the allowance due to an extract, divorced from the previous matter which had warned the reader, and prepared him for its enjoyment. This, also, I submit to your better judgment. I pray you not to give this extract the appearance of being published by me, as a specimen of the work. There is a puerility as well as vanity in such a course by which I should feel myself extremely humiliated. If you choose to say any thing of the cause which suspends the publication of the entire work, you may state, as the fact is, that, as yet, the rough draft of it only is finished, and that besides the necessity of revision, for which the Author's professional engagements will probably not afford him leisure until the next summer, it has become necessary for him to consult the archives of other States, particularly of Massachusetts, for the purpose of settling the dates of certain political events in which he has been obliged to differ from some of the historians of the revolution.

I lament that the circumstance of my not taking the Baltimore papers has deprived me of the pleasure of seeing your Old Bachelors. By-the-by, I am under a sort of promise to furnish Mr. Lucas some additional numbers, of gayer character, by way of lightening the too heavy and sombre aspect of my O. B.'s, for he has resolved it seems on a new edition. If yours are of a stamp to produce this exhilarating effect, and you have no objection to putting them into dull company, I should be very much gratified as well as relieved, if you would permit him to incorporate them with his new edition—and I am sure that the gentlemen who were associated with me in the preparation of the Richmond O. B. will have the same sense of the honor due our work by your alliance.

I never knew until the receipt of your last letter to whom I was indebted for the handsome things, so handsomely said of me in the beautiful little preface to Mr. Lucas's edition of the British Spy. It is certainly one of the best written things in the book—and the praise which it so elegantly bestows leaves me nothing to regret except the consciousness that I owe it rather to your kindness than to any merit of my own.

I beg you to believe me, dear sir,

With sincere esteem and respect,

Your ob't servant,

WM. WIRT.

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

THE HISTORY OF PENDENNIS. His Fortunes and Misfortunes, his Friends and his greatest Enemy. By W. M. Thackeray. Author of Vanity Fair, &c. New York: Harper & Brothers. Publishers.

We took occasion last month to commend to the public favor the first two numbers of this charming work. The appearance of No. 3 affords us an opportunity, which we gladly embrace, of considering more at length the literary merits of its author, who has risen in twelve months from the rank of a respectable magazine-writer to the first honors of the English novelist.

In forming a proper estimate of the merits and capacity of William Makepeace Thackeray, our readers may be assisted by a few outlines of his biography which we give upon the authority of the Edinburgh Review. Mr. Thackeray is now about thirty-eight years of age. He is of a good family and was originally intended for the bar, but after spending some years at the University of Cambridge, went off, without his degree, to the continent, with the view of making an artist of himself. He spent some time in copying pictures in the French galleries, but as his talent in this line was rather of a comic kind and consisted chiefly in his being able to sketch rapidly scenes and incidents for the amusement of his friends, he soon abandoned the brush and took to the pen. His first effort in the world of letters was a weekly journal on the plan of the "Athenæum," which, though brilliant while it lasted, soon gave up competition with the firmly-rooted popularity of the older establishments. "It sparkled, was exhaled and went to"—that oblivion which sooner or later awaits all papers and magazines. Mr. Thackeray then became a contributor to Fraser and Punch, afterwards wrote "The Irish Sketch Book" and "Notes of a Journey from Cornhill to Cairo," works of an amusing, but not a very superior character, and at last struck into that vein of sterling ore of which "Vanity Fair" was the first shining specimen, and at which he is working with great success in "Pendennis."

We cannot better preface our desultory remarks on these remarkable volumes—which bear, in our judgment, about the same relation to his other productions that the finest sculptures of Chantrey bear to the first rude carvings of his chisel, than by a negative description, in pointing out some classes of the modern novel to which they do not belong. We shall presently see, in the prosecution of this design, that our author has hit upon a manner of fictitious composition which, if it be not original, is at least refreshingly different from the ordinary run of novels since the days of Fielding and of Scott.

When the school of Mrs. Radcliffe, with all its dear, delightful terrors, its mysterious tapestries and its moonlight minstrels, went into decline, there arose among second-rate authors a new and more vicious one, borrowed from the French,—the school of "high-life." The most striking feature of this school is the ease and elegance with which the dramatis personæ contrive to break the ten commandments without shocking the moral sensibilities of the reader. The venue being transitory, the scene is changed readily from England, where the book opens, to the continent, and the hero appears as a German Count, ("honors are easy" in continental Europe,) invested with every quality that can attract admiration. The heroine, who has been already introduced as somebody else's wife, falls in with him in a gorge of the Alps, is rescued by him from the attack of a gang of banditti, and the amiable pair, after exchanging vows of eternal constancy and affection, run off with each other and defy heaven and earth through the remaining eight and forty chapters. Mr. Thackeray's works have no affinity with this class.

Another sort of bad morality in fiction prevails to an alarming extent in the novel of "low-life." The characters who figure in books of this description are less tolerable than all others, in being very gross, unrefined persons, who are not sufficiently well-bred for the highway, and whose conversation is plentifully adorned with the profane slang of St. Giles's. The principal male performer, (we cannot call him a hero,) generally appeals to the sympathy of the reader by a swaggering bravado under some most righteous sentence of the law, and at last swings at Tyburn with the air of a martyr to the wayward sense of justice of his countrymen. Those who look in Mr. Thackeray's pages for such vulgarity as this, will be disappointed. The scoundrelism of sentiment and the villainy of the melodrama are alike unvarnished by his narrative.

There is yet another class of novels that has sprung up within a few years past—those which aim at great political reforms, or theological expositions. Of this school is Miss Martineau and the authors of the Puseyite fictions en masse, who make the main object of their writings the enforcement of some very doubtful proposition in theology or political economy. It has been well said of these that they cannot avoid a petitio principii in the execution of their plan, and that it is just as easy, by imaginary incidents and plots of their own invention, to fortify one doctrine as another. Mr. Thackeray is not of this school.

Equally free from false sympathy, the affectation of science and the cant of reform, our author is content to give his views of society through the pleasant medium of genuine, honest love-stories, just such, in design, as in times past called forth the tears of our grandmothers, and, when plainly told, will continue to subdue the soul as long as woman's eye beams and woman's lip smiles and woman's voice is melody to man. Love in its rightful acceptation, generous, tearful, confiding, devoted love, with its varying phases on earth, is theme enough for the most brilliant composer to interweave with the expressions of his own heart-music, and the soft and doleful air, the old and moving story, with which the beautiful Genevieve was wooed and won, suffices to unlock the sympathies of the race. It is in unfolding some such narrative as this, that Mr. Thackeray presents himself to us in his most salient point of view—as the satirist, par excellence, of the age. In shooting Folly as it flies, there is no marksman at all comparable with him. Every shot tells. In the world of London around him—no bad epitome of the great, busy world itself—he walks through the French Row and the Italian Row of its "Vanity Fair," seizing upon every foible that his keen observation detects, and exposing it in terms as unmistakable as those employed by Faithful in the allegory, before the jury of which Mr. Blindman was the foreman. Yet is our author no cynic. If he makes war upon worldliness, he is not affected with misanthropy. The great expanse of society lies spread out before him, and if there are arid and blackened spots upon its surface, if the slough of falsehood and the desert of selfishness appear in gloomy perspective to the eye of the pilgrim, there are yet nooks brightened with occasional bursts of the mellowest and holiest sunshine. We do not lay down one of Thackeray's novels, where we have encountered characters, (alas, too correctly portrayed,) of the worst description, with the impression on our minds that the world has in it nothing of goodness or of purity. "The world," says he, "is a looking-glass, and gives forth to every man the reflection of his own face. Frown at it, and it will in turn look sourly upon you: laugh at it, and it is a jolly, kind companion; and so let all young persons take their choice." And is not this a right genial, loving creed for a satirist?

It is a rare thing that Mr. Thackeray attempts pathos, but when he does so, he is unsurpassed by any one but Dickens. To say that he "attempts" it, at any time, is perhaps an improper expression, because he seems really to be always striving to avoid it. His terror of maudlin sentiment is such, that he even endeavors to cover his pathetic passages with a playful irony. It is this very disposition, perhaps, that renders his pathos so exquisite. In spite of him, however, the spark will now and then flash out, touching "the electric chain wherewith we are darkly bound."

"The History of Pendennis," of which we have read not quite one half, is, thus far, as true to the life and as bitingly satirical as "Vanity Fair." It contains some more lenient readings of human motives than that famous book, and the ladies, who considered themselves greatly ill-used by the accomplished rascality of Becky Sharp and the sweet silliness of Amelia Sedley, will find in it full amends for Mr. Thackeray's offences against them. The female character is made the subject of high eulogium in the first number, and the heroine of the tale, though not represented as a paragon of excellence, has an amiability in her soeur sœur that is quite angelic. One of the "woman-kind" of the story is a delicious portraiture. We cannot help setting her before our readers, at the risk of a long extract. The sentimental Miss has never been so "done" before. It may be sufficient to enable them to understand the dialogue we are about to give, to say that Miss Amory, the step-daughter of Sir Francis Clavering, has recently come with her parents to reside at Clavering Park in the neighborhood of Fair Oaks, where live Mrs. Pendennis, her son the hero, and Miss Laura Bell, an adopted daughter who passes, with the young gentleman, by the endearing title of cousin.

"Sir Francis is a very judicious parent," Miss Amory whispered. "Don't you think so, Miss Bell? I shan't call you Miss Bell—I shall call you Laura. I admired you so at church. Your robe was not well made, nor your bonnet very fresh. But you have such beautiful grey eyes, and such a lovely tint."

"Thank you," said Miss Bell, laughing.

"Your cousin is handsome, and thinks so. He is uneasy de sa personne. He has not seen the world yet. Has he genius? Has he suffered? A lady, a little woman in a rumpled satin and velvet shoes—a Miss Pybus—came here and said he has suffered. I, too, have suffered—and you, Laura, has your heart ever been touched?"

"Laura said 'No!' but perhaps blushed a little at the idea of the question, so that the other said—

"Ah, Laura! I see it all. It is the beau cousin. Tell me every thing. I already love you as a sister."

"You are very kind," said Miss Bell, smiling, "and—and it must be owned that it is a very sudden attachment."

"All attachments are so. It is electricity—spontaneity. It is instantaneous. I knew I should love you from the moment I saw you. Do you not feel it yourself?"

"Not yet," said Laura; "but I dare say I shall if I try."

"Call me by my name then."

"But I don't know it," Laura cried out.

"My name is Blanche—isn't it a pretty name? Call me by it."

"Blanche—it is very pretty indeed."

"And while mamma talks with that kind looking lady—what relation is she to you? She must have been pretty once, but is rather passée; she is not well gâtée, but she has a pretty hand—and while mamma talks to her, come with me to my own room—my own, own room. It's a darling room, though that horrid creature, Captain Strong, did arrange it. Are you épouse of him? He says you are, but I know better; it is the beau cousin. Yes—il a de beaux yeux. Je n'aime pas les blonds ordinairement. Car je suis blonde moi—je suis Blanche et blonde."—and she looked at her face and made a moue in the glass; and never stopped for Laura's answer to the questions which she had put.

Blanche was fair and like a sylph. She had fair hair, with green reflections in it. But she had dark eyebrows. She had long black eye-lashes, which veiled beautiful brown eyes. She had such a slim waist, that it was a wonder to behold; and such slim little feet, that you would have thought the grass would hardly bend under them. Her lips were of the color of faint rosebuds, and her voice warbled limpidly over a set of the sweetest little pearly teeth ever seen. She showed them very often, for they were very pretty. She was very good-natured, and a smile not only showed her teeth wonderfully, but likewise exhibited two lovely little pink dimples, that nestled in either cheek.

She showed Laura her drawings, which the other thought charming. She played her some of her waltzes, with a rapid and brilliant finger, and Laura was still more charmed. And she then read her some poems, in French and English, likewise of her own composition, and which she kept locked in her own book—how own dear little book; it was bound in blue velvet with a gilt lock, and on it was printed the title of 'Mes Larmes.'

"Mes Larmes!—isn't it a pretty name?" the young lady continued, who was pleased with every thing that she did, and did every thing very well. Laura owned that it was. She had never seen any thing like it before; any thing so lovely, so accomplished, so fragile and pretty; warbling so prettily, and tripping about such a pretty room, with such a number of pretty books, pictures, flowers, round about her. The honest and generous country girl forgot even jealousy in her admiration. "Indeed, Blanche," she said, "every thing in the room is pretty; and you are the prettiest of all." The other smiled, looked in the glass, went up and took both of Laura's hands, and kissed them, and sat down to the piano, and shook out a little song, as if she had been a nightingale.

"This was the first visit paid by Fair Oaks to Clavering Park, in return for Clavering Park's visit to Fair Oaks, in reply to Fair Oaks's card left a few days after the arrival of Sir Francis's family. The intimacy between the young ladies sprang up like Jack's Bean-stalk to the skies in a single night. The large footmen were perpetually walking with little rose-colored-pink notes to Fair Oaks where there was a pretty housemaid in the kitchen, who might possibly tempt those gentlemen to so humble a place. Miss Amory sent music, or Miss Amory sent a new novel, or a picture from the 'Journal des Modes,' to Laura; or my lady's compliments arrived with flowers and fruit; or Miss Amory begged and prayed Miss Bell to come to dinner; and dear Mrs. Pendennis, if she was strong enough; and Mr. Arthur, if a hum-drum party were not too stupid for him; and would send a pony-carriage for Mrs. Pendennis; and would take no denial."

Although Laura and Pen commonly went to Clavering Park together, yet sometimes Mr. Pen took walks there unattended by her, and about which he did not tell her. He took to fishing the Brawl, which runs through the park, and passes not very far from the garden-wall. And by the oddest coincidence, Miss Amory would walk out (having been to look at her flowers,) and would be quite surprised to see Mr. Pendennis fishing.

"I wonder what trout Pen caught while the young lady was looking on? or whether Miss Blanche was the pretty little fish which played round his fly, and which Mr. Pen was endeavoring to hook? It must be owned, he became very fond of that healthful and invigorating pursuit of angling, and was whipping the Brawl continually with his fly.

"As for Miss Blanche, she had a kind heart; and having, as she owned herself 'suffered' a good deal in the course of her brief life and experience—why, she could compassionate other susceptible beings like Pen, who had suffered too. Her love for Laura and that dear Mrs. Pendennis redoubled: if they were not at the Park, she was not easy unless she herself was at Fair Oaks. She played with Laura; she read French and German with Laura; and Mr. Pen read French and German along with them. He turned sentimental ballads of Schiller and Göthe into English verse for the ladies, and Blanche unlocked 'Mes Larmes' for him, and imparted to him some of the plaintive outpourings of her own tender muse.

"It appeared from these poems that this young creature had indeed suffered prodigiously. She was familiar with the idea of suicide. Death she repeatedly longed for. A faded rose inspired her with such grief that you would have thought she must die in pain of it. It was a wonder how a young creature (who had had a snug home, or been at a comfortable boarding-school, and had no outward grief or hardship to complain of) should have suffered so much—should have found the means of getting at such an ocean of despair and passion (as a run-away boy who will get to sea), and having embarked on it, should survive it. What a talent she must have had for weeping to be able to pour out so many of Mes Larmes!

"They were not particularly briny, Miss Blanche's tears, that is the truth; but Pen, who read her verses, thought them very well for a lady—and wrote some verses himself for her. He was very violent and passionate, very hot, sweet and strong; and he not only wrote verses; but—O, the villain! O, the deceiver! he altered and adapted former poems in his possession, and which had been composed for a certain Miss Emily Fotheringay, for the use and to the Christian name of Miss Blanche Amory."

"Our accomplished little friend had some peculiarities or defects of character which rendered her not very popular. She was a young lady of some genius, exquisite sympathies and considerable literary attainments, living, like many another genius, with relatives who could not comprehend her. Neither her mother nor her step-father were persons of a literary turn. Bell's life and the Racing Calendar were the extent of the baronet's reading, and Lady Clavering still wrote like a school girl of thirteen, and with an extraordinary disregard to grammar and spelling. And as Miss Amory felt very keenly that she was not appreciated, and that she lived with persons who were not her equals in intellect or conversational power, she lost no opportunity to acquaint her family circle with their inferiority to herself, and not only was a martyr, but took care to let everybody know that she was so. If she suffered, as she said and thought she did, severely, are we to wonder that a young creature of such delicate sensibilities should shriek and cry out a good deal? Without sympathy life is nothing; and would it not have been a want of candor on her part to affect a cheerfulness which she did not feel, or pretend a respect for those toward whom it was quite impossible she should entertain any reverence? If a poetess may not bemoan her lot, of what earthly use is her lyre? Blanche struck hers only to the saddest of tunes; and sang elegies over her dead hopes, dirges over her early frost-nipt buds of affection, as became such a melancholy fate and muse.

"Her actual distress, as we have said, had not been, up to the present time, very considerable; but her griefs lay, like those of most of us, in her own soul—that being sad and habitually dissatisfied, what wonder that she should weep? So Mes Larmes dribbled out of her eyes any day at command; she could furnish an unlimited supply of tears, and her faculty of shedding them increased by practice. For sentiment is like another complaint mentioned by Horace, as increasing by self-indulgence (I am sorry to say, ladies, that the complaint in question is called the dropsy) and the more you cry, the more you will be able and desirous to do so.

"Missy had begun to gush at a very early age. Lamartine was her favorite bard from the period that she first could feel; and she had improved her mind by a sedulous study of novels of the great modern authors of the French language. There was not a romance of Balzac and George Sand which the indefatigable little creature had not devoured by the time she was sixteen; and, however little she sympathized with her relatives at home, she had friends, as she said, in the spirit-world, meaning the tender Indiana, the passionate and poetic Lelia, the amiable Tremmor, that high-souled convict, that angel of the galleys—the fairy Stenio—and the other numberless heroes of the French romances. She had been in love with Prince Rodolph and Prince Djalma while she was yet at school, and had settled the divorce question, and the rights of woman, with Indiana, before she had left off pinafores. The impetuous little lady played at love with these imaginary worthies, as a little while before she had played at maternity with her doll. Pretty little poetical spirits! it is curious to watch them with those playthings. To-day the blue-eyed one is the favorite, and the black-eyed one is pushed behind the drawers. To-morrow blue-eyes may take its turn of neglect; and it may be an odious little wretch with a burned nose, or torn head of hair, and no eyes at all, that takes the first place in Miss's affection, and is dandled and caressed in her arms."

We shall look with impatience for the forthcoming Nos. of "Pendennis," which we are sure our readers will be eager to read in full, after enjoying the foregoing extracts. The work is excellently printed and embellished with spirited wood-cuts from the designs of the author.

For sale by Morris & Brother.

HISTORY OF THE FRENCH REVOLUTION OF 1848. By A. De Lamartine. Translated by Francis A. Durieage and William S. Chase. First American Edition. Boston: Phillips, Sampson & Co., 110 Washington street. 1849.

If the world is not at last made fully acquainted with the life and adventures of this dangerous man—this Gallic orator, minstrel, statesman, philosopher and hero—it will certainly be no fault of M. Alphonse de Lamartine. In Raphaël and Les Confidences he has recently told the public how badly he conducted himself in his boyhood, what conquests of peerless damsels he achieved, still attested by touching souvenirs in the shape of tresses, and what requital he made for the tenderest affection ever lavished by woman on our inconstant and ungrateful sex. Years before the publication of these books, he had been gracious enough to narrate what glorious things Lady Hester Stanhope had foretold of his future career, and now he comes forward to show how her predictions have been verified, in a work which we have no hesitation in saying is the most remarkable specimen of self-laudation that has ever come under our notice.

Egotism indeed was but little understood until the French feuilleton commenced its interminable labours. There had, it is true, been some egotists prior to that time, on both sides of the Channel. Byron had laid bare his whole being to the eyes of mankind, and Jean Jacques, a hundred years before him, had exemplified the maxim of Rochefcauld, to the effect, that we had rather talk of our faults than not talk of ourselves at all. But both the Englishman and the Genevese did, at times, pass from self to other topics; a transition which the modern Frenchman never makes. Whatever he writes, he is in his own proper person the burthen of the strain. So infectious has this practice become, that it pervades all classes of writers, and we have seen the great Chateaubriand, in the evening of his life, reading out to a little band of claqueurs around his own fireside, those revelations of his inmost being, which should never have spoken to us even from "Beyond the Tomb." We have the less patience with this egotism too, when we consider that it meets with the largest pecuniary rewards. While administering to his vanity the French author is filling his purse, and his receipts seem to bear a direct proportion to his use of the first person singular. A book full of the author's confessions—no matter whether they disclose things which all honorable men would keep closely locked up in their bosoms—will sell,—if written for La Presse or the Siècle, will pay handsomely—while a writer who discusses other subjects finds few readers and small remuneration. Perhaps the fault may after all be with the mass of readers and the man who publishes. Sidney Smith once asked "if all the decencies and delicacies of life were in one scale and five francs in the other, what French bookseller would feel a single moment of doubt in making his election?" In this day, we fear that with the booksellers and bookmakers, a few sous would be quite sufficient to determine the balance.

Of all the writers of the modern French school we think M. de Lamartine is the most insufferably vain. He seems to have undertaken systematically, since the eventful month of February, 1848, to show to France and the rest of the world how exquisitely the good and great qualities of Socrates, Scipio, Paul, Charlemagne, Milton and Washington combine in the person of the representative of Macon. He appears in his own pages as a man too sublimated for the age in which destiny has cast his lot, an expounder of truths which mankind is not yet prepared to receive, an embodiment of wisdom of which the world is not worthy. The suffrages of the people for the first President of the Republic were withheld from him, in his judgment, because he was not appreciated. Let the people read his "History of the Revolution of 1848" and they will become sensible of their great mistake. They will then see how they suffered the most enlarged patriotism to go unrewarded,

And like the base Judean threw a pearl away
Richer than all their tribe.

It is a melancholy thing to recognize this cardinal weakness in so remarkable a person as Lamartine. For assuredly he has many admirable and attractive traits, and there is something in him above the flippancy of the old philosophes. When the last Revolution broke out, there were many in republican America who watched his movements with eager interest and applauded that noble effort at the Hotel de Ville which made him, for the space of half-an-hour, a truly great man. In taking up the History now before us, we were naturally curious to know in what manner Lamartine would speak of this event. Our readers shall see for themselves in the following extract, which, as it is the only one our limits will allow us to make, must serve to substantiate the charge of insufferable vanity we have brought against the author.

After describing the irruption of the populace, into the court of the hotel, Lamartine (speaking of himself in the third person) says :

"Lagrange, with dishevelled hair, and two pistols at his girdle, with excited gestures, subduing the crowd by his lofty figure, and the tumult by his voice, that resembled the roaring of the masses, was striving in vain, in the midst of his friends of the evening and those who had gone beyond him in the morning, at once to satisfy and restrain the zeal of this crowd, intoxicated with victory, impatience, suspicion, tumult, and wine. The almost inarticulate voice of Lagrange as much excited frenzy by its tone as it desired to appease it by its meaning. Tossed about like the mast of a vessel, from group to group, he was borne from the staircase to the passage, from the door to the windows. With extended arms and salutations of the head, he cried from above to the multitude in the courts, with supplicating speeches, which were carried away by the winds, or drowned by the howling in the lower stories, and the noise of the firing. A weak door, which could hardly allow two men to pass abreast, served as a dike against the crowd, arrested by their own weight. Lamartine, raised on the arms and shoulders of some good citizens, rushed to it. He broke it open, preceded only by his name, and found himself again alone, struggling with the most tumultuous and foaming waves of the sedition.

"In vain the man nearest to him cried out his name to the multitude—in vain they raised him at times upon their entwined arms, to show his form to the people, and to obtain silence, if it were only from curiosity. The fluctuation of this crowd, the cries, the shocks, the resounding of the strokes of muskets against the walls, the voice of Lagrange, interrupting with hoarse sentences the brief silence of the multitude, rendered all attitude and speech impossible. Engulphed, stifled, and crowded back against the door, which was closed behind him, it only remained for Lamartine to allow the deaf and blind irruption to pass over his body, with the red flag, which the insurgents raised above their heads, as a standard, victorious over the vanquished government.

"At last some devoted men succeeded in bringing to him a broken straw-covered chair, upon which he mounted, as it were upon a tottering tribune, which was supported by the hands of his friends. From his appearance, from the calmness of his figure which he strove to render so much the more impassible as he had the more passions to restrain, from his patient gestures, from the cries of the good citizens imploring silence that he might be heard, the crowd, with whom a new spectacle always commands attention, began to group themselves into an audience, and to quiet by degrees their noise.

"Lamartine began many times to speak, but at each fortunate attempt to subdue this tumult by his look, his arm and his voice, the voice of Lagrange haranguing on his side another portion of the people from the windows, raised again in the hall the guttural cries, fragments of discourse, and roaring of the crowd, which drowned the words and action of Lamartine, and caused the sedition to triumph by confusion. They finally calmed Lagrange, and drew him from his tribune. He went to carry persuasion other parts of the edifice; and Lamartine, whose resolution increased with the danger, could finally make himself heard by his friends and his enemies.

"He first calmed the people by an eloquent hymn upon the victory so sudden, so complete, so unhopd for even by republicans the most desirous of liberty. He called God and men to witness the admirable moderation and religious humanity which the mass of this people had shown, even in combat and in triumph. He roused again that sublime instinct which had, during the evening, thrown this people, still armed, but already obedient and disciplined, into the arms of a few men devoted to calumny, to weariness and death, for the safety of all.

"At these pictures the crowd began to admire themselves, and to shed tears over the virtues of the people. Enthusiasm soon raised them above their suspicions, their vengeance and their anarchy.

"Citizens, see what the sun of yesterday beheld!" continued Lamartine. "And what will the sun of to-day witness? It will see another people so much the more furious as it has fewer enemies to combat, defying the very men whom yesterday they had raised above them; constraining them in their liberty, humbling them in their dignity, despising them in their authority, which is only your own; substituting a revolution of vengeance and punishment for one of unanimity and fraternity, and commanding their government to raise, in token of concord, the standard of deadly combat between citizens of a common country!—that red banner, which they have sometimes been able to raise when blood was flowing, as a terror to their enemies, but which they ought to lower immediately after the combat, in sign of reconciliation and peace! I should prefer the black flag, which sometimes in a besieged city, floats like a winding-sheet, to designate to the bomb the neutral edifices consecrated to humanity, and which even the bullet and the shell of the enemy must spare. Do you wish, then, that the banner of your republic should be more menacing and sinister than that of a bombarded town?"

"No, no!" cried some of the spectators; "Lamartine is right; let us not preserve this flag of terror for the citizens!"—"Yea, yes!" cried others: "it is ours, it is that of the people. It is that with which we have conquered. Why, then, should we not preserve, after the victory, the standard which we have stained with our blood?"

"Citizens," resumed Lamartine, after having opposed the change of the banner by all the reasons most striking to the imagination of the people, and, as it were, withdrawing upon his personal conscience for his last argument, thus intimidating the people, who loved him, by the menace of his retreat: "Citizens, you can offer violence to the government; you can command it to change the flag of the nation, and the name of France, if you are so badly counselled, and so obstinate in your error, as to force upon it the republic of a party, and the standard of terror. The government, I know, is as decided as myself, to die rather than to dishonor itself by obeying you. As for me, never shall my hand sign this decree! I will refuse, even to the death, this flag of blood; and you should repudiate it still more than I! for the red flag which you offer us has only made the tour of the Champ de Mars, drawn through the blood of the people in '91 and in '93; while the tri-colored banner has made the circuit of the world, with the name, the glory, and the liberty of the country!"

"At these last words, Lamartine, interrupted by almost unanimous cries of enthusiasm, fell from the chair which served him as a tribune into the arms stretched towards him from all sides! The cause of the new republic triumphed over the bloody reminiscences which would have been substituted for it. A general impulse, seconded by the gestures of Lamartine and the influence of good citizens, caused the rioters, who filled the hall, to fall back as far as the landing-place of the great staircase, with cries of 'Vive Lamartine! vive le drapeau tri-couleur!'"

"L'etat," we can hear our author saying triumphantly, "L'etat c'est moi."

Of the work before us as a history, apart from the self-glorification of the historian, we do not think very highly. Indeed it would be a miracle if it were reliable. We are much too near the Revolution of 1848 to judge correctly of its events and personages. To see these in a proper point of view, there should be a perspective of at least two generations, and the observer should be free from the prejudices of the times.

As we have not seen the original version of M. de Lamartine's history, we cannot pass judgment on the merits of the translation. It is very smoothly done and we doubt not with reasonable fidelity.

HISTORY OF THE AMERICAN BIBLE SOCIETY, from its Organization to the present time, by W. P. Strickland; With an Introduction by Rev. N. L. Rice, D. D. And a likeness of Hon. Elias Boudinot, LL. D., first President of the Society. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1849. 8 vo. pp. 468.

The friends of the Bible Society will find in this volume the supply of a want that has often been felt. The American Bible Society is one of the noblest charities of the age, and has attracted to it the sympathies of many of the best men of all parties and sects. But having been in existence for more than thirty years, and its field of labor spread over nearly the whole world, it was necessary to consult a great variety of documents, not easily accessible to all, in order to obtain complete information as to many points connected with its proceedings. It was the experience of this difficulty that led to the compilation of the volume before us. In the execution of the work, the author has spared no pains to ensure completeness, accuracy and clearness. As the operations of the Society have extended to almost every part of the world, we have a great deal of information here embodied that is valuable and interesting, independent of its relation to the circulation of the Bible. This Society having auxiliaries, at least in Virginia and South Carolina, if not in other Southern States, that are several years older than itself; and having numbered among its patrons and officers such names as Pinckney, Gaston, Wirt, Bushrod Washington, and others of like luster, there are many of our readers, we doubt not, who will regard this volume with interest, not only on account of its intrinsic value, but on account of the cause whose progress it details.

OUTLINES OF ASTRONOMY. By Sir John Herschel, Bart. K. H. With Plates and Wood Cuts. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard. 1849.

The student of Astronomy will find this treatise the very best guide to his labours that he can secure. It is an enlargement of Sir John Herschel's work on Astronomy furnished to the Cabinet Cyclopaedia in 1833, with the introduction of much new and valuable material. The reprint of Messrs. Lea & Blanchard is very carefully gotten up, and contains all the plates, wood cuts and indexes of the original London edition.

For sale by Morris & Brother.

THE MAN OF LETTERS: An Address, delivered before the Literary Societies of Wake Forest College, North Carolina, June 14, 1849. By J. L. REYNOLDS, Pastor of the Second Baptist Church, Richmond, Va. Richmond: H. K. Ellyson, Printer, Main Street. 1849.

Mr. Reynolds is a man of elegant scholarship and regular habits of thought, and the high expectations which were raised in us by his name on the title-page of the present Address, have not been disappointed in the reading.

In his style there is a certain finish that denotes long practice in composition, and we are not at a loss in setting him down at once as a "Man of Letters" in the best sense of the term. By this we do not mean a maker of books or pamphlets—for, besides occasional addresses similar to the one now before us, delivered during his connection with a Georgia University, and now and then a fine article in the Southern Quarterly Review, he has produced little,—but a man imbued with the love of classical learning, and drawing often from the best sources of human as well as divine knowledge. The chief fault of Mr. Reynolds as exhibited in this address, is what the French call l'embaras des richesses, a profusion not of ornament but of illustration, which a writer less opulent in literary treasures than he would not have been apt to commit.

SHAKESPEARE'S DRAMATIC WORKS. With Introductory Remarks, and Notes Original and Selected. Boston Edition. Illustrated. Published by Phillips, Sampson & Co. 1849. Nos. 1 and 2. Tempest and Two Gentlemen of Verona.

Large type, fair paper and very handsome engraved portraits of the heroines are the good points of this edition of Shakspeare, which will doubtless meet with an extensive sale. It is in royal-octavo form, and will be published in semi-monthly numbers—each number containing a play, with a portrait—until completed. It may be obtained at Mr. West's bookstore, under the Exchange Hotel, at the publication price—twenty-five cents a number.

THE METROPOLIS. This is a weekly journal of literature and art, published in New York City, under the management of Park Benjamin, G. G. Foster and two other editorial confidés. It has been in existence a few months. We wrote a commendatory notice of the first number which by some accident did not appear; a fact which is not much to be regretted, since upon a more intimate acquaintance, we can now speak more confidently of the merits of the paper. It is a very excellent one. Mr. Benjamin is well-known throughout the country, and his name alone furnishes a sufficient guaranty for the agreeable and instructive character of the editorial columns. He writes well both in prose and verse, and there is a manly candor in his criticisms that we like especially. In the present condition of the American press as regards new works, when good and bad alike receive the common places of puffery, it is a good thing to have a reliable and well-informed person in the critic's chair, who speaks what he thinks, and who knows how to be caustic without being discourteous.

THE HEMANS READER for Female Schools: containing Extracts in Prose and Poetry, &c., &c., New York. W. B. Smith & Co., Cincinnati.

RAY'S ALGEBRA, designed for Common Schools and Academies. By Joseph Ray, M. D., Professor of Mathematics in Woodward College. W. B. Smith & Co., Cincinnati.

These volumes belong to the excellent Eclectic Series of Dr. McGuffey which has obtained so wide and well deserved a celebrity throughout the United States. An impudent attempt has been made by a rival publisher to avail himself of the popularity of this Series, by appropriating the name Eclectic, with the prefix of Southern, and thus facilitate the sale of inferior works of a similar design; an attempt which Dr. McGuffey's publishers lash in a severe pamphlet accompanying the volumes. We have a single objection to the series—the adoption of the Websterian spelling which, saving one or two alterations made by it, we cordially abhor and abominate.

J. W. Randolph has the Eclectic Series for sale.

BULWER AND FORBES ON THE WATER TREATMENT. Edited, with additional matter. By Ronald S. Houghton, A. M., M. D. New York: George P. Putnam, 155 Broadway. 1849.

Bulwer's Letter from the Malvern Hills on the benefits he derived from the Water-Cure, has made the names of Priesnitz and Wilson known everywhere. This little volume is a reproduction of it, in connection with a scientific treatise on the subject by Dr. Forbes. The book comprises 227 pages and is handsomely printed.

THE CASSIQUE OF ACCABEE. A Tale of Ashley River. With other Pieces. By William Gilmore Simms. New York: George P. Putnam. 1849.

A touching little story in the pleasing and musical versification of Mr. Simms. We are glad to see that he has not altogether relinquished his quondam dalliance with the muses, in becoming the editor of the Southern Quarterly Review. No man has done so much for the literature of the South as the author of Atalantis, and we see in his popularity a gratifying earnest that his efforts to spread a taste for letters in our sunny region have not been in vain. Some of the minor pieces in the present brochure are very beautiful.

The style of the publication is not worthy of the gems it contains, and though it has the imprimatur of Mr. Putnam, we suspect it came not from his tasteful and elegant establishment.

Messrs. Lea & Blanchard of Philadelphia have lately published, among other interesting works, the Life of Wm Wirt, by the Hon. John P. Kennedy, 2 vols., 8 vo. This charming biography possesses an interest that no effort in the same walk of letters has afforded, since Mr. Wirt himself wrote the Life of Patrick Henry. We shall avail ourselves of the earliest opportunity of examining it more in detail. The same publishers have also issued Miss Pardoe's "Court and Reign of Francis the First," a work of high character and a most worthy companion to her former historical treatise on "Louis XIV." These volumes are for sale by Morris & Brother and J. W. Randolph.

PRINCIPLES OF THE MECHANICS OF MACHINERY AND ENGINEERING. By Julius Weisbach. First American Edition. Edited by Walter R. Johnson, A. M., Civ. and Min. Eng. Professor of Chemistry, &c., &c. Two Volumes. Philadelphia: Lea & Blanchard. 1848 and 1849.

This is really a splendid work. As a scientific treatise it is all that the most inquiring student of mechanics could desire, and the exceeding clearness of the wood-cuts, of which there are more than eight hundred, lends additional value to the mathematical formulas which they are designed to illustrate. The cost of its publication must have been very great, and the class of Engineers and Machinists in the United States owe Lea & Blanchard warm thanks for the enterprise which brought out a standard work of such high character.

These volumes may be found at the bookstore of Morris & Brother.

THE KNICKERBOCKER MAGAZINE.

EDITED BY LEWIS GAYLORD CLARK.

This is pronounced, by the press of America and England, "the best Magazine in America." It has now begun its thirty-fourth volume, and in its list of upward of a hundred contributors, are found the names of every distinguished writer, male and female, in America, with several equally prominent of Great Britain, Turkey, Sweden, etc. A new volume, containing a superb engraving, a portrait of the editor, engraved by Cheney, from a painting by Elliott, was commenced on the first day of July, 1849. The following notices of the Knickerbocker are from the American and English press, to which might be added hundreds of others.

"The last Knickerbocker is exceedingly good. Some of the articles are worthy of Blackwood's palmiest days. The Editor's Table is in Mr. Clark's happiest vein; varied and racy in a remarkable degree."—New York Commercial Advertiser.

"The Knickerbocker seems to increase in attraction as it advances in age. It exhibits a monthly variety of contributions unsurpassed in number or ability."—National Intelligencer.

"The Knickerbocker is one of the most valuable Magazines of the day, and outstrips all competition in the higher walks of literature."—Albany Argus.

"The Knickerbocker Magazine is now beyond a question the magazine of the country. Whoever wishes his money's worth, and something over, let him subscribe now to 'Old Knick,' and our word for it, the Editor's Table alone will amply satisfy his expectations. It is not a periodical to be lightly glanced over and thrown by, but it forms a library book to save and re-read. A set of the Knickerbocker, bound up in volumes, on the shelves of one of our popular libraries, is more consulted (so the librarians has often told us) than any other similar work."—Boston Daily Transcript.

The London Examiner.—"This very clever Magazine is the pleasantest periodical in the United States. Its articles, which are numerous and short, various and interesting, are well worthy of imitation by our Magazines on this side of the Atlantic."

London Morning Chronicle.—"Judging from the numbers before us, we are inclined to consider this the best of all the American literary periodicals. Its contents are highly interesting, instructive and amusing."

REDUCTION IN PRICE TO CLUBS.

The publisher has determined to do every thing in his power to bring the Knickerbocker within the means of all, and invites the attention of those who feel an interest in circulating the best American literature, to the following terms to clubs, viz:

| | |
|--|---------|
| For five copies sent to one address, the price will be | $20 00 |
| " ten " " " " " | 35 00 |
| " twenty " " " " | 60 00 |

Post Masters throughout the United States are invited and requested to act as agents. To all those who may interest themselves in getting up clubs, we will send a copy free so long as they keep up, and remit regularly the yearly payment.

To the Subscribers and all interested in our Work.

The publisher desires to avail himself of this opportunity to thank those who have manifested their unabated interest in the Knickerbocker, by sending subscribers. Quite a number have done so, and no doubt with a very slight effort on the part of some friends, our list might be doubled. As a further inducement for this effort on the part of our patrons, we wish to say, that no pains or expense will be spared to enhance the value of the work, and our pages will prove that our readers will receive at least as large a share of benefit from our increased means as we could expect ourselves.

AGENTS WANTED FOR THE KNICKERBOCKER MAGAZINE.

Enterprising, active agents are wanted in every town and city in the United States, to procure subscribers for the Knickerbocker. To competent, active persons, with satisfactory references, the most liberal terms will be allowed. Apply, post paid, to SAMUEL HUESTON, 139 Nassau-street,

GREAT INDUCEMENT TO SUBSCRIBE FOR THE KNICKERBOCKER.

FOUR YEARS FOR TEN DOLLARS.

The undersigned will give the Volumes of the Knickerbocker for the years 1847, '48, '49, and '50, to all persons who will remit to him ten dollars, in funds current in this city, post paid.

☞ Back Volumes or Numbers supplied, and a complete set for sale.

Specimen Numbers sent free of charge on application, post id.

TERMS—$5 per annum in advance. All remittances must be made to

SAMUEL HUESTON, Publisher,
139 Nassau-street, New-York.

PROSPECTUS
OF THE
SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER,
FOR 1850.
SIXTEENTH VOLUME.

A new volume of this long-established and favorite monthly will be commenced on the 1st of January next. In issuing its Prospectus, the Editor does not deem it necessary to publish any long list of contributors or to indulge in any fulsome laudations of the Magazine. Its character is well-known throughout the country. For nearly sixteen years it has occupied the first rank of excellence in periodical literature. The Editor is determined to maintain its standing, by filling it with articles from the best pens in the country. The contents will embrace Reviews, Historical and Biographical Sketches, Novels, Tales, Travels, Essays, Poems, Critiques, and Papers on the Army, Navy and other National Subjects.

The Messenger will also continue to present articles of a SCIENTIFIC character, such as during the past year, have excited the most marked attention on both sides of the Atlantic. In the forthcoming volume, the Original Novel, of will be continued. This work was pronounced by the late Edgar A. Poe to be the finest effort of genius in course of publication in this country.

THE CHEVALIER MERLIN

The Editor has pleasure in announcing that his accomplished European Correspondent will continue to furnish the Magazine with comprising all the items of foreign intelligence, and critical remarks on all novelties in Science, Literature and Art. The reader will find this correspondence a faithful reflection of Life in the French Capital. The political sagacity of the writer has been commended in the highest terms by the National Intelligencer.

MONTHLY LETTERS FROM PARIS,

Of the Editorial and Critical Department of the Messenger, the Editor will only say that it will embrace copious notes on current literature, and reviews of all new American or Foreign works of general interest and value. His opinions will at least be always fearlessly and honestly avowed.

CONDITIONS OF THE SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

1. THE LITERARY MESSENGER is published in monthly numbers. Each number contains not less than 64 large super-royal pages, printed on good type, and in the best manner, and on paper of the most beautiful quality.
2. The MESSENGER is mailed regularly on or about the first day of every month in the year. Twelve numbers make a volume,—and the price of subscription is $5 per volume, payable in advance;—nor will the work be sent to any one, unless the order for it is accompanied with the CASH. THE YEAR COMMENCES WITH THE JANUARY NUMBER. NO SUBSCRIPTION RECEIVED FOR LESS THAN THE YEAR, UNLESS THE INDIVIDUAL SUBSCRIBING CHOOSES TO PAY THE FULL PRICE OF A YEAR'S SUBSCRIPTION, FOR A LESS PERIOD.
3. The risk of transmitting subscriptions by mail will be assumed by the proprietor. But every subscriber thus transmitting payment, is required (besides taking proper evidence of the fact and date of mailing) to retain a memorandum of the number and particular marks of the note sent; or subscriptions may be remitted through the Post-Masters, according to the present laws.
4. If a subscription is not directed to be discontinued before the first number of a volume has been published, it will be taken as a continuance for another year.
5. Any one enclosing a $20 current bill, at one time, with the names of FIVE NEW subscribers, shall receive FIVE copies of the MESSENGER, for one year.
6. The mutual obligations of the publisher and subscriber, for the year, are fully incurred as soon as the first No. of the volume is issued: and after that time, no discontinuance of a subscription will be permitted. Nor will any subscription be discontinued while any thing remains due thereon, unless at the option of the editor.

JNO. R. THOMPSON, Editor and Proprietor.

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, October, 1849.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

JNO. R. THOMPSON, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

VOL. XV., No. 12.

DECEMBER, 1849.

Whole Number, CLXXX.

ORIGINAL PROSE ARTICLES.

| | PAGE. |
|--|-------|
| 1. Rhetoric, as a Part of the College Course. Imperfect definitions of Rhetoric: benefits to be derived from a study of it—examination of the leading text-books in use—qualifications of the Rhetorical Professor, &c. | 705 |
| 2. The Seldens of Sherwood. Chapters XIII, XIV and XV. | 710 |
| 3. Of Style in Writing. By C. C. | 721 |
| 4. City and Salon. By Ik Marvel. | 722 |
| 5. The Poems of Sir William Jones. | 724 |
| 6. Original Novel. The Chevalier Merlin. Chapters Sixteenth and Seventeenth. | 727 |
| 5. Love's Winter. A Tale. | 735 |
| 6. The English Literati. A Review. Interest which attaches to lives of authors—Mr. Powell's Living Authors of England—Wordsworth, Leigh Hunt, Rogers, Tennyson, Macaulay, Browning, Jerrold, &c.; attack on Dickens, Sergeant Talfourd's defence of Macready, Irving demolished by Mr. Powell, &c. | 744 |
| 7. From Our Paris Correspondent. M. Melsen's discoveries relating to sugar—Introduction of the Telegraph into France, &c. | 751 |

SELECTED PROSE ARTICLE.

| | |
|--|-----|
| 8. An Excellent Speech of Mr. Everett. | 755 |
|--|-----|

ORIGINAL POETRY.

| | PAGE. |
|---|-------|
| 9. The Evening Twilight. | 710 |
| 10. A Lament on a Brother Deceased. By William Pembroke Mulchinock. | 720 |
| 11. Lines. | 724 |
| 12. Song. From the German. | 726 |
| 13. In Autumn. By Charles Wood. | 734 |
| 14. Memory. To M— G—. | 744 |
| 15. Nervous Fears. | 754 |

EDITOR'S TABLE.

| | |
|--|---------|
| Christmas—The Year Books—General Scott's reception—Sonnet of Poe—Death of Miss Mary E. Lee and Miss Mary G. Wells. | 758—760 |
|--|---------|

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS:—

| | |
|--|---------|
| Redburn—Dr. Hawks' Egypt—Commentary on the Gospels—The History of Alexander the Great—Evenings at Woodlawn—The Pilot—Prof. Dabney's Address—Los Gringos—Griswold's Sacred Poets—The Jefferson Monument Magazine—The Old World—The American Almanac—Rev. B. M. Smith's Address—Southern and Western Traveller's Guide, &c., &c. | 760—764 |
|--|---------|

LOCAL AGENTS.

KEITH & WOODS, St. Louis, Mo.
 J. C. MORGAN, New Orleans,
 GEORGE P. PUTNAM, London,
 E. P. NASH, Petersburg, Va.
 W. R. SCRIVEN, Petersburg, N. Y.

MACFARLANE & FERGUSSON, Richmond, Va.
 DEWITT & DAVENPORT, New York.
 JOSEPH ROBINSON, Baltimore, Md.
 C. C. CLEAVES, Memphis, Tenn.
 JOHN P. WRIGHT, Lynchburg, Virginia.

THIS WORK IS PUBLISHED IN MONTHLY NUMBERS AVERAGING SIXTY-FOUR PAGES EACH, AT FIVE DOLLARS, PER ANNUM, INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

RICHMOND, VA.
 MACFARLANE & FERGUSSON.
 1849.

GENERAL COLLECTORS FOR THE LITERARY MESSENGER.

Wm. Gouldin, General Agent and Collector for Virginia.

Thomas L. Jones is our General Collector for the States of Mississippi, Alabama, Tennessee and Louisiana.

Israel E. James, is our General Travelling Agent, for the following States, District of Columbia, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Mississippi, Louisiana and Arkansas—assisted by James K. Whipple, Wm. H. Weld, O. H. P. Stem, John B. Weld, T. S. Waterman, John Collins, James Deering, Albert K. Wellington, R. S. James, and E. A. Evans.

Henry M. Lewis, is our General Agent, for Alabama and Tennessee.

C. W. James, is our General Collector, for Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois and Missouri; Wisconsin and Iowa—assisted by James R. Smith, J. T. Dent, E. Y. Jennings, T. G. Smith, and Frederick J. Hawse. Mr. C. W. James also makes a Fall trip to the Eastern States, and the District of Columbia.

Eli M. Stevenson, General Collector for Kentucky, and specially authorised to solicit new subscriptions.

Wm. Wertenbaker of the University of Virginia is our authorised agent for the county of Albemarle, Va.

Addison A. Bell, of Alabama, is authorised to procure New Subscribers.

J. F. Staunton is authorised to procure New Subscribers for the Messenger, generally.

R. Morris & Co., Jackson, Mississippi, are authorised to Collect and procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

J. W. B. Garrett, is authorised to procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

Baalis Davis is duly authorised to Collect Money and procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

W. Ramsay, Frankfort, Kentucky, is authorised to procure new subscribers for the Messenger.

B. F. Somerville, Locust Dale, Virginia, is authorised to procure New Subscribers,

B. M. Dewitt, is authorised to procure New Subscribers for the Messenger.

MONTHLY ADVERTISER.

With the first number of the Sixteenth Volume, we shall commence the publication of a

MONTHLY ADVERTISER

in connection with the MESSENGER, for which we solicit Advertisements from the trading public generally. As a medium for the insertion of

HOTEL CARDS, PUBLISHER'S LISTS, COLLEGIATE AND ACADEMICAL PROSPECTUSES,

AND THE ANNOUNCEMENTS OF

DEALERS IN FANCY WARES,

The Messenger ADVERTISER will be exceedingly desirable. Its extensive circulation throughout the entire country, will present unequalled advantages to the dealer.

The following rates will be charged for Advertisements:

| | | | |
|---------------------------------|---------|---|--------|
| One page, two insertions, - - - | $16 00 | Fourth of a page, two insertions, - | $4 00 |
| " " one do. - - - | 12 00 | " " one do. - | 3 00 |
| Half page, two do. - - - | 8 00 | Eighth of a page or less, two insertions, | 2 00 |
| " " one do. - - - | 6 00 | " " " one do. | 1 25 |

As we shall print a certain number of copies of the ADVERTISER apart from the Messenger itself, we must ask all our Exchanges to direct their papers to the "MONTHLY ADVERTISER," Richmond, Va., by which arrangement we shall save postage.

⚡ Advertisements must be handed in by the 20th of each month.

FOR THE YEAR 1850.

NEW VOLUME! GREAT IMPROVEMENTS!!

On the 1st of January, 1850, the undersigned will commence a New Volume of the SOUTHERN MONTHLY MAGAZINE!

The improvements to be introduced cannot but give it a reputation second to no dollar Magazine in the Union!! Our illustrations, (both steel and wood,) will all be engraved expressly for the Magazine! A series of Splendid Portraits of the Distinguished Men of the South will be given, commencing with those of Washington Allston and Hon. Jos. Henry Lumpkin, (of Ga.)

Our Contributors for the next volume will comprise such writers as W. Gilmore Simms, LL. D., Col. Henry R. Jackson, Mrs. Mary S. Whitaker, J. J. Hooper, Esq., Edward J. Porter, Esq., Hon. R. M. Charlton, Miss Alice Carey, Hon. B. F. Porter, Jacques Journot, Wm. N. White, Esq., J. M. Legaré, Esq., Miss M. J. E. Knox, Prof. J. P. Waddel, Theodore A. Gould, Miss C. W. Barber, &c.

We have great pleasure in announcing a series of sparkling Humorous Sketches from the pen of J. J. Hooper, author of that inimitable book, "Capt. Simon Suggs." Also a series of illustrated papers on the "Poets and Poetry of the South," comprising Biographical and Critical Notes, with specimens from each author. The articles will be copyrighted.

Taken all in all, our Magazine will rival the best of its kindred Publications at the North; and we rely with confidence upon the appreciation and support of the South.

Terms:—ONE DOLLAR per annum, in Advance.

| | | | | | | |
|----------------|---|--------|------------------------------|------------------|------------------------|------------------|
| 7 copies, for | - | $5 00 | } And one copy to the person | } 20 copies, for | - | $14 00 |
| 10 copies, for | - | 7 50 | | | } making up the Club!! | } 30 copies, for |

Remember, now is the time to get a Magazine for nothing!!

One copy of Wheler's Southern Monthly, and one of either Graham's, Sartain's or Godey's Magazine will be furnished for THREE DOLLARS!

One copy of Wheler's Magazine and one of the Yankee Blade, Boston Rambler, or Boston Museum, [$2 papers] will be furnished one year for TWO DOLLARS!

Address your orders, (post-paid,) to

CHARLES L. WHELER,
 Publisher, Athens, Ga.

SERIES FOR 1850.

THE HOME JOURNAL:

AN ELEGANTLY PRINTED

FAMILY NEWSPAPER,

EDITED BY G. P. MORRIS AND N. P. WILLIS.

A new volume of this brilliantly original and peculiar Family Newspaper, will be issued on the first of January next. New subscribers can be supplied with the work from that date, by forwarding two dollars to the office of publication.

During the past four years The Home Journal has met with universal favor at the hands of all classes of the community, and the proprietors will spare neither exertions nor expense to give such increased value, interest and attractiveness to the forthcoming year, as will render it superior in every respect to all the volumes that have preceded it. Besides the original productions of the editors, the Foreign and Domestic Correspondence of a large list of contributors, the spice of the European and American Magazines, selections from the most interesting publications of the day will frequently be given. Such features as have been found to be attractive will be retained, and new ones added. "The Belles of our Time" by N. P. Willis; "Brief Novels;" "Piquant Stories;" the sparkling wit and amusing anecdote, news and gossip of the Parisian papers; Personal sketches of Public characters; the stirring scenes of the city we live in; a chronicle of the news for ladies; the fashions and fashionable gossip; the facts and outlines of news; the pick of English information and brilliancy; the wit, humor and pathos of the times; essays on life, literature, society and morals, and the usual variety of careful choosings from the wilderness of English periodical literature, criticism, poetry, will still continue to enrich these columns.

As no more copies of the first number will be printed than the demand absolutely requires, and as new subscribers generally desire to begin with the beginning, it is advisable to subscribe without delay, to avoid any disappointment in the early and prompt receipt of the paper.

TERMS.—The Home Journal is published every Saturday, at No. 107 Fulton-street, New-York, at the very low price of two dollars a year, or three copies for five dollars, payable invariably in advance.

All letters, remittances and communications (not paid) to be addressed to

DE BOW'S COMMERCIAL REVIEW.

A Monthly Journal of Trade, Agriculture, Commerce, Commercial Polity, Manufactures, Internal Improvements, &c.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY, IN THE CITY OF NEW-ORLEANS.

Terms Five Dollars per annum, in advance.

Advocating the interests of the South and West, the Commercial Review will not be the less mindful of the great interests of Trade, Commerce and Agriculture throughout the World—Commerce in its various and multifarious relations—in its History, its Laws, and its Statistics; Commercial commodities; regulations of Trade, inter-State and inter-National; Treaties; Foreign and Domestic Tariffs, Excises and Posts; Marine relations; Enterprises of Commerce, in Shipping, Canals, Railroads and Steam Navigation, etc.; Mercantile Systems, Codes, Laws and Decisions, ancient as well as modern; Banking Insurance, Exchange, Partnership, Factorage, Guaranty, Brokerage, Bankruptcy, Wreck, Salvage Freights, Privateering, Marque and Reprisal, Piracy, Quarantine and Custom House Regulations, etc., etc.; Commercial Literature and Biography.

ADDRESS WELD & CO., NEW-ORLEANS.

Bound volumes of Commercial Review, in handsome style, for sale at the office, complete viz.:

- | | | |
|--------------------|--|--|
| Vol. I. 543 pages. | } Papers, by Hon. Joel R. Poinsett, and a great number of other distinguished contributors. | |
| " II. 442 " | | |
| " III. 588 " | | Engraving of Stephen Girard; 50 original contributions, maps, &c. |
| " IV. 560 " | | Important American Statistics, &c. |
| " V. 544 " | | Contains an elaborate Prize Essay upon Silk, in addition to all other American Products and Staples. |
| " VI. | Contains, among other things, a republication of the great English work, by Evans, on Sugar, which ought to be in the hands of every planter. The price of the English copy is $4 50. | |

Two volumes make one year. Charge for binding at binders' prices. Complete Indexes of the work, for inspection, can be had at the office.

PROSPECTUS TO THE SEVENTH VOLUME.

This work has been regularly published nearly four years. Its success has been signal throughout the whole Southern and Western Country, and its subscription list steadily and rapidly increased there and in other sections of the Union. In this brief period it has gained a larger circulation than any other Southern work, and the strongest influence. Complimentary letters and notices have been received from every source, even the very highest, as could be shown did space permit. The Commercial Review has advocated and upheld the Commerce and Agriculture of the Southern and Western States, and exhibited from time to time their complete Statistics, in such a manner as could not but have secured the best results. The papers which have appeared upon Sugar and upon Cotton, upon Tobacco and Rice, and Manufactures, upon the Progress of our Commercial Relations with all nations, and upon Mexico, may be stated as examples. Indeed, this has been admitted from many sources. Although devoted in its aims to the development and exhibition of the Resources of the South and West, the Commercial Review neglects no view of American and European Industry and Enterprise, in every department, and must be of equal value to American Citizens wherever they are found. Is there a section of the Union, too, or an interest, which has no concern with the progress and resources of the Great West, of which the Commercial Review is the faithful exponent?

B. F. De Bow, Charleston, is the Agent for the two Carolina's, and will attend to all business for those States.

WM. R. SCRIVEN,

ATTORNEY, SOLICITOR AND COUNSELLOR.

Office in Petersburg, South Village, New York. Business done with dispatch.

SOUTHERN LITERARY MESSENGER.

PUBLISHED MONTHLY AT FIVE DOLLARS PER ANNUM—JNO. R. THOMPSON, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

VOL. XV.

RICHMOND, DECEMBER, 1849.

NO. 12.

Rhetoric, as a part of the College Course.

The Archbishop of Dublin, in the introduction to his Rhetoric, says, "two questions arise connected with the study of Rhetoric—first, whether oratorical skill is on the whole a public benefit or evil, and secondly whether any artificial system of rules is conducive to the attainment of that skill. The former of these questions was eagerly debated among the ancients; on the latter but little doubt seems to have existed. With us, on the contrary, the state of these questions seems nearly reversed. The value of the skill is generally admitted, but many, perhaps most persons, are inclined to the opinion that eloquence, either in writing or speaking, is either a natural gift, or, at least, is to be acquired by mere practice, and is not to be attained or improved by any system of rules." If we look at the printed catalogues and registers containing the course of study pursued in the literary institutions of our country, it would seem that there is a general consent that Rhetoric properly enters into the system of instruction of young men; for we suppose that there is not a college in the land from the cuniculum of which it is excluded. But having once noticed La Place set down as a text book in an institution not pre-eminently mathematical, and having other reasons to know that professors are not exempt from the weaknesses of human nature, we have learned not to rely implicitly upon the prima facie evidence of a printed synopsis of studies.

If we were to inquire, in a way to bring out the truth, what is the rank assigned to Rhetoric, when compared with other studies, we think that it would probably be found to be so low in most of our colleges as to be nearly equivalent to virtual abandonment.

Believing this to be the case, and believing that it is caused by an under-estimate of Rhetoric as a part of the regular college course, we would venture a few remarks upon the subject.

The object of college education is to prepare a young man for the discharge of the active duties of after life, and education is valuable just in proportion as it accomplishes this object. The test is the same, if applied to any particular branch of study. This general advantage may be resolved into two others more specific, viz: first, the developing and strengthening the mental powers in general, or of any one of them in particular, and secondly, the imparting of knowledge in itself useful. Most of the usual branches of education combine these two uses, while each is, notwithstanding, more efficient for one than the other. Thus, mathematics and the languages are prized, mainly as instruments of mental improvement, while, at the same time, independent of this, they are of themselves valuable acquisitions. On the other hand the physical and moral sciences, while serving as an admirable training for some of the mental powers, are esteemed as valuable, chiefly on account of their practical character. In both these respects we deem the benefits resulting from the study of Rhetoric important and peculiar, so that the neglect of it is not compensated for by increased attention to other branches of study.

It is not very easy, perhaps, to give an unexceptionable definition of Rhetoric, and we will not trouble ourselves at present by inquiring which of several, given by different writers, is entitled to the preference. It will be sufficient to say that we mean by Rhetoric the system of rules relating to composition generally—to public speaking and to criticism. This is the ground usually gone over in the text books upon this branch, and as far as we know, the lectures of college professors are confined to the same topics. Logic and the History of English Literature are sometimes connected with it, but are obviously studies differing from it as really as mental and moral philosophy, not unfrequently taught by the same professor.

In the course of the study of Rhetoric the same powers are put into requisition which, at an earlier period of the student's course, are exercised in the study of the languages, viz: the powers of remembering, comparing, selecting and judging; and the argument used to prove that the study of languages is beneficial as a training of the mind, may be adopted with but little change by the advocate for the study of Rhetoric. We may here say, that, in our judgment, one of the principal benefits of the study of different languages is the increased facility in the use of our own—not merely because we are put into possession of the derivation of a large number of the words in our language—this is a great advantage; but it is a still greater one to have turned over in the process of oral translation, the vocabulary of our tongue so often that we have at length become familiar with its treasures. Whether this advantage is secured or forfeited depends upon the mode of teaching adopted by the teacher. Verbum verbo is certainly the proper way for beginners who are always inclined to read by what they call gumption, rather than by grammar. But when a scholar can be trusted he ought to be encouraged to proceed, laris habenis. A boy should learn his grammar before he leaves the grammar school, but when a young man translates, in a college hall, a classical poet, it is surely time for him to abandon the gibberish produced by using a word first in one language and then in another. Students should be encouraged in their translations to aim at accuracy, elegance and fluency; all will not attain these excellences, but some will, and all who make the effort will be improved in the use of their own language. It must be obvious that the improvement in this respect to be expected from oral recitations upon Rhetoric, is yet more ample and more certain. The subject is too extensive to allow preparation by rote, and in framing answers, more copiousness as well as more originality in the use of words is demanded of the student than when he is engaged in the translation. If the attention of young men is directed to the acquisition of readiness in the use of language they generally become fond of the exercise, and their improvement is very manifest. The service done in this way by the study of Rhetoric, (and we may add by the study of mental and moral philosophy also, though perhaps not to the same extent,) is the more important because the study of the mathematical branches, so far from contributing to the same end, is rather hurtful as it regards the expression of our ideas. Mathematics is an exact science. Mathematical language is also an exact language, into which comparatively few of the words of the general vocabulary are introduced, and these few are for the most part arranged in definite formulas. For this reason, of all fluent persons, a mathematical demonstrator is the most fluent.

But take a young man who has just explained a problem in Descriptive Geometry that looks as if it might be a section cut out of the famous Labyrinth,—and explained it too with faultless precision of language,—and ask him why it is that we take pleasure in seeing performed a tragedy which makes us weep—and he will perhaps hesitate, flounder and be guilty of innumerable inaccuracies, if not improprieties, of speech. So far from being aided by his fluency in the use of mathematical language, he is actually impeded by it. Just as the swimmer with cork is in a worse condition for learning to swim than if he had never tried at all. We will add that this improvement is not limited to increased facility in the use of words, but extends itself to the minor parts of elocution—the tones of the voice, the rapidity of utterance, and especially to propriety of pronunciation. No one will consider these things as unimportant, but no one who has not had some experience, knows how much young men need correction in these particulars.

Another distinct and important advantage belonging to the study of Rhetoric, is the improvement of the taste. We will not involve ourselves in difficulty by attempting to define taste. Call it a faculty or what you will. It is enough for us at present to say that we all know that there is a great difference between men in the amount of pleasure which they receive from the objects of taste, and in their power of discrimination with regard to these objects—that taste can be cultivated—and that for the cultivation of it, as applied to a large class of objects, no study is better than that of Rhetoric. We may add, however, that the value of a cultivated taste is to be estimated not solely with reference to the multiplying of the sources of our elegant pleasures or to the sharpening of our critical powers. Taste connects itself with many of the more serious and practical affairs of life; saves a man from many a mistake, of which the consequences would be something more than mortification and embarrassment, and sometimes even leads away from the path of error, or erects a barrier which turns back the feet that have already entered upon it.

As we have said of languages so we say of Rhetoric, and so we might say of any other study, that it depends mainly upon the mode of instruction which is pursued whether the advantages which ought to be derived from it are actually secured. In the remarks which we have made, we have taken it for granted as to the system of instruction, that it includes of course, among other things, regular and extended oral examinations and frequent exercises in composition. With regard to the latter we approve the plan adopted by some professors of requiring of the class what may be called extemporaneous compositions. For example; the professor will call up daily two members of his class to the black-board, and assigning them a subject, the same for both, require them to write a composition while the usual lecture or recitation is going on. These compositions will be short, for not much can be written with chalk upon a black-board; and they will not usually be very good: but they will have the advantage of being entirely original and of affording opportunities for the application of Rhetorical rules, in a way to make a more permanent impression than when Addison, or Bolingbroke, or Carlyle, or Scott, are made to furnish the examples. It does something, too, to wards enabling a young man to acquire that most valuable power of writing promptly in the presence of others upon a given subject. These extemporaneous compositions should not, however, take the place of more elaborate original essays and criticisms.

We think we have said enough,—though we have been purposely abstinent upon a tempting theme—to show that this department of a college course is very valuable for training purposes. But we may further remark in this connection that it is generally an attractive study to young men. It is easy compared with some of their other studies; and those who have been severely drilled in mathematics and the languages feel as if Rhetoric was a sort of dress parade. But apart from this recommendation to the favor of many who study it, in itself it is less didactic than most of the other branches and calls into play faculties of the mind, the exercising of which gives peculiar pleasure. In the hands of a professor who is a man of talent and varied information, of delicate taste and handsome elocution, nothing can be more fascinating; while instructors who are not thus gifted, if they are but diligent in making preparation rarely fail to secure the attention of their classes.

In all our literary institutions we believe that Rhetoric occupies the student near the close of his course, and the zest with which it is pursued is heightened, because from its obvious connection with professional studies, it is regarded as a sort of prelude to the real struggle of life. This arrangement, it is true, is inverted at the West Point Academy. There, we see by the register, a boy is required, the first year he enters, to study Bullion's Grammar, Morse's Geography, and Blair's Lectures. We presume that this remarkable classification of studies depends upon some military principle with which we are unacquainted, or connects itself with some deep reason of State Policy.

We will pass from this view of the subject—that the student is profited by the study itself, crescit eundo—and consider what is the value of the acquisition in the way of after fruits.

To be a good speaker or a good writer is to possess a power which, by common consent, can scarcely be estimated too high. And in no country and at no time was it ever more desirable to possess this power than it is now, in the United States. Never, perhaps, was there a people more given to speaking. Lawyers and divines are every where speakers of course, but ours do more of this work than their brethren in other countries. And then we have our statesmen and legislators of the nation, and our statesmen and legislators of thirty sovereign states—our politicians and our politicians' friends, and our lecturers upon all manner of subjects. Education, abolition, temperance, odd-fellowship, mesmerism cum multis aliis. We have our regular national anniversary orators, and special orators provided for the use of colleges, lyceums, institutes, monuments, corner-stones and barbecues. Every thing in this country begins in talk. From the annexation of a new country and the nomination of a President down to the establishment of a cotton factory, every thing comes within the purview of a public meeting great or small, and every public meeting must have its speaker great or small. In most countries it is the privilege of soldiers to be mutum pecus, but not so with us. Our soldiers receive swords, and dinners, and nominations, and are called out to address public meetings, until we almost see in them the ambidextrous troubadours, wielding with equal skill the lyre and the sword. It may be said of us that if public speaking is not our forte, the passion for it is our weakness. Some may think that we have too much public speaking and we will not undertake to maintain the contrary; but it will be conceded that we ought to endeavor to improve the quality of this great staple. So too with regard to writing—never was the press more concerned with the movements of any age than of ours, and never was any age more characterized by movements having far-reaching consequences.

The question then is simply, is the study of Rhetoric calculated to make men better speakers, and better writers? That it is, has been well established, we think, by Archbishop Whately. Not indeed by the help of the distinction which he draws apparently with a good deal of self-satisfaction between "An Art of Reasoning" and "The Art of Reasoning," but by what he quotes from Aristotle, who says substantially—"that some succeed better than others in explaining their opinions, and bringing others over to them; and this not merely by superiority of natural gifts, but by acquired habit; and that consequently if we can discover the causes of this superior success—the means by which the desired end is attained by all who do attain it—we shall be in possession of rules capable of general application. This is the province, and herein consists the value of Rhetoric. Nothing comes by chance, and every one who speaks or writes well, does so by rule, whether he is himself aware of it or not. By attention, then, to excellent models, we may hope to arrive at the rules which, if followed, promise success; and with more certainty, may we learn by noticing the errors of others, to avoid those errors ourselves. In fact, in treatises upon Rhetoric, we find that the didactic parts consist of rules mainly in a negative form. Freedom from fault is not however merely a negative virtue; it is a positive excellence. Effect depends not solely upon the amount of power employed, but also upon the number and character of existing impediments. Practically it is the same thing in mechanics, to increase the moving power or to diminish the friction. We know that it may be said, that there have been many eminent orators and writers, who had no acquaintance with Rhetoric as a science, and that on the other hand, many well-versed in its principles, have been little profited by their knowledge. This is true of Rhetoric, and it is equally true of any other branch of human knowledge, and the same objection has at different times been urged against every one. The absurdity of the objection is best shown by allowing it as good against all at once, and then drawing the inevitable conclusion, that all instruction may safely be dispensed with. Find a General, as you may find many a one, who has been successful, though he never had regular military training, and then say that books upon the science of war are humbugs: if an artist has excelled by force of natural genius, ridicule those who think they can be profited by going to Rome: because many celebrated divines have been their own teachers, pull down all theological seminaries, and finally assert that so far from a rule's being established by exceptions, there can be no rule where there is an exception. Some are prejudiced against Rhetoric from an entire misapprehension of its true object. They look upon it as professing either to teach a sophistical mode of general reasoning, or to cultivate the power of florid declamation. This prejudice has its origin in a confused notion of Logic and Rhetoric, and betrays ignorance of both. Yet it must be allowed that the history of both Logic and Rhetoric, and the pretensions of some of the ancient writers upon these subjects might readily occasion such a prejudice. Whoever will take the trouble, however, to look into any of the modern authors upon Rhetoric, will find that they take great pains to inculcate the principle that sound sense must be the basis of all excellence in speaking and writing, while they attack empty declamation with unsparing ridicule. We cannot suppose that a prejudice so illiterate, nor indeed a prejudice of any kind against Rhetoric is found within College walls; nor can we suppose that experienced instructors of youth are ignorant of the advantages of the study when properly pursued. And yet, as we have already intimated, we believe that even College Professors speak of Rhetoric more slightly than of any study in the course. Two causes perhaps contribute to produce this. In the first place, there is no good text-book upon Rhetoric. The one in most general use is Blair's Lectures, and perhaps as a text-book, it is to be preferred to any other in our language. Its characteristic excellence is its systematic arrangement. The general plan is comprehensive, the main divisions are natural, and the sub-divisions are clear, and stand so related to one another, and to the whole, as to secure admirable unity in the management of a subject which presents many difficulties on this score. This causes every student to see the development of the subject, and enables the instructor to recur, as frequently as he pleases, to ground previously gone over. We know of no text-book, of equal size, and embracing as great a variety of topics, which a class will master as soon and as well. No other book in our language, except Blackstone's Commentaries, is as good an example of the value of method. The opinions expressed in the work, are for the most part such as command the assent of all critics, and the rules laid down are as practical as the nature of the subject permits. The style is pure and agreeable, and while it does not aim at the energy or the brilliancy which most modern writers seem to think indispensable, it is so satisfactory as to lead us to doubt whether after all it is not the best for conveying instruction. The author is so candid and temperate, that we always feel safe; and so free from arrogance, that when he speaks positively we feel almost sure that he is right. One of the most brilliant orators of the United States Senate once said to us, that after the lapse of thirty years, he was reading Blair for the second time, and he was astonished to find what an amount of valuable practical instruction it contained. Still it is not such a text-book as we need. It is too old. It was written nearly a hundred years ago, and it is strong testimony to the soundness of its general principles, that it has been continued to be used so long. The essential rules of good writing and speaking are of course always the same; but there are many supplemental ones established by the experience of the last century which are important. In criticism especially, we seem to be almost wasting our time in the minute examination of a number of the Spectator or the Rambler. We want a master to dissect the writings of Chalmers, and Macaulay, and Foster, and Irving, and Coleridge, and Carlyle, and Emerson, and others good and bad. We would like to see some of the critiques of Jeffrey in the Edinburgh brought to the form of canons.

Kames' Elements of Criticism, never was intended as a text-book, and as a whole could not be used as such. It is however an excellent book for the student to refer to, as it contains some good philosophy, and more good taste. It was published before Dr. Blair's work, and the Doctor made very free and judicious use of it. Campbell's Philosophy of Rhetoric is used in some Colleges, but it must be with very great expenditure of labor on the part of the Professor and the student. Dr. Campbell was a man, as every one knows, of great powers and of great learning; but he was better suited to answer Hume than to write upon Belles Lettres. He loved argument, and his Rhetoric is a bundle of argumentative essays very roughly put up. The arguments are ingenious, but not unfrequently unseasonable, fine-spun and tedious. If he proceeds upon any pre-arranged system, it is one which it is not easy to discover. He takes up questions which seem to the reader to be irrelevant, and dismisses topics before they are fully treated. Add to this, that his style labors, until the reader is fatigued through sympathy. Besides these special objections to Dr. Campbell's work, it is to be remarked that it does not go over the whole ground covered by Rhetoric, as the term is commonly understood. Nevertheless every reader will be well repaid for the labor which a perusal of this book will cost him. He will find some of the principles of criticism thoroughly investigated, many hints of much value, a number of admirable illustrations, and a great deal of disquisition and miscellaneous matter, entertaining and instructive.

Of more modern works upon Rhetoric, that by Dr. Whately, Archbishop of Dublin, is facile princeps. The ability, scholarship, and high reputation of the author, together with the practical tendencies of his mind, seemed to fit him well for giving forth a canonical book upon the subject. But he was encumbered, we think, by one thing, which he evidently regarded as his highest qualification, viz: his thorough acquaintance with the science of Logic, and his unusually high estimate of its practical value. Hence he has taken up the greater portion of his work, (a small one altogether,) with what cannot be regarded as much else than a practical application of scholastic logic—most excellent it is, and doubtless very instructive, but surely out of place. Dr. Whately avowedly treats Rhetoric as an offshoot of Logic. Now in a scientific classification this may be correct, but still there is much of Rhetoric which bears but little affinity to Logic, and it is precisely this portion of it which in our judgment is most valuable as part of a College course. The invention of such arguments as will convince and persuade, is certainly the great thing to be aimed at by the speaker and the writer, but we doubt if all the instruction upon this head, which can be given in College, is of much service to young men. But it is likewise a matter of great importance to all, to learn to present their thoughts with perspicuity, energy and elegance, and much can be effected, we know, towards teaching young men to do this, and especially towards teaching them to avoid the faults which are opposed to the qualities of good style.

Upon this branch of Rhetoric, in our view the main one, viz: style or the expression of our thoughts, Archbishop Whately has comparatively little; that little however is so valuable, and for the most part so original, that it makes us regret but the more, the point of view from which he has chosen to look at the whole subject.

The want of a suitable text-book we regard then as one reason why the study of Rhetoric meets with less favor than it should. We wish that Macaulay would not think it beneath him to write upon the subject such a book as no other man could write. In the mean time, a writer of far inferior capabilities might do good service if he would resolutely apply himself to the task of making a book for the use of students. If he would content himself with the work and the fame of a compiler, and would take the text-books we have mentioned, Lectures on Eloquence by the late President Adams, and the Edinburgh and some other Reviews, and put together properly in a neat style what is to be found in these works of principles, illustrations, and criticism, he might furnish a book which would entitle him to the thanks of those who feel that that they could do better work if they had better tools.

The other cause which we think operates against the study of Rhetoric is the labor of teaching it. We have said that it is an easy subject for the student, but it does not follow that it is an easy one for the Professor. Some things which cost us the most labor to acquire, are the easiest to impart. Mathematics, for example, is usually held to be the toughest subject in the course, while it is well known to be the easiest chair in the Faculty. Mathematics is a homogeneous science. The instructor has one thing to impart, and but one. He need not be learned in philology, or criticism, or history, or moral, or mental philosophy, or any thing else besides mathematics. He cannot even make use of any associated learning that he possesses. He is rarely called upon for anything original or illustrative. Some teachers of mathematics are certainly superior to others, but their superiority is to be attributed rather to their greater fidelity and vivacity as teachers, than to the depth and variety of their attainments. The case is different in the physical sciences, in mental and moral philosophy, in political economy, in history and in Belles Lettres. Each of these subjects has so many various aspects, and is connected by so many relations to other departments of knowledge, that a professor of any of them has often to answer questions upon matters which though not foreign to his subject, lie in such an out of the way spot of its wide domain, that he has never before had his attention specially directed to them. Teaching mathematics may be compared—the greater to the less—to pointing out the position of places on a map. Every thing is defined by lines, and when you have found the intersection of the meridian of longitude and the parallel of latitude of a particular place, you have ascertained its position with absolute certainty. To instruct in the other subjects above mentioned, is more like explaining a historical picture. Here are figures, colors, shade, perspective, proportion and so on, and all is to be understood; but moreover, and chiefly, the whole is surrounded by a wide sea of historical fact and allusion, and you feel that you may perhaps, by a bold questioner, be pushed off somewhere beyond your depth. An additional demand upon the Rhetorical Professor, is occasioned by the expectation that he shall in some degree exemplify his precepts by his practice, and be prepared with a critical opinion as to the merits of the current as well as the standard literature of the language. To meet these demands fully, would require a union of high talents and rare erudition, only to be found among the most eloquent speakers and most brilliant writers of the day. To discharge the duties of the chair with any good degree of success, imposes upon those not more highly gifted than ordinary, an amount of labor not required of those who give instruction in departments usually considered much more important.

S. L. C.

THE EVENING TWILIGHT.

There is a sadness in the twilight hour,
When busy life is lulled into repose,
When Twilight holds us by its gentle pow'r,
And o'er the heart a softened shadow throws.

The sunlight from our hearts as slowly fades
As the last streaks along the western sky,
And evening's silent, melancholy shades
Blend with our thoughts to charm and purify.

Morn is all bustle in the City's mart—
And though we stroll along the dewy hills,
To share the solemn silence they impart,
And rob the breast of all its rising ills :

Yet will the wild bird's merry matin song,
The yeoman's laugh, the ploughboy's simple strain,
And every sound the zephyrs bear along,
Bring back the world's obtrusive thoughts again.

But when the weary work of day is o'er,
And every warbler's mellow throat is still ;
When yeoman's laugh and ploughboy's song no more,
In mingled cadence, echo from the hill :

When Twilight comes, as herald of the night,
With welcome promises of sweet repose,
This—this the hour to muse in sad delight ;
The hour when thought in tranquil current flows.

And is it thus—the Twilight of "Old Age,"
(That pause between the day and night of life,)
Do calmer, holier thoughts the mind engage,
To shut from view the world's incessant strife ?

Alas! when man's refulgent morn has flown,
And darkening shadows steal along his sky—
The tranquil Twilight his, and his alone
Whose early hours have passed untainted by.

A.M.A.N.D.

Petersburg, Nov. 7th, '49.

THE SELDENS OF SHERWOOD.

CHAPTER XIII.

But chiefly Thou,
Whom soft-eyed Pity once led down from Heav'n
To bleed for man, to teach him how to live,
And oh! still harder lesson! how to die;
Disdain not Thou to smooth the restless bed
Of sickness and of pain.—Bp. Porteus.

"The clouds threaten a tempest," said Mrs. Mason, approaching Charles, who was standing at a window; "had you not better defer your ride for an hour or two longer?"

"The message was so urgent, that I think there is no time for delay; the man who expresses such an anxiety to see me has, I fear, not more than a few hours to live, but there is no cause for uneasiness; Bayard is as gentle as he is spirited, and I shall be at Dermot's house, in all probability, before the storm comes up. Good evening," added Charles, turning with a bright and encouraging smile towards Mrs. Mason, who was still watching the clouds with an expression of great anxiety on her countenance. "Will you be so good as to keep my promise to Frank, of reading to him in Anson's Voyages this evening? You will find the book on the table in my study."

Mrs. Mason nodded her head in token of assent, but maintained her station as watcher of the clouds. Dark masses were rolling heavily together, and there was a lurid look about the edges of some of these black "sailors of the air," as the greatest of German poets has termed them, which foreboded an awful storm. Low, growling thunder was now heard, and the close and oppressive atmosphere betokened the war that was brooding in the elements. Mrs. Mason stood pale and silent, with a look of anxiety, which awakened the apprehension of the boys, who drew close to her side, and inquired eagerly whether she thought cousin Charles could reach Dermot's house before the storm came up.

Her fears were not unfounded; the storm set in with terrific violence, when Charles was still two or three miles from Dermot's habitation, and there was no place of refuge. Trees bent before the violence of the wind, and the crashing of limbs was heard amidst awful and almost continued peals of thunder, which seemed accompanied, rather than followed, by the most vivid lightning. An oak tree was shivered at a few yards distance from Charles' path, and Bayard, for the first time becoming frightened, it was with difficulty Charles controlled him until they arrived at their place of destination.

The fury of the storm had, by this time, in some measure subsided. Judy met Charles Selden at the door with many thanks for his safety, for she said she knew he would come after getting Dermot's message, and she had been "the miserablest creature in the world; but thank God," she added, in a lower tone, "you have got here before the breath was out of his body, for I don't think he'll ever see the sun rise, and he has been asking mighty often whether I thought you would get here before he died. But take off your overcoat, sir, it is dripping wet."

As Charles turned to hang the overcoat against the wall, he perceived to his utter amazement a female form sitting near the hearth, with a shawl drawn closely around her, which he recognized at once to be that of Edith Fitzgerald. She arose with that simple dignity and self-possession which always characterized her slightest actions, and held out her hand to Charles, but not at all with the air of an embarrassed heroine, surprised in a cottage in some graceful act of benevolence, and receiving the admiring homage of beholder, for no expression was visible on her face which showed the most transient thought of herself. There were traces of tears perceptible, and an expression of blended awe and sympathy appeared in her countenance as her glance turned frankly and fully upon Charles.

After returning her greeting, Charles gently approached the sick man and kindly took the offered hand which the poor fellow stretched languidly forward, while something like a gleam of pleasure passed over his face.

"I thank you, Mr. Selden," he said, in a faint voice, "for coming out this dreadful evening, to see such a poor creature as I am, but I'm afraid it is all of no use, I am going very fast."

As he pronounced these words with difficulty, he fixed a wild and earnest glance of terror and inquiry upon Charles, which touched him deeply. He made no immediate reply, but after feeling Dermot's pulse for some minutes, said, "There is still hope of life even in this world, Dermot: your pulse is good, your hand is warm, and this death-like languor and depression is a part of your disease. You may recover, Dermot; but now, while you are brought to the very valley and shadow of death, do you not feel that you want a rod and staff to comfort you? Do you not feel, that after the few, fleeting years of life are past, which are the most to which any of us can look forward, how delightful would be the hope that our good Shepherd would lead us through the green pastures and by the still waters of our heavenly home?"

"Ah, Mr. Selden," said Dermot, with an almost despairing look of supplication, "if you could give me any true hope of peace hereafter, I would give ten thousand worlds. It is a dreadful thing to see death as I do now, hovering round me to take me away from this world, with all my sins upon my head, to stand before the judgment seat. And if we are to be judged by our works, where, oh where, my dear Mr. Selden, shall I appear?"

With the utmost gentleness, in the simplest, clearest, and yet most pathetic language, Charles explained to the almost dying man, the great doctrine of the Atonement; and as he listened, the expression of his countenance softened, and tears from his heart, flowed gently down his cheeks, as he hung upon Charles' words as if fearful to lose a syllable he uttered.

Charles was careful not to confuse or oppress the mind of Dermot by saying too much; he endeavored to present this great doctrine of the Gospel in its most forcible and consoling light, he repeated a few of the most striking texts of Scripture, and then kneeling by the bedside, offered up a prayer for the sufferer, from the very depths of his heart, and the tears of his hearers flowed fast, as they joined their supplications with his. Death was before them, with them; here lay a fellow-mortal, perhaps even now passing away through the deep waters, and with thankfulness and awe they looked to that Redeemer, whom Charles pointed out as alone able to bear him through the flood so that it should not overwhelm him.

Edith had often before stood by the bed of sickness and death, but the awful reality of eternal things had never before been so deeply impressed upon her heart, and when the prayer was concluded, she sat pale and motionless as a statue with thoughts too deep for words.

The clouds were now rolling away, and Charles opened the door to admit the reviving influence of the fresh air. He then took a kind leave of Dermot, after a few words of encouragement and sympathy, and a promise to visit him the ensuing day. After urging on Judy the necessity of keeping Dermot as quiet as possible, he told her in a lone tone that he entertained some hopes of his recovery; but in order that this should take place, it would be absolutely necessary that she should observe the directions given her by the doctor. He added that he should go by Dr. Wilson's house on his return home, as he thought it very important that he should see Dermot in his present state. Judy felt new hope and strength and promised implicit obedience.

As Judy was engaged in changing Dermot's pillows, and giving him some medicine, Charles approached Edith, and said in a low tone, "You are perhaps not aware, Miss Fitzgerald, that Dr. Wilson considers Dermot's illness as a typhus fever of an infectious character."

"No, I was not aware of this circumstance, or I should, perhaps, not have considered myself as justifiable in coming here, as I might communicate the infection to others were I to take the fever."

"You have then no personal fears?"

"None: more I believe from a sort of natural imprudent hardihood, which has protected me in most cases from all sorts of personal fear, than from the only sort of courage that deserves the name—moral courage. But it seems a pitiful sort of selfishness to abandon our fellow-creatures in extremity from personal considerations."

"Yes, I certainly would not advise any one to do so, if any human creature depended upon them solely for succor. But this is not the case here; others must expose themselves from considerations of sacred and professional duty, and from motives of natural duty and affection. Dr. Wilson is a very attentive physician, Judy has a sister who will assist her in nursing her husband, and I pledge my word that he shall not suffer for aid or attendance, so that farther exposure of yourself would be unnecessary. Had you not better go at once into the open air? The storm is now past."

Edith bowed her head in token of acquiescence. She did not feel personally indebted to him for his consideration, for she felt that his whole tone and manner would have been quite as appropriately addressed to her Aunt Travers as to herself. It was not to Edith Fitzgerald, but to a fellow-creature he spoke, and while a sense of this prevented any thing like embarrassment or gratitude on her part, it raised him in her estimation. The simple and earnest dignity of Charles Selden's manner, the singleness of his purposes always so apparent, excited at once her respect and admiration.

After taking leave of Judy and Dermot, Edith left the house, and turning to Charles Selden, who was standing near her, said in reply to his offer of walking home with her:

"The near way through the woods is a short walk from Travers Lodge, and as my way home lies directly by some of the negro cabins, I should not be able to get up a fear, even if I were so disposed, and as you intend going by for Dr. Wilson, it is best not to delay you, Mr. Selden."

This was so reasonable that Charles offered no remonstrance;—Edith thought he looked rather pleased at finding there was no necessity for his services, and they parted with a mutual increase of esteem.

Edith's mind was deeply affected by the scene through which she had just passed. Many thoughts had been presented to her with a force and connection with which she had never before considered them. The great doctrines of the sinfulness of man—the fullness of redemption offered by an atoning Saviour—she had never fully received, or deeply considered. Slowly she pursued her way homewards, deeply wrapped in thoughts solemn, elevating and consoling. The ravages of the storm were every where visible in her path: immense boughs torn from their trunks were scattered on the ground; here too was a tree scathed by lightning, but before her the bow of promise threw its ethereal and magnificent arch across the heavens. Striking types! thought Edith; from earthly tears does the bright arch arise on which we must ascend to Heaven. There must be a deep meaning in human suffering—a strong necessity for its existence. With such strong evidences in the works of nature, in the events of life, of the love of God, of his tender care over his creatures, it would be impossible to believe that he could wantonly afflict the children of men. How deep and fatal must be the malady from which such direful consequences spring!

Edith thought of what Charles had said of the necessity of an atonement, of the fullness of redemption wrought out for us by a Divine mediator, and though not prepared to embrace these doctrines in their full extent, light and joy sprung up within her soul as she reflected upon them. The deep earnestness with which Charles had spoken, left the almost irresistible conviction on the mind of his hearers that he knew he was speaking the truth, and Edith ceased to wonder that with such feelings and convictions he should have become a Minister of the Gospel. His sacred profession acquired in her eyes a new dignity and importance, since the grandeur and reality of eternal things had been placed before her in a brighter, nearer point of view, and she thought how much more reasonable it would be that he should wonder at the supreme importance which the children of the world attach to the fleeting and deceitful pleasures of earth, than they, that he should choose for his portion the unspeakable and imperishable blessings of Heaven.

CHAPTER XIV.

Fair Isabella is so fond of fame,
That her dear self is her perpetual theme,
Through hopes of contradiction oft she'll say,
"Methinks I look so wretchedly to-day!"—Young.

It was some evenings after the scene related in the preceding chapter, that the ladies at Travers Lodge assembled in the parlor to hold a consultation on the important subject of needlework. A poor woman in the neighborhood had recently had the misfortune of losing her cabin and nearly all the clothes her children and herself possessed, by fire. Affairs of charity were never then transacted by means of societies, but the individual exertions of such charitable persons, as always exist in every community, for the relief of sufferers within their own sphere of action, were probably much greater than in the present day. The increased intelligence, system and division of labor, which are found now in plans for the relief of the poor, have certainly greatly improved the machinery of benevolence; but as in the management of all human affairs, what is gained in one way, there is danger of losing in some other,—individual sympathy for suffering is often lost in the business-like administration of general charities.

The case of this poor woman had excited general compassion, and no one had been more anxious for her relief, or more ready to give assistance to her necessities, than Edith Fitzgerald. Anna Maria had talked a great deal, but done very little.

A large bundle of goods of various sorts suitable for cheap clothing, chiefly purchased by Edith, lay on a table in the sitting-room, and Mrs. Travers had undertaken the task of cutting out complete sets of garments suitable to the ages of the different children. Edith and Juliana were very busily engaged in making them up. Juliana was fond of all new projects, and was moreover not deficient in kindness of heart; she was very skilful and quick in the use of her needle, and readily undertook to instruct Edith in all the mysteries of baby-linen, &c., &c. Edith was well acquainted with the use of the pencil, and with many sorts of fancy work, but the various kinds of useful and homely needlework, which are of such indispensable necessity in a family, she was entirely unacquainted with, and was now applying her best efforts to profit by Juliana's instructions, which were not imparted without much giggling and many jokes at her cousin's ignorance.

Anna Maria, apparently uninterested in their proceedings, was busily engaged in covering a muslin apron with a profusion of leaves and flowers, such as had not their likeness in the heavens above, nor in the earth beneath. Mr. Travers' voice was heard in the passage, and immediately afterwards he threw open the door saying, "Walk into this room, Mr. Selden."

Anna Maria started, changed color, and quickly put aside her work; whilst Edith, almost as quickly, deposited the little frock she was making in a large basket beside Mrs. Travers. Juliana observed both these movements with some amusement, and continued her own employment with a smile and a look which said plainly, "You see Mr. Selden's presence makes no difference with me."

Charles advanced, quite unconscious of the commotion which his presence had excited, and having exchanged friendly greetings with the little circle, took a seat near Mrs. Travers.

"You find us in the midst of a workshop," said Mrs. Travers, addressing herself to Charles; "the girls are so intent on making up these clothes for poor Mrs. Dawson's children, that they have set me as hard at work as themselves."

Whilst Mrs. Travers was speaking, Anna Maria contrived dexterously to possess herself of a piece of work from the huge repository at her mother's side, and began hemming as industriously as if her life had depended upon finishing the garment as expeditiously as possible, while Juliana's very neck was scarlet with the violence of the effort she was making to repress a hearty laugh at this manœuvre of her sister.

"Her case really deserves compassion," said Charles; "she has not only lost all her little property by the fire, but has also the additional misfortune of a very sick child—so sick, indeed, I should suppose from its appearance, that there is but small hope of its recovery."

"So Edith told me; she went yesterday to see Mrs. Dawson, and quite moved my heart by her account of the poor woman's distress. But Edith, have you finished the frock you were making, or are you waiting for me to give you any instruction?"

Edith was conscious that a feeling of false pride had made her throw her work aside at Charles' entrance, lest she should seem to be seeking his approbation; and as she perceived Juliana regarding her with a provoking smile at this question of her aunt's, a bright crimson flush passed over her cheek, as she replied in a tone of indifference,

"Only a sudden fit of laziness has seized me, a thing which very often happens."

"Well, it is best not to begin too violently at first, I thought you would tire yourself out with such constant workings," said Mrs. Travers mildly, who never perceived any motive for conduct but the one alleged.

"A sudden fit of industry seems to have seized Anna Maria, which will make amends for Edith's laziness," said Juliana, who had now become familiar to Charles Selden's visits, and since she found he could talk and behave like other people, as she expressed it, had lost in a great measure her awe of him.

Anna Maria affected not to hear this remark, and Edith hastened to endeavor to give another turn to the conversation by addressing some inquiries to Charles, respecting Mrs. Mason and the boys.

Mr. Travers seeing Charles engaged in conversation with the ladies, drew a newspaper from his pocket which he had just brought with him from the neighboring post-office, and began to peruse it diligently and apparently with absorbing interest.

Anna Maria stole a glance from her work to see whether Charles seemed to be regarding her with approbation, but as he gave no token of observing her industry she determined to make a bolder effort to attract his attention, and turning towards him said in a sentimental tone:

"I was rejoiced this morning to hear Dermot was getting better; his wife tells me she has never seen such a change, and she seems to ascribe his recovery to you. She says you are a blessing to the poor."

Charles, without accepting or disclaiming this compliment, remarked with quiet simplicity, "a crisis has taken place in the fever, and the change has certainly been favorable. Dr. Wilson entertains now the most sanguine hopes of his recovery, and says if he could only rely on Judy's discretion, he should consider his restoration as certain."

"People in her rank of life are so destitute of sensibility and intelligence, that it is in vain to hope for any thing like reasonable conduct from them, even if their own lives depended on their acting rationally," said Anna Maria.

"Indeed, I believe," said Edith, "that Judy would exert herself to preserve Dermot's life, even more than her own, but she is ignorant and superstitious, and of course could not be trusted as a nurse without some superintendence."

"Dr. Wilson and I have undertaken the task of superintendence," said Charles looking towards Edith with a smile, which she understood as meant to remind her of the promise he had made a few evenings before, "and you must not do Judy the injustice of supposing her destitute of feeling, she will carefully obey orders if we can only persuade her they are really for the good of the patient," he added, addressing himself to Anna Maria.

"But what a risk you incur, Mr. Selden, in exposing yourself to the typhus fever," said Anna Maria in a sympathizing tone, "Dr. Wilson told us yesterday Dermot was suffering under this disease."

"Doctors and ministers are, of course, obliged to visit the sick," replied Charles with a tone and manner that showed he thought his case called for no particular sympathy, "but, Miss Travers, I think you are mistaken in supposing that people in the lower ranks of life are generally destitute of, or even deficient in, feeling. They have not, it is true, much of what is called sensibility, this can scarcely exist in those who lead a life of poverty and hardship, and have been exposed to constant association with persons whose manners and language must necessarily be void of refinement; it is a merciful arrangement of Providence, that they should thus be enabled to encounter without pain a thousand things to which their situation in life exposes them. But I have seen the most touching instances amongst them, of strong natural feeling, of disinterested affection, of humble trust in God."

Anna Maria smiled acquiescence, for her object was not to argue with Charles, but only to appear to him in an interesting point of view, and replied: "I cannot presume to contradict your assertions, Mr. Selden, you are so much better acquainted with the character of the poor than I can pretend to be."

"Oh I cannot set up for a Pope," said Charles laughing, "you must examine and consider my assertions before you assent to them."

"My opportunities are so limited of acquiring this kind of experience, to say nothing of the inferiority of my judgment, that I think my safest course would be to take your assertions on this subject for granted."

"I think Edith ought to be able to form an opinion of the character of the poor around us at least," said Juliana, "for there is nothing she delights in so much as to visit every smoky cabin and talk to every miserable, ragged-looking wretch within her reach."

"You know I like to study human nature," said Edith coloring, "so that I am curious to know how people in every rank of life feel and think. Then the strange and often striking modes of expression used by those in the lower ranks of life amuse and interest me."

"Really, Edith," said Mrs. Travers, looking up from her work at her niece with some surprise, "I should never have supposed if you had not told me so yourself, that you had so much curiosity; I always ascribed the interest you showed in the poor to a charitable motive."

Charles thought of the scene he had lately witnessed and felt sure that Edith had not been actuated in this instance by curiosity, but he also perceived that she was unwilling for her good deeds to be known or commented on, and there was something in her manner which induced him to think she was anxious to show him that she was not desirous to gain his approbation.

"You see," said Juliana laughing, "though I am always considered not at all good, that Anna Maria and Edith are not much better. Edith only takes interest in the poor from motives of curiosity, and Anna Maria takes none at all from any motive."

Edith laughed, but Anna Maria's color rose to her temples, though she constrained herself to say with tolerable composure, "you quite misunderstood me, Juliana, I did not mean to say that I took no interest in the poor, on the contrary, I pity them and endeavor to relieve them; I only remarked that my opportunities were limited of acquiring much experience as to their habits and character.

"You know," said Edith, finding it necessary to come to the rescue, "Juliana never gives herself the trouble to listen to our remarks or to give them a right construction, so explanations and vindications are lost upon her. she would only turn them into a jest;" then perceiving from Juliana's looks that some saucy reply was upon her lips which she thought probable would provoke Anna Maria beyond all power of endurance she took Juliana's work from her saying: "how very neatly and prettily you are making this cap, but it is a positive waste of time to put ornamental stitches on work for such a purpose."

"Well I have nothing very particular to do with my time," replied Juliana, "and I don't see why, because the baby is poor, it should have a frightful cap as an additional misfortune."

Just then an involuntary exclamation of horror which escaped from Mr. Travers, who was intently employed in reading the newspapers, directed the attention of every one to himself.

"Bless me, my dear," said Mrs. Travers who was thrown in a tremor from head to foot at this exclamation, "are any of our friends dead?"

"No, not that I know of," replied Mr. Travers, "but listen to this, Mr. Selden, and tell me if you could have believed that such demons exist in human shape?"

Mr. Travers then read aloud a passage from the paper, detailing some of the most revolting cruelties of the Revolutionary Tribunal, to which his audience listened with countenances of horror.

"Well sir," he said when he had finished reading the passage, turning towards Charles, "what can you say to this—could one have supposed that the love of freedom, one of the noblest of human feelings, and one too which has led to such glorious results in our own country, should produce such frightful excesses in France."

"Frightful!" said Edith, her eyes filling with tears of mingled pity and indignation, "say rather deeds of which fiends might be ashamed."

"Say any thing you please, my dear, and you cannot say too much," said Mr. Travers, "but really proceedings such as those overset all my theories, and convince me that I am but a tyro in the knowledge of human nature."

"This page in the history of France," said Charles, "is an awful lesson as to what human nature can be when the restraints of Government and Religion are entirely thrown off; a lesson too which can never be forgotten. When we consider the age, the circumstances, the country in which these horrors are being perpetrated, they have not their parallel in ancient or modern history."

"True," said Mr. Travers, "but we can scarcely account for the unparalleled atrocities committed by the French, by the circumstance of their having thrown off all religious restraints, for they have certainly a better creed than the Pagans, and yet their practices are far more abominable and horrible."

"You will observe," said Charles, "that Paris is the centre of these abominations, and judging of the state of morals and religion there, from all the pictures of society gathered from letters and memoirs, we may well pronounce the Parisians to be less under the influence of moral and religious restraints than the nations of antiquity, for the profession of the Greeks and Romans did not differ so much from their practice as that of the Parisians, and there is nothing which produces so fatal an effect on national and individual character as this constant discrepancy between faith and practice. The distinction between good and evil cannot be perceived or cared for. Political causes have, doubtless, likewise contributed to produce these fearful results, so totally different from the effects of our own efforts for freedom."

Juliana broke up the political discussion by reading aloud from the paper which her father had just laid down, the marriage of Mr. Norris of Belvoir, to Miss Wilson of Primrose Cottage.

"Who would have thought," she exclaimed turning to her father with a laugh, "of old cousin John Norris' getting married, and to that prim Miss Wilson too? I wonder what Thomas and the girls will say to it."

"I don't see what Mr. Norris' marriage has to do with the French Revolution," replied Mr. Travers rather gravely, "but I don't know what his children can have to say about it, but that their father is old enough to judge for himself; and as to his being so very old, as you seem to suppose, Juliana, that is quite a mistake, he is just about my age."

"La, Papa!" said Juliana, with a saucy look and laugh.

"I could never understand," said Mr. Travers, "why the ladies should entertain such unreasonable prejudices against second marriages. A gentleman pays the highest possible compliment to his first wife by seeking to supply her place."

Anna Maria cast a side-long glance towards Charles, as if to discover his sentiments on this subject, but as his countenance gave no indication by which she could discover them, she concluded his opinions were the same with those just expressed by Mr. Travers, as she knew they were entertained by men almost universally. Determined, therefore, to show that she was above the prejudices just ascribed by her father to women on the subject of second marriages, she observed: "I think if Mr. Norris' children have a real affection for their father they will prefer his happiness to their own."

"Very sensibly observed," said her father.

"So then if mamma were to die you would have no objection to a step-mother, Anna Maria," said Juliana in a reproachful tone.

"I should certainly wish my father to do whatever would best promote his happiness."

A slight flush passed over the cheek of Mrs. Travers at Anna Maria's speech, but she said nothing. Juliana, however, exclaimed with great indignation, "wonderfully good indeed at mamma's expense—I at least should"—

"Come, come," said Edith, gently laying her hand upon Juliana's arm, "fortunately there does not seem to be any probability that aunt Travers will afford a vacancy for a successor. You know all gentlemen approve and defend second marriages, they consider it as one of their inalienable privileges, even when they have no wish or intention of availing themselves of it. Even papa would not say for the world that he disapproved of them."

"Then I should be afraid that some of these days he would present me with a step-mother," said Juliana.

"Ah, that is because you are not acquainted with my father, if you knew him as well as I do the possibility of such an event would not occur to you."

"Will you not give us your opinion on this subject?" said Anna Maria, turning towards Charles with a smile which she meant to be one of irresistible sweetness.

"My opinions on this matter," said Charles, "are subject to so many qualifications and exceptions from circumstances, that to explain them fully would require an essay. Though I am a preacher," he added smiling, "I could not consent, in cold blood, to inflict such tediousness on an unoffending audience."

Charles would scarcely have been able, however, to avoid giving his opinions at full length on this subject, as Anna Maria was determined not to let him off so easily, but to plead her right as one of his flock to his views on all moral questions, had not the entrance of George Travers put a forcible end to the conversation. His favorite riding-horse had been suddenly taken very sick, and he came to consult Mr. Travers as to the best method of treating him. Charles, after listening attentively to George's description of the state of his horse, which was addressed to his father, said that he had himself cured one a few months ago, similarly affected and proposed to go with George to the stable to see the horse.

George accepted the offer with great surprise and some gratitude, and during their walk Charles rose a hundred degrees in his estimation by the knowledge he discovered him to possess of farriery. His good opinion was still farther increased by the success with which Charles' prescription for the horse was attended and the interest he showed in its recovery, and when Charles took leave that night George exclaimed as soon as he had left the room—"He is a fine fellow after all, if he is a preacher. What could have possessed him to make such a horrible choice of a profession? he was intended for better things."

"To cure horses for instance," said Edith laughing.

"Yes, what could be more useful or charitable."

"Oh nothing, not even to save souls."

"Pshaw! you are disposed lately, Edith, to ridicule every thing I say. You think then, it was beneath Mr. Selden's dignity to cure poor Saladin."

"Not at all, George," said Edith, with a good-humored smile, "and I am sincerely glad your fine horse is likely to recover. But good night, for I have a letter now to write before bed-time."

So saying she glided quietly from the room, and it is certain that she thought several times of Charles, his observations and his character, before the letter was begun.

CHAPTER XV.

Alas! our young affections runs to waste,
Or water but the desert.—Childe Harold.

Week after week passed by, and Margaret found her perplexities and disturbances daily increase, and yet the time glided on swiftly, and in some respects, very pleasantly. Scarcely a day passed that she did not see Gerald Devereux and Augustus Vernon. The Davenports were near neighbors, and the families at Davenport Lodge and Sherwood had always kept up habits of the most social and intimate intercourse. Lewis and Arthur were always fishing, hunting, shooting and riding together, and it had been generally understood by all their acquaintances, that Lewis had been in love with Virginia from his boyhood, though he had never yet found courage to tell her so, and it would have been thought something very strange at Sherwood if two or three days had passed without seeing Lewis. His guests, Gerald Devereux and Augustus Vernon fell into the same habits of frequent intercourse, and were becoming quite domesticated at Sherwood.

These gentlemen were now the almost constant subjects of thought and discussion amongst the family circle at Sherwood. While habits of almost daily intercourse made the noble heart, and superior talents and endowments of Gerald Devereux more apparent, Augustus Vernon lost ground proportionably in the estimation of Mrs. Selden and Margaret. Unfortunately it was but too visible, that if he lost favor with the other members of the family, he gained it rapidly with Virginia, and Mrs. Selden and Margaret perceiving the state of her feelings with great and increasing disturbance, devised all sorts of methods to destroy his influence, and weaken the too favorable impression which they perceived he had made upon her heart. To break up the intercourse was clearly impossible, and the only other possible method to divert Virginia's thoughts into other channels, would be a change of place and objects; but to effect this would be a matter of some difficulty. When Charles had first settled in his new abode, Virginia had frequently expressed a great desire to visit him, and Margaret and her mother could think of no better plan than to endeavor to persuade her to spend a few weeks at The Rectory.

"It will be impossible, I am afraid, to persuade her to leave Sherwood now," said Mrs. Selden with a sigh to Margaret, after they had been discussing the subject for some time, without coming to any satisfactory conclusion.

"We could not well propose such a plan to Virginia, without making our secret thoughts and wishes so obvious, as to wound and alarm her feelings, and rouse within her a spirit of resistance; for though she is so gentle in most things, in this, I am sure, she would be inflexibly firm, if she once believed that her friends understood her feelings, and deliberately designed opposing her attachment—for such I fear it is. Of course she would submit to a positive command from you, that she should go to The Rectory; but this, you know, we have determined should be the last resort, for many reasons. We must write to Charles—you know he can safely be trusted with any thing—tell him the whole truth, and he will, without alluding to our information, write to insist upon Virginia's visiting him. I think if he urges it very strongly, she will go, partly because there will be no plausible reason to allege for not doing so, though I know she will do it with great reluctance."

"That is an excellent idea, Margaret; if Virginia could be prevailed on to go from any motive whatever, I should hope that this infatuation might be removed. It is merely a delusion of the fancy; it can be nothing more; for there is certainly nothing in Augustus Vernon to inspire real love, and Charles is so skilful in managing diseases of the mind, and is so deeply interested in Virginia, that I should hope every thing from his society and influence, combined with a total change of scene and associations—to say nothing of the cheerful, practical good sense of Charlotte, who with all her strong feeling and tender affection, is, you, know the very antipode of romance and sentimentality."

Margaret shook her head sorrowfully, "I do not wish to destroy your hopes, mother; I hope something, too, but I fear much more. Virginia's feelings are much more deeply rooted than you imagine; they are founded on delusion; but they are, alas, but too real. I have studied the state of her heart most closely, but if any one can divert her thoughts, and change her feelings, Charles would be the person."

This plan was no sooner resolved upon, than it was put into execution. Margaret wrote immediately to her brother, and she awaited his reply with anxiety and uneasiness. She was convinced that Virginia ought to be removed as soon as was practicable from Augustus Vernon's society. Nothing could be more dangerous than this sort of intimate intercourse; especially to a person of Virginia's modest and retiring character. The easy hospitality of Sherwood had completely domesticated Augustus Vernon, and this sort of familiarity rendered a thousand things natural and proper, that would not have been thought of in more formal society; and Virginia thus insensibly glided into habits of intimacy, which could not have taken place under any other circumstances. Something must be done at once to remedy this evil; something, too, which would seem to be in the natural course of things, that suspicion might not be awakened as to the state of Virginia's feelings, and to the effort her friends thought it necessary to make, to enable her to subdue them. Yet Margaret shrunk from the pain which she knew this step would inflict on Virginia, if she consented to go to The Rectory—and if she refused, from the explanations and persuasions which must ensue. She was doubtful, too, whether or not to seek Virginia's confidence, fearful that an expression of her feelings would give her courage and strengthen her determination not to sacrifice Augustus Vernon to the prejudices of her friends. But as is often the case in life, our doubts and difficulties are settled by apparently the most casual circumstances, and we find ourselves saying the very things, upon the propriety of which we had been long pondering daily almost without knowing how, or why, our thoughts were changed into words.

It happened one evening that Margaret and Virginia were left alone; the gentlemen were all out on a fishing party, and Mrs. Selden had gone to visit a sick neighbor. Margaret was looking out on vacancy, thinking of Virginia, when she was roused from her reverie by the sound of a light footstep, and looking around she saw the object of her meditations busily engaged in arranging and contemplating some flowers in a small china vase on the table. Margaret said from an almost irresistible impulse, "These flowers are scarcely worth preserving with so much care, Virginia; I could make you a prettier bouquet from any bed of flowers in the garden."

A slight blush passed over Virginia's fair face, as she replied half-reproachfully, "You have scarcely deigned to look at my poor bouquet, which you speak of so contemptuously, or you would have seen that it was selected with more than usual taste and sentiment."

Margaret knew that this bouquet had been the gift of Augustus Vernon two or three evenings before, and an involuntary sigh escaped her, though she smiled good humoredly, as he said, "Let us see, roses that are full blown and beginning to drop their leaves, bruised mignonnette, and a few sprigs of ill-thriven myrtle, cropped no doubt from Charlotte's sickly bush. A few wild flowers from the woods would suit my taste infinitely better, and suggest more pleasing associations."

"You have a great deal of charity for some persons, Margaret, and none at all for others. There are some persons whose very attractions and virtues are sins in your eyes." This was said with a look and tone of pettishness, so unusual to Virginia, that Margaret looked at her steadily for a few minutes with surprise, until she perceived that Virginia's eyes were filled with tears; then taking her hand affectionately, she said in a gentle tone,

"Do not be vexed with me, Virginia; you know that I would always gladly save your feelings, even at the expense of my own, and in return for that love, which is strong for you in my heart as life, I ask your confidence. Why should there be any reserve or circumlocution between us? Let us understand each other fully. Is it not Augustus Vernon against whom you think me so much prejudiced, that his very attractions and virtues are sins in my eyes?"

Margaret's kind and firm tone had always power over the tender heart and wavering resolution of Virginia; and she felt impelled to yield up her feelings and thoughts almost unconsciously to her sister. "Yes, Margaret," she said, "you cannot but be conscious of the justice of my assertion; it is the first time I have ever seen my mother and yourself unjust to any one; and it seems so strange, so unkind, when you have so many reasons to be partial to him."

"In the first place, then, Virginia, I will answer for myself—I am not at all prejudiced against Mr. Vernon, and so far from wishing to see faults in his character, I should be rejoiced to see virtues."

"Oh, Margaret, if these are indeed your feelings, why cannot you perceive what every one else does?"

"Who is every one, Virginia?"

Virginia's face flushed with a deep crimson tint, and with a slightly tremulous voice, she said, "I, at least, am some one, Margaret, if I am not your equal in judgment and good sense, I am not wholly devoid of those qualities, and you must admit, that I have had better opportunities of understanding his character than you."

"Pardon me, Virginia, I admit no such thing."

"Because you are determined to make no admission, some how or other, it has certainly happened, that—perhaps because he perceived your aversion to him, or from some other cause that we have, that is, that he has"—

"That you have been much more together, and conversed more with each other," said Margaret, pitying her sister's confusion, "that he has been much more attentive to you, more anxious to gain your approbation. All this I admit fully, and I can easily perceive, arises from the most natural causes imaginable, and yet, Virginia, I do not think your opportunities for studying Mr. Vernon's character have been so good as mine."

"If that is the case, it can only arise from my very inferior powers of discernment."

"That is by no means a necessary inference. Mr. Vernon has been so much more assiduous in his efforts to gain your favor than mine, it is but natural you should view him with more indulgence, and you know that it is possible to be prejudiced favorably, as well as unfavorably. Now, I deny that I am prejudiced unfavorably, and think that I am able to pass a more impartial judgment on his character and understanding than you are."

"And that judgment has been unfavorable?" And as Virginia said this, she cast an earnest and beseeching look at Margaret.

"I am very, very sorry it has been," and Margaret, conscious of the pain she was inflicting, averted her eyes from Virginia and did not perceive the emotions that swelled her heart almost to suffocation. She remained silent, her color varying from marble paleness to the deepest flush of crimson until she was at length relieved by a burst of tears. Ashamed of betraying how deeply her heart was interested, shocked at herself, and vexed with Margaret, she was about to rise precipitately and leave the room; but Margaret took her reluctant hand, pressed it closely between her own, then raised it to her lips, and Virginia felt a warm tear fall on it. Vexation was always a weak and short lived sentiment in Virginia's heart. Instantly softened by this proof of Margaret's sympathy, she returned the pressure of her hand and her tears flowed more gently and were less bitter.

"Forgive me, dear Virginia, I ought to have remembered how delicate and sensitive your feelings are and should have spoken with more consideration, should have prepared you for sentiments so different from your own and which I knew would be painful to you, alas! I knew not how painful. But your happiness, your character, Virginia, which is even dearer to me than your happiness, are of too much importance to allow of any prevarication, any temporising upon so serious a subject. I have studied Augustus Vernon's character with the deepest interest and attention, and the result of my observation is that he is not worthy of my precious sister, that he could not make her happy, and moreover"—

"Spare me, Margaret," said Virginia in a faltering tone, and with her face averted, "you know the weakness of my heart, do not take advantage of it; you cannot help despising me, I know, for caring so much for a person who has never made any declaration of love for me, but even though I incur your contempt I cannot hear you do him so much injustice without saying something in his vindication. I have observed his character likewise,—you must at least acknowledge, by the humiliating proof I have given you of my interest in it, that I have done so—and my conclusions have been very different."

"I do not condemn you, I do not despise you, Virginia, I only lament deeply the circumstances that have led to this state of feeling, and I grieve still more that it should be utterly impossible for me to enable you to perceive the truth, which to me seems written in characters of light. With so many pleasing external qualities to captivate, it is not strange that a person at your age, with your lively imagination, quick feelings and total inexperience should have become interested in Augustus Vernon, nor can you have any reason for the humiliating reflection that you have given your love unsought, for though he has made no declaration of love in words, his every look and tone, since he became acquainted with you, has been a declaration."

Margaret perceived as she returned these words that a bright and beautiful flush of joy passed over Virginia's face, and that she cast her eyes down to conceal the pleasure that sparkled in them, and she sighed as she continued. "But, my dear Virginia, how can we know that these looks and tones are indications of true love?"

Virginia's brow was instantly overcast as she replied in a low and hesitating tone; "I should suppose that looks and tones were the truest indications of genuine feeling. Words may deceive but looks and tones cannot."

"Your looks and tones I admit cannot, because they express unconsciously the feelings of a warm and single heart; but this is not the case with every one, especially with those who have made a profession of captivating."

"What cruel things you say, Margaret, why should you believe that he is so mean, so deceitful and ungenerous, unless it appears to you impossible that I should be loved?"

"So far from this being impossible I think you were made to be loved, one of the flowers of creation, meant to be cherished tenderly, and never exposed to the storms and conflicts of life, and it is for this reason that I feel so anxious about you. I have never for a moment doubted that Augustus Vernon admires your beauty, ardently wishes you to love him and probably loves you as much as his nature is capable of, but nothing hardens the heart so much as the constant effort to make conquests merely to gratify vanity, and I fear that this has been the practice pursued by Mr. Vernon."

"This is indeed prejudice unworthy of you, Margaret; why should you think so?" asked Virginia in an indignant tone.

"For several reasons. You know this is the character we heard of him at the commencement of our acquaintance. I know this is the opinion of persons who have been acquainted with his past life, but what is to me most conclusive is, that I have observed that all he does and says seems to spring rather from vanity than feeling."

"Common report is often unjust, Margaret, and as to the persons who think so, you must tell me who they are and what grounds they have for their opinions. We should not condemn any one without examination, I am sure I have often heard you say so."

"And I say so still, nor do I expect the evidence, which is convincing to me, to be equally conclusive to you,—all I ask is that you would give my views weight enough to make you re-examine your opinion of Augustus Vernon, to avoid above all things any entanglement with him until something more can be ascertained as to his real character, and to withdraw yourself awhile from his influence until your mind becomes less dazzled, less bewildered."

A deep sigh and fast flowing tears were Virginia's only replies for some minutes; at length she said; "you are unreasonable, Margaret, and abuse your power over me."

"I have no power, dear Virginia, but what affection and reason can give."

Virginia perceived by Margaret's look and tone that she was hurt and grieved at what she herself had said, and with a sudden reaction of feeling she threw her arms around her sister's neck. "Forgive me, Margaret," she said, "have pity on me and for my sake at least try to do him justice."

"I do try, I will try every thing that I can for your happiness, for God knows it is dearer to me than my own, but try to compose yourself and tell me, I entreat you, whether you have committed yourself in any way to Augustus Vernon, whether you think he understands the nature of your feelings towards him?"

"Oh no, I hope not, I think not, surely you do not think I would permit him to discover them, unless he had made a declaration of love in words, indeed I hope he does not know all that you do."

"I trust not: then our care must be to prevent his making the discovery."

Just as Margaret had uttered these words she heard Augustus Vernon's voice in the parlor, enquiring of one of the servants if the young ladies were at home. Struck with dismay and vexation Margaret looked at Virginia as if to consider what had best be done.

"I will go and receive Mr. Vernon and tell him you are indisposed, Virginia, which I am sure will be no falsehood."

Virginia was bathing her eyes to efface all traces of the tears she had just been shedding, as Margaret said this, and she replied with hesitation and embarrassment,

"But will it not appear strange? he will suspect something."

"No, that is impossible, I shall say with all the boldness and straight-forwardness of truth, which compels belief you know, that you have the headache and are not well enough to go out."

And without giving Virginia any farther time for doubt, closing the door hastily, Margaret went to receive Augustus Vernon, wishing earnestly that he was a thousand miles off. She found him standing in a graceful attitude, fait a peindre, arrayed with the utmost care, his curls becomingly arranged, and holding in his hand a large bouquet, intended to express quite as many tender and pretty sentiments as twenty love sonnets could do. The whole expression of his countenance changed from the air of bewitching tenderness he had assumed to one of blank disappointment when he perceived the unsentimental Margaret enter, instead of the fair Virginia.

He regretted Virginia's indisposition, and would have sent her many pretty messages, accompanying the bouquet, which he desired Margaret to give her sister, but there was a sort of dryness and coldness about her manner, though she was perfectly polite, which froze the sentiments on his lips before he could utter them, and they were both equally relieved from a burthensome tete-a-tete by the entrance of the party who had gone out on a fishing expedition in the morning.

F.....

A Lament on a Brother Deceased.

BY WILLIAM PEMBROKE MULCHINOCK.

I move by the heaving deep,
Alone,
When the winds awake from sleep,
To moan.

I gaze on its bosom blue
Afar,
Where mirror'd below I view
Each star.

From mine eye the heavy tears
I dry,
As I think on the happy years
Gone by.

For him of the fair young brow
I weep,
Who takes in the church-yard now
His sleep;

For he was the star above
Sun-bright,
That tinged with the light of love
My night.

Sadly I now must roam,
And sigh
For him, who has found a home
On high.

My tongue in the halls of mirth
Is mute,
And sad are thy notes on earth,
My lute.

A fend o'er my bosom steals
Through air,
And his voice all wildly wails—
"Despair."

OF STYLE IN WRITING.

Fine artificial writers love to stuff their pages with high-flown figures of speech and gaudy flowers of rhetoric. They still carry on the tinsel manufacture in all its branches, they delight in the superlative and hyperbolical and ever affect the "Ercles vein." They cannot describe an ordinary incident, a simple affair, without a flourish of trumpets. It might amuse a man of wit,—such as Dean Swift,—to strip some of these flowery productions of their superfluous ornaments; to sift this bushel of chaff and find how many grains of wheat it contains; to trim and raze the redundant, the epithetical, the turgid, and to expunge whatever seems only to weaken the sense. To make the thing the more palpable, the original and the corrected copy might be arranged vis-a-vis in parallel columns. Cervantes brings in the curate, the barber and the house-keeper, tossing Don Quixote's library—musty old tomes of enchantment and knight errantry, out at an upper window down into the court-yard, and making a bonfire of them. If all the books extant were collected, how many of them might deserve to share the same fate? And even of those that might escape with their lives,—how many, if they were made to pass through the ordeal of a just criticism, would emerge depleted, shrunken, emaciated skeletons, disembowelled ghosts, "lean anatomies," "remnants of themselves?" The Brobdignaggian folio would dwindle into a thin octavo, the corpulent quarto would awake in the form of a Lilliputian duodecimo. How many horse-cart loads of poems, histories, voyages and travels, romances, dramas, memoirs and novels, encyclopædias, pamphlets, abridgments and epitomes, short and easy ways, vade-mecums—what vast piles of newspapers and magazines and reviews, would expire in this expurgatorial brush-heap?

Fine writers sacrifice simplicity to artifice and affectation, and endeavor to set off poverty of thought by a showy dress. Fond of hyperbole and disdaining the temperate zone, they must either congeal amid the snows of eternal winter or melt in the blaze of an equatorial sun. This extravagance defeats itself; the mind rejects such incessant draughts upon its credulity. Some writers affect a mystified style, counting plain English quite too vulgar for the sublimity of their ethereal spirits—they manufacture a sort of Mosaic dialect of their own only to be understood by the initiated and envelope themselves in a hazy veil of transcendental smoke. Their writings are apt to be like Egyptian hieroglyphics which need to be decyphered, and what has cost much pains in the unravelling often turns out to have deserved none.

Of style Milton says: "For me readers although I cannot say I am utterly unrestrained in those rules which best rhetoricians have written in any learned language, yet true eloquence I find to be none but the serious and hearty love of truth: and that whose mind soever is fully possessed with a fervent desire to know things and with the dearest charity to infuse the knowledge of them into others—when such a man would speak, his words, by what I can express, like so many nimble and airy servitors trip about him at command, and in well-ordered files, as he would wish, and all aptly into their own places." Dr. Johnson advises him that would acquire a style elegant and smooth to give his days and his nights to the reading of Addison. The advice is good and quite disinterested, for his own style is the very reverse of Addison's. Dr. Franklin in improving his style found it a good exercise to read a number of the Spectator, shut the book and try how nearly he could imitate the original. Longinus suggests to a writer, when about to attempt a lofty flight, to conceive within himself how Homer, or some one of the master-spirits of the world would have expressed himself on such an occasion. So in the present day a writer might ask himself what would Milton or Pascal have said in this case. The difficulty is that in order to conceive what Homer or Milton would have said, it is necessary to have Homer or Milton's grasp of mind.

John Foster, in his inimitable essays, remarks: "False eloquence is like a false alarm of thunder, where a sober man that is not apt to startle at sounds looks out to see if it be not the rumbuling of a cart." And again: "Eloquence resides in the thought and no words can make that eloquent which will not be so in the plainest that could possibly express the sense." The Latinized pedantry of style is well taken off by the licentious wit, Rabelais, where he makes the Paris student give an account of his religion: "I revere the olympicals; I latrially revere the supernal astripotent; I dilige and redame my proxims; I observe the decalogical precepts; and according to the facultate of my vires I do not discede from them one breadth of an unquicule: nevertheless it is veriform that because Mammona doth not supergurgitate any thing in my locules, I am somewhat rare and lent to supererrogate the elemosynes to those egeants that ostially queritate their stipe." Pantagruel to cure him of his Latin style caught him by the throat and so throttled him that he soon began to beg for mercy in his own tongue naturally. Rabelais adds that Octavian Augustus advises "to shun all strange words with as much care as pilots of ships avoid the rocks of the sea." An artificial style is proof of the absence of feeling. A man who feels warmly has no time or inclination to cast about for fine words; the proper words come spontaneously. Children use a natural style and a fish-woman in a passion may exhibit a specimen of eloquence from which the cast-iron rhetorician might learn a lesson. Eloquence is but the voice of nature. To write well, one must be full of his subject and feel what he writes and write what he feels. The best English writers are fonder of using their own mother-tongue, the Anglo-Saxon, than the Roman. Dr. Gregory says: "In one of my early interviews with Mr. Hall [Robert Hall] I used the word 'felicity' three or four times in rather quick succession. He asked, "Why do you say 'felicity,' sir? 'Happiness' is a better word, more musical and genuine English coming from the Saxon." "Not more musical, I think sir." "Yes, more musical; and so are words derived from the Saxon generally. Listen sir; 'My heart is smitten and withered like grass;' there's plaintive music. Listen again sir; 'Under the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice;' there's cheerful music." "Yes, but 'rejoice' is French." "True, but all the rest is Saxon; and 'rejoice' is almost out of tune with the other words. Listen again, 'Thou hast delivered my eyes from tears, my soul from death, and my feet from falling;' all Saxon, sir, except 'delivered.' I could think of the word 'tear,' sir, till I wept. Then again for another noble specimen and almost all good old Saxon English: 'Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life; and I will dwell in the house of the Lord forever.'"

Richard Sharp, in one of his letters, says, "I am convinced that in the gravest age! and in the sublimest passages the simple terms and the idioms of our language often add a grace beyond the reach of scholarship, increasing rather than diminishing the elegance as well as the spirit of the diction. 'Utinam et verba in usu quotidiano posita minus timeremus.'"

"He that would write well," says Roger Ascham, "must follow the advice of Aristotle, to speak as the common people speak and to think as the wise think." In support of this opinion many of the examples often cited are amusing as well as convincing. The following from a great author may be added—"Is there a God to swear by and is there none to believe in, none to trust to?" What becomes of the for ceand simplicity of this short sentence when turned into the clumsy English which schoolmasters indite and which little boys can construe? "Is there a God by whom to swear, is there none in whom to believe, none to whom to pray?"

C. C.

CITY AND SALON.*

BY IK MARVEL.

Reports come in night after night from the Provinces. The Government discusses, with feverish anxiety, the political complexion of each new Representative. The quidnuncs talk with ardor; the Cafés are alive with conversationists. New names are bruited from mouth to mouth; and lineage, education, and political bias, are ferreted out with all the aids of registers and Provincial Journals. The Presse sends out its extras, bringing down intelligence to the latest moment.

The men of the Ateliers Nationaux, gleeful with their easy-earned wages, are sauntering at their work in the Parc Monceau, or along the quays; and cry—long life to the Government that supplies us with home and bread!

But meantime commerce is sadly falling off; no strangers are now loitering about those elegant shops of Rue de la Paix for trinkets and bijoux; manufactories are closed; the railways, unable to complete their engagements for continuance of their lines, are taken in hand by the Government, whose resources between fête-giving, and labor payments, and equipment of Garde Mobile, are fast failing.

The projected plans of completing the Tuilleries, and extending the markets, loom over the heads of Exchequer men more and more gigantic. Railway shares are sadly down, and fluctuate hour by hour. The rich man of yesterday is poor to-day; and rich again to-morrow. The holders of houses are refusing payment of rents; and untenanted buildings can find neither lessees, nor buyers.

—A young man of easy fortune, in Paris world, has purchased, a week before the Revolution, at the date of his marriage, a Hotel, for which is to be paid the sum of 600,000 francs. Of this, one half remains secured upon the property. His creditor, straitened by the exigencies of the time, is compelled to foreclose the mortgage: the Hotel realizes, a week after the Revolution, 200,000 francs only, leaving the former rich possessor worse than bankrupt. Judge, if such worsted Bourgeois would fling up his cap for the Republic!

Wealthy families of St. Germain, finding their incomes reducing by a third, are curtailing expenses. Horses and carriages are sold at ruinous rates. Old diners at the Café de Paris now order humble meals of private restaurateurs. The Theatre, that sweetest of luxuries to a Parisian, is abjured. The employées of the Opera are deserting. Except upon free nights—another drain upon the failing treasury—the benches are never full.

* From an unpublished work, "The Battle Summer," now in Press.

Notwithstanding, Parisian Salons are not quiet nor dull. The new scenes, the approaching assembly, the clubs, the Briarian Journalism, the depth and interest of the questions at stake keep the public mind strung to its utmost tensivity. Nor in the discussion of such topics does society lose that happy grace and ease without which Paris society would be no longer itself. A certain indescribable bonhomie and careless freedom yet throw their charms over the most serious of Salon talk.

—Madame P— has disposed of her equipage; she has even changed her quarters from the premier to the entresol; but she wears the same old air of cheerfulness; she disposes such jewels as remain with double effect; she pities her friend who, from fear or economy, is obliged to quit Paris—la belle Ville—even in its worst estate.

You enter her little salon of an evening;—an elegant little salon—though scarce ten feet above the street:—she is half-reclining upon a luxurious brocade-covered chair;—her dress is disposed with the same artless care that always belongs to a French lady's toilette; her white hand, set off with a lace ruffle, and ornamented by a single brilliant, lies carelessly upon the richly carved arm of fauteuil. She receives you, half rising, with a cheerful smile;—beckons you by a wave of the hand to a seat, and resumes, with the most unaffected good-humor and flow of wit, her previous talk.

She stops—she remembers that you, as a stranger, would be glad to know on what topic the conversation is drifting in these troublous times. She runs over in an instant the salient points of the discussion; by a half dozen effective, short sentences, full of color, of verve, and action, she throws the whole burden into your hands, and puzzles you for an expression of opinion while you are only admiring her address.

A tall, thin-faced Colonel is of the company—a Royalist in feeling, but serving now in Republican army. He has been educated to respect old-fashioned politicians; he has no faith in Arago or Cremieux; he sneers at Lamartine, and berates unmercifully the cowardly, truckling measures of the Provisional Power.

Another is a young employée in an important bureau of state;—quick, penetrating, overflowing with humor, he defends with the good nature, and warm abandon of youth, a system which is waking all the youthful blood in France. He would accept the Republic even with all its possible excesses, rather than be the slave of that system which by force of bribery, and corruption, and the dogmas of feudal habit and tradition,—denied to all talent its prestige, and to youthful France, its best and dearest hopes.

—What—says he—will you weigh lost property, or damaged commerce, or a little night-fear, against this new nobleness of excitation—this God-like effort for something better, purer, higher—by which intellect shall be quickened, new faculties developed, new sympathies awakened, and every old nation of Europe suddenly started into consciousness of those active, and present faculties, with which heaven has blessed them,—not for sloth, and unrest, but the most extended, possible development?

—You see—says Madame—glancing round at her humble entresol, with what sympathy my friends console me. But allons, courage! You must not, my dear Colonel, bear so hardly on our poet Lamartine.

—Qu'il est bien, cet homme!—murmurs the young man.

—It is the worst to say of him—continues Madame,—that he is unused to power. But what better prestige than this for a people with whom power is new? You cannot surely doubt his humanity, nor his generosity, nor his devotion; and for philosophy, what is better than that which springs out of the hour (a true French sentiment) tempered by adversity, and lighted with poetic ardor?

The topic changes as easily as words flow from a French-woman's lips.

—And you have seen the play of Geo. Sand,—Le Roi attend; and Mademoiselle — is she not gracieuse? but ma foi, what audience! Poor Madame Dudevant! they say she is utterly disconsolate at Tours;—no wonder—so inspired by the change;—a Lelia, at last found a pure, and loving Stenio! But I forget, you have not been to the spectacle, since the unfortunate night of that terrible, chanting crowd,—quelle horreur!

—Yet how patiently, how earnestly they listened even to Corneille!

—And who would not, with such interpreter as Rachel?—noble in Elvira, but how like a ghost of the bloody past, in her white robe chanting that fearful Marseillaise!

—God save us—says an old lady in the corner—from those terrible Canaille!

— Thus much, to give an idea of the tone, and change of the salon talk.

Madame P— is a quick, Parisian lady,—of more years by a dozen than you would credit her—whose judgment lies in her fancy; she is a true philosopher—meaning only life philosophy—because her philosophy consoles, and forgets.

The Colonel is a stiff, austere reader of the Débats newspaper: he is of highest Bourgeois; his friends among the bankers, and old noblesse.

The young man is of some school of St. Cyr, with cleverness and life;—some accident may give him position that will make him great; or kill him on some June barricade.

The old lady is nurtured in the faith of the old regime,—perhaps was one of the suspects of Robespierre; with her, a Republic is a nightmare, and all people—Canaille.

LINES.

This morn through many a pleasing scene
In sun and shade my course I held,
A weight of grief upon my heart,
Which could not be dispelled.

In vain I sought to catch the joy
Which seemed to move in leaf and flower,
The breeze "came to me" from the fields,
But with no soothing power.

Birds filled the air with noisy songs,
The squirrel leaped from bough to bough,
There was no cloud in Heaven to throw
That shadow on my brow.

What secret influence was there,
To guide my thoughts, dear Babe, to thee,
And give relief I could not find
In Nature's kindly glee.

The stream that wandered by, might well
An emblem of thy life impart,
But even its music failed to stir,
The fancy in my heart.

That there are sweet similitudes
I know, betwixt the flowers and thee,
Yet, while a thousand flowers were near,
Not one occurred to me.

I only know, that unannounced
Thy image glanced across my mind,
And like a transient sunbeam passed,
But left no gloom behind.

AGLAUS.

THE POEMS OF SIR WILLIAM JONES.

I now understood what a Poet was, namely one who could sing what he saw and felt.—Hansen.

The library at Ringwood is so small, that the writer is obliged to depend a good deal on his neighbors for mental entertainment. On a rainy day a short time since, a fair daughter of Eve was kind enough to send him a morceau in the Poems of Sir William Jones. His taste was never very oriental, for he has always liked a prairie better than a jungle, and a stout oak better than a banyan tree. But having nothing else to read he was reduced to the necessity of looking over the volume, for Necessitas nullam habet legem.

It is conceded that Sir William was a remarkable man. He was born in London in 1746, and died in Bengal, India, in 1794. His life was short, and his attainments were various and extraordinary, but so well known, that an allusion to them is scarcely necessary. Our remarks will not extend to his Life of Nadir Shah—his Persian Grammar, or Dictionary—his Sacontala—or his translation of the ordinances of Menu. We leave these to be investigated by others who possess larger means for purchasing costly works. Our design is simply to make a few remarks on the Poems of this distinguished jurist.

These Poems are for the most part versions of Eastern originals; but the translator states that he has taken considerable liberties with the authors themselves. He has filled up the outline, introduced new characters, and enlarged the plan on which the pieces were at first written. They are mere careless effusions, such as any man whose pursuits are grave and profound might produce in moments of relaxation from severe study, and were to the author what her leaves were to the Cumæan Sybil, as described by Virgil in the third book of the Æneid,

*Nunquam deinde cavo volitantia prendere saxo
Nec revocare situs—aut jungeret carmina curat.*

The mind of Sir William Jones possessed a wonderful power of apprehending what others had discovered. He could follow on any path which pioneers had opened. His attainments were out of all proportion to his original mental power, and they resulted probably from his acquiring some one language profoundly—the rest being mastered almost without exertion and as a necessary consequence. We have ceased to wonder at this great orientalist, since Professor Lee of Cambridge has rivalled him—or since Dr. Carey, at Serampore, conquered twenty-seven dialects—and Ross, in Scotland, who was a mere youth when he died, could write seventeen tongues when he died. After all, the admirable Crichtons, we think, must doff their plumes before our Learned Blacksmith. An education in things is always more utilitarian than an education in words. We are not certain but that the acquirements of Sir William would have crushed the fine genius of Burns; nor could the swan of Avon have possibly borne their weight.

No friend of morals, however, can ever wantonly depreciate the Calcutta Judge, for he was a man of unblemished virtue. We cherish for his memory the warmest veneration. His designs were magnificent, and his ardor in oriental studies was worthy of all praise. He was not the first, however, who gave an Eastern direction to the human mind. Camoens, Tasso and Milton had preceded him in time; but their researches into Eastern objects were more poetical than learned. We do not suppose that Oliver Goldy was acquainted with Chinese when he wrote like a mandarin—or that Tom Moore was versed in the dialect of Cashmir when he wrote his Lalla Rookh. There is something in that East, which powerfully affects the imagination. Its very gorgeousness strikes the fancy. Its formal gardens—its tanks—its stuccoed cottages—its citron groves—its rare spices and rich perfumes—its cypress trees tasselled with blossoms wound about them—its scenes of indolent repose—its sequestered woods—its stupendous rivers and its barbaric gold, are not lost on persons of sensitive temperament. Among such objects Sir William spent ten years of his valuable life, dispensing British law among the Hindoos, founding learned societies, and occasionally paying homage to the Muses. Those pieces are the fruits of that reverential homage.

So late as 1772, pastoral poetry had not died out in England. Sir Philip Sidney had defended it, and Spenser, Pope and Gay had given specimens in this kind of composition. Sir William published his Arcadia before he left England for Calcutta, and he had before him pastorals written in Greek, Latin, Italian and Spanish. This poem is founded on a brief allegory by Addison, which appeared in the thirty-second number of the Guardian. At least its imitator has turned it into an allegory, and, in our judgment, the turning has not at all improved it. Addison's plot was that Menalcaas, a sort of king in Arcadia, and father of a very pretty daughter, whose name was Amaryllis, had received a pipe from Oberon on condition that no one was to obtain his daughter in marriage unless he could play the same tune on the pipe with which Menalcaas had been amused by the fairy. On a given day Menalcaas sat on a green hillock with Amaryllis by his side, when a band of youths appeared in various costumes to contend. This was a sensible plot, for any poet would be apt to compete for such a handsome woman. Thus in his Queen's Wake, the Ettrick Shepherd brings down all the Highland minstrels to Edinburgh, to please Mary Queen of Scots, upon making her entry into her Scottish capital. But when the pipe was won, the miniature story ought to have stopped, and the oaten reed should not have passed through a succession of pastoral poets; for mankind have long been tired of shepherds' songs. The complex passions must now be reached by tones more powerful than any brought out by Gessner's shell, or even that of Theocritus. Both Addison and Sir William ought to have known that the world had heard enough of Tityrus, Daphnis, and flocks and lutes.

The poem called "Seven Fountains" is in truth a beautiful allegory. It is drawn in part from the Persian poet Nezami, but Sir William states that he has taken unusual liberties with the original writer. It is a piece which ought to be not only read, but pondered by every youth in America—we should say in the world, were it not that our recommendation will not be apt to extend so far. This allegory has the usual accompaniments of all Eastern poetry—such as pearls, diamonds, gems, rubies, lilies, roses and a hundred other things; but the essence of the allegory is in its profound moral. We would analyse it, but we fear that the analysis might keep some one of our readers from procuring and reading it as it deserves to be read. It will touch the heart of any ingenuous youth and inspire him with disgust at that happiness which results from sensual pursuits, in contradistinction to that which flows from virtue.

Solima, written in 1768, has a moral quite obvious. It celebrates an Eastern princess who erected a caravansera for the entertainment of pilgrims. The moral is the same precisely as Pope inculcated in his Man of Ross, where he extols the benevolence of an old bachelor who lived on the Wye. Solima is a piece simply pleasing, and the next to it in order is Laura, an Elogy, translated from the two hundred and seventieth sonnet of Petrarch. For twenty-one years did Petrarch spin out verses about that Laura from the loom of his Cashmir imagination. We wonder he did not tire of his theme. It was a poor compliment to the female sex, that he could find no other woman near Avignon as winsome as Laura. The whole of this affair shews in Petrarch a mental weakness that is truly astonishing, and we are surprised that Lord Byron, instead of praising this passion, did not apply to it the whip of satire.

The rest of this volume consists of translations of Hafiz, Ferdusi and Mesih, as well as other Persian and Turkish poets. The most of them are addressed to Hindoo gods and goddesses. They are excessively tedious. There is a good deal of splendor in the imagery employed: but from its sameness it cloyes on the taste. We regret that Sir William did not keep more on English ground, for he has given us one or two sonnets, the scene of which is laid at Cardigan in Wales, and they are interesting; but the mind of their author had been so long in an Oriental mould, that even in them Eastern imagery has the preponderance. He believed in the identity to a great extent of English and Hindoo objects; but the same objects are affected by climate, association, and religion. If our author had kept to Albion he would have been a more powerful poet. The woods of India may be more sparkling than those of England—its fruits may be more succulent—its rivers may be cast on a bolder scale; but there is something in English life that makes its way to the heart. No man can acquire much reputation as a mere translator. Pope's Homer has fallen into neglect. The same is true of Dryden's Virgil, though done with elegance; and Cowper's Odyssey, though he was true to the Greek costume. To gain reputation it is necessary that the translator should make a new work, and this is manifestly unjust to the original writer. In Wiffen's Tasso there is quite as much of Wiffen as of the Italian poet.

We deeply regret that Sir William Jones never carried out his design of writing an epic of which Britain was to be subject. He meditated such a design in the twenty-third year of his age, and the outline of his plan is contained in the volume we are examining. The world has seen but four or five Epics, and their Authors by universal consent, occupy the top of Parnassus. It must remain an undecided point, whether Sir William would have succeeded in this mental enterprise. The possibility is, that after establishing British law in India, that he anticipated retiring on a pension, and devoting the evening of his life to his epic, among the green woods of England, or the mountains of Wales. Accordingly to his outline, a Tyrian Prince, was to discover Britain some ages before the Christian era, and to pass, of course, among islands that lay between Tyre and Britain, and one can easily see what profound interest might have been awakened by the mind's being carried back to those dim ages and shadowy objects. We cannot see why the adventures of the Tyrian Prince might not have been as well wrought up as those of Ulysses, Æneas, Godfrey or Vasco de Gama.

The volume concludes with a pleasing Essay on the Poetry of the Eastern Nations. This subject has excited considerable interest in England, and has been fully treated by Bishop Lowth, in a series of Lectures delivered at the University of Oxford. The object of the Bishop, however, is limited to the Poetry of the Sacred Writings, whilst that of Sir William extends to all sorts of Arabian, Persian and Hindoo bards. This distinguished orientalist believes that Arabia, the Happy, which lies between the eleventh and fifteenth degrees of North Latitude, to be the true field of Pastoral Poetry. He prefers it to the celebrated vale of Cashmir in the North of Hindostan. Its serene skies—the simple manners which prevail among its tribes—their independence and love of liberty—its gardens—its caravans and merchandise—its spice trees—its odors—its nightingales—its camels—its tents, entitle it to this distinction. The same is true, to a great extent, of Persia and India, but it is probable that English associations will in all time to come, affect the Muses of the Ganges and the Burrampooter. Their imagery may be less glaring, and their sobriety may be promoted by the mixture which will take place of the English language with the Eastern dialects. The East India Company obtained a footing in India, in achieving which many questionable deeds were enacted, and at one time Lord Clive and Warren Hastings, were regarded with horror. But the British power has destroyed some of the most repulsive customs which prevailed among the Hindoos. Many distinguished men have labored among the semi-barbarians of the British possessions, among whom Lord Wellington, Lord Teignmouth, Sir James McIntosh, Dr. Carey, Sir Stamford Raffles, Leyden and many others might be mentioned. The accomplished Bishop Heber found there a grave. That country has enriched England, and England may be of service to her slaves, but we hope that an emancipation may take place at no distant day, and that the course of human events may roll on a national freedom for all the colonial islands of England, and especially for any territory she may have acquired by unjust conquest.

Ringwood, Virginia.

SONG.

Translated from the German of Friedrich Matthisson.

I think of thee
When the nightingale's song,
Thro' the murmuring trees,
Is borne on the breath
Of the soft summer breeze—
When dost thou think of me?

I think of thee
In the twilight's dim shade
By the green fountain's side—
As I gaze on the star-beams
That dance in its tide—
Where dost thou think of me?

I think of thee
With a wild thrill of bliss—
Thro' the depth of my heart—
And tears that seem sweeter
Than smiles, as they start—
How dost thou think of me?

Oh! think of me—
Till our souls having winged
Their bright passage afar—
Shall mingle once more
In a holier star—
While on earth, tho' a wand'rer,
By land and by sea—
Ever—I'll think of thee.

P. H. H.

[Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1849, by John R. Thompson, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia.]

THE CHEVALIER MERLIN.

CHAPTER SIXTEENTH.

" 'Twas after dread Pultowa's day,
When fortune left the royal Swede,
Around a slaughtered army lay,
No more to combat and to bleed.
The power and glory of the war,
Faithless as their vain votaries, men,
Had passed to the triumphant Czar,
And Moscow's walls were safe again,
Until a day more dark and drear,
And a more memorable year,
Should give to slaughter and to shame
A mightier host and haughtier name."

Byron.

We left King Charles under an oak on the evening of the day of Pultowa. Noises of the evening penetrated to the desolate bivouac as the night, illumined by a July moon, deepened. The Caknucks of the Czar and the banditti of Moldavia were traversing the plains, unwearied from a battle in which they had taken scarcely more part than vultures take in the slaughter which spreads a bloody feast for them. The forest hid, with its wilderness of summer leaves, the little band of fugitives. The enemy came and went on the plain without making an effort to penetrate the concealing shadows.

Mazeppa, more wakeful than his companions, spent a great part of the night in meditation upon his ruined fortunes and in listening to the various sounds which broke upon the stillness of the sombre solitude. An owl, with a cry like the wail of a woman, wandered from one part of the dusky woodland to another. The wakeful old man once saw the melancholy bird, beating its wings amongst the burnished leaves at the summit of a majestic chesnut tree which out-towered its comrades into the yellow light. Wolves were howling, and three or four of them, each animal squatting on his haunches with head erect, were visible in a little glade which, wet with dew and silvered by the moon, looked like a winding stream with a white and glistening surface. The noises of the hostile lancers were not sounds of so beding or dispiriting a character as these night-cries of the tenants of the wilderness. But at last a morning bird—a feldfare or some other sweet singer—flew to a tree-top and began a flourish of jubilant music. Then the Hetman knew that grey streaks were in the east, although invisible to him. He rose from the ground and, shaking himself like a dog roused from his kennel, went to the king's side. Charles was in that disturbed sleep which does not refresh the sleeper. The beams of the paling moon fell upon his face, making it appear ghastly; at times a low moan issued from his motionless lips. Then Mazeppa made a circuit of the sleeping band. The sentinels were asleep with the rest. The horses, accustomed by this time to the howling of the wolves, grazed and browsed, grinding the succulent food with lazy jaws, but stopping even that languid labour to stare at the moving figure of the Hetman. The enemy were no longer heard. With a shrill whistle the old man changed in a moment the whole scene. The sleepers were staggering to their feet. The forest became alive with their moving forms.

The fugitives were in a short time ready to continue their flight. King Charles, more ill than ever, was once more lifted to the saddle. Poniatowski took post on his right hand, Merlin on his left. Mazeppa assumed the lead, and the band left the wood, directing its course toward the mouth of the Vorska. The open country was gained before the broad light of day had wholly driven the shadows from it. The hillocks were spotted with black on their western sides. The moon and planets were still visible, as white as plates of silver in the sky now swiftly changing its colours. Between the unhappy men and the glimmering planets, the air was alive with rustling wings and harsh croakings. Vultures were passing in black streams. They were going to Pultowa.

North of west, four leagues distant, were the hills in the angle of the rivers. To these hills the fugitives pricked rapidly on. By an hour's travel the top of one of them was gained, and a scene which for a moment inspired hope burst on the view of the band. The colours of Sweden were flying in and around a village—the little town of Perwolocna—and a substantial remnant of the Swedish force was visible, ranked and in array for action. The foe, whom they were prepared to receive, was also visible, but only at points widely separated by the concealing hills which rose, round and isolated, like tents of some Titan army. Trumpets were sounding lustily from the advancing battalions of the victorious enemy; no instrument of martial music replied from the Swedish ranks. Instead, a hymn went up from them—a hymn stern and solemn.

Merlin said to one near him: "The hymn sounds like that grand but melancholy music which we have heard on our northern coasts when the sea beats roughly upon them."

"Yea," answered the stout soldier, seizing upon the thought of home—"the music of our northern seas is pleasant to hear. Our wives and our little children are listening to it. Sir, we will never hear it again."

The band of the king presently descended at full gallop from the top of the hill to unite with their comrades. It was Lewenhaupt who held the village of Perwolocna. He had maintained a small unbroken force in the reverses of Pultowa, had fallen back on the baggage, where his force became a nucleus for fugitives, and swelled soon to ten thousand men. He had retreated, fighting for many leagues of the way, to the Boristhenes, on the banks of which he now stood, doubting between surrender and a battle of despair.

When the Swedes saw their king whom they supposed to be dead, they expressed their joy in gallant shouts. But the fury of joy was short-lived. Charles was nearly insensible. Instead of a hero, exalted in his proud courage by disaster, and ready to lead his desperate host in the final struggle of brave hearts, the Swedes saw but a sick man whose visage betrayed scarcely a consciousness of the presence of those about him. The hopes, excited by his coming, fell therefore as suddenly as they sprang up. But the love and care of his veterans did not give way for a moment to selfish distresses. A boat was found, and Charles and two or three of his attendants were placed in it with an old calash, procured in the village, a small stock of provisions, and several boxes of treasure which Lewenhaupt had rescued from the baggage. Poniatowski plunged on horseback into the deep and rapid stream. Others followed, Merlin and Caputech amongst them. Mazeppa passed in the boat with the king. The crazy barque, yielding to the current and struck by a sudden wind, was near foundering. The Hetman threw over board the greater part of the treasure. The opposite bank was at length gained. Many horsemen were lost in this passage of the Boristhenes; and for a time the air was filled with the cries of drowning steeds. All who attempted the passage on foot perished. When the survivors had won their way across, they gathered about the king, numbering now, by additions from the force of Lewenhaupt, a thousand men. Charles was placed in the calash—Count Horn, one of his generals, fainting from wounds, shared it with him—and the thousand Swedes, lashing their horses, continued to fly into the desert.

Lewenhaupt, with an army suffering for want of food, destitute of powder, deserted by its king, surrounded by Prince Menzikoff, the pastry-cook. There were incidents of this surrender worthy of being remembered. A Swedish colonel* observing the Muscovites approach, advanced with a single battalion to meet them, preferring an honorable death to the disgrace of a surrender.

* Colonel Troutefette.

Lewenhaupt over-ruled this despairing self-sacrifice. Two captains of the same brave regiment stood side by side on the edge of the Boristhenes and shot each other through the head.

With the surrender of Lewenhaupt the magnificent host with which Charles had passed the Russian borders, no longer existed in any available remnant—save the thousand horsemen who fled toward the Turkish frontier, and some scattered parties which the lancers of the Czar were pursuing in other directions—some toward the Desna others toward the Don—all were dead or slaves. So conclusive had proved the disastrous battle of Pultowa.

Peter the Great upon finding the work thus accomplished, wrote the following cheerful words of self-approbation and laudation in his diary. "Thus hath an incomparable great victory been achieved by the prudent and gallant conduct of his majesty, the Czar, who hath been approved a true and great captain."

As the conqueror wrote, his defeated rival was craving a little water to moisten his parched lips. Let us rejoin the flying king in the desert.

The sinking sun was nearing the horizon, which was but the flat line of an immeasurable plain. The feeble grasses of this plain were parched away by the summer heat until the sands of an Arabian waste could wear no more desolate aspect. The descending orb filled the west like a conflagration. Its hot splendours streamed over the vast reach of sands with a white and tremulous glare. The vision of an eagle must have failed before a lustre so intense. A breeze had sprung up with the decline of the sun, but, instead of refreshing, it filled the air with a fiery dust which nearly stifled man and horse. A journey of twenty leagues, without a drop of water, over a sandy desert, under a raging sun-heat, had been accomplished by King Charles and his party since leaving the Boristhenes. Now water only could save life—water of which on the vast levels not a trace could be seen.

"Better would it have been had we died like brave men on the field of battle," said Merlin who had placed himself at Mazeppa's side. "My vitals are burning. These blasts of wind are like the breath of hell."

"Your northern natures," the Hetman answered, "are easily overcome by these trials. A hardy man should be able to endure thirst in the mouth of a furnace for one day. But truly water must be found or the horses will die, and then we shall be eagles without wings."

Caputech was engaged, as Mazeppa spoke, in controlling some freaks of his little Tartar. The restless struggle of the horse made a rare clatter of the various goods which the boy had heaped on his back, and the noise drew the attention of the Hetman. After watching the conduct of the horse for a minute the old man said :

"The courser looks out over the sands, and whinnies, and spreads his nostrils. The robbers of Budziac are familiar with this region, and Osbeck has often traversed it. The horse perhaps remembers some spring of water. Give him a free rein, child."

Caputsch did this, and the Tartar horse at once wheeled and set off at a brisk pace in a direction materially divergent from the course of the band. Mazepa dispatched several Cossacks to follow the boy. These seekers of water disappeared in the distance. They were absent so long that the eyes which were strained to see them return began to be hindered by the dusky twilight. But then with a joyous halloo the little party came back at full speed to rejoin the main body. Water had been found. The horse of Caputsch had gone straight to it. It was abundant. A number of desert springs bubbling up through the sands made the head of what, in a different soil, would have been a considerable brook. As it was the soil soon arrested the flow, leaving instead of a continuous stream only a long narrow lagoon, edged broadly with coarse grasses and shrubs, and spotted over its surface with the white flowers of the water-lily.

The night was passed near this pool. Its grasses and shrubs vanished before the devouring horses. Bread for the men had been procured at Perwolocna. Refreshed by food and water, the remnant of the great army slept on the desolate plain—its prostrate forms as motionless as the overthrown columns of some old lost city whose site the desert winds have nearly buried. Day broke. New hearts beat in the bosoms of the brave Swedes. The blue eye of their king had regained its clear courage.

For five days this ride was continued over burning sands and under brassy skies, and then King Charles, sufficiently restored to be able to direct his band, reached the banks of the Bogh—the ancient Hypanis. The Calmucks had been dogging his steps for the last three days. They were swarming in his rear at a safe distance as he reached the river opposite to Oczakow, a Turkish frontier town. The inhabitants of Oczakow refused to furnish boats to the wanderers, whose dress and language were strange to them, until their governor issued the order. The wise Waywode debated the question with Turkish sobriety, and finally waived a decision, submitting the question to his superior, the Seraskier of the province, who resided at Bender in Besarabia. King Charles was in no case to await the decision. His enemies came on with a fury quickened by the prospect of quite losing the pleasures of massacre and plunder. He sent a few swimmers, with swords between their teeth, to the Turkish bank to seize boats. This measure was successful. The Swedish force began, by small parties, to cross the river. Other boats were seized, and the transportation went on more speedily. As it advanced, the Calmucks, gathering courage, and concentrating their force, made many dashes upon the lingering fugitives, whose numbers were fast reduced, as boat after boat received its load, and was pushed off for the farther bank. These onsets became presently a steady battle, waged with fury by the Tartars and met with the faltering resistance of men who fight in the act of flight. Merlin remained with the rear, engaged in a contest which, every moment, became more critical. He had despatched Caputsch in one of the boats. The rear had become the post of strong men. The Calmuck numbers seemed to grow. Their audacity increased. They were soon interspersed, on foot, with the Swedish horseman, clogging the necks and very limbs of the steeds with their sinewy arms.

The Norwegian giant, panting from the slaughter, his sweeping sword pouring its blood over his gauntlet, his dress discoloured and rent, plunged his way to the water-side. His comrades were pressing in confusion into the boats, their crowds hemmed in, driven, and penetrated by the enemy whose knives were ripping out the bowels of the war-horses, and severing the wrists of the oarsmen.

On the Turkish bank, those who had escaped were gathered, looking back to watch the fate of their comrades, and shouting counsel or hope to them. King Charles did not witness the scene. He had in fact entered Oczakow, giving no heed to the despised foe whom he deemed hardly bold enough to come into close contact with his iron Swedes.

As Merlin plunged his way to the water-side, he felt the slim Tartar arms binding him like cords. Galba struggled like a lion when the nets of the Nubian hunters begin to master him. His yorcking heels were clogged with the clinging foe; the reins, which sword-stroke after sword-stroke had freed, were again clutched by numberless hands. The gallant horse, rearing, dragged up the enemies at his head; then he reeled, and fell on one side. As he went down the Tartars swarmed over him and his giant rider. With a furious struggle the good horse rose, but riderless. He shook off the crowd whose clutches were now directed to his master, and then, with a snort and a magnificent dash onward, took to the water at a long bound. As he clove the surface of the Bogh, a wild wail came from the Turkish shore. It issued from the lips of Caputsch, who stood ringing his hands as the war-horse swam the river.

Of the thousand men who had escaped as far as the Bogh, five hundred were either slain or made prisoners by the Calmucks. Soon after this disastrous conclusion had been witnessed from the town, an answer to the message of the governor of Oczakow came from the Seraskier at Bender. The hospitable Seraskier commanded honours and protection to be extended to the great guest of the Sultan, the most renowned of infidels, the wandering Lion of the North. Then the tardy governor, with tears in his eyes, besought pardon for a delay which had proved fatal to so large a part of the king's band; and Charles, coupling the condescension with a reprimand as haughty as he would have used to one of his own subjects, granted it.

The Seraskier sent an Aga to compliment the royal guest, and proffer to him a magnificent tent, provisions, baggage wagons, officers and attendants, and a reception at Bender befitting his grandeur and renown. Then to Bender King Charles passed on.

Just before the renewed march was begun, Caputsch came to Grothusen who had with the rest escaped from Pultowa. To Grothusen Caputsch entrusted the mails containing the valuable goods of the dead or captive Norwegian, amongst the rest that girdle of the Countess of Konigsmark. Galba was placed in the stud of the king which the generosity of the Turks had reestablished by a gift of sumptuously caparisoned Arabians. Having thus stripped himself for hardy adventure, the faithful boy left the Swedes as they were in the bustle of departure from Oczakow. He was seen to recross the river in a boat, and then to gallop away on his swift little courser.

CHAPTER SEVENTEENTH.

"In this dismal battell where so many did what men could doe, and when they could doe no more, left there their bodies in testimonie of their mindes; Smith, among slaughtered dead bodies, and many gasping souls, lay groaning with toile and wounds, till being found by the Pillagers alive, and the richness of his armor and habit perceived, it was accounted that his ransom might be better to them than his death, and he was led away prisoner with many others. In Axopolis they were all sold for slaves like beasts in a market-place."—Captaine John Smith.

The King of Sweden, conducted with all honour, passed on, through the region once called the Wilderness of Gâtæ, to Bender. Coming to that town, instead of entering it, he chose to encamp in its environs. The Seraskier, Jussuf Pacha, caused a magnificent pavilion to be erected for him, and tents were likewise provided for his retinue.

Thus began that extraordinary residence of Charles the Twelfth in the dominions of the Grand Seignior, which continued for so long a time, and which filled Europe with comment and wonder.

This book would never come to an end, if I undertook to chronicle the daily life of the expatriated Swedes, and their companions of different countries, condemned by the obstinate caprice of Charles to remain at Bender. Indeed years were passed in nothing more interesting than quiet intrigues, having for their end the implication of the Sultan in the projects, stubbornly cherished, of retribution against the Czar. Moreover, the Chevalier Merlin, passages in whose life it is my business to recount, fell as we have seen into the hands of the Calmucks, and for two years nothing was heard of him at Bender. Let us pass at once then to the month of June, 1711, contenting ourselves with such a review of the outlines of the two lost years as we shall find the Chevalier Merlin, when we rejoin him, extracting from one who had shared the society and joined in the schemes of the vanquished monarch.

On the first of June, of the year to which we pass on, a French gentleman, the Count of Villonque, who inflamed with admiration of the King of Sweden, had left Picardy and gone to Besarabia to enlist in his service, and who now was engaged in the intrigues at Constantinople, stood under one of the outer arcades of a bezeitein, or bazaar of that sea-pierced city. The Count Villonque was a tall person of slight figure. The pinched length of his aquiline nose, his thin cheeks, a certain querulous melancholy in his eyes, gave one to understand that his life had been a struggle between want and the sensitive pride of a poor gentleman. This inference was just now repelled by a costly and splendidly embroidered cloak, which, in spite of the summer weather, he wore drawn closely about him. To be sure when once a puff of wind trifled with the skirts of the splendid cloak, an under dress by no means so fine or so well preserved, might have been seen for a moment; but there were no eyes on the watch. The wise-browed Turks, in the neighbouring stalls, sitting with legs crossed under them, were not inquisitive spectators.

The scene upon which the Frenchman looked was one well worth lingering upon. The bazaar, a square building crowned with many hundred low domes, and internally a labyrinth of arcades, occupied an elevated situation near the summit of one of the city's seven hills; and from its eastern front, where the Frank stood, the eye mastered a broad and fair view. Walled palaces and villas, with hanging flower gardens and dark green cypress groves covered the Asiatic hills beyond the Bosphorus. The tiled tops of the low houses near the bazaar did not hinder the vision in taking in this scene; but it was masked and pierced by many domes and minarets of which thousands towered up from the slopes of the beautiful city. The town of Galata, lying low on the water-side beyond the harbour—the famous Golden Horn which gorges the European side of the strait separating the European suburb Galata from the mother city—was nearly concealed by the far spreading towers of the Seraglio; but the Christian town, Pera, with its brown and dusky buildings, lay more fully in view on the swelling ground behind and above Galata. There were spaces of the bright surface of the Golden Horn likewise visible; the shadows of towers, domes and minarets were beginning to reach far over them, for the setting sun that flashed on the sea of Marmora and gilded the Castle of the Seven Towers, was fast withdrawing his light from the eastern harbour. Over such shadow-traversed spaces of visible water, gilded boats passing with the light speed of the gondola appeared, and the heavier galliots came and went, flanked with silvery showers from the sweep of their long oars. Sails dotted the stretch of the Bosphorus, visible like a Rhine, peaceful between wooded-hills, far away toward the Euxine, and some were seen, by glimpses, sweeping around the point of Galata, to be presently lost under the walls of the Seraglio. Through the luminous atmosphere which hung over the famous city, over the blue waters, over the hills covered with palaces, hanging gardens, and green groves, troops of the Jacobine, that beautiful tufted pigeon, were careering, now darting off to Asia to circle above the town of caravans and cemeteries, Scutari, now coming back on swift wings to Europe. A breeze from the Euxine fluttered the leafy crowns of the hills, disturbed at moments the ranks of the beautiful birds, and made white ripples on the surface of the Bosphorus. As Monsieur Villonque stood in contemplation of this scene, which gained beauty as the day waned, a boy strangely habited in a mixed costume appeared near at hand. The movements of the grotesquely clad little figure interrupted the repose of the grave Turks of the bezestein. The turbaned stall-holders—armourers, grocers, pipe-makers, jewellers, shawl merchants, librarians,—greeted its approach, and a certain nosing and timid quest which it made amongst them, pretty much as a parcel of sober old poultry might salute a weasel stealing under their perch. The sharp monosyllables and disturbed looks of the Turks seemed to repel the boy. But in the next moment he fastened his keen eyes upon the Frank. His stare, no doubt, filled him with satisfaction, for he approached Monsieur Villonque nimbly, and seizing one of the hands that guarded the folds of the cloak, burst into a jargon of languages, Swedish, French and German. The Frenchman endeavored to calm the loquacious little stranger, and demanded what he wanted.

“Oh thanks to the Good God!” cried the boy with scarcely more composure, “Monsieur is a Christian gentleman—Monsieur will be a blessed sight to the eyes of my unfortunate master—not unfortunate, however, as I have now found Monsieur. It is the noble cavalier—the greatest man of them all—that has lived to get back again, and is now there on deck. Do you see the cavalier? Come this way three steps. You observe him there through the opening, walking up and down like a ghost. I think you cannot see him after all; it is so far, and two or three rows of houses are in the way, but he is there. Well, Monsieur, the infernal dog of a captain demands that my master will pay him; the sum is thirty crowns; for bringing us a great distance. We proposed that he should rely upon our honour for payment of the crowns when we could get them, but the Galliongi went on smoking and said nothing. It is impossible to argue with men who say nothing. At last it was arranged that I should come on shore and get the crowns. Thank God, I have found them; Monsieur.”

“Who is your master, boy, that I should pay thirty crowns for him?” said Villonque.

“He belongs,” answered the lad, “to the family of the unfortunate. Is that not enough to say to a Christian gentleman? But, Monsieur, it is the Chevalier Merlin, one of the brave soldiers of the Hero of the North—the Chevalier Merlin—that is to say Major Merlin Brand, who fought at Pultowa, and traversed the desert, and was dragged from his horse on the banks of the Bogh, before that melancholy town, Oczakow, and carried off by the Tartars. I am Caputsch his servant—but that is nothing. If you are not a wolf, Monsieur, but have a Christian generosity, pay the thirty crowns.”

Tightening his cloak about him with a jealous care, the Frenchman set off at once for the Golden Horn, Caputsch leading the way at a brisk trot.

In an hour's time our lost friend, the Chevalier Merlin, stood once more on firm land, redeemed from the hands of Tartar and Turk. He was a rude enough figure as he drew up to the full of his extraordinary height, and planted his footing unsteadied by a long voyage on the Euxine. His dragoon boots were substituted by rough buskins of goat-skin. A surcoat of buff entirely robbed of its embroidery did not hide the condition of the garments beneath it, to which the concealed under apparel of Monsieur Villonque must in comparison have been splendour itself. Instead of the round hat of the Turks, or the casque of the cuirassier, the curls of his auburn hair, now streaming shaggy and wild to his shoulders, were crowned with a yellow Tartar cap. Still at his side, contrasting with the poverty and enhancing the singularity of his apparel, was the good sword, the gift of Augustus of Saxony, with the jewelled hilt, and sheath inlaid with flowers of gold and silver.

The returned captive was presently conducted by Villonque to the house of Fonseca, a Portuguese Jew, physician of the Seraglio, who had long been employed in the intrigues of the king of Sweden at the court of the Sultan. Funds of the king were devoted to his use; six christian tailors, in Pera, were put to the labour of producing by the next morning a suit to substitute for the rags of his captivity. Meantime the Frenchman and Norwegian spent the earliest hours of the night in conversation. Merlin was in the humour rather to gain information upon public affairs than to tell the story of his personal adventures. The courteous Frenchman soon made this discovery.

"Sir," he said in the opening of their dialogue, "your name and worth are not new to me, although we meet to-day for the first time. You have not been wholly forgotten by your friends at Bender. From what point, monsieur, have you now come?"

"From beyond Astrachan—from the region north of the Caspian."

"Astrachan!" mused the Frenchman innocently. "That city lies at a prodigious distance. What took you so far as Astrachan?"

Merlin answered in the style of Johnson the Englishman to Don Juan, in the slave market:—

"Twelve Tartars and a drag chain." He then added: "But, count, I am burning to have many questions concerning affairs of a broader interest answered."

Villonque at once yielded his curiosity, and expressed his readiness to be questioned.

"Tell me then, monsieur," said Merlin, "what chanced immediately after the fatal skirmish on the banks of the Bogh?"

"The King of Sweden went to Bender," Villonque replied. "As you know, he is still there."

"Yes: I knew so much. Is it as a constrained fugitive, or as an honoured guest that he resides in the dominion of the Turk?"

Villonque smiled as he answered:

"Mehemet Pacha of Bender, gave his majesty a noble welcome; the Grand Seignior, after a generous custom of the Turks, supplied provisions and daily purses to him. This generosity has been continued. The position of his majesty is therefore that of a welcome guest; but nevertheless the Turk would give a province to be rid of us, and but for the magnificent honour of this unbelieving people, we should long ago have been chased over their borders."

Merlin then asked that question which the world was asking: "Why has the King of Sweden remained so long in the Turkish dominions?" He added: "A leader of free companions might in such a time—all enterprise hindered to him—sigh for his native land. It is amazing that a great monarch should leave his throne empty and consent to spend years in strange lands without the least opening for high action."

Villonque moved his shoulders with the Gallic shrug as he replied:

"King Charles has remained at Bender to embroil the Sultan with the Czar. If that is not a good reason it is yet the best. And possibly, monsieur, two circumstances give proof that his course has not been altogether unwise. In the first place his majesty's enemies have been greatly alarmed by it, and much desire his return to Sweden. The Czar furiously desires it; and all Germany promises peals of bells and illuminated towns to celebrate his passage. Courses which our enemies wish us to change cannot be altogether unwise. Then, in the second place, his majesty's great purpose, that for which he has lived this strange exile life, seems to be on the point of successful accomplishment. The vizier, Mehemet Batagli, as you have already learned since your landing, is in motion with three hundred thousand men, to make war upon the Czar. In a few days we will witness the muster of this splendid host on the plain of Adrianople."

"Inform me, monsieur, concerning his majesty's affairs in the north."

"When the news of Pultowa reached Saxony, the Elector, Frederick Augustus, entered Poland avowing before God and man, what was doubtless the truth, that his former relinquishment of the throne of that country had been an enforced act and his oaths of surrender extorted. His casuists cleared his conscience upon those grounds, and he expelled King Stanislaus, and regained his crown. He continues to wear it. Denmark violated her treaties as promptly, and made a descent upon Sweden; but the Regency resisted that hostile movement with gallant energy. The battle of Helsingborgh was a rout and a slaughter to the Danes. Denmark has been passively hostile since then. The Czar has been more successful. He has clutched all Finland and Livonia."

"And can King Charles, remaining where he is, expect no assistance from Sweden?"

"A year ago, some messengers from Stockholm appeared at Bender. They informed his majesty that the peasants of Dalecarlia, upon hearing that their king was a prisoner amongst the Turks, had made a formal offer, to the Regency, to go at their own expense, to the number of twenty thousand men, to rescue him. The king received the news with emotion, but bade his faithful subjects remain at home. He seems to be under the influence of a proud reluctance to show himself to his subjects as a vanquished prince, needing aid from them."

"And how has his majesty passed the days of these inactive years? One whose life was once illustrious with victories must have found such repose irksome and most wearisome."

"It has not seemed to be so. At first there was the employment of building a town. Quite a town has grown up near Bender. When the work was finished, his majesty, quite recovered at length from that wound in the heel, which troubled him for so long a time, found employment in exercising his little army, and often tired three horses a day in this energetic amusement. Chess at other times gave him occupation. Also, my countryman, the Baron Fabricius, has induced him to read many noble books in that language which he refuses to speak; and it is possible to forget cares and weariness, even where they add weight to a crown, in the tragedies of Pierre Corneille and Racine. Finally, monsieur, there have been the negotiations with viziers, the overthrowing of viziers, the excitements of procuring money and squandering it, the labours of flattery and bribery. Where so many were to be dealt with—Mufti, Reis Effendi, Keoga Bey, Tefterdar, Ullma, and even the Eunuchs of the Seraglio—we could not be idle. I assure you these intrigues were exciting. His majesty felt them to be so, although personally aloof, and operating by his agents. That gentleman of true skill and a wide reach of intellect, Monsieur Poniatowski, has maintained the chief conduct of these affairs. I have aided him with an humble ability, which his majesty has been gracious enough to commend."

"You speak, sir, of the difficulty of procuring money. It is not possible that his majesty, the most renowned monarch on earth, is pinched by so base a want."

Villonque pointed to his dress, which the removal of his cloak now left exposed. It was thread-bare.

"The King of Sweden," he answered, "is of too imperial a nature to be in the least degree provident. We have procured money from France, and from every Jew lender in Stamboul. We are in better credit at present, but three months ago we were glad to procure ten sequins upon the promise to pay a hundred hereafter. The daily purse of five hundred crowns, which the Turks give his majesty, has saved us from bankruptcy. Grothusen is a treasurer of magnificent imagination. He squanders even more superbly than his royal master. I happened to be present on one occasion when Grothusen brought to his majesty an account, in three lines, of sixty thousand crowns expended. 'Ten thousand crowns'—so the account ran—'given to the Swedes and Janissaries by the generous orders of his majesty, and the rest spent by myself.' The king said, when he read it—'It is thus I would have my friends give in their accounts. Mullern would make me read whole pages for the sum of ten thousand livres. I like the laconic style of Grothusen better.' So you may understand, Monsieur, how it is that we are poor, and that my suit is thread-bare."

"But his majesty's followers should scarcely be in want, since, as you say, the sums squandered are in part, lavished in generous gifts to them."

"We receive in the first instance, but then the Janissaries at Bender, and the itching palms of our friends here, eventually get all. Grothusen borrows back his gifts to us that he may not want presents and bribes for them. Moreover, Monsieur, on several occasions of excessive necessity, the treasurer has condescended to borrow even our trifling articles of jewelry, to be sold to the Jews. And this reminds me of an incident, which by impressing your name on my memory, enabled me, to day, to recal you all the more readily when the little sprite, your servant, spoke to me of your captivity and return."

"What was the incident, Monsieur Villonque?"

"Amongst your goods, which your servant was said to have left in the hands of Grothusen, was a valuable girdle set with brilliants."

"Yes: there was such a girdle."

"Well: the girdle went with the rest to the Jews. A thousand rix-dollars which also belonged to you, Grothusen used. His majesty directed that you should be repaid fully if you were ever again found. I sold the girdle to a damnable extortioner for ten thousand crowns, but his majesty will compel you to receive its real value, fifty thousand crowns, when you are repaid."

"His majesty," Merlin replied, "may repay the rix-dollars, but not the price of the girdle. I lament its loss upon peculiar grounds. But we have many great cares, Monsieur, and little room amongst them for a trivial annoyance."

The Norwegian added:

"I have heard of the unhappy fate of my gallant companions who fell into the hands of the Czar after Pultowa; therefore I have not questioned you concerning them. They are scattered in captivity from the mines of the north to the shores of the Caspian. To-morrow, as we travel, I will give you the story of my own captivity. As to those who escaped over the Bogh with his majesty, you have mentioned Poniatowski and Grothusen as at present engaged in the royal affairs. There are others of whom I wish you to speak. How fares it with Mazepa the Hetman?"

"He lies ill at Bender. A singular fever has brought him by slow degrees to the edge of the grave—a fever as full of delusive imaginations as the calenture which destroys the mariner upon the seas of the south."

Merlin extended his inquiries until he perceived that the courtesy of Monsieur Villonque was contending at disadvantage with drowsiness. He then gave the Frenchman a respite, and soon, under the roof of Fonseca the Jew, renewed in his dreams the rocking of the Euxine.

Early on the next day, the Count Vilhonque, Merlin, and Caputech, travelled behind fast coach horses over that level region, which, extending from the capital city to the rugged feet of the Balkan, enfolds Adrianople in its verdant waste.

IN AUTUMN.

BY CHARLES WOOD.

'Tis Autumn now—the shining hours
Of bloom have passed away,
When all things breathed the breath of flowers,
When every scene was gay;
When countless wild birds on the wing
Still fluttered to the melody,
Sweet music of the voice of Spring—
That woke them into joyous glee,
And sported on each airy bough,
Where sounded oft the evening vow,
In warblings that are silent now
Around the greenwood tree.

The loveliest hues that flourished there
Were those of buoyant Spring,
Which, full of grace, upon the air
That fann'd her, she did fling—
They fell upon the leaves so gay,
They crowned awhile the opening flowers,
Then, with the birds that flew away,
Departed for elysian bowers;
And all that's left where they have been—
Of birds and flowers and leaves of green—
Draws deeper sadness o'er the scene
To weigh the weary hours.

Though still enchanting hues are spread
Along yon woody crest—
'Tis but to mind us of the dead—
The Summer—gone to rest!
And well they serve, by zephyrs tossed
That whisper of departed bloom,
To show how Nature loved the lost—
To be the garlands of the tomb.

In dying memory let them wave
Around the calm, bright Summer's grave,
And rosy Spring's.—Ah, naught could save
Even her from death and gloom!

Or, what though with her own sweet strains
The lark, in quivering flight,
Uprises o'er the wavy plains,
'Mid raptures of delight—
It is as if with sudden sweep
An angel's music floated past,
And he that listened could but weep,
That every tone might be the last—
And leave him to his earthly woe!
The lark has plumed her wings to go
Where scenes of fadeless verdure glow,
Unawept by Winter's blast.

Or soon her song of happy cheer
Shall hush—nor charm again,—
That Summer lives no longer here.
To keep alive the strain.
For mark you not how Autumn's tone
Is swelling on the fitful gust!—
Her gaudy glories withering down,
Even while we view them, to the dust!
Her ground is strew'd at every breath
With forms that tell the tale of death,—
With many a faded leaf that saith
"I die—as all things must!"

As through the solitary wood
The winds, with saddening moan,
Resound as if they loved to brood
O'er life and beauty flown—
They seem to speak, while murmuring on,
To flowers of still unfaded hue,
And verdant Summer leaves—a tone
Which all the dead while living knew—
The doom from which there's nothing absented;
The latest breath that Summer breathed
Has taught them, while in beauty wreathed,
That they must wither too!

And they shall soon be joined to those
That fell in early bloom,
And none be near their last repose
To smile away the gloom!
Yet ne'er more bleat the dreamy dove
Hath wooed her sleep's unconscious sway—
I would, that all the friends I love
Might sleep in death as calm as they!
And each fond form forever dwell
As purely bright in Memory's cell,
And thou be, Autumn! there to swell
The requiem o'er their clay.

For aye, whenever thou dost come,
What calm, sweet days are thine!
What mournful memories, never dumb,
Their power to thee resign;—
What voices of departed years
Thou wakest—that have slumbered on,
Unheard through long, bright Summer hours,
Yet now resume their former tone.
For this I love thee, Autumn drear,
What though I greet thee with a tear;
'Tis joy to weep—when thou art here,
To smile—when thou art gone.

Bolivar, Tenn.

LOVE'S WINTER.

Verily, from others' griefs are gendered sympathy and kindness;
 Patience, humility, and faith, spring not seldom from thine own.—Tupper.

I.

"How in the wide world came it so?"

Now if Mrs. Nance had been conscious that in the very act of taking her eyes from her work and fixing them on the bright fire, and at the same time uttering this question of latitude, she was metamorphosing herself into a Sphynx; and that neither coals of fire, nor the andirons, nor even Mr. Nance, who sat opposite with his pipe, were derivatives from Œdipus, nor even resembled that individual in having swollen feet—we say had Mrs. N. been conscious of these things, she would no more have asked this question than she would have gone and thrown herself, like the real Sphynx, into the sea; which would scarcely have been more disturbing to the good woman than the ocean of uncertainty upon which she was now tossed. This we affirm from our knowledge of this lady's character.

To one who did not understand Mrs. Nance's peculiar design in asking such questions as this—which in truth was just no design at all,—the present interrogatory might appear inconsiderate. Did she not recollect that it had been a topic of conversation in the neighborhood for two months? Nay, that for a month past it had been an object of particular, incessant and careful investigation on the part of several maiden ladies of age and experience, whose insight into such matters had never, thank fortune, been questioned for an instant? How then, we ask, could she dream of obtaining satisfaction on that point, and at such a time; and more especially as Mr. Nance had just returned from his trip up the country, and had heard no item of the home news? We repeat, that if we did not know Mrs. N. we should think this inconsiderate of her. Mr. Nance must have thought so, from the celerity with which his mouth parted simultaneously with pipe and question—which was unusual.

"How came what so, my dear?"

"Why now just hear the man! Did you never hear of such a thing as Andy Eppen's being engaged to Melanie Tuck?"

"Yes," responded the whiff of smoke which issued from Mr. N's pipe.

"Well, and did you never hear of such a thing as Andy Eppen and Melanie's being married next week—yes, right here in the dead of winter when every thing's freezing and nothing thawing!"

Mr. N. had obviously never heard of such a thing. The next whiff of smoke was speechless with astonishment, and that gentleman whistled it away as if he were rejecting the statement of his spouse.

"That can't be, sure enough," said he with fond incredulity.

"Ain't it though—read that." Here Mrs. Nance flung the affirmation in his face in the shape of an invitation card. The article fell on the floor and Nance stooped to recover it; he thereupon read it over—may be twice—then fell into a profound reverie. He might have remained so until the end of time—or at least until the wedding-day, had he not been interrupted by an untoward circumstance.

"See there!" exclaimed Mrs. Nance. "Lord love the man!"

Now the cause of this startling invocation was after this wise. In stooping to pick up the card, Mr. N's pipe had heaped coals of fire on the head of an unoffending crane, which had been standing knee-deep in the carpet ever since it had been a carpet, or at least until its feet had become immovably fastened in the water; either because they were too numb to be lifted, or until its ankles had become burthened to the anchoring point with feathers brought about by the action of the water, (vide PALEY on the Mechanism of Nature,) or else from real affection for the cloth, which was of the first water. Of all the tribe of Grallatous which were pictured upon the carpet, as if there had been a sort of Egyptian plague there, none was so unfortunate as this one, which had lost its cranium and part of its neck by fire from Nance's pipe; for the future compelling that niche of the carpet to go neck or nothing. Mrs. N. had never been a scold. So far from it she and William had gone on together for near thirty years, as she frequently reckoned from the age of her eldest son, now in the army, during which time nothing harsh or unfeeling had ever existed between them—we state this on the authority of Mrs. Nance; now and then, though even that scarcely—she might have been a little pettish and he a little sullen, but such feelings were not fed by either, and so found no existence between them. But to-night there was really unusual temptation to fretfulness for the good woman. In the first place Mrs. Nance liked to see things done right; but can the intelligent reader say that it was in accordance therewith for Andy Eppen to come and get married to a 'great favorite of her's' in the cold, gloomy, windy winter? In the second place Mrs. Nance was remarkable for her neatness and completeness withal; and it cannot be denied that the loss of the crane's head was a ruthless violation of both of these, Mrs. N's commendable predilections. In a moment of extreme trial she exclaimed, "'Pon my word you're the stupidest man living; when pray did you see me do any thing so very careless as that is?"

"Just now when you threw this card a foot over my head on the floor!"

"See here, William, you'd better hush, or you'll make yourself out a regular fool."

"It'll all be o' staying with you if I am one."

Mrs. Nance was 'up'—bodily and mentally. Her eyes flashed—her faced flashed. She was on the point of venting her indignation in abuse. He was prepared for this; but it was more than he could stand to see her burst into tears and seat herself, as if her heart were broken—it was 'nt in Nance to stand it.

Oh don't now," he said, very much discomfited; "there's a precious, please now, I did'nt mean it, indeed I did'nt."

"Nor I either," sobbed Nan, "I didn't mean to get mad, William."

"Don't say that, Nan, you were right and I was all wrong."

"No—no, you were right and I was wrong."

"Well now, say we were both wrong, and say no more."

Mrs. Nance assented to the contract, and confirmed it by wiping her eyes.

"The fact is, William, I know there's something boding ill for Mel Tuck's marriage. Here this card has come in like an evil spirit, and caused a sad passing between you and I who were married on a bright, sweet spring day and so have always lived happy—have'n't we?"

Mrs. Nance spake thus triumphantly; as if by natural sequence the life were to derive its brightness and sweetness from the quantum of those qualities in the wedding day.

"It'll do no good or comfort to make folks trudge through snow and cold to see them married. Fine chance too for catching one's death. I should think they might put it off a little later if it were only to have a bunch of flowers in the bride's cake, or a bird to sing at the window."

"How came it so, I wonder?" said Mr. Nance.

"Just as if I didn't say the same thing half an hour ago?" laughed Mrs. Nance!

—

II.

Very bleak and agitated was the wedding day. A day when nature had a cold in her head which made her very irritable indeed. The wind was in high glee; sometimes screaming a tune for dry leaves and dead limbs to dance by, slamming people's window shutters, and then again as if tired with farce, it would whirl up with something tragic by giving some inoffensive one a prostration, à la Pecksniff. And then when the company was in course of convergence at old Parson Tuck's it delighted to steal away this one's veil and that one's hat, and neglected not to dance a minuet or a reel with each one individually by way of pre-paid compensation for the lack of that amusement in the parsonage. Such was the very exceptionable emotion of the wind on this occasion, and the emotions of the company were proportionably pleasing as they bade him good night, for the time being, at the door, and came in the parlour to breath hard over the fire.

There was every thing to make the wedding that night at Parson Tuck's a very cheerful and a very blithe one. Both parties know every body and were both universally known, and no one could be found in the whole parish who would be so perverse as to deny that it was a love match, and that Andy and Melanio suited each other to a T. Such a match in that day of mercenary marriages was a something both curious and lovely to behold, every body said.

Andy was evidently very happy indeed. It was a positive prodigy to see how he was in every corner of the room at one and the same time, as one might say. However great your infidelity in other things you could not help believing him happy as a king—and indeed much happier than said potentate in these days of dethronement—for his mouth, and eyes, and feet, and hands confirmed the thing in absolute credit. Melanio too was so happy that it reminded one of what the dove's joy might be when it found a green spot to rest upon. But Mel after the ceremony ran straight and threw her arms around her "dear Nan's" neck and kissed her. The good Mrs. Nance couldn't help, in her weakness, dropping a tear as she said "God bless you." Unfortunate tear! it quenched a good hour of ardent happiness in the lovely bride that evening. This was certainly very thoughtless in Mrs. Nance. And indeed now as we look upon the party assembled, and every thing glowing with bright reflections, the roaring fire and the chandelier, and mirrors, no less than the laughing faces—all of which lit up the parsonage that night—we say as we look upon these things we are half inclined to suspect that Mrs. N. is a contrary-wise somebody, and that no one but her could see any thing in or about the festivities which was not radiating bright prospects, and that nothing short of suspicion could see any thing hovering about the amiable couple, but love. Who, pray, has taught us how to love, or whom, or when, or where, or why, or indeed to love at all? Why, every rake from Ovidius Naso to Henry Fielding. And who, pray, hath inculcated otherwise? Why, a very fair and love poetess who, from the misery of her heart, has farnished a pleasing entertainment for social companies which do not recollect that in it the wail of a Lucretia and a Josephine were mingled with her own sigh. If the company had recalled this to-night as Melanie sang and played "Love Not" they would have stopped and shuddered as if it were the howling of the tempest outside. On the contrary one exclaimed: "Fine advice from Mrs. Eppen!" and another—"You can talk to us so now!" And all joined in the expression of admiration which very heartily ensued, for Mel sang and played delightfully, such was the uniform consent. By a strange fortuity some very temporal personage looked at his watch and discovered that it was after midnight. No one, when the fact was whispered about, had ever dreamed of such a thing, doubtless for the simple reason that no one had been asleep. Hereupon all the ladies kissed and went out into another room to put each others shawls and cloaks on, for from the miscellany of habits therein no one could hope to recover his own that night; it was unreasonable. The wind was at his old pranks again. He had obviously been peeping in at the key hole, and seen all the kissing of the bride with envy. So now he luxuriated in kissing the whole party on their noses, and eyes, and ears, for they had entirely muffled up their mouths. But we can't go home with all, so well just escort home our old acquaintances Mr. and Mrs. Nance. But indeed we are almost sorry we came; for to see Mrs. Nance set down crying by the fire and go to bed crying makes us feel like crying too from sympathy.

The good couple had been in bed about two hours. Mr. N. had been asleep about the same length of time, but his wife had been awake as long. All at once a loud and violent knocking was heard at the door. Mrs. N. immediately roused her husband, who got up and, lifting the window, found that it was clogged with the snow which was then falling fast.

"Who's that?" cried he.

"It's me—Hornet."

"Ah, Hornet—is that you, Hornet, wait one minute."

Mr. Nance went down quickly and opened the door: whereupon the wind seized the opportunity and blew out the candle; 'twas a night of blow-outs.

"You needn't have opened the door," said Hornet, and you needn't light the candle. Please, sir, I want help."

"Help? Hornet."

"Yes, sir, we're at a stand—father and all—clogged and can't find the way—quick, sir, quick."

Mr. Nance ran out and ordered his carryall—then went up stairs and dressed hastily, and at the same time told Mrs. N. that she must have a roaring fire for the folks that he would bring back with him. She was no less prompt than he; but bless Mrs. Nance how she did cry! She certainly intended washing her hands of all the guilt connected with a wedding on such a night, and that too in her tears. Every thing was very comfortable and tidy when Mr. and Mrs. Hornet and all the little Hornets, like so many of Grimaldi's blossoms stuck about in the snow, arrived in Mr. Nance's carryall; Mrs. N's. tears had ceased to flow, which was an additional comfort.

"This is dreadful weather, ma'am," said Mrs. Nance to Mrs. Hornet.

"Very bad indeed—especially for a wedding," replied that lady.

"So it is!" said every body.

Mrs. Nance accommodated every body very comfortably that night. No one in the borough could have done it better, if indeed as well as she. Next morning all who had been at the wedding got up late; when they did rise it was because the scraping of snow from all the steps in the neighborhood would not allow the inmates to sleep. There were likewise a great many late breakfasts next morning. And in many families things went on wrong all day long in consequence.

We must mention an exception to this however. At the Parsonage family prayers, and breakfast, and duties were resumed as usual in every respect. Andy and Mel had left with the five o'clock mail for a trip; according to a modern usage which implies that if man and wife can travel happily together in a stage coach or on a steam boat, they can do the like on the sea of matrimony.

—

III.

It was in the very freshest of spring and the weather was as sweet and salubrious as it had been on Mr. Nance's wedding-day, when Andy Eppen and his wife returned to the Parsonage. Their trip had been a long one and a very pleasant one. They had a wedding dinner for them on the day after their return, at which there was another merry-making. Mrs. Nance could not complain now, for the mantle-piece and the table were hung with flowers until they fairly groaned and the birds fairly split their throats with singing. Both were fresh and cheerful, but no more so than the couple whose honor they served. It did Mrs. N's heart good to see how very happy Melanie Eppen was in her new relation. She came over to pay her a call—did Mel—and told her all about her visit, what and whom she had seen, and never failed when an instance presented itself to speak enthusiastically of her husband's kindness and attention. All these minutiae put Mrs. N. in a good humor which would have withstood the attacks of every snow storm or crane's head in the universe. Her tears had all been dried by the spring sunshine which, by the way, was the thing which the good lady took to more than any thing else on earth.

• • • • •

It is sometimes a pleasure to the traveller to pause upon an eminence and glance back upon the way he has traversed. If it has been rugged and uneven it is sweet to look upon its smoothness in the distance; it almost makes us think we have not passed through as much as we had supposed. And then again there is a delight in discerning some shade when we have had rest, or a cool spring when we have found refreshments. The brightest blessings of life are those which are subjective.

Let us imagine ourselves, one and all, lifted ten years forward, from the wedding season to a green hillock in the course of time and look over those years as so many miles in the past journey of life. To one who looks upon it, the way has been far wearier and more rugged than she had anticipated, so much so that had each mile been ten it could not have been more tedious. That one is Melanie Eppen! She sees two bright spots on the way, one when she lived at the Parsonage before her father's death, the object of every one's love; the other the birth of her twins, two fair children, a girl and a boy. These have been thenceforth the sole relief to the shadow over her path; a shadow not of harshness or of insult, but of NEGLECT. Neglect! Shame on mankind that the word has not been blotted from the earth; that worst violation of human relations. Severity may be grateful, for it shows that our fault was unexpected and is felt; but action without censure or commendation is sure poison to the spirit. Is there a bosom under heaven in which blooms not something worthy; it is because the half-dimmed sun of apathy has hardened the once soft soil. The human heart is a flower (we hope the reader will not set us down at the simile as too sentimental) which yields no fragrance unless it be cultured or trampled on;

"When God himself complained, it was that none regarded,
And indifference bowed to the rebuke. Thou gavest me no kiss when I came in."

And they who do it not unto the least are cast into outer darkness, where perchance their doom will be to spend the ages of eternity without one glance of pity from the hosts above or sympathy from their fellow-fallen!

We have said that Andy Eppen did not treat his wife harshly; indeed he was so respectful that Melanie was for a long time at a loss to find out whence the loneliness that shrouded her heart was; or why it was that she could not be lively as of you. The fact is, she had in her loving fancy clothed him with a depth of feeling which he did not possess. And now when there was his fine and interesting boy to meet him at the door and set upon his knee, he forgot the wife of his bosom in devotion to his son, until he was ashamed to turn again and bless her with his affection. Sometimes a shade of remorse would occur to Mr. Eppen when he saw his idolized little Andy playing with his little daughter whom he also loved dearly. We say sometimes his better genius would suggest such thoughts to him in the beginning of his coldness; thoughts of how it would do to rush forward and give vent to his feelings on the bosom of his wronged wife, asking forgiveness; but such thoughts made him sick almost, and he would rebuke their unmanliness by mixing in the scenes of busy life. These reflections however annoyed him so repeatedly that he had to set himself to find out something in her that would justify his coldness. At last he did, having a great deal of penetration, and was worried no more. But whilst Andy was happy in giving his whole heart to his son, with some of its feeling to his sweet little daughter, and little of its warmth to his wife, Melanie was obliged—poor thing! she thought so—to love all three. And when she felt sometimes that perhaps she did not care enough for any one of them, or dreamed that she had seen some one of her family in danger or distress, without tears or effort for their relief, she would start frightened, and would in her anguish pray God that her eyes might sooner be closed in death than that they should behold human suffering unweeping. Sometimes she would think that the fault was with her, that she was much worse than other women, and that her husband saw it, but felt much delicacy in telling her so, though he could not love her. Oh! how intense was the suffering and grief with which such moments and thoughts were fraught.

But there was one that silently noted all these things. Little Andy, though under ten years of age, saw with grief his mother's care, and set himself to find the cause. No one knew that whilst he was playing with his little sister his mind was running off upon some hastily dried tear that he had seen fall from his mother's eyelid, and which to him was an ocean in which days of pleasure were drowned. And when he sat upon his father's knee and gaily talked and sang, oh! none dreamed of the thoughts which crowded upon little Andy's mind. Something whispered to him at length till it almost ran him crazy, that he had stolen his mama's love or that which was due her and that he should return it to her!

But we do not like to dwell upon these things, it is very painful. We shall remark an incident here, however, which took place one evening in the tenth year of Melanie's marriage. She had been sitting a long time alone, thinking over her circumstances, and had wept until her eyes were very red. It was the birth-day returned, of her twins; how could she but think?

"Where are the children—I've birth-day presents for them?" said Mr. Eppen entering.

"Mrs. Nance sent to ask me if they might come down there, she had a fruit cake to give them on their birth-day."

It was strange! Like the memory of a dark deed which cannot be undone, the old thought that Andy Eppen had rejected long since, recurred as he looked upon the sad expression of Melanie; the thought, we mean, of becoming once more her loving husband. It staggered him, and the only way in which he could recover was by uttering his first harsh intimation,

"I do believe you try to get the children out of my way!" he said.

Mel rose hastily and went from the room; she saw little Andy start back from the door as she hurried on to her chamber, there to weep as many tears as her good "dear Nan" did on the wedding night.

IV.

"My dear Nan, have you heard the news?"

"Why bless me, William, what news have I to hear?" Mrs. Nance looked up.

"My dear, my dear, this is a bright and pretty day outside, but to some it is the darkest day that ever shone since the days of Moses' rod."

"Who are they, William?"

"Parsonage folks," making a hasty gesture over his shoulder, he continued thoughtfully.

"Ah yes! to them last night was drearier and windier than the wedding night."

"Good gracious! what's he at; why you talk in riddles, William."

"Why, didn't you know that little Andy was gone—not to be found!"

"Heaven help us! Not the little dear that was here yesterday evening—"

"The very same fine lad. He went off Heaven knows whither, Nan, and nothing's been heard of him. Nobody knows anything."

"Oh, dear—dear—the li-t-tle love!" Mrs. Nance was sobbing.

"And there's his father flying through and skirting the old woods for miles and miles like madman, now leaping the fences or jumping a ditch and never stopping to do anything but light a fire, and every now and then, Nan, he grits his teeth and says wildly something about 'trying to get the children out of his way?'"

"Oh! save us," sobbed Mrs. Nance.

"And then there's Melanie standing all night long at the window watching the lights and crying and praying for little Andy. You can't tell how it made my heart ache when she called to me as I was passing and asked me if they'd heard nothing yet, and I had to answer nothing!"

"Little Andy's gone—gone!" said the good woman.

"Oh yes he's gone—I fear forever—but yet I'm off to look after him."

"Yes, but William how came it so?" Mrs. N. was off her guard evidently.

"My wife, my dear wife, don't you know that question can never be answered in this house!" Thereupon Mr. Nance rushed from the room, leaving his good wife to her thoughts of stormy weddings and presentiments.

It would almost seem as if the last harsh word of Eppen to his wife, which has been recorded, were a suspicion prompted by some foul fiend; which now assumed the form and nature of its origin, to curse the utterer and all connected with him. Sleep visited not the Parsonage, for the house where Melanie's father had lived, and which he had left his son-in-law at his death, still retained that name. Perhaps there was not sleep in the village. All night long the parish church bell sounded; bonfires were kindled on every steep; and the fearful cry of "Lost Child!" echoing through the solemn hours of that fearful night, caused a shudder in the hearts of tearful mothers, as they pressed their infants closer to their bosoms. Alas! where is little Andy? So shrieked Eppen as he dashed through the wild woods like a maniac; and such was the burthen of the wind as it moaned through the forest; and such was the theme of the bonfire as it roared and cracked. Half frantic Melanie listened from the attic window, if perchance she might hear a cry of joy from any amongst the crowd that sought her precious boy. And in her anguish-stricken-ear the maddening sentence still rang—
"I do believe you try to get the children out of my way!" 'Twas sounded in every tolling of the bell, and was written upon the wall in characters of light, by every flash of the bonfires. Beside her—for she could not sleep—little Mel stood weeping. At last her mother said to her, "Tell me all, child, again, that he said to you when he left?"

"Oh, ma, he came to me with tears in his eyes and kissed me over and over again; he said he'd have to leave me then, but he'd come back again."

Here the two sobbed together for a long time; the little girl then continued,

"Then I caught hold of his jacket and begged him not to leave me there in the dark woods, that I was afraid. I told a story there, ma, I was'n't afraid for myself; he said he'd see that I was'n't hurt. Oh! ma, how I begged him not to leave me. I told him I knew he'd get lost, and then I told him to think how distressed you and pa and I would be"—here the child sobbed violently.

"What did Andy say then, love?" asked Melanie.

"Why he cried as if his heart would break. Then he jerked away from me, and ran off saying he'd come back by and by. And then, ma, I ran after him crying and calling out, 'Come back Andy, please just come back, and tell me goodbye and kiss me once more—just once!'"

Here the mother and daughter wept together long and loudly.

"Oh, ma, I thought my heart would break when Andy left me there, I thought if I could only call him back and bring him here to see you once before he left, that I would be happy, but no he was gone!"

Day now began to dawn in the east; and at intervals from then till about ten o'clock, all the various parties that had gone out to hunt after the lost child, returned from their fruitless search. There was a great deal of excitement in the village during the day. But the people talked, the mother wept, and the father sought in vain; Andy could not be found.

At last Eppen returned and locked himself in his room to his own wild feelings; he cared for none on earth that he knew of.

Andy Eppen was colder now than ever to his wife, because to his former coldness was added that of suspicion, which obscures the brightness of men's minds as rust on steel. Did it never occur to him that one word of sympathy from Melanie, had he suffered himself to receive it, would have caused him more joy than the recovery of his son. Did it never come back upon him, when he devoured his grief in privacy, that happiness could then be found in his own house, which would cause ineffable joy to his lost son if he were an angel, and would be the truest light to guide him back if he were a wanderer on earth. Oh! did his old, dark, repulsed thoughts never return.

The only thing which Eppen and Melanie possessed in common now was ardent love for their lovely daughter. But little Mel did not act as the element which harmonises by its presence discordant substances. And yet to see her husband's pure affection for his daughter, would sometimes inspire Melanie with a throbbing hope that perhaps some spark yet lingered there for her. Oh! how her heart fainted within her at the timid thought; gladly would she have died that instant to have known it true. But this she could never know or believe save in a dream or a fever; for Andy's lips were sealed to her, as much as were those of her son. In the day time he paused not in her presence unless to dandle for an instant his lovely little daughter.

Melanie's grief was perpetual, poignant, almost inhuman. Her sole support was that which she was taught when she first recollected the Parsonage as her home, "He doeth all things well." Deserted, neglected, and not relieved by death! "it is well!"

—

V.

You might have mingled with all the peasantry of the old world in the days of pestilence and hunger, and in every cottage you would find a Philamon and Baucis compared with the inmates of the Parsonage. No one would have believed that piety had ever taken up its abode there, or least of all that it had ever seen a merry wedding, for no where had every trace of happiness been so thoroughly erased from the threshold. Coldness and apathy gathered there, until the surrounding grounds, uncultivated, sprang forth in weeds and briars: and there too snakes were bred as emblems of the diabolical influence which seemed to gloat over the whole. We have said that every trace of happiness had been erased from the hearthstone at the Parsonage; so at least it was destined to be, for the remaining idol was to be torn therefrom. The narrative is brief and sad, let us hasten through it.

Since the loss of her twin-brother, little Mel had never been the same lively child. She seldom spake except to her mother when alone, and then she would dwell with rapture on the memory of the loved one who had gone. She took but little interest in the things around her; and Melanie saw that her daughter was pining toward the tomb. Sometimes she was tempted to pray that she might pine away as fast! The physician advised a change of air for the little girl, and she was taken to a watering-place; scarcely however had she arrived and walked about the green grounds, when she desired to return home. By her bedside at home her mother sat from day to day to see the flower fade gradually away from her home; whilst the wretched, unweeping father, remained in his room, to his own meditations. Of what sort they were God knows!

The afternoon was very fair and pleasant when little Mel died. She turned from a refreshing sleep, about an hour before the sun had spent its course, to her mother and said cheerfully—

“Ma kiss me and I'll tell you my dream.”

Her mother kissed her fondly and then pressed her to her bosom.

“I dreamed, ma, that I saw brother in a far off country. He looked lovelier and finer than ever; he was not crying as when he left me in the woods; and there he wanted me to come and live with him. He said that he could not live without me; and that if I'd come he'd love me—ma—ma—don't cry, I told him I could not leave you. And when I told him so, he said that I'd have to come soon—don't cry, ma, he meant that the doctor would send me there for my health. And then he told me that he would love me as much in that bright and lovely country, as pa loves you here. I'll be loved a great deal then, won't I ma?”

Melanie started and turned pale as she looked in the face of her dying child. Unperceived Eppen had been standing at the door looking on the same sight which angels looked on from above. A stifled sob betrayed his presence—he could stand it no longer; the old dark thoughts of years gone by prevailed, and Andy wept on the neck of his wife in the presence of his dying child!

“Oh! he will love me that much in that land!”

In an ecstasy of joy the fair girl clasped her hands; and so as the sinking sun faded from the chamber she breathed her last.

“God help me, Mel, I loved both before you, yet you only are left to love me; oh! forgive”—

There in the chamber of death as they wept, they could not utter their emotion; it were idle for the pen to attempt it.

Many wept next day as they laid the body of the little girl to rest in the silent tomb, beneath the green trees which sighed in the old church yard. They could but weep to think of the heavy sorrows that had fallen on the family at the Parsonage, and wondered too that it was so. In the large congregation which surrounded the small grave, there was not one who did not recall some bereavement sustained at the hand of death; the brother, the sister, the parent, or the child lay beneath the sod, and little Mel's grave was a fresh opening to each wound. All have such wounds;

“write on her tomb,” said the philosopher of old to Darius, “the names of three who have not suffered adverse things, and I will raise thy wife from death!” Were that her only epitaph the tomb would have remained unlettered.

With the afflicted pair it was not now as it had been in their former sufferings. Andy felt now with new emotion the omnipotence of sympathy, it mingled with his grief a sacred pleasure; he could now kneel by his fireside with his loved Melanie, and pray for preparation to meet in heaven those who had gone before! Often they would walk to the grave of their loved child, there would talk of her dying words, and wonder too if her dream had come true—if the two were twins in the better land as on earth.

One morning, Melanie repaired alone, as she often did in spring, to the grave yard; no sooner had she cast her eyes upon the tomb of her lost one, than she started back pale with terror; on the stone in wreaths of rose buds and violets twined with ivy, were framed the words “My Sister!” A superstitious feeling crept over her, for she could but believe that the angel form of her son had placed the words there. She hastily gathered up the flowers and carried them home; she did not breathe, however, what she had seen; she was afraid to, she knew not why, and so kept it in her own heart as something to shudder at.

New life dawned upon the Parsonage now; the weeds were quickly rooted from the garden, and flowers at the front smiled in acknowledgment of Melanie's tender care which did not neglect the least thing in nature, that raised its head above the ground. It was her reward now to have a smile and kiss of affection from her husband, on his departure or return; her happiness was as if her youth were renewed, as if her wedding-day had returned, and she again sang—

“Love not, love not! ye hapless sons of clay.

Hope's gayest wreaths are made of earthly flowers,
Things that are born to fade and fall away—

Ere they have blossomed for a few short hours!”

She did not look upon her Andy now, as you or I would look upon him, with his face wrinkled somewhat with care, and his head turning gray, as it had been since the loss of his son. Ah no! she saw him handsome and happy as he pressed the ring upon her finger; and as for herself she felt as young as he appeared. The two felt more and more dependent on each other as they went on; they staid with each other more now, and felt a mutual interest growing day by day between them. And at last if you could see Andy's unhappiness when Mel was not present, you would have surely thought he was making up in loving her now for the time he had lost in apathy!

VI.

In a neat room of a country house, not an hundred miles from the village which has been the scene of the main portion of this narrative, there sat two youthful persons with whom we now have to do. About the girl there is a singularly sweet expression of face; she is apparently much more staid than the young man. But who is he? You may well ask that, for without an introduction, none would ever recognise him as the same fine boy that in a period long passed, kissed his sister in the wood for the last time on earth; so grown and changed was Andy now, you would never have known him!

"Maria," said he tearfully, "my object is accomplished: that for which I gave up home and all its endearments. I shall now return to bless, if I may, their mutual love." Maria's face was usually calm; indeed Andy had never seen her in tears until now. "When I left home and wandered to Mr. Limnef's—your father's—door, fevered and sick at heart; I thank God that you met me there! A slight resemblance to my little sister that's gone, inspired me more than anything else, probably, to open my heart to you. Oh! it is a memorable item in our history, Maria, when we meet with those who count our feelings worthy of themselves, and so adopt them. And had I not met with your cordial sympathy and encouragement, Maria, oh, I fear I should have given up and returned to claim my love so dearly bought, or at least to have saved Melanie from the grave!"

Here both wept audibly; the agitated youth pressed Maria's hand and continued—"over her resting-place, I am now going to mingle my tears with those of my dear parents; to tread again the same spot where with her bursting heart she cried 'once more Andy—just once.' Oh, Maria! had I gone to her then, I should never have left her"—

Maria had not uttered a word in all the time, but sat weeping. "I am going back now to try and bless the declining years of my parents with duty and affection; but how, oh! how shall I leave you who have been to me so good and kind. Though I have laboured for my own support in your father's family, yet I would have performed double sooner than gone elsewhere and lost the support of your friendship and smile.

"Shall I lose it now? Shall my heart yearn in vain for the sympathy which it can find alone in your own? Listen, Maria, to my parting request. May I one day come again and take you to the Parsonage to be my wife. Oh! say that you'll come, and fill the void which the grave of little Mel has made at our hearth-stone. I'll not only love you now in the days of your youth and beauty, but when these have ceased, my affection will not fade—no never!"

Maria had started up and turned pale. She fixed her eyes upon him but did not speak until they were dry, and her face as calm as ever.

"I'd never thought it, Andy. When I first met you a poor boy, seeking employment, I don't know that I was curious for your history. You confided it all to me, unbidden; and I could but honor a design so noble, as I thought. If my feelings had become interested in one who sacrificed the dearest relations of home and life for that design—I did not know it until you told me that you were about to leave! Go on now—I consent."

Andy's utterance was choked, and he could only press her hand to his lips in silence. Finally, however, he arose and as he left the room said,

"I shall now go to my room and thank my father above, Maria, that I ever met you!"

In the first stage-coach that afternoon, Andy started for the home from which he had been so long estranged. It was his birth-day; and on the way he thought over the strange portion of his history which had occurred since nine years before he had left his father's house; how slowly had they passed! And in their passing, Andy's mind, if not his body, had grown old, almost as much so as if they had been nineteen instead of nine.

It was just dark when he arrived; and he entered softly at the side-door of the house. And still more softly, save for his beating heart, he kneeled at the parlour door, where about the same hour he had kneeled nine years ago, and heard his father's first harsh word to his mother; the word which had decided him to leave! Little thought Eppen, when he uttered it, of the bon-fires it would kindle—of the noise and the madness; little did he dream that it was making his boy an alien, and bespeaking an early grave for his loved little Melanie!

The husband and wife had been talking over the scenes of the past; for it was the birth-day of those they had loved for a short time on earth. They had wondered again and again if both were now in the better land, unvisited by sickness and sorrow. At last Melanie, pale and trembling, spake—

"Forgive me, Andy, if I have kept anything from you. But I have somewhat to say, which I have often tried to speak, but could not. Some strange spell seems to have kept me silent until now. One very bright morning, shortly after little Melanie's death, I happened to walk to the grave-yard alone—and oh! what think you met my eyes? there, on the tomb, were the letters woven of flowers, 'My Sister!'"

"Oh, Melanie! tell me if my son lives."

"I know not. I know it was weak, but I half believed then, and now, that they may have fallen from the hand of my boy in heaven, with the dew that covered them!"

"Oh, Melanie! why did you not tell me?"—the anxious man rose—"Oh! if little Andy did place those letters there!"—

"I'll answer for that!" exclaimed the son rushing in the room.

"Oh God!" exclaimed Eppen, and in a moment the three were joined in an embrace, which told of a joy purer and deeper than we can describe.

"My noble boy come back!" sobbed the father.

"Oh dear Andy—why could you leave us?" said Melanie as soon as she could speak.

"Pardon me, my father, and I will tell you all," said he holding the hand of each.

"God bless you—tell on," cried the old man.

"In all the land there was no one with more to make him happy at my age, than had I. You both know well that my slightest wish was always gratified; I was almost idolized by all. But oh! from some source or other, a dreadful thought would often flit upon my mind, that the love which you, my father, lavished upon me was at the cost of that love to another whom I almost adored, and whose hand I now hold!"

Eppen groaned and bowed his head, as he said "tell on."

"Forgive me, my dear father—but I saw that I had taken the place in your affection which was due to my mother. Oh! the thought was a very terrible one for a boy of ten years to hold. I thought that if I was taken from you, it would tell you your dependence on your once loved wife for happiness?"

"There was but one person to whom I told my design; an old dear friend of yours, mother, and one to whom your heart was open, it was Mrs. Nance; she endeavored to dissuade me, and has often begged me to return when I would go to her for information; though she kept her promise not to betray my secret.

"I went to Mr. Lemnif's and labored for my support, there I have been ever since. Oh! how I have been tempted to return at times. When beneath this roof that being for whom I would have at any moment lain down my life—rested on her death-bed; when I knew that one word from me would cheer up her sinking frame. Oh how I was tempted to return! But no—I would not have returned scarcely though it had been to raise her into life."

The three wept together in silence for a long time, the youth then continued:

"The thought of wiping from your eyes those tears of anguish which I have seen so often, when you knew it not, and the confidence I felt that you would be again loved as you deserved—oh, mother, these things supported me and cheered me!

"And now my work is accomplished, thank God! but in the conflict little Melanie has gone"—Andy could scarcely speak—"perhaps she is now looking on us from her bright home above. But my dear parents, I shall supply her place soon, as far as on earth it can be, with one who is lovely, and who will assist me in comforting your sinking days with love and care, one who has been my only solace in all my trials since I left you; and with whom I have visited my dear sister's grave, where, with flowers wreathed by her hand, I wrote the words, 'My Sister!'"

"What you have said, my son," said Eppen, as soon as Andy had finished, "is too true. God knows I did not intend to treat my dear Melaine with neglect, but I did so—and fearfully have I paid for it. It is by the deepest affliction that I have been brought again to love her and you together, as I do now."

"As the heavens are higher than the earth, so are his ways higher than our ways, and his thoughts than ours!" said Melanie.

VII.

CONCLUSION.

There was another wedding-party at the Parsonage soon afterward: a wedding too, on as fair and bright a summer-night as ever any wedding was on. Mrs. Nance did her share, too, toward strewing the room and the dinner with roses and daisies. There never had been such a happy time in the village as when young Andy Eppen was married to Maria Limnef. The sun acknowledged it by sinking in the West without a cloud, and the moon agreed thereto by lighting the folks to and from the Parsonage. The wind likewise gave in its consent to the opinion, by not howling or playing pranks with peoples' hats and bonnets, and other proper clothing. It was a place for young girls to catch beaux, and for said beaux to become desperate—was this wedding. How then, on the face of the earth, could it be otherwise than merry and happy!

Never was bride more admired than Maria Eppen; and every one said in a whisper how like she was to little Mel that died. The observation caused a shade of sadness it is true; a thought of how happy she would be if she were present, contradicted by a thought of how much happier she was being absent—but all this flitted away with the music and the laughing, the kissing and the eating. We hope the reader will pardon us for making use of this last word; but observation has made manifest to us that people, at weddings, never think of living on love so much as brides' cakes; and that feasts of reason are the remotest of all sublimity feasts from their minds. Music, laughing, kissing and eating! Whew! what a coronet of brilliance for the brow of Hymen have we woven unconsciously; and thus, like Synesius, rendered that deity "concealed," during supper-time at least, "by its own effulgence!"

The wind, as we have before intimated, did not take any mean advantage of the guests as they went home after the wedding; on the contrary it snuffed the moon of all its cloudiness, for the better accommodation of the same. Now we—the writer and the reader—cannot any more follow the folks to their respective mansions from the Parsonage, than we could twenty odd years ago, when the first wedding took place at the same place. And so, just for the sake of old acquaintance, let us return with Mr. and Mrs. Nance. We have the greatest conceivable affection for them, and always have had, and always will; and that alone would induce us to accompany them.

Mrs. Nance said this was a wedding—we are serious in the assertion—at least it was what she called a wedding. In these days of innovation, it is important to know the old nomenclature, and we have therefore stated this fact of Mrs. Nance. Mr. Nance assented.

"Here," said Mrs. N., "you and I get ready, go to the wedding, come back again without any colds in our heads."

"Or tears in our eyes," suggested Nance.

"No half frozen Hornets to take care of."

"Nor sleep lost."

"None at all—none whatever." Mrs. Nance waved both hands, "and then William, look upon that carpet—do you see any crane on that whole carpet disfigured?"

Mr. Nance saw none, though he put on his spectacles to it.

"Mark me. William, when Andy Eppen and Maria grow old, they will not have to look back at bonfires, and children running off and dying early; and what will you inquire then, William, if you are alive?"

"How came it so?" said Mr. N., quietly.

The Qui fit Mæccenas was answered at last, by Mrs. N. "Because they got married like Christian people, in the season of green trees, and flowers, and birds. When," continued she vehemently, "there's no snow to cover and hide peoples' paths, nor wind nor weather to give them their deaths!"

"Umph!" assented Nance.

MEMORY.

TO M—— G——.

At times, o'er Melancholy's stormy tide,
A beauteous image doth serenely glide,
As 'twere an Iris 'mid the clouds of Thought,
With splendor calm, like that by twilight brought—
That lingers on the verge of parting light,
And flings enchantment o'er the brow of Night!
Expression's fleeting radiance, from her eye,
Falls like a meteor through an autumn sky;
Her voice, though near, yet borne from far doth seem,—
The lonely echo that survives a dream!
'Tis Memory—that sweet minstrel of the Past,
Which wakes a softening spell in every blast,
Which sheds a rapture o'er the darkest hour,
Like dewy starlight to the drooping flower,
And lends a tongue to Autumn's leaf, whose cheek
Portrays an eloquence no words can speak.
When fairy visions fade beneath the blight
Of thy bleak eye, austere Philosophy,
Before whose wand must fall, the veil so bright,
That hides the blank of cold reality—
When Pride must view, with callous glance, the hopes,
The fondest schemes of happiness destroyed,
As year by year, each crumbling fragment drops
From Time's dull wreck, into Oblivion's void,
'Tis then we muse, unconscious, on the hours,
When seemed existence but a path of flowers,
Wherein we viewed, with Nature's artless eye,
No specious hues to grace Depravity;
No sophistry, forsooth, superb and vain,
Which robs the soul to overload the brain!
Stagnates along the garden of the heart,
And chokes its fountains with the mire of art;
Corruption's senseless pomp, nor Flattery's smile,
Soft robe of vice refined and splendid guile;
No scowl of Bigotry, nor Grandeur's sneer,
The winter of whose face would freeze a tear:
'Tis then that boyhood's fleeting light appears
An ignis fatuus in the mist of years—
A dwindling meteor, far off, yet sublime—
A star on the horizon edge of Time!

MARCUS.

THE ENGLISH LITERATI.*

Perhaps a greater interest attaches to the lives of successful authors than any other class of distinguished persons. We hear of great deeds of arms, and we feel a natural desire to see the noble captain who has achieved them—the man who has seemed to bear a charmed life amid the rage of embattled hosts and the desolation of iron tempest. But we have no inordinate wish to be made acquainted with him in private, to see him apart from the great pageant wherein he moves, as he is seen by his valet, and to hear the ordinary staple of his conversation. We stand before a picture or a statue, as in an atmosphere of beauty, and when the spell of admiration is first broken, we call the name of the artist: but we are filled with no insatiable longing for his personal minutiae—we care not to know how the lonely labours of the studio were accomplished. We listen to the last divine strain of some great composer, until lifted upon the invisible pinions of song we are borne into the region of light and celestial harmonies, and tears “rise in the heart and gather to the eyes” as the notes are prolonged: and yet there is no absolute craving excited for the composer’s domestic history and characteristics. We do not mean to say, of course, that the biographies of such men are void of interest. Far from it. Biography is of all others the most attractive form of composition, and when written by the subject himself, especially if his life possess remarkable incident, it becomes, as in the case of Benvenuto Cellini, extremely fascinating. But we do mean to say that sketches of the character and habits of literary men are read with an avidity out of all manner of proportion to any other sort of personal memoranda. When we read a book that fastens itself upon the mind, we instantly conceive a peculiar and lasting interest in the author. If the publication be anonymous we begin to inquire “who wrote it?” Thus, a large majority of the body of readers, would rather have talked half-an-hour with Sir Walter at Abbotsford than with Napoleon at Longwood or Thorwaldsen at Florence or Beethoven at Schwarzpauzner.

* The Living Authors of England, by Thomas Powell, New York: D. Appleton & Co., 200 Broadway: Philadelphia: George S. Appleton, 164 Chesnut Street, 1849.

There is no difficulty whatever in arriving at a satisfactory explanation of this. The author is in daily communion with his readers, wherein revelations of his own nature are given, and we seem already to have made his acquaintance after the perusal of his volumes. We certainly know more of him than of many whom we see daily in flesh and blood. The sympathetic chord is constantly touched by him and it readily responds. As far as his language reaches, he has raised up a multitude of friends, in the hut of the peasant and in the lordly dwelling, by far-off rivers and on the shores of distant seas. Thousands there are who feel the liveliest interest in the most trivial circumstance with which he is connected, who have never perhaps trod the same hemisphere with him. This feeling was but too ridiculously exemplified in the ovation which attended the steps of Mr. Dickens from the wharf at East Boston throughout his whole journey in the United States, and which Field-marshal, the Duke of Wellington, himself could not have secured.

It is because of this interest and of the entertaining anecdotes of prominent English literati, which Mr. Thomas Powell has given us, and certainly not from any merit of Mr. Thomas Powell himself, either as critic or sketcher, that we have found a pleasant volume in “The Living Authors of England.” Apart from these anecdotes, the book contains nothing that we consider worthy of publication. We mean no reflection upon the American publishers when we say that we do not believe that any established bibliopole on the other side of the water would have undertaken to give to the world, in one volume, so much crude criticism and careless composition. Mr. Powell is evidently a man of some information on literary topics and has at times great felicity of expression which would seem to indicate long practice in writing, but an offensive ex cathedra tone pervades his book that now and then becomes down-right impudence. There can be no question, however, that he has seen much of English literary life—perhaps as a diner-out, we trust, in a capacity not so menial—and that he has embodied in the present volume some very racy incidents of character. Dismissing Mr. Powell therefore for the instant, pass we on to make such extracts from his pot-pourri as we may think pleasant and profitable. We shall string them together like beads, with little space between.

The Bard of Rydal Mount is the first portraiture, and we are put in possession of a fact with regard to him that we had long since gleaned from his writings—that he has no perception of the ridiculous, no wit or appreciation of wit. A joke he never understands, and when one is explained to him, simple, kind-hearted old gentleman that he is, he cannot readily make it out. The following anecdote is in point—

“At a friend’s house, after dinner,” says Mr. Powell, “the conversation turned upon wit and humor. The author of Lalla Rookh, who was present, gave some illustrations from Sheridan’s ‘sayings, doings, and writings.’ Starting from his reverie, Wordsworth said that he did not consider himself to be a witty poet; ‘indeed,’ continued he, ‘I do not think I was ever witty but once in my life.’ A great desire was naturally expressed by all to know what this special drollery was. After some hesitation the old poet said—‘Well, well, I will tell you. I was standing some time ago at the entrance of my cottage at Rydal Mount. A man accosted me with the question—‘Pray, sir, have you seen my wife pass by?’ whereupon I said, ‘Why, my good friend, I didn’t know, till this moment, that you had a wife!’ The company stared, and finding that the old bard had discharged his entire stock, burst into a roar of laughter, which the facetious Wordsworth, in his simplicity, accepted as a genuine compliment to the brilliancy of his wit.”

Leigh Hunt next appears, and here he is:

“In person he is tall; his hair is now gray and parted on his forehead; it grows low down, which gives the appearance of a want of intellectual power; his voice is peculiar and soft; he sings a lively song, and accompanies himself on the piano or seraphine with much spirit and grace; abounds with pleasant anecdote, and is fond of punning; his quotations are very happy, and he occasionally throws off a parody of some old hackneyed passage with great effect.

"We remember one day, in an excursion with him and Dr. Southwood Smith to Croydon, he saw some sheep grazing in a park near that place. He there remarked how much of the beauty of a passage depended on a word; for instance, said he, apostrophizing the sheep—

'The lamb thy riot dooms to bleed to-day,
Had he thy reason would he skip and play?
Pleased to the last, his flowery food he crops,
And licks the hand that cuts him into chops!'"

Of Samuel Rogers we have a capital thing, showing that he and Wordsworth are antipodes in fun—

"It was told me by a friend of the bard, of the beau, the banker (Rogers,) that the poet's uncle adopted him and his brother, and took them into his banking-house. After some time he detected the elder one in writing verses; the horror-struck merchant, when he died, allowed the detected verse-maker a certain annuity, leaving the business and the bulk of his fortune to Samuel, with the remark that he would never be a poet. We are entirely of the uncle's opinion, and boldly avow our belief that no spiteful nature can, by any process of sublimation, be raised into the poet; Mr. Rogers, therefore, must be content to stand or fall by his own nature—he has the reputation of being a great wit, and of having made some of the severest of modern jokes.

"The last on record is a remark he made to the younger Miss Cushman, sister to the celebrated actress, and it exemplifies his politeness to the fair sex in a striking manner. The elder Miss Cushman is remarkable for the masculine nature of her genius, and for her assumption of male characters. The younger sister was congratulated one day by Mr. Rogers, on a report current in theatrical circles, of her approaching marriage. She denied the rumor, adding that she did not think it probable that she should ever marry, as she had not met any one of a manly tone of mind. If she ever married, added the fastidious fair one, it would be one of a strong masculine nature. 'Indeed,' replied the sallow wit, 'then why don't you marry your sister?'"

As sketched by Mr. Powell, Alfred Tennyson stands before us the identical individual that he has appeared to our mind's eye, a man to enjoy the dolce far niente of a fragrant Havana, with his vest unbuttoned, beneath a shade tree in the country, or sitting in his dressing gown, before a genial fire, in a cozy room of the metropolis, when the blasts of winter are abroad: a man, in short, who would not object to become "the Laureate bold," as the parodist has told us—

Oh, would not that be a merry life.
Apart from care, and apart from strife,
With the Laureate's wine and the Laureate's pay,
And no deductions at quarter-day?
Oh, that would be the post for me!
With plenty to get and nothing to do
But to deck a pet poodle with ribbons of blue,
And whistle a tune to the Queen's cockatoo,
And scribble of verses remarkable few,
And at evening empty a bottle or two,
Quaffingly, quaffingly;

We were not before aware that Tennyson enjoyed a pension. All who recollect the poem of Lady Clara Vere de Vere, with the grim and ghastly picture of the scorned lover, must recall with grateful satisfaction the noble stanza in which aristocracy of rank is derided.

But for Mr. Powell's sketch:

"Tennyson avoids general society, preferring to sit quietly with a friend, discussing the fancies that pour in his mind. He has no conversational force or brilliancy, hates arguing; is as 'fond of smoking as an American or a Mussulman;' passes most of his time in the country; his favorite spot being a small farm-house near Maidstone. He is occasionally visible to his friends in London for a month or so, but to see him in his best mood you must catch him with his cigar, or under a tree lounging on the grass on 'a warm, lazy day.' Born in Lincolnshire, it is curious to observe how the suggestions of that fenny scenery have pervaded his writings and influenced his choice of images.

"He is reserved in his habits, has a fine intellectual face, and is very calm and self-possessed; there is an admirable picture of him by Lawrence. He is approaching his fortieth year. Lately he has been rewarded by the Queen with a pension of £200 a year. We are told that she was much charmed with his ballad of Lord Burleigh; the poem being pointed out to her during her late visit to the Marquis of Exeter at Burleigh. The pension came very opportune, he having lost most of his small patrimony in a speculation. For the especial information of our female readers, he is unmarried."

We confess our great disappointment that nothing is given in the sketch of Macaulay, but a dry outline of his college and parliamentary life, and some extracts from his History, with which everybody is perfectly familiar. We should be glad to know something of the historian in the private circle. He has not the reputation of a wit, and yet we were assured by a friend who once breakfasted with him in company with Rogers and Sidney Smith, that the latter observed that if you would "feed and water Macaulay he was the best vis-a-vis you could desire at a dinner." The watering process, we suppose, should be done with burgundy.

In allusion to Croker's article on Macaulay, however, Mr. Powell gives an amusing incident in the history of the Quarterly Review.

"Some few years ago, the Review in question now and then executed a poet for the especial delight of its readers; Tennyson, Browning, Keats, and others scarcely less illustrious, have been gibbeted (fortunately only in effigy,) from their new patent drop, the Jack Ketch being Mr. Croker. It reached Mr. Allan Cunningham's ears that the Maid of Elvar, his poetical child, was to undergo capital punishment in the forthcoming number of the Review. The indignant bard, who was a stalwart man of above six feet, with an arm accustomed to wield the mason's mallet, intimated to Mr. Croker that the day after the publication of the attack he would personally chastise him. The valorous Rigby was alarmed, but having announced a "slashing poetical article," he substituted the meek and small Moxon for the gigantic Highlander, who was equally good as a sculptor and a pugilist.

We have a malicious pleasure in giving full credence to the foregoing, since the small objections brought by the Quarterly against the History of England—we say the History, for so we consider it.

We must confess too, that never having conceived a passionate admiration for Robert Browning, we have been gratified to learn that others besides ourselves have been puzzled with his poems: just perhaps as boys who become deplorably benighted in the Differential Calculus, find consolation in the fact that Macaulay could not master the mathematics. For our part, though we never advanced a step understandingly beyond the binomial theorem, we should sooner sit down to comprehend the whole of the Mecanique Celeste than a single page of Sordello. It would appear that no less a person than Douglas Jerrold is as obtuse in this respect as ourselves—

"This distinguished contributor to Punch was recruiting himself at Brighton after a long illness. In the progress of his convalescence a parcel arrived from London, which contained, among other things, this new volume of Sordello; the medical attendant had forbidden Mr. Jerrold the luxury of reading, but, owing to the absence of his conjugal 'life guards' he indulged in the illicit enjoyment.

"A few lines put Jerrold in a state of alarm. Sentence after sentence brought no consecutive thought to his brain. At last the idea crossed his mind that in his illness his mental faculties had been wrecked. The perspiration rolled from his forehead, and smiting his head he sat down in his sofa crying, 'O, God, I am an idiot!' When his wife and sister came, they were amused by his pushing the volume into their hands, and demanding what they thought of it. He watched them intently while they read—at last his wife said: I don't understand what the man means; it is gibberish. The delighted humorist sank in his seat again: 'thank God I am not an idiot.' Mr. Browning, to whom we told this, has often laughed over it, and then endeavored to show that Sordello was the clearest and most simple poem in the English language. We know only one person who pretends to understand Sordello, and this is Mrs. Marston, the poet's wife."

Apropos of Jerrold, who is known as one of the Editors of Punch.

"In person, Jerrold is very small and spare; stoops, with his head in his shoulders—hair gray, and pushed back, as though he had dragged it through a gooseberry bush instead of a comb, while his sharp features, shaggy eye-brows, from 'neath which stare two earnest eyes—sharp voice and biting manners, are in perfect keeping with his writings, and altogether make up the embodied idea of a man of indomitable self-will and reliance, ever ready for the conflict of opinions, in which he gives and receives unflinchingly the hardest of blows. We have recorded some of his gentlest sayings in this volume, and regret that the tone of many others that we remember are too personal to admit of repetition. He is very sweeping in his remarks, and unsparing in his conversation, frequently in the irritation of the minute, wounding without scruple the feelings of his companions."

This is not a flattering representation, nor do we care to make it more repulsive by quoting all the bitter things that Mr. Powell has recorded of Jerrold in another part of the volume. It is well indeed that the kindly feelings of poor Hood supplied the counteracting agent in the early preparations of Punch, or the citric acid of Jerrold might have rendered the mixture unpalatable. We give, however, a well-merited retort upon Albert Smith as a specimen of his power in this line:

"Modesty is not, perhaps, the distinguishing peculiarity of this clever author; possibly his greatest failing is a kind of assumption, which leads him to become occasionally boastful: one evening at the Museum Club, on his return from Paris, he was making somewhat free from the name of Lamartine, then in the heyday of his popularity, on account of the prominent part he had played in the recent French Revolution.—According to Mr. Smith, the distinguished French statesman never did anything without his advice and assistance. He wound up a long and boastful eulogium on Lamartine's regard for him, by saying, 'In short, we always row in the same boat.' Jerrold, who had been quietly listening to his brother author's rhodomontade, exclaimed, 'That's very likely; you may row in the same boat, sure enough, but with very different sort of sculls.' The sarcastic wit accompanied this retort with a good tempered, but highly significant tap on his head."

In the sketch of Dickens, we are favored with a long and very tedious examination of his works, a critical parallel between him and Thackeray, (who par parenthèse is not deemed worthy of a separate notice,) and a cool attempt to establish a plagiarism, or plagiarisms, upon the author of Dombey, from the works of an American writer. The reader will no doubt be electrified to know that this American writer is—Cornelius Matthews! We have no wish to join issue with Mr. Powell upon the respective merits of the passages quoted from David Copperfield and Puffer Hopkins, as a discussion of this sort would not probably be very entertaining to our readers. They will, however, one and all, rush immediately to the shops and buy the unsold copies of this chef d'œuvre of our neglected fellow-citizen, and if they have any patriotic feeling, they will thenceforth consider that the world has made a great mistake in rating Dickens above him. It is just possible that after reading the wonderful adventures of the said Puffer Hopkins, they may arrive at the conclusion that it is only Mr. Powell who has committed a blunder, their love of country to the contrary notwithstanding.

Passing by therefore this matter of dispute, we come to a good story which Mr. Dickens is said to tell with great spirit. It is a story of Macready—

"A gentleman, of the name of Prichard, having failed as an actor, settled down into the more useful occupation of stage-manager of Drury Lane Theatre. He had the peculiarity of being an extravagant admirer of celebrity, but the chief idol of his worship was Mr. Macready. His delight was intense when he heard that the great tragedian was engaged to play a number of his favorite characters. It seemed to be an honor to hear him talk. He resolved, therefore, to show him every attention.

"On Mr. Macready's first visit he was almost driven to despair by the reserved manners of the actor, who seemed a frozen man with the powers of locomotion. He, notwithstanding, paid unremitting attention to the hero of his worship: looked to the fire in his dressing-room, placed lofty wax tapers there, and by a thousand delicate services expressed his deference. After a week's perseverance he was rewarded by an inclination of his idol's head. A few days more the face ripened into a smile: then came a more rapid thawing; and one morning Mr. Macready was so touched by the deferential respect and attention of the stage-manager that he actually spoke to him, 'Good morning, Mr. Prichard.' Balaam was not more astounded at his donkey's speech, than Prichard at his lion's condescension—in a little time it ripened into 'Good morning, Prichard!' and one morning, never to be forgotten by the obsequious Prichard, Mr. Macready said, 'Prichard, you don't look well; you want a change of air! I have a little cottage at Elstree; come down on Saturday and stay till Monday.' In a state of speechless rapture the admiring stage-manager accepted the invitation. Never minutes crawled so slowly as those which intervened; at length the blissful time arrived, and in a state of joyful trepidation the highly honored man mounted the stage that was to convey him to this terrestrial seventh heaven.

No monarch on his throne sat with a greater pride. He looked as though he felt all the passengers knew he was going to see Mr. Macready. His look seemed to proclaim, 'Gentlemen, I am actually going on a visit to the great Mr. Macready—what do you think of that!' In due time he was deposited at the door of the cottage. Mr. Macready received him at the porch, led him to the parlor, and then told his servant to show Mr. Prichard his room. In this neat little dormitory the bewildered visitor endeavored to calm the tumultuous rapture of his mind. After some little delicate devotion to his toilet he descended to the parlor, where he was introduced to Mrs. Macready. 'My dear, this is my kind friend, Mr. Prichard, whose attention to me at the theatre I have named to you.' Mrs. Macready, in her usual lady-like manner welcomed him. Mr. Prichard flowered a little and said 'The pleasure he felt in showing his respect for so resplendent a genius as Mr. Macready was his greatest happiness and reward,' &c. He was interrupted in his blushing and glowing enumeration by the tragedian's saying, "We don't dine till six, we shall have time for a stroll in the garden and paddock." Mr. Macready pointed out in his way the wonders around. 'That is my little paddock—there is my boy's horse—there is a small hen.' Mr. Prichard put forth a word or two of rhetoric. 'How blissful for a man of genius, tired with the fret and fever of the world to retire, and in the calm seclusion,' and so on. Mr. Macready nipped this fine crop of oratory by saying, 'That's a cow, it supplies our family with milk.' 'Happy cow, (exclaimed the manager,) to supply so great a man's family with milk.' Prichard in the intense adoration of the minute wished himself a cow! As Jupiter for love of Iö turned himself into a bull, so would Prichard have done the synonymous for Mr. Macready.

"Behold Mr. Prichard actually seated at the same table with Mr. and Mrs. Macready! In the course of the evening the courteous host happened to say to this simple-minded manager, 'Prichard, make yourself at home; ask for whatever you want; I have a warm bath in the house; one would, I am sure, do you good; if you think so, you have only to ring; tell my man;—it is prepared in a minute—now don't stand on ceremony—it is no trouble.'

"Dinner passed off; Mr. Macready was condescending—the manager seemed translated; towards midnight he was led to his room by his hero, and told that he was to consider himself at home, and do as he liked. Left alone, he gave himself up to a variety of pleasing reflections; lapped in this reverie, time slid on unconsciously; at last the words of Mr. Macready, 'a warm bath will do you good; it gives no trouble; it is prepared in a minute' fastened upon him with a fatal fascination. 'It will do me good,' involuntarily exclaimed Prichard; 'I feel overpowered with the sensations that have rushed through me; I will have one; Mr. Macready pressed me to take it; he will be offended if I don't; I would not wound his feelings for the world.' His hand instinctively pulled the bell; like fear in Collin's Ode,

*'He back recoiled, he knew not why,
E'en at the sound himself had made.'*

The tinkling ceased; dead silence; again the bell was rung louder; no one came; Prichard gave up the idea of his bath and thanked the abortive ringing; at length, just as he was preparing to get into bed there was a rap at his door with a half sleepy 'Did you ring, sir?' 'I should like to have a warm bath,' faintly ejaculated Prichard, half suspecting the absurdity of the request; 'A warm bath, sir?' said the servant. 'Yes, Mr. Macready said I should have a warm bath.' The servant vanished and went to his master's bed-room door and rapped; the great actor was sleeping, no doubt dreaming of histrionic triumphs, with no Astor House in the vista.

"Mrs. Macready was the first to hear this unusual sound. She listened a minute space, then touching the modern Macbeth's arm, said, 'William, what is that?' a deep guttural growl was the response.

'Again the lady at his side
Her soul-subduing voice applied.'

'William, pray wake, I tell you I hear a noise. I thought I heard a bell ring twice before; William, pray wake, I am getting alarmed.' When Mr. Macready was thoroughly awake, he sat up in bed. 'Who is that?' said he, 'Me, sir,' said the servant, 'What do you mean by disturbing us in the middle of the night?' 'Please, sir, Mr. Prichard wants a warm bath!' 'A warm bath!' gasped his master, 'does he know it is the dead waste and middle of the night? a warm bath, ha! ha!' continued he, 'was there no pond on his road hither that he could have washed in? a warm bath! hah! hah! Rouse all the servants! let him have his bath; a bath! a bath! his kingdom for a bath!' saying this he sank hysterically on the pillow."

It is some mitigation of our author's treatment of poor Mr. Sergeant Talfourd, whose verse is said to be "smooth common place," that he is admitted to be "an ornament to the legal profession." Whether Mr. Powell is as good a judge of law as of poetry we know not, but we quite agree with him as to the cleverness of the following hit:

"One of the most felicitous instances of pleading in modern times was his defence of Macready against Mr. Bunn. That tricky manager had engaged the eminent tragedian, at a large salary, for fifty nights. After a few performances, finding he was losing money, he resolved to annoy Macready by every means in his power, fully trusting that the actor's well known irritability would lead him to break the contract. He commenced on a petty scale, such as placing only one common, dim-looking candle in his dressing-room, and by a variety of trifling annoyances of a like character; finding these had no effect, he resolved on a larger sphere of action.

"He put his name down in the "Taming of the Shrew" as an afterpiece, playing a farce before it. Mr. Macready at first remonstrated, but suspecting the villainy of the lessee, he consulted Mr. Forster, and the sergeant, who advised him to play the character of Petruchio even under these provoking circumstances.

"Mr. Bunn finding this had no effect, hit upon a scheme which he resolved to put in practice the next night. Mr. Macready was performing 'Richard III.,' and had gone through the first four acts in his usual manner, reserving his energies for the close of that magnificent drama. Mr. Macready at the end of the fourth act had retired to his dressing-room, and was sitting, waiting the call-boy, enwrapped in a pleasing reverie as to the effect he was about to produce on the audience in the next act."

"Time flew on, when to his surprise the orchestra commenced the overture to the pantomime. Starting up, the mimic tyrant went to the door of his dressing-room and demanded the reason. Presently a man came with a message from Mr. Bunn, saying, with his compliments, that there was not time for the fifth act of the tragedy, as the pantomime was so long; and that if Mr. Macready would look into the playbills issued that morning, only four acts of the play had been promised. There, true enough, in infinitesimal type, was the trick artfully drest out: Macready's rage was intense; he saw he had been tricked; prudence counselled silent contempt; pride and indignation prompted a thousand things. At first he resolved to address the audience on his wrongs, and denounce his tormentor. Fired with that professional ambition so highly characteristic of Mr. Macready, he determined to rush upon the stage and present the public with the most intense and energetic Richard they had ever seen. On his way to the achievement of this great histrionic feat, he happened to pass the door of the manager's room; he was brimful of Richard, and doubting whether he could hold it in till he got to the footlights, his eye unluckily encountered the bland and smiling features of the poet Bunn, the perverter of the playbill, whose unlucky destiny it was to receive immediately a tremendous thumping at the hands of the excited tragedian. When the unhappy Bunn was nearly beaten insensible, the indignant actor rushed into his carriage and was whirled home.

"In the action which the pumelled manager brought for the assault, Talfourd was retained as Macready's counsel. The witnesses were examined: the assault was proved; the legality of Bunn's conduct was indisputable; the unwarrantable violence of the actor was glaring, and every one in court expected large damages. The ludicrous light however, in which Talfourd placed the whole affair at the close of his address to the jury, is so ingenious, that we must quote it (from memory) even at the risk of being considered tedious.

"My Lord and Gentlemen of the jury must bear in mind, in justification of this apparently severe assault, the peculiar circumstances of the case: I will not insult your understanding by any remarks as to the wonderful power which the immortal Shakspeare has over the feelings of his readers; judge then what must be the tremendous spell that he exercises over that great tragedian, whose whole life has been absorbed in the study of his miraculous dramatist. In a few words, gentlemen, Mr. Macready having worked himself up, under the inspiration of Shakspeare, to electrify the audience, was suddenly stopped short at the end of the fourth act, and meeting with Mr. Bunn, he was compelled by the necessity of his case, and unable longer to contain the supprest energy, to discharge the entire fifth act of Richard III. on the unfortunate head of Mr. Bunn.

"I feel quite sure that you will not punish my friend Mr. Macready for the wonderful power which the immortal Shakspeare has over his votaries and admirers."

"He then closed his speech, and the actor got off with tolerable damages."

We come now to notice what strikes us as quite the most remarkable piece of cockney impudence we have seen for a long time. Mr. Powell gives a few pages under the caption of John Forster. We were naturally eager to learn something more than we already knew of this acute and philosophical writer. He enjoys a high and well-deserved reputation wherever his "Lives of the Statesmen of the Commonwealth" has reached. Thinking that we should be furnished with some pleasant memoranda of his private history, we turned to that part of the book at once. Judge our surprise and mortification to find instead an attack of a most vituperative character on Washington Irving who is charged with having stolen the whole of his "Life of Oliver Goldsmith" from the English Biographer. Not content with this, our author assails the long established fame of Geoffrey Crayon, who occupies "a false position in American literature" and we are told that it is "fallacy" to consider him "any thing beyond an agreeable essayist, and a very successful imitator of the level style of Addison and Pope." His volume on Goldsmith is asserted to be a compend of "faded piracy, tame sentimentalism, and common-place suavity." Oh, cruel Mr. Powell! Oh, luckless Mr. Irving! How facile is the destruction of fame! Conjured up by petty malice, how easily a cloud envelops Sunnyside and shuts out forever the author of the Sketch-Book.

We have not yet done with Mr. Powell; for there are sins of omission as well as of commission, and he has fallen upon them. Henry Taylor and Philip J. Bailey are men of whom we would fain know something, and yet Mr. Powell mentions them only to introduce flat critiques on "Philip Van Arteveldt" and "Festus." One would suppose too that a work which gives a niche to writers as little known as Ernest Jones, Coventry Patmore, Thomas Burbidge and Arthur A. Clough might mention, if only in a single paragraph, the names of other authors whose works are familiar to the American reader. Where is Martin Farquhar Tupper whose Proverbial Philosophy has passed through one hundred editions in the United States? The admirers of that writer (we confess we are not of the number) may justly complain of his exclusion from a book professing to present to us the "Living Authors of England." What though he draws occasionally upon an old and forgotten author, one Solomon, for his proverbs and upon later and better-remembered essayists for his philosophy—what though he

Breaks into blank the Gospel of St. Luke
And boldly pilfers from the Pentateuch,
And, undisturbed by conscientious qualms,
Perverts the Prophets and purloins the Psalms—

we say, what of all this—is he not a "living author" of England? Where too is Thackeray, beyond all question, next to Dickens, the first master of pathos in the English tongue? Where is Professor Aytoun, the Bon Gaultier of the monthly magazines? Where is Elliott, the artisan-poet, whose rhymes convey to the stern, sad heart of English toil the sense, the dream, the hope of a larger and better liberty, of a new and enduring social reform? Where are the Howitts, man and wife, whose efforts, though sometimes misdirected, are always exerted in behalf of humanity? They may perhaps move in a less shining orbit than many of Mr. Powell's celebrities, they go not to dine in Belgravia, and their names are never seen in La Belle Assemblée, but are they not authors of England, aye, and living authors in the fullest sense of the word? Some too are omitted, among the privileged few whose volumes glitter on the rosewood tables of "the twice three hundred for whom earth was made." Lady Georgiana Fullerton has claims to be ranked among English authors, and what shall we say for the neglect of the "wondrous boy that wrote Alroy" and Mr. G. P. R. James? We might multiply examples of Mr. Powell's sins of omission, we might refer to D. M. Moir, the "Δ" of Blackwood (who, we think, is still alive) and Simons, his successor in lyric effusions, and the Bells of Jane Eyre notoriety, and others, to the extent of a page. But we have said enough. Our author promises a companion to the present volume in the "Living Authors of America," shortly to be published in which we shall probably see Mr. Cornelius Mathews magnified into the great Mogul of western literature. For that work we wait with exemplary patience.

EPIGRAM.

To Flavia's shrine two suitors run
And woo the fair at once;
A needy fortune-hunter one
And one a wealthy dunce.

How, thus twin-courted, she'll behave
Depends upon this rule—
If she's a fool she'll wed the knave
And if a knave the fool.

FROM OUR PARIS CORRESPONDENT.

PARIS, October, 1849.

In one of my late letters I spoke of a recent discovery of M. Melsens, Professor of Agriculture and Veterinary Medicine at Brussels, which at the time was attracting much attention, and was supposed to interest, in the highest degree, all who were concerned, here or elsewhere, in the production of sugar. The discovery was then known only by its marvellous effects. The product was to be doubled, and the manufacture simplified, expedited, and cheapened in an equal degree. The scientific and practical experiments which were officially ordered to test the value of the discovery have taken place. The results have not been so favorable as was hoped; but were far from being decisive against the discoverer. It is admitted that before the value of the new procedures can be authoritatively pronounced upon, their application to the coming crop must be witnessed. In the mean time M. Melsens has himself torn off the veil of secrecy and published a work, in which his discovery is freely given to the world with scientific and practical instructions for its application. I must redeem my promise by giving a short account of it, which may prove sufficient for the information of the generality of readers. Such as would have a more intimate knowledge must apply to the original work of M. Melsens. It will probably soon be translated in the United States.

Neither the cane nor the beet root, said M. Melsens, contains any sugar that is not capable of crystallization. The formation of molasses, or treacle, is caused by the ferments which they contain, and which are developed upon coming in contact with air and water, in the course of the operations necessary in the manufacture of sugar by the usual mode. To be sure, by the use of alcohol instead of water, as a dissolving agent, the sugar is separated from the ferments and protected from all alteration. But alcohol is too costly to be generally used with advantage, and the employment greatly increases the danger from fire. M. Melsens therefore directed his researches to the discovery of some cheap and convenient substitute for alcohol—a liquid which rapidly absorbing oxygen, would form with it an acid, which without injuring the sugar, would precipitate the ferments and the substances which produce them. He subjected to a variety of experiments three substances known to possess the properties desired, binoxide of azote, sulphurous acid, and aldehyde. For different reasons, these were successively abandoned, and a course of experiments commenced with the acid sulphites, and more especially with the bisulphite of lime. The abundant sulphurous acid which these bodies contain prevents all fermentation while their base neutralizes the sulphuric acid, as soon as it produced. It remained to be proved whether by themselves, or by their very abundant sulphurous acid, they did or did not affect, and how, the sugar in process of manufacture. To this end various experiments were made, in all of which it was observed that the sugar crystallized totally, readily and without any appearance of molasses. "I was allowed then to hope," said M. Melsens, "that the bisulphite of lime employed as a prompt absorbent of oxygen, and as an antiseptic, exerted no deleterious action upon the sugar, if it were poured cold upon the rasping machine of the beetroot, or the rolling mill of the cane, so as to mix immediately with the juice at the very moment of the rupture of the cells containing it. I was allowed to hope that the sugar would undergo, in its presence, and without injury, the action of the heat indispensable in the process of refining. In this operation, supposing it to be conducted in the usual manner, the lime employed would neutralize the bisulphite, and would leave the juice prepared for evaporation without loss of sugar, purified from the ferments and from all matters capable of producing them."

M. Melsens soon perceived that the bisulphite of lime was possessed of other properties of great value in the manufacture of sugar. It was a powerful clarifier. Experiments had established the fact that the substance in question separates all the azotic matter existing in the cane and beetroot, with a loss of sugar estimated at about one or two hundredth parts of the mass. The bisulphite of lime removes too almost completely, and promptly, the colored matters existing in the cane and beet root; and it prevents the formation of such other colored matters as are produced by the contact of the air with the pulp and during evaporation; and especially of such as require the concurrence of air and a free alkali. To sum up in the words of M. Melsens himself—the bisulphite of lime is useful in the manufacture of sugar,

"1st. As eminently antiseptic, preventing the production and the action of all ferments.

"2d. As an absorbent of oxygen, preventing those changes in the juices which the presence of oxygen would otherwise produce.

"3rd. As a purifying agent, which at 100 degrees, clarifies the juices and rids them of all albuminous and coagulable matter.

"4th. As a substance removing pre-existing colors.

"5th. As an anti-colorant eminently efficient in preventing the formation of colored matter.

"6th. As an agent neutralizing all injurious acids which may exist, or be produced in the juices, by substituting an acid almost inert, sulphurous acid, in their place."

In what quantities, in what manner, is the bisulphite of lime to be applied to the cane and beetroot in the manufacture of sugar?

What are the disadvantages or inconveniences accompanying the application of the new processes?

M. Dumas, the celebrated Parisian chemist, procured from the sugar plantations of Murcia, in Spain, several hundred weight of sugar-cane and handed them over to M. Melsens to be made the subject of his experiments. He proceeded thus:

The cane was broken up by means of a beet-root rasping machine: the pulp resulting from the operation, being sprinkled with a solution of the bisulphite of lime. The pulp was then subjected to a press and the juice extracted. This juice was boiled, filtered, placed in pans over a fire and evaporated to a density of about one-third for the cold syrup. Filtered again and left for slow crystallization, this syrup, in a few days, gave a mass of candy from which it was impossible to extract any molasses.

The pulp, moistened with water, and subjected to another pressure, furnished a second juice equally rich. It was treated like the first, and yielded the same results. If need be, this operation may be again repeated. M. Melsens employed a bisulphite of lime, marking 10 degrees of the areometer of Baumé, a quantity equal to about one per cent. of the weight of the cane. The whole of the sugar had been extracted and was there before him in solid form. All this, says M. Melsens, is effected without the extraction of any special attention or study. The workmen employed in the operation are not hurried and pressed. So long as an appreciable amount of the bisulphite exists in the liquid it prevents alteration. This discovery will, it is hoped by M. Melsens, facilitate the domestic manufacture of sugar in large quantities for family use. Powerful rolling mills to crush the cane are by no means necessary. A root-cutter, a rasp suffice; for nothing hinders the operation by washing. The use of bisulphite of lime rendering all fermentation impossible, the direct washing of the cane cut into small pieces, or rudely torn and broken up, suffices for its exhaustion.

If the statements of the discoverer are to be relied upon, the application of his new process will be attended with the most brilliant results. The average yield, he says, with the methods hitherto employed, is from 6 to 7 lbs. brown sugar, (raw or muscovado), for 100 lbs. cane. His solution of bisulphite of lime, applied to the juice alone, is to increase this yield to about 12 lbs. white sugar: and if applied to both juice and pulp the yield will be 17 or 18 per cent.

The late experiments signalize an unpleasant sulphurous taste in the sugar manufactured after the Melsens method. The discoverer replies to this objection, that the taste of sulphur may be made to disappear from the sugar in three ways.

1st. Break up the sugar and leave it for a while exposed to the air. The sulphite is converted into a tasteless sulphate.

2nd. Exposed to the action of an ammoniacal atmosphere the sugar loses the savour of sulphur and acquires a highly agreeable vanilla flavor. But in this case it is sometimes colored a little.

3rd. If the sugar is subjected to the process of clarification (la claire) so that it be made to lose about 10 per cent. of its weight, the result will be a sugar comparable with the purest and whitest made by the ordinary methods. This operation regenerates, by means of evaporation, such sugars as the above.

So much for the sugar cane.

As for the beet-root its manufacture into sugar is much more advanced than that of the cane. It is nearly perfect. Science, it is well established, cannot do much more for it. The beet-root contains sugar to the amount of 10 per 100 of its weight. By the methods already in use an average of 6 per 100 is actually obtained. M. Melsens anticipates from the adoption of his improvement, an average yield of 8 per 100. The remaining 2 per 100 may be set down as unattainable; the juice of the beet-root containing many salts opposing the crystallization of sugar and which the bisulphite of lime is powerless to counteract.

In his experiments, M. Melsens sprinkled the beet-root, at the moment of rasping it, with his solution of the bisulphite of lime. The solution used, marked, as in the case of the cane, 10 degrees by the areometer of Baumé: but the quantity employed, instead of being 1 per 100 of the weight of the root, was now equal to 2½ per 100.

On watering the pulp from which the juices had been extracted, adding a little of the bisulphite, the crystallized masses which were the result always contained unaltered sugar to the amount indicated by previous analysis. At the same time it is admitted that the product was not so beautiful as in the experiments on the cane, and the crystallization was often confused.

"If," says M. Melsens, "the employment of the bisulphite of lime is adopted, the new conditions which it will introduce will open a large field for invention, which I am quite unable to scan. But it appears to me that the use of the rasping machines will be necessary until profound study and observation shall have demonstrated the effects produced by the bisulphite upon the slices produced by the root-cutter and subjected to systematic washing. It has appeared to me that the saccharine liquids obtained by maceration or levigation are operated upon with more facility than the natural juices derived directly from the action of the rasping machine and rolling mill.

"I dare not assert that the presses now in use will be retained even if rasps should be. They are constructed with a special view to a quick despatch of work. But under the new system, the pulp once rendered unalterable, presses of slow action, operating upon large masses, economizing labor, dispensing with the bags and hurdles, may offer certain advantages and justly obtain the preference.

"Boilers of the kind now in use will be indispensable in the process of refining the sugar.

"Taylor's filters, or others similar to them, will be employed under the new as under the old system; unless, which is quite probable, it may be deemed preferable to operate by deposition.

"The apparatus for evaporation by fire cannot be used in the beginning of the concentration of the juices: but towards the end recourse must be had either to rapid evaporation in boilers heated by steam, or to a slow crystallization effected in stoves. I have ascertained that in this operation one may employ at pleasure vessels made of sheet-iron, cast-iron, tinned copper, and very probably of wood or of bricks cemented. The use of animal charcoal may be retained, diminished, or quite suppressed, according to the quality of the sugar, raw or refined, which it is intended to manufacture."

M. Melsens thus concludes the valuable and interesting work of the contents of which I have given only a concise summary.

"If, contrary to all expectation, the manufacturers of indigenous sugar should not find it to their advantage to adopt my process, I cannot believe but that it is still destined to exert a great influence upon the production of the sugar proper to our climates. When nothing but a root-cutter, one or two casks, a washer-woman's boiling kettle, and a few earthen vessels are all that is necessary to conveniently extract the sugar from a couple of thousand lbs. of beet-root, obtaining it by the very first operation whiter than the most beautiful muscovado brought from the colonies, may we not hope that the demands of a constantly increasing consumption of this article will henceforth render its manufacture popular throughout the country, making general the benefits which belong to the cultivation of the beet-root? Agriculture will be benefitted by the desirable facilities it will afford for the rotation of crops: and the laborer himself will reap the hygienic advantages, hitherto unknown to him, of an increased consumption of sugar. While in England the consumption of sugar amounts to an average of 22 lbs. per head per annum, upon the continent the average consumption of each individual does not reach 5½ lbs. per annum."

I have had occasion, I think, in former letters to allude to the backwardness of the French Government, not less evinced under the republican than under the monarchical regime, to frankly adopt the grand invention of the nineteenth century, the electric telegraph, and submit to the new conditions of social, commercial and political progress which that invention imposes. A nation daily boasting, with more or less reason, to be at the head of civilization, to be the greatest, the most enlightened, the most generous people on the face of the earth, the most progressive too, (God save the mark!) and yet materially and intellectually so far behindhand as not to need the electric telegraph! as not to see and comprehend its sublime results, its beneficent uses! as to shrink with fear from its application! Glory to the Anglo-Saxon who invented, comprehends, and dares to apply the electric telegraph—fearlessly accepting all its consequences. Glory to the Anglo-Saxon which alone among nations is socially and politically up to the electric telegraph! If France were, as she claims to be, at the head of nations, the steamboat, the locomotive, and the electric telegraph might perhaps be in existence, but the world, the living, moving, active world would know nothing of them. They would not have told upon humanity as they have told, and are every day telling. Beautiful miniature models might be seen, however, at the Conservatoire des Arts et Metiers, No. — rue St. Martin. Once a month, in summer, the boat would be exhibited to the admiration of the public upon the grand basin in the garden of the Tuileries: the locomotive would occasionally make the tour of the Louvre before a select company of distinguished strangers and invited guests. As for the electric telegraph it would be established in one of the longest salles at the Garden of Plants. Periodically like the great water-works at Versailles and St. Cloud, and like them advertised in the papers four or five days in advance, the marvellous telegraph would be made to play. "On nous annonce que le télégraphe électrique ce saisissant et merveilleux produit de la science Française, jouera dimanche prochain, à trois heures précises." A Savant would be at hand to explain to the curious spectators how there was no doubt that if the wires were extended across the city of Paris, from the Arch of Triumph to the Barrière du Trone, the communication would be equally prompt and sure as across the room. Indeed it was almost certain, that the most distant extremities of France might by possibility be thus brought into instant communication with each other! Perhaps if left to herself France might, about the year 1949, after amusing herself for a century with the scientific play-thing, and glorifying herself for its invention, actually put Marseilles and Paris in instant communication with each other by this means. Thanks, however, to the United States and England leading the way, France is already considerably advanced in the practical application of steamboats and locomotives. Thanks to England and the United States pushing, shaming, almost kicking her on, she is about to venture, nearly a century before her time, upon some practical experiment of the electric telegraph. See how timidly she talks even with the example of England and the United States before her eyes, of establishing two or three lines radiating from Paris and delivering them to the use of the rail road companies and the public. It is the republican minister of the interior, in the year 1849, who thus expresses himself in an exposé recently published.

"We believe that the inconveniences apprehended from the delivering to public use the electric telegraphs have been much exaggerated; and we think that with all the guaranties which the administration will take care to establish, reserving to itself for instance the exclusive privilege of transmitting despatches, and the right of even totally suspending the use of the telegraph under circumstances when its use would seem to jeopard the public order and security, the admission of private persons to the use of the electric telegraph will not be attended with greater danger than the admission of the same persons to the use of rail-roads and the other means and instruments of progress in general. We will add that the transmission of all despatches will be subjected to tariffs which will, we hope, produce sums sufficiently important to compensate the state at least in part for the outlays it will make for the construction of these lines and keeping them in repair."

There exist at present in France two lines of telegraphic communication; one from Paris to Rouen, the other from Paris to Valenciennes and Lille composing an aggregate length of 310 miles. The public has never been admitted to the use of them at all, and the rail-road companies under such embarrassing restrictions that the use was abandoned by them. They are of but little service to government itself, and much of the time are out of repair. But government—(yes, there's the clog and the curse to Industry and Enterprise in France! the government must have not merely a finger in the pie, nor a whole hand, but both hands)—government seems now to be seriously taking hold of the matter. Three new lines it is now ordered shall be added to the two already existing. 1st. From Rouen to Havre about 57 miles, thus completing the line from Paris to Havre—estimated cost $23,205. 2nd. From Paris to Tonnerre, on the Marseilles rail-road, 60 miles—at an estimated cost of $40,152. 3rd. From Paris to Angers on the road to Bordeaux—to cost $73,776. These telegraphic lines, put up at government expense and controlled by government exclusively, will prove of but very little service to the public generally. They are not meant to serve the public but to serve the government. They will put the minister of the interior within a few hours of the most distant prefects—they will maintain—they are meant to maintain—the curse of France—centralization, the predominance of Paris over the departments, the pernicious rule of the capital, the subjection of thirty-four millions to one million.

W. W. M.

NERVOUS FEARS;

OR,

A NIGHT IN THE HAUNTED CHAMBER.

A LESSON FOR THE CREDULOUS.

It was past midnight, and a taper light
Gleamed fitfully on the hearth,
All around was hushed, save the blast which rushed
And roared like the sea in its wrath.

'Twas an awful gale! and at times would wail
Like a mourner o'er the dead,
The windows would shake, as if an earthquake
Began its havoc to spread.

In this trying state, at an hour so late,
Alone in the haunted room?
With bitter regret, I lamented the bet
I had made to brave its gloom.

At length the wind ceased,—my terror decreased,
And I closed my eyes to sleep;
But the nap I sought was not to be caught,
For wide awake did I keep.

Feeling so dreary, restless and weary,
Oh, how I wished for the dawn!
The minutes seemed hours, winged by wicked powers,
So heavily they moved on.

The lamp would glimmer,—burn dimmer and dimmer,
Then shed a blue light around!
A shade on the wall, resembled a pall,
Its fringes trailing the ground.

The old oak table, of hue so sable,
 Looked like a funeral bier,
 And each antique chair, stiff, high-backed and queer,
 A canon's stall did appear.

I laid still as death! restrained every breath,
 And traced the forms on the chintz—
They seemed to advance, in a weird like dance,
 And their uncouth steps to mince.

I averted my face, from the hideous race,
 With their odd, fantastic gait,
 And shuddering with dread, enveloped my head,
 Expecting a direful fate.

Soon came a faint cry, and something ran by
 Quick scampering over the floor!
 Round and round it flew, the lamp it o'erthrew
 I shrieked—and remember no more.

Friends found me next day, as senseless as clay
 And cold as a block of ice!
 At my bed-side sat, my favorite cat
 By her,—lay two slaughtered mice.

There was then no doubt, of what caused the rout,
 Which scared me out of my wits—
 Puss raised the turmoil, and upset the oil
 In catching a treat for her kits.

And how she got there, was equally clear,
 For in haste the night before,
 I had quickly undrest, and retired to rest,
 Neglecting to fasten the door.

Puss wand'ring astray, while seeking for prey,
 And finding the door ajar,
 Had slyly crept in;—then followed the din
 Of her predatory war.

J. M. C.

AN EXCELLENT SPEECH.

We never read a speech of Mr. Everett without wishing to preserve it. The following effort is certainly "too good to be lost," and as it has not yet appeared in any other than newspaper form, we gladly give up to it a few pages of the Messenger. We are indebted for a copy of it, in a Boston paper, to the courtesy of the distinguished author.—Ed. Mess.

REMARKS OF MR. EDWARD EVERETT,

AT THE DINNER TABLE AT CAMBRIDGE,

AUGUST 21, 1849.

Being the last day of the Session of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

I rise, Mr. President, with your permission, for the discharge of a yet unperformed duty. We have, sir, in the hall above, in the earlier part of the day, adopted resolutions of thanks to the worthy officers of the Association; to the citizens of Cambridge, and the associations and individuals in the vicinity who have manifested an interest in the Institution, and a desire to promote the convenience and gratification of the members, and the objects of the meeting. There still remains a debt of this kind to be acquitted; and I propose, Sir, before I take my seat, to endeavor to perform it, by moving a vote of thanks to the ladies who have honored the meetings of the Association, both here at the social table and in the Sections, with their presence and countenance.

Before I do this, I will crave leave to say a few words upon the objects of the Association and the character of its meetings the present year. This I shall do with the greatest boldness, even though I may be breaking through the regulation which was adopted, for very good reasons, that there should be no speaking at the dinner table. We have reached the last day, on which we shall meet together, and my bad example, in this respect, cannot be drawn into an inconvenient precedent for the present year.

But I am desirous of availing myself of the opportunity to say, that, in my humble opinion, the transactions of the Association, at its present meeting have been highly creditable to its members and to the science of the country. I had an opportunity in 1841 of attending the annual meeting of a similar association at Florence, consisting of between nine hundred and a thousand of the men of science of Italy and the neighboring countries; and in the years 1842, 1844, and 1845, I enjoyed a similar opportunity in reference to the meetings of the British Association for the Promotion of Science. It appears to me, that, in the scientific character of its proceedings at the present meeting, the American Association will compare advantageously with those of Europe. The number of men of science in attendance is much less; but I think the volume of this year's transactions when published will show proportionably a large number of communications, on interesting and important topics, in most of the departments of science, and exhibiting as much original research and sound speculation, as the annual reports of any of the European Associations. I make this remark with the less hesitation, because I have myself borne no other part in the scientific labors of the Association than that of a gratified and instructed listener; and also because among the circumstances which have enabled the Association to present such fair ground of comparison with its European contemporaries, no one can forget that European talent of the highest order is to be found in our ranks.*

* Among the active members of the Association at the present meeting were Professors Agassiz and Guyot of Neuchatel.

I think no one, Sir, could have attended any considerable number of the meetings of the Association, and witnessed its course of operations, but must have been satisfied, if he had doubts before, of the utility of such an institution. A meeting of scientific men from every part of the Union with the opportunity thus afforded for entering into friendly personal relations is itself an object of no mean importance; especially in a country so large as this, and destitute of any one great metropolis. It cannot have escaped any one's observation that much time, labor, and skilful research must have been devoted to the preparation of many of the memoirs, which it is highly probable would not have been bestowed upon scientific pursuits, under other circumstances. Much is gained, at all times, by the actual presence of the instructor, and the animation of the living voice. An impression is made by them which is rarely produced by the lifeless page of the printed volume. I do not of course mean that lecturing can ever take the place of study; but it is an admirable assistant. Then too the meetings of the Association possess the advantage of affording, in the discussions to which the memoirs are subjected, an opportunity for the friendly collision of intellect and the instructive comparison of opinions, which nothing but oral instruction can yield. These topics might be easily expanded, but I think I should undertake a very superfluous office should I endeavor more in detail on the present occasion, to set forth the usefulness of institutions of this kind.

I am aware that it has been objected to them at home and abroad, that they do not lead to the discovery of truth. The question is frequently asked, in reference to the great European Associations of this kind, What discoveries have been made by them? Well, Sir, in this demand for Discoveries as the test of usefulness, on the part of associated or individual effort, there is no little vagueness and a good deal of injustice. It appears to me quite unreasonable as an exclusive test of utility, to demand either of scientific bodies, or of single votaries of science, that they should make discoveries. If by "discoveries" we mean matters of fact before unknown, such as the discovery of the existence of the American Continent, or of the planet Uranus or Neptune, or of the effect of vaccination, it would be shutting up the domain of science within very narrow limits, to exclude from it all but a very few, who to the greatest sagacity and generally also the greatest diligence, have united the greatest good fortune. If we set up this standard, we should strike at the root not merely of this Association, but of almost every other specific form of scientific action.—Discoveries such as I mention are, necessarily, more or less casual in their immediate origin.—Or rather there is a happy inspiration,—an unexplained, inexplicable kindling of mind,—which no logic can teach, no discipline certainly produce. That the globe was spherical was not first conceived by Columbus; how happened it that he first formed the practical conception of reaching the Indies by sailing to the West? The perturbations of Uranus have been sustained by astronomers for a quarter of a century;—what inspired Leverrier and Adams alone, with the happy thought of deducing from them the existence of an undiscovered planet?

If we use the term "discovery," in reference to great general laws of nature, such as the Copernican System, the attraction of gravitation, the relations of electricity and magnetism, then the unreasonableness of objecting to scientific Associations, that they have not produced and are not likely to produce such results, is still more apparent. Discoveries of this kind, even though apparently referable to single authors, to particular periods of time, and to distinct courses of research, are so only in a limited degree. They are the product of the whole condition of science at the time;—they are its consummate flower; its ripened fruit. Such discoveries strike their roots far into the past,—they are not made; they have grown. The preparation of centuries has gradually opened the way for them;—hundreds of minds have taken part in the discovery, hundreds of years before it is made. At length the world of science is ripe for the grand result; the fullness of time is come; the gifted genius destined to put the last hand to the work is born, and the "discovery" is made; not seldom, perhaps, in popular acceptance, with an exaggeration of its absolute novelty; an overrating of the originality of the discoverer and consequent injustice to his predecessors.—Pope beautifully says,

"Nature and Nature's laws lay hid in night;—
God said, 'Let Newton be';—and all was light."

This certainly is very happily said, by way of epigrammatic eulogy;—but it would not bear scientific examination. The illustrious philosopher as just and modest as he was great, did not so deem of himself.—Were the laws of nature wholly hidden in darkness before the time of Newton? Had Copernicus, Tycho, Kepler, Galileo thrown no light upon them?

So, too, and perhaps this is a still more important reflection, after the discovery of some such general law is made, the work of Science is by no means exhausted. Even if it were true that Scientific Associations had no tendency to promote discovery, in either sense of the word, it might still be a matter of great importance, that they furnish occasions and facilities for illustrating and diffusing more widely the knowledge of the great laws of Nature. There is a point on which, if time permitted, and I were addressing an audience of young men who needed encouragements to engage with ardor in the pursuit of Science, I would gladly enlarge. I would say to them, fear not that the masters who have gone before you, have reaped the field of Science so thoroughly, as to leave neither harvest nor gleanings for their successors. True, indeed, the Newtons have lived and taught; not to supersede and render superfluous, but to prepare the way for disciples and followers, not unworthy to be called the Newtons of after ages. The discovery of a great law is an enlargement not an exhaustion of the domain of Science. Each new truth is a lever for the discovery of further truth. It may never be given again to the human intellect, (but who shall say that it never will be given,) to attain another generalization at once of such divine simplicity and stupendous magnitude as the Law of Gravitation. But I think it may with truth be said, that The System of the Universe resting on that law has been more fully developed by the successors of Newton than by himself. It was believed in 1729 that the maximum of telescopic power had been attained:—And the Solar System as then understood comprised six primary planets and ten secondaries!—There are now discovered nineteen planetary bodies which revolve round the Sun, and (if we allow two satellites for Neptune) twenty-one secondaries!

This important truth, that a great discovery not only leads to, but stands in need of further researches, is most happily expressed in a fine apostrophe of the poet Cowley to the philosopher Hobbes, which attracted my notice as I happened into the bookseller's the day before yesterday, and seemed to me so full of wisdom as to impress itself upon my memory. Cowley addresses Hobbes as "The great Columbus of the golden lands of new philosophies." Few persons, at the present day would be disposed to admit the claim of the philosopher of Malmesbury to this magnificent title. But the strain in which Cowley proceeds, however uncouth in point of versification, is singularly acute and discriminating:

"Thou great Columbus of the golden land of new Philosophies!

Thy task is harder much than his,
For thy learned America is
Not only first found out by thee,
And rudely left to future industry,
But thy eloquence and thy wit
Has planted, peopled, built and civilized it."

The verse is rude, but the lesson is significant. Columbus may set foot on a continent before unseen by civilized man; Copernicus may sweep away the cycles and epicycles of the Ptolemaic theory and establish the Sun on his central throne; and Newton may demonstrate the wondrous law which binds every member of the system,—forever attracted and forever repelled,—to that mysterious Centre. But after all these great discoveries have been made, there is not only room, there is a crying demand, a great intellectual necessity for further progress. Other discoverers, other philosophers must rise to unfold the consequences of these primordial truths;—to plant and people these scientific continents (if I may be allowed to carry on Cowley's metaphor) with new experiments and observations; to build them up with harmonious systems; to civilize them into a refined adaptation to the wants and service of moral beings.

This is the work left to the mass of the scientific community, and no one can reasonably deny that an association like ours is an approved and effective part of that system of concerted action, by which men advantageously unite themselves to accomplish desirable ends. And it is most cheering to learn from the example of the great discoverers that the materials for carrying on their work,—the elements of farther discovery,—surround us on every side. There is no error more gross than that the knowledge of the great truths which form the glory of modern science must be directly sought from the depths of the heavens above or of the abyss below. Or if philosophical analysis enables us, in some degree, to penetrate to the mysteries of the earth we inhabit or of the mighty universe of which it forms so small a part, it is by virtue of laws and principles exemplified as clearly in the notes that cheaply people the sun-beam,—as in the mighty spheres that are held in their orbits by the Sun. The law of gravitation was suggested to Newton, not by the magnificent spectacle of a comet drawn down to the sun from the outskirts of the solar system, but by an apple falling from a tree to the earth. The glass which I hold in my hand, with the water it contains, is of itself a richly stored cabinet of scientific truth. By the ancients, the water, believed to be a simple substance, was no doubt regarded chiefly as the element designed to moisten and fertilize the earth, to quench the thirst of man, to separate Greece from the lands of the Barbarians. By a great progress of art, it came to serve for the construction of a clepsydra. Modern science early took note of the expansive powers of steam;—The Marquis of Worcester, Savery, and Newcomen attempted and Bolton and Watt, perfected the machinery which has made the vapor of boiling water the life-spring of modern industry, and in the hands of our own Fulton converted it into the great means of commerce and communication around the globe. Questioned by chemical science, the same limpid element is made to yield to Cavendish and Priestley the secret of its gaseous composition, and thus becomes the starting point of no inconsiderable portion of our modern chemistry; teaching us at the outset the somewhat startling fact, that agua fortis and the common air we breathe consist of precisely the same ingredients, in proportions a little varied. Physiology here takes her turn; and my friend opposite, who favors me with an approving smile, (Prof. Agassiz,) is ready to subject the contents of the glass to the creative focus of his microscope, and to demonstrate the organization, circulation, and whole animal economy of orders of beings, whose existence is apparent only under the higher powers. Not content with the harvest of science to be reaped from the water, our worthy President (Professor Henry) is thinking of the glass. To his eye it is a tolerable cylinder. His mind runs upon electricity, induction, and the relations of galvanism and magnetism, to the illustration of which he has himself so materially contributed. Here we reach the magnetic telegraph,—the electric clock, and their application to the measurement of differences of longitude, and the observation and record of celestial phenomena;—an apparatus so wonderful that, as we have heard in the Sections, a child of twelve years old, who sees it for the first time, can observe and record the passage of a star over the wires of the micrometer, more correctly than it could be done by the most skilful observer in the ordinary way. Thus we are carried back to a more accurate observation of the heavens, by that electric spark which Franklin first drew from the clouds.

But it is time, Sir, to think of performing the duty for which I originally rose to address you. It is one of the most pleasing incidents of the present meeting of the Association that they have been attended by so many ladies. Many of the members of the Association from a distance have been accompanied with their wives and daughters who, together with the ladies of Cambridge, have not only from day to day honored our social table with their company, but have given their diligent attention in the Sections. The Association has, I understand, been favored in this way for the first time at the present meeting. I am sure I speak for all those who have taken part in the scientific transactions, that they have been animated and encouraged by this unusual presence; and the preserving attendance of our fair friends to the close of the session authorizes the hope that they have been gratified listeners. How much our social meetings in this hall have been enlivened by their presence I need not say. I trust the example which they have set, the present year, will be followed at the future meetings of the Association. When we recal the names of Caroline Herschell, of Mary Somerville, and may I not add of our own Maria Mitchell, we need no arguments to show that the cultivation of science is by no means the exclusive mission of man. The time may come perhaps when my successor in the duty I now perform will be called upon to return the acknowledgments of the Association not only to the ladies who have honored the meetings by their presence, but to those who have contributed to their Scientific Transactions. I beg leave, Sir, to submit the following motion:—

Resolved, that the thanks of the American Association for the Advancement of Science be given to the ladies who have honored the meetings of the Association with their attendance.

The question on this resolution was put by the President, and it was carried unanimously.

EDITOR'S TABLE.

CHRISTMAS.

It is a privilege of which we gladly avail ourselves, to send off a "merry Christmas" to each of our subscribers in the last pages of our December number, with the certainty of its being received, through the agency of steam, in time for the annual festivity. Our readers in Paris, (and we have many in that far-distant metropolis,) will get our benison before the jes de Noël is performed. Those who dwell in the far west, by the waters of the great Lakes, and in the dark forests of Minnesota, will also be assured of our good wishes over the game-dinner of Christmas day. Certain New England friends who stoutly maintain the orthodoxy of the blessed season in the face of Thanksgiving frolics, and hold to the doctrine of mince-pies as opposed to pumpkins, will accept and return, we trust, our cordial gratulations on the approach of the holiday period. And upon some good people on the borders of our sister Republic, who have helped to extend the Messenger among their fellow-citizens of Texas we shall come down, (without a failure of the mail,) with our "merry Christmas" on the eve of the "witching and hallowed time." Gentle readers, to one and all we say Benedicite!

THE YEAR BOOKS.

It was Leigh Hunt, we believe, who said in December "How pleasant it is to have fires again!" This exclamation of the jolly old cockney-poet is suggestive of in-door comfort in every shape, not only of ruddy hearthstones, but of small, well-furnished parlors, of great arm-chairs, and of the companionship of the annuals. The sight of a centre-table covered with these resplendent volumes, arrayed in the leather of Morocco and gleaming with the purple of Tyre, goes far to reconcile us to the notion that we live in a highly enlightened age of the world. What would our respected progenitors of the last century say, could they behold the dazzling books with which we now adorn our sitting-rooms! Indeed, what would the old Athenians, who walked among architectural triumphs that mankind has ever since vainly endeavored to imitate, say of these intellectual toys, could they rise from their graves and visit the book-shops of Broadway! Did Pericles have it in his power to make Aspasia such a present as the Drawing Room Scrap Book? Were there any Books of Beauty to preserve in line-engraving the features of Cleopatra? We are seriously of opinion that if we were called upon to say in what respect the nineteenth century most excels the age of Grecian supremacy, we should pass by the telegraph and the rail-car, and mention the exceeding perfection to which the art of book-making has been brought.

In saying this we allude more especially to the English publications, for in all the essentials of excellence in this department, John Bull is very far before us. We should advise our friends, therefore, who design making the customary interchange of tokens of affection, at the end of this year of grace, to get the London annuals, as "books which are books." Among the vast multitude of glittering quartos and folios from the American press with which the tables of the booksellers are loaded, for 1850, we have seen few that deserve special commendation and these few are not, strictly speaking, of the class of annuals. We mention such as we think meritorious.

A beautiful volume is the new edition of the Poems of Amelia, from the press of Appleton & Co. The golden cadences of Mrs. Welby's song are too familiar to the ears of our readers to demand our praise, so that we need only say that the present edition is a most worthy and acceptable one. A few very choice engravings, from designs by Weir, set off the sweet numbers of our favorite poetess.

The same publishers present a sumptuous volume in the "Women of the Old and New Testament," richly bound in styles from the antique. The engravings are very well executed, but we should have preferred, in the treatment of the subjects, a closer imitation of the Italian masters, as in the Madonna of Raphael in the Frontispiece. We most cordially commend the volume to the pretty-book-purchasing community.

Putnam, never backward in his branch of the arts, gives us a large batch of elegantly illustrated gift-books,—The Tales of a Traveller, Knickerbocker's History of New York, Irving's Life of Goldsmith, and Mrs. Ellet's "Family Pictures from the Bible," with designs by Darley, Maclise and other eminent artists. The Illustrated Sketch-Book, published last year, met with so large a sale, that Mr. Putnam brings out a new edition of it to accompany those above mentioned. We must notice also a really superb book published by Putnam, the "Lays of the Western World," which is highly creditable to the country, and is, perhaps, the very best of the flowering chrysanthemums of literature.

Every now and then we have a gala-day of pomp and parade, in our quiet little city of Richmond, which affords the daily press a capital opportunity for a good local paragraph. One such has recently occurred. That great chieftain, General Winfield Scott, was received by the military and citizens of Richmond, on Tuesday 13th November. The reception took place in the southern portico of the capitol, where an address of welcome was made by Wm. H. Macfarland, Esq., to which Gen. Scott responded in becoming terms. It was a brave sight, an autumnal sun shining down on that old warrior in his harness, surrounded by a large multitude, assembled to do him honor in the city of his early manhood, the metropolis of his native State. Those who were present will not readily forget it. Conspicuous on that occasion was a young soldier, distinguished by gallant service and a severe wound in the war with Mexico, whom Gen. Scott had honored with the confidential relation of aid-de-camp. In a late number of the Literary World we find a poem inscribed to this gentleman, which will be read with interest by those who know him.

TO BREVET CAPTAIN SCHUYLER HAMILTON.

"Mira il favorecido del Dios."*

It was not superstition's breath
That thus dispelled the fear of death;
Those words the aged chief bequeathed,
In memory's garland should be wreathed
To nerve thy soul in battle's strife,
And shield it from the wiles of life.
"Favored of God!" does his right arm
A chosen few protect from harm?
Can a frail mortal win by prayer,
The blessing of his partial care?
Those who have never wandered far
From childhood's high and cloudless star;
Whose primal love has kept its glow,
Who've held their birthright pure below;
The meek, the trustful, and the brave
Are nearer God than this world's slave;
Their life, thus charmed by noble zeal,
Wards evil off like tempered steel:
For self-possession, faith and skill
(The great preservatives from ill)—
Live in a soul where justice reigns,
And Honor more than Law restrains.
"Favored of God!"—O let this be
A holy watchword unto thee!—
A sign that thou art pledged to wear
Immunities which angels share,
Won on the earth in thy first youth,
By loyalty to Nature's truth!—

THEKLA.

One of the most touching of the compositions of poor Poe, is the Sonnet to his mother-in-law. It bears the impress of sincere feeling and seems to have been written in his better moments, when his spirit returning from "the misty mid-region of Weir" and the companionship of the Ghouls, betrayed that touch of nature which makes the whole world kin. Here is the Sonnet—

SONNET TO MY MOTHER.

Because the angels in the Heavens above,
Devoutly singing unto one another,
Can find amid their burning terms of love,
None so devotional as that of "mother,"
Therefore by that sweet name I long have called you;
You who are more than mother unto me,
Filling my heart of hearts, where God installed you,
In setting my Virginia's spirit free.
My mother—my own mother, who died early,
Was but the mother of myself; but you

* When severely wounded, Capt. Hamilton was taken to a hamlet near Monterey, where the Alcalde, observing the impress of a bullet on the button of his coat, assembling the children of the village around him, exclaimed—"Mira el favorecido del Dios!"—Behold one favored of God.

Are mother to the dead I loved so dearly,
 Are thus more precious than the one I knew,
 By that infinity with which my wife
 Was dearer to my soul than its soul life.

It is a melancholy thing to know that this lady has been left in the most destitute circumstances by the death of her son-in-law. We trust that "the humane and charitable" (as the advertisements of the Morning Post have it) will respond to the appeal that has already been made in her behalf, and we ask "the Brothers Cheeryble" of America (our faith is firm in the existence of such an amiable pair) to extend to her such relief as in the kindness of their hearts they shall think consonant with the dictates of philanthropy. It is a case calling for the exercise of that religion which we are assured is "pure and undefiled before God and the Father."

Those persons who desire to contribute to so noble a charity as this may make remittances to N. P. Willis Esq. Office of the Home Journal, New York City, who will apply the receipts to the immediate relief of Mrs. Clemm.

It is with sad feelings indeed that we copy the following announcement from the Southern Literary Gazette.

DIED.

In Charleston, S. C. on the morning of the 19th of September, after a protracted illness, Mary Elizabeth Lee, in whose beautiful character many of the virtues that adorn humanity were blended, and where meekness and humility shone pre-eminently. Her death has left a vacancy in the hearts of her loved and loving friends, which only time can fill up. To her immediate and devoted relatives her loss is irreparable. "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord."

Miss LEE was a daughter of William Lee Esq., and a niece of the late Judge Thomas Lee of Charleston, S. C. She contributed frequently to the best magazines of the country, both in prose and verse, and was an especial favorite with the readers of the Messenger, who will recollect the fine poetical talent developed in the Indian's Revenge, a Legend of Toccoa, in Four Parts, which was published in the 12th volume.

But a few days before this lovely being passed into the heavenly land, another spirit "whose lips o'erflowed with song," was called away to her final rest. Miss MARY G. WELLS, well known for her graceful contributions to the Messenger, died in Philadelphia on the 2nd of September last. Her disease was pulmonary consumption, that distressing malady which seems to be the chosen guise in which the dread angel approaches the fairest and meekest of earth's creatures. She lingered seven months, bearing her sufferings with the most affecting resignation, and looking with such tranquil composure for the last great change, that she herself chose a spot in the Cemetery of Laurel Hill as the receptacle of her earthly remains. There they now repose.

Thus, one by one, fall away the blossoms that adorn the rugged path of our earthly pilgrimage. Of the two kindred spirits whose decease we have just recorded, we may say, in the significant image of Bryant's elegiac verses, that it was meet that they should perish with the flowers, for their lives were assimilated to the radiant sphere to which they have taken flight, and they walked on earth as in the land of Beulah, catching at times bright glimpses of the Delectable Mountains.

NOTICES OF NEW WORKS.

REDBURN: His First Voyage. Being the Sailor-Boy Confessions and Reminiscences of the Son of a Gentleman, in the Merchant Service. By Herman Melville, author of "Typee," "Omoo," and "Mardi." New York: Harper & Brothers. 1849.

If this volume be an imaginary narrative then is it the most life-like and natural fiction since Robinson Crusoe's account of his life on the island of Juan Fernandez. Mr. Melville has made ample amends in Redburn for the grotesqueness and prolixity of his last work, "Mardi," which we found it impossible to read through. No one, we undertake to say, can find in this sailor-boy confession any incident that might not have happened—nay, that has not the air of strict probability. The descriptions of life before the mast, of the sailor boarding-houses in Liverpool, of dock service and fore-castle usages, are well-drawn and sometimes remind us of Smollett. For the purpose of introducing a few passages, we give an outline of the narrative.

Wellingborough Redburn, the son of a bankrupt merchant, living with his mother, then a widow, on the banks of the Hudson, resolves to go to sea. Carrying this resolution into effect he ships on board the Highlander, a first class merchantman, for Liverpool. Being quite a boy he meets with little consideration at the hands of the crew and begins to discover that the bunk of a ship (like a newly macadamized road to a light carriage) is not "what it's cracked up to be." His ideas of the captain in particular are greatly modified. He had seen that official all courtesy and sussexter-in-modo at the time he signed his articles in New York. At sea he was quite another sort of person. Redburn, with the utmost simplicity, designed making a social call on the captain in his cabin, encouraged by his affable manner on shore. This is his account of the matter, told with exquisite saivess—

"When two or three days had passed without the captain's speaking to me in any way, or sending word into the fore-castle that he wished me to drop into the cabin to pay my respects, I began to think whether I should not make the first advances, and whether indeed he did not expect it of me, since I was but a boy, and he a man; and perhaps that might have been the reason why he had not spoken to me yet, deeming it more proper and respectful for me to address him first. I thought he might be offended, too, especially if he were a proud man, with tender feelings. So one evening, a little before sundown, in the second dog-watch, when there was no more work to be done, I concluded to call and see him.

"After drawing a bucket of water, and having a good wash, to get off some of the chicken-coop stains, I went down into the fore-castle to dress myself as neatly as I could. I put on a white shirt in place of my red one, and got into a pair of cloth trousers instead of my duck ones, and put on my new pumps, and then carefully brushing my shooting jacket I put that on over all, so that upon the whole I made quite a genteel figure, at least for a fore-castle, though I would not have looked so well in a drawing-room.

"When the sailors saw me thus employed, they did not know what to make of it, and wanted to know whether I was dressing to go ashore; I told them no, for we were then out of sight of land; but that I was going to pay my respects to the captain. Upon which they all laughed and shouted, as if I were a simpleton; though there seemed nothing so very simple in going to make an evening call upon my friend. Then some of them tried to dissuade me, saying I was green and raw: but Jackson, who was looking on, cried out with a hideous grin—'Let him go, let him go, men—he is a nice boy. Let him go; the captain has some nuts and raisins for him.' And so he was going on, when one of his violent fits of coughing seized him, and he was almost choked.

"As I was about leaving the fore-castle, I happened to look at my hands, and seeing them stained all over of a deep yellow, for that morning the mate had set me to tarring some strips of canvass for the rigging, I thought it would never do to present myself before a gentleman that way; so for want of kids, I slipped on a pair of woollen mittens, which my mother had knit for me to carry to sea. As I was putting them on, Jackson asked me whether he shouldn't call a carriage; and another bade me not to forget to present his best respects to the skipper. I left them all tittering, and coming on deck was passing the cook-house, when the old cook called after me, saying I had forgot my cane.

"But I did not heed their impudence, and was walking straight towards the cabin-door on the quarter-deck, when the chief mate met me. I touched my hat, and was passing him, when, after staring at me till I thought his eyes would burst out, he all at once caught me by the collar, and with a voice of thunder, wanted to know what I meant by playing such tricks aboard a ship that he was mate of? I told him to let go of me or I would complain to my friend the captain, whom I intended to visit that evening. Upon this he gave me such a whirl round that I thought the Gulf Stream was in my head; and then shoved me forward, roaring out I know not what. Meanwhile the sailors were all standing round the windlass looking aft, mightily tickled.

"Seeing I could not effect my object that night, I thought it best to defer it for the present; and returning among the sailors, Jackson asked me how I had found the captain, and whether the next time I went, I would not take a friend along and introduce him.

"The upshot of this business was, that before I went to sleep that night, I felt well satisfied that it was not customary for sailors to call on the captain in the cabin; and I began to have an inkling of the fact that I had acted like a fool; but it all arose from my ignorance of sea usages."

The Jackson here mentioned is the petty tyrant of the fore-castle, who maltreats his inferiors and exercises a hard sway over Redburn.

After a thirty days' passage the Highlander at last hauls up in Prince's Dock, Liverpool, and Redburn goes ashore to look about him. After getting comfortably installed at the "Baltimore Clipper," a nautical caravansera, he takes a turn of the town assisted by an old guide-book which his father had purchased on a visit to Liverpool many years before. The book of course is superannuated, antediluvian, and our young hero is sensibly affected in not being able to find the haunts of the father as marked down in it. All attempts to discover a certain Riddough's Hotel, whereat his father had lodged, proving fruitless, he speculates on it as follows—

"Then, indeed, a new light broke in upon me concerning my guide-book; and all my previous dim suspicions were almost confirmed. It was nearly half a century behind the age! and no more fit to guide me about the town than the map of Pompeii.

"It was a sad, a solemn, and a most melancholy thought. The book on which I had so much relied; the book in the old morocco cover; the book with the cocked-hat corners; the book full of fine old family associations; the book with seventeen plates, executed in the highest style of art; this precious book was next to useless. Yea, the thing that had guided the father, could not guide the son. And I sat down on a shop step, and gave loose to meditation.

"Here, now, oh, Wellingborough, thought I, learn a lesson and never forget it. This world, my boy, is a moving world; its Riddough's Hotels are forever being pulled down; it never stands still; and its sands are forever shifting. This very harbor of Liverpool is gradually filling up, they say; and who knows what your son (if you ever have one) may behold, when he comes to visit Liverpool, as long after you as you come after his grandfather. And, Wellingborough, as your father's guide-book is no guide for you, neither would yours (could you afford to buy a modern one to day) be a true guide to those who come after you. Guide-books, Wellingborough, are the least reliable books in all literature; and nearly all literature, in one sense, is made up of guide-books. Old ones tell us the way our fathers went, through the thoroughfares and courts of old; but how few of those former places can their posterity trace, amid avenues of modern erections; to how few is the old guide-book now a clew! Every age makes its own guide-books, and the old ones are used for waste paper. But there is one Holy Guide-Book, Wellingborough, that will never lead you astray, if you but follow it aright; and some noble monuments that remain, though the pyramids crumble.

"But though I rose from the door-step a sadder and a wiser boy, and though my guide-book had been stripped of its reputation for infallibility, I did not treat with contumely or disdain, those sacred pages which had once been a beacon to my sire."

Redburn begins to observe critically the sights of Liverpool and to comment thereupon. His reflections on the draught-horses are quite philosophical:

"Among all the sights of the docks, the noble truck-horses are not the least striking to a stranger. They are large and powerful brutes, with such sleek and glossy coats, that they look as if brushed and put on by a valet every morning. They march with a slow and stately step, lifting their ponderous hoofs like royal Siam elephants. Thou shalt not lay stripes upon the Roman citizens; for their docility is such, they are guided without rein or lash; they go or come, halt or march on, at a whisper. So grave, dignified, gentlemanly, and courteous did the fine truck-horses look—so full of calm intelligence and sagacity, that often I endeavored to get into conversation with them, as they stood in contemplative attitudes while their loads were preparing. But all I could get from them was the mere recognition of a friendly neigh; though I would stake much upon it that, could I have spoken in their language, I would have derived from them a good deal of valuable information touching the docks, where they passed the whole of their dignified lives.

"There are unknown worlds of knowledge in brutes; and whenever you mark a horse, or a dog, with a peculiarly mild, calm, deep-seated eye, be sure he is an Aristotle or a Kant, tranquilly speculating upon the mysteries in man. No philosophers so thoroughly comprehend us as dogs and horses. They see through us at a glance. And after all, what is a horse, but a species of four-footed dumb man, in a leathern overall, who happens to live upon oats, and toils for his masters, half-required or abused, like the biped hewers of wood and drawers of water? But there is a touch of divinity even in brutes, and a special halo about a horse, that should forever exempt him from indignities. As for those majestic, magisterial truck-horses of the docks, I would as soon think of striking a judge on the bench, as to lay violent hand upon their holy hides.

"It is wonderful what loads their majesties will condescend to draw. The truck is a large square platform, on four low wheels; and upon this the lumpers pile bale after bale of cotton, as if they were filling a large warehouse, and yet a procession of three of these horses will tranquilly walk away with the whole."

We should like to quote the passage descriptive of Redburn's stroll into the country and his evening meal with the hospitable cottager and his three rosy-cheeked daughters, which stands in striking relief to the melodramatic midnight trip to London with Harry Bolton, but we have no room for it. We must be getting back with Redburn on his return voyage with its tragic incidents, one of which we copy, passing by the thrilling transcript of the pestilence in the steerage. Our quotation, (the last we can make,) is the death of Jackson, who has long labored under an incurable consumption.

"Off Cape Cod!" said the steward, coming forward from the quarter-deck, where the captain had just been taking his noon observation; sweeping the vast horizon with his quadrant, like a dandy circumnavigating the dress-circle of an amphitheater with his glass.

"Off Cape Cod!" and in the shore-bloom that came to us—even from that desert of sand-hillocks—methought I could almost distinguish the fragrance of the rose-bush my sisters and I had planted, in our far inland garden at home. Delicious odors are those of our mother Earth; which like a flower-pot set with a thousand shrubs, greets the eager voyager from afar.

"The breeze was stiff, and so drove us along that we turned over two broad, blue furrows from our bows, as we plowed the watery prairie. By night it was a reef-top-sail-breeze; but so impatient was the captain to make his port before a shift of wind overtook us, that even yet we carried a maintop-gallant-sail, though the light mast sprung like a switch.

"In the second dog-watch, however, the breeze became such, that at last the order was given to douse the top-gallant-sail, and clap a reef into all three top-sails.

"While the men were settling away the halyards on deck, and before they had begun to haul out the reef-tackles, to the surprise of several, Jackson came up from the fore-castle, and, for the first time in four weeks or more, took hold of a rope.

"Like most seamen, who during the greater part of a voyage, have been off duty from sickness, he was, perhaps, desirous, just previous to entering port, of reminding the captain of his existence, and also that he expected his wages; but, alas! his wages proved the wages of sin.

"At no time could he better signalize his disposition to work than upon an occasion like the present; which generally attracts every soul on deck, from the captain to the child in the steerage.

"His aspect was damp and death-like; the blue hollows of his eyes were like vaults full of snakes; and issuing so unexpectedly from his dark tomb in the fore-castle, he looked like a man raised from the dead.

"Before the sailors had made fast the reef-tackle, Jackson was tottering up the rigging; thus getting the start of them, and securing his place at the extreme weather-end of the topsail-yard—which in reefing is accounted the post of honor. For it was one of the characteristics of this man, that though when on duty he would shy away from mere dull work in a calm, yet in tempest-time he always claimed the van, and would yield it to none; and this, perhaps, was one cause of his unbounded dominion over the men.

"Soon we were all strung along the main-topsail yard; the ship rearing and plunging under us, like a runaway steed; each man griping his reef-point, and sideways leaning, dragging the sail over toward Jackson whose business it was to confine the reef corner to the yard.

"His hat and shoes were off; and he rode the yard-arm end, leaning backward to the gale, and pulling at earing-rope, like a bridle. At all times, this is a moment of frantic exertion with sailors, whose spirits seem then to partake of the commotion of the elements, as they hang in the gale, between heaven and earth; and then it is too, that they are the most profane.

"Haul out to windward!" coughed Jackson, with a blasphemous cry, and he threw himself back with a violent strain upon the bridle in his hand. But the wild words were hardly out of his mouth, when his hands dropped to his side, and the belying sail was spattered with a torrent of blood from his lungs.

"As the man next him stretched out his arm to save, Jackson fell headlong from the yard, and with a long seethe, plunged like a diver into the sea.

"It was when the ship had rolled to windward, which, with the long projection of the yard-arm over the side, made him strike far out upon the water. His fall was seen by the whole upward-gazing crowd on deck, some of whom were spotted with the blood that trickled down the sail, while they raised a spontaneous cry, so shrill and wild that a blind man might have known something deadly had happened.

"Clutching our reef-points, we hung over the stick, and gazed down to the one white, bubbling spot, which had closed over the head of our shipmate; but the next minute it was brewed into the common yeast of the waves and Jackson never arose. We waited a few minutes, expecting an order to descend, haul back the fore-yard, and man the boat; but instead of that, the next sound that greeted us was, 'Bear a hand, and reef away, men!' from the mate.

"Indeed, upon reflection, it would have been idle to attempt to save Jackson; for besides that he must have been dead, ere he struck the sea—and if he had not been dead then, the first immersion must have driven his soul from his lacerated lungs—our jolly-boat would have taken full fifteen minutes to launch into the waves."

Our readers will be satisfied after the extracts we have given that Redburn is no ordinary book. We trust Mr. Melville may write many more such, and let Polynesia alone in future, as a field that he has himself fully exhausted. We have had enough of Babbalanja and the anthropopagi generally and we regard la belle sauvage as a young lady who has had her day.

Redburn is for sale by Morris and Brother.

THE MONUMENTS OF EGYPT; or Egypt a Witness for the Bible. By Francis L. Hawks, D. D., LL. D. With Notes of a Voyage up the Nile by an American. New York: George P. Putnam, 155 Broadway. London: John Murray. M.DCCC.L.

Dr. Hawks has rendered a real and valuable service to literature and to religion in the compilation of the present volume,—we say compilation, because he disclaims all pretension to originality in the preface. His object has been to collect into a simple and intelligible compend, the results of the research of all the most enlightened explorers of the wide field of Egyptian archaeology. In this design he has been abundantly successful. Indeed no one united in himself so many requisites for the accomplishment of the task as Dr. Hawks. A man of profound learning and most refined taste, he had visited in person the ruins and monuments which are the subject of the present inquiry, and with their appearance fresh in his memory, he was peculiarly well fitted to sum up the evidence of earlier visitors. The interest which still invests the land of the pyramids, and makes the shattered sculptures of Thebes eloquent of a remote grandeur, will render the labors of Dr. Hawks acceptable to all; while the Christian world will receive with thanks a learned and truthful exposition, tending to illustrate and confirm the record of the Scriptures. Not the least readable portion of the work is the account of a "Voyage up the Nile" during 1848 and 1849, by an intelligent American gentleman whose name is not given.

The style of the publication is very excellent, being uniform with "Layard's Nineveh," recently issued from the same establishment. The book is for sale by Nash & Woodhouse.

THE FOUR GOSPELS; Arranged as a Practical Family Commentary, for every day in the Year. By the author of "The Peep of Day," &c., &c., &c. New York: D. Appleton & Company, 200 Broadway. Philadelphia: Geo. S. Appleton, 164 Chestnut street. M.DCCC.L.

It is enough to say of this excellent publication that it comes forth in the beautiful typography of the Appletons and under the editorial auspices of a learned and eloquent divine, the Rev. Dr. Stephen H. Tyng, Rector of St. George's Church, New York City. It will be found an instructive companion to the study of that saddest and most touching of all histories narrated in the sublime record of the Evangelists.

The book is illustrated with twelve steel engravings and is for sale by Morris & Brother, and Harrold & Murray.

THE HISTORY OF ALFRED THE GREAT, by Jacob Abbott. With Engravings. New York: Harper & Brothers.

Again we congratulate our little friends on their good fortune in having within their reach the story of a great monarch told in the agreeable style of Mr. Abbott. We have already taken occasion to express ourselves in warm terms of praise with regard to Mr. Abbott's historical series, and can only say of the present volume that it is, in all respects, excellent. We are not surprised to learn that the sale of these histories has been unprecedented.

The History of Alfred the Great may be obtained of Morris & Brother.

EVENINGS AT WOODLAWN. By Mrs. Ellett, author of "The Women of the Revolution." New York: Baker and Scribner. 1849.

We have here an agreeable collection of German legends, introduced to us through the medium of a pleasant little fiction, which supposes them to have been read out to the family circle of the Guions at Woodlawn, by a certain Professor Azele, deeply versed in continental literature. The translations are very spirited and faithful, embracing selections from Grimm, Hoffman, La Motte Fouqué and other distinguished German writers. Mrs. Ellett, who is one of our most entertaining writers, will receive the thanks of all those who read to be amused, for her present tasteful addition to the domain of English fiction.

For sale by Morris & Brother.

THE PILOT; A Tale of the Sea. By the author of "The Spy," "Pioneers," &c., &c. Revised, corrected, and Illustrated with a new Introduction, Notes, etc. By the Author. New York: George P. Putnam, 155 Broadway. 1849.

It is now twenty-six years since the original publication of "The Pilot," and in the mean time, a host of far less worthy volumes has supplied the wants of the reader of romance; so that the new edition will have all the freshness of novelty to the present generation. We know many old gentlemen too, who have declared their intention of reviving their early impressions of Mr. Cooper by reading over his first and best writings, now that they can do so, without fatiguing the eyesight, in the fair, clear print of Mr. Putnam's library copies.

"The Pilot" may be obtained of Messrs. Nash & Woodhouse.

ADDRESS "ON THE VALUE OF WRITING," Delivered before the Society of Alumni of the University of Virginia, at their Annual meeting, June 29th 1849. By GEORGE E. DABNEY. Charlottesville: Printed by O. S. Allen and Co. 1849.

It is a proud thing for our State University that, before she has attained a quarter of a century, she can point to such men as Mr. Dabney among her foster-children. It is gratifying, too, to see one who is identified, as it were, with the interests of another institution of learning, recognizing the filial obligation by lending interest to her anniversary. We had the good fortune to hear the address of Mr. Dabney, which now lies before us in printed form, and the favorable impression made upon us by the happy manner and musical voice of the orator has been confirmed in the perusal of it. We have seldom seen the "Value of Writing" so clearly and elegantly announced. Mr. Dabney's style is singularly chaste and pure, free from the affectation of "fine-writing" and yet sufficiently adorned with the graces of the rhetorician.

LOS GRINGOS: OR, AN INSIDE VIEW OF MEXICO AND CALIFORNIA. With Wanderings in Peru, Chili and Polynesia. By Lieut. Wise, U. S. N. New York: Baker & Scribner. 1849.

We have an objection to make, à propos, to the volume before us, of a very serious nature, that whereas having read in the preface that Los Gringos is the Anglo-Spanish designation for greenhorns, we proceeded in the confident expectation of being amused with the blunders and escapades of a land-lubber at sea and in "foreign parts," and found only a very graphic and entertaining account of the adventures of a naval officer who was not green at all, but on the contrary exceedingly sharp and possessing a charming sauvage the wide world over. Lieut. Wise we should take to be a capital compagnon du voyage, full of animal spirits under all circumstances, prepared for all the emergencies of service, ready to clear decks either for an engagement or a bal dansé, and not backward in paying his devoirs, (if we may be pardoned another Gallicism,) to the softer sex — from China to Peru.

We have spent some pleasant moments in the perusal of his volume, which is written in a careless, conversational, unambitious quarter-deck style that one cannot except to even in the most critical mood. A vast deal of useful knowledge may be gathered from Lieut. Wise's narrative relating to California and the islands of the Pacific, and we think the author fairly entitled to the praise awarded by Horace to him who mixes the agreeable with the instructive.

The book is for sale by Morris & Brother.

THE SACRED PORTS OF ENGLAND AND AMERICA, From the Earliest to the Present Time. Edited by Rufus W. Griswold. Illustrated with Fine Steel Engravings. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 200 Broadway. 1850.

We are glad to see a new and improved edition of this tasteful compilation. The devotional poetry it contains has been selected with great judgment by Dr. Griswold, and the typography and embellishments of the volume are very beautiful.

It may be obtained at the bookstores of Nash & Woodhouse, Harrold & Murray, and Morris & Brother.

THE JEFFERSON MONUMENT MAGAZINE. Conducted by the Students of the University of Virginia. November, 1849. Charlottesville, Va. James Alexander.

The November number of this neat little publication is before us. We have looked over its contents with some care, and so far as we are able to judge, it exhibits a gratifying improvement upon either of the former magazines "conducted by the Students of the University." We hope that this work, which is prosecuted for the laudable purpose of providing a fund for the erection of a monument to the "Father" of the institution, will, in reality as in name, be "conducted by the Students of the University" and not merely by a few designated as the Editorial Committee. We well recollect, (and we must say, hæc meminisse juvat), that in the days of the Collegian, it was the habit of the body of the students to leave the entire work of the magazine to the five unhappy individuals who had been chosen as Editors, and to play the critic upon their performances afterwards, as each monthly number appeared. We trust our successors will manage these things better. Among three hundred and twenty young gentlemen engaged in the study of the liberal sciences, (we rejoice at this large number,) there should certainly be talent enough to make a monthly magazine of the highest excellence.

The articles in the present number of the "Jefferson Monument Magazine" are varied and pleasing. We are glad to see in it a just and discriminating review of the poems of P. P. Cooke.

THE OLD WORLD: Or Scenes and Cities in Foreign Lands. By William Furniss. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 200 Broadway. 1849.

So much have been written on the subject of European travel of late years that the success of a work of this character depends altogether upon the point of view from which the author regards the countries described. Mr. Furniss seems to have gone over the route, as Cæsar went into Gaul, summa diligentia, with great haste, and also, as the old joke renders it, on the top of a diligence. His sketches, however, are agreeable and never tire the reader. The work is well-printed and embellished with wood-cuts and an excellent map of Europe.

For sale by Morris & Brother, Nash & Woodhouse, and Harrold & Murray.

THE AMERICAN ALMANAC and Repository of Useful Knowledge for the year 1850. Boston: Charles C. Little and James Brown.

The character of this most excellent publication is well set forth in the title. It is a "Repository of Useful Knowledge for the year 1850" containing not merely the ordinary astronomical calculations of Almanacs, but every thing in the way of statistics that is desirable to know of the commercial interests of the country, together with accurate lists of the officers of Government in the Departments of State, War, Treasury, Navy and Interior, the posture of our foreign relations, etc., etc. No one who wishes to have at hand the most reliable facts in connection with the progress of the United States should be without this valuable compendium. Persons residing in the country can obtain it free of postage by remitting one Dollar to the publishers, Little and Brown, Boston.

Morris & Brother have it for sale in Richmond.

THE BIBLE. A BOOK FOR THE WORLD. An Address Delivered before the Cadet's Bible Society of the Virginia Military Institute, May 1st, 1849. By B. M. Smith, Pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Staunton, Va. New York: John Wiley, 161 Broadway. 1849.

This is a short and well written address. It presents in rapid view the claims of the sacred volume upon the consideration of the world, as a book of history, a teacher of great principles, a conservator of human interests and a patron of learning. Mr. Smith has done well in consenting to the publication of this address which he tells us in the preface was written with no view to its appearance in print.

SOUTHERN AND WESTERN TRAVELLER'S GUIDE. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 200 Broadway. 1849.

The want of such a publication as this has long been felt. The Southern and Western traveller will find this Guide a most valuable vade mecum, containing the fullest and latest intelligence of the routes of travel, with excellent maps of all the principal cities and rivers. It is published at a very moderate price and may be obtained at all the bookstores.

GEORGE P. PUTNAM has issued the first volume of the promised edition of Goldsmith's Miscellaneous Works, and "The Neighbors," the first volume of a new edition of Miss Bremer's works, published under the immediate superintendence of the charming Swedish novelist herself. Both of these books are of the choicest description as regards typography and outward appearance. "The Neighbors" contains an original preface, written by Miss Bremer, during her recent visit to Mr. Downing at Newburgh on the Hudson, together with a handsome portrait and autograph. It is enough to say of the edition of Goldsmith, that it is the only complete one ever published, and much to be preferred in externals to any from the presses of London or Paris.

We are indebted to the obliging Richmond agents, Messrs. Nash & Woodhouse, for copies of Blackwood's Magazine and the Foreign Reviews, for the October quarter.

1

